

BIBLIOTHECA REGIA MONACENSIS.

<36600683010010

<36600683010010

Bayer. Staatsbibliothek

COBBETT'S
Parliamentary History
OF ENGLAND.

VOL. V.

CORBETT'S

Parliamentary History

OF ENGLAND.

VOL. VI.

COBBETT'S
Parliamentary History
OF ENGLAND.

FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST, IN 1066,

TO

THE YEAR 1803.

FROM WHICH LAST-MENTIONED EPOCH IT IS CONTINUED

DOWNWARDS IN THE WORK ENTITLED,

“COBBETT'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.”

VOL. V.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE REVOLUTION, IN 1688,
TO THE ACCESSION OF QUEEN ANNE, IN 1702.

LONDON:

PRINTED BY T. C. HANSARD, PETERBOROUGH-COURT, FLEET-STREET.

PUBLISHED BY R. BAGSHAW, BRYDGES STREET, COVENT GARDEN; AND SOLD
BY J. BUDD, PALL-MALL; J. FAULDER, NEW BOND-STREET; SHERWOOD, NEELEY AND JONES, PATERNOSTER-ROW; BLACK, PARRY AND KINGSEURY, LEADENHALL-STREET; BELL AND BRADFUTE, EDINBURGH; AND J. ARCHER, DUBLIN.

1809.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE present Volume embraces the period from the Revolution, in 1688, to the Accession of QUEEN ANNE, in the year 1702. For this period, the materials, as well for the Proceedings as the Debates, have been, for the most part, collected from the following Works: 1. The Journals of the House of Lords; 2. The Journals of the House of Commons; 3. The Debates of the House of Commons, from 1688 to 1694, collected by the Honourable Anchitell Grey, who was forty years member for the town of Derby; 4. The Debate between the Lords and the Commons, at a Free Conference, held in the Painted Chamber, in the Session of the Convention in 1688, relating to the words, “Abdicated,” and “the Vacancy of the Throne,” used in the Vote of the Commons; 5. A Collection of the Debates and Proceedings in Parliament in 1694 and 1695, upon the Inquiry into the [then] late Briberies and corrupt Practices, printed in the year 1695; 6. Proceedings in the House of Commons against Sir John Fenwick, printed in the year 1698; 7. Timberland’s History and Proceedings of the House of Lords; and, 8. Chandler’s History and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

Here again, as in the former Volumes, recourse has been had to the best historians and contemporary writers; and, amongst others, to Burnet, Echard, Kennet, Oldmixon, Ralph, Tindal, Boyer, and Somerville. The Hardwicke Papers have also been consulted; together with the State Tracts, and the Harleian Collection.

There is subjoined, by way of Appendix, a Collection of very scarce and valuable Parliamentary Tracts, taken from those of Lord Sommers, the Harleian Miscellany, and the Collection of State Tracts published during the reign of William the Third.

April 15, 1809.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME V.

I. PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.	X. PROTESTS.
II. ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT.	XI. ARMY, NAVY, FINANCE. &c.
III. ADDRESSES.	XII. PERSONS FILLING THE SEVERAL HIGH OFFICES OF STATE, FROM THE REVOLUTION IN 1688, TO THE ACCESSION OF QUEEN ANNE IN 1702.
IV. DECLARATIONS.	XIII. CONTENTS OF THE APPENDIX.
V. KING'S LETTERS.	XIV. INDEX OF THE NAMES OF THE SEVERAL SPEAKERS IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.
VI. KING'S MESSAGES.
VII. KING'S SPEECHES.
VIII. LISTS OF THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
IX. PETITIONS.

I. PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

1688.		4 JAMES II.	Page
Oct. 10.	The Prince of Orange's First Declaration	- - - - -	1
24.	The Prince of Orange's Additional Declaration	- - - - -	11
28.	A Counterfeit Declaration published in the Prince of Orange's Name	- - - - -	13
Nov. 5.	The King's Answer to the Prince of Orange's Declaration	- - - - -	15
	The Petition of several Lords to the King for calling a Parliament—
	The King's Answer	- - - - -	16
	Lord Devonshire's PAPER	- - - - -	17
	The Nottingham PAPER	- - - - -	17
	The King's Proclamation, declaring a General Pardon	- - - - -	18
	The King's Proposals to the Prince of Orange—His Highness's Answer	- - - - -	18

INTERREGNUM.

	The King leaves Whitehall, and throws the Great Seal into the Thames	- - - - -	19
Dec. 11.	Meeting of the Peers at Guild Hall—Their Declaration	- - - - -	19
	Address of the City of London to the Prince of Orange	- - - - -	20

1688.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
Dec. 21. The Lords meet the Prince of Orange at St. James's—His Highness's Speech	21
23. The King's Paper, left behind him when he took shipping for France	21
25. The Peers assemble at Westminster, and Address the Prince of Orange	23
The Prince of Orange summons the Commons—His Speech to them	24
—They form themselves into a House—Their Address to the Prince
—The Prince's Answer	24

MEETING OF THE CONVENTION.

1688-9.

Jan. 22. List of the Members of the Convention	26
Mr. Powel chosen Speaker of the House of Commons	32
The Prince of Orange's Letter to both Houses—Debate thereon	32
Address of both Houses to the Prince—The Prince's Answer	33
Debate on filling up the Vacancies of the House	34
The King's Letter to both Houses	35
28. Debate on the State of the Nation	36
Vote of the Commons, declaring the Throne vacant	50
29. Further Debate on the State of the Nation	50
Thanks voted to the Clergy, Army, and Navy	58
Proceedings in the Lords on the Vote of Vacancy	58
Feb. 1. A tumultuous Petition set on foot	60
2. Debate in the Commons on the Lords' Amendment of the Word "ABDICATED;"—A Conference with the Lords thereon	61
6. DEBATE AT A FREE CONFERENCE, RELATING TO THE WORD "ABDICATED"	66
7. The Lords agree to the Vote of Vacancy	108
13. THE DECLARATION OF RIGHTS	108
The Prince of Orange's Answer thereto	111

WILLIAM AND MARY.

William and Mary proclaimed King and Queen	111
Settlement of the Court, Council, and Ministry	113
The CONVENTION turned into a Parliament	118
18. The King's Speech to both Houses	118
19. Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech	119
Debate on the Bill for preventing Doubts concerning the assembling and sitting of this Parliament	122
The Convention voted a Parliament	134
25. Further Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech	135
Debate on taking away the old Oaths of Allegiance, &c.	137
26. Debate on the King's Revenue	138
27. The Commons resolve to stand by the King with their Lives and Fortunes	150
March 1. State of the Revenue delivered in by Sir R. Howard	150
The King's Message relative to the Hearth Money—Debate thereon	152
The King's Message on committing several Persons—Debate thereon	153
Debate on the Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act	156
5. Report from the Committee of Grievances	159
Debate on Grievances	159
6. Protest on the Bill for regulating Trials	162
8. The King's Answer to the Address of Lives and Fortunes	162
9. Debate on a Motion for printing the Votes	164
11. Debate on the King's Speech	168
Debate on the Bill for annulling lord Russel's Attainder	169
Farther Debate on the King's Revenue	171

		Page
Mar. 14.	Debate on the Vote for indemnifying the Dutch - - -	175
15.	Debate on the Mutiny of lord Dumbarton's Regiment - - -	179
16.	Debate on the Bill for disarming Papists - - -	182
	The King's Speech in favour of Dissenters - - -	184
20.	Debate on the Bill for regulating Trials - - -	184
	Account of the Produce of the Excise - - -	187
	Estimate of the Charge of Government - - -	189
	Further Debate on the King's Revenue - - -	191
22.	Debate on the Supply for Ireland - - -	193
	Bill brought into the House of Lords to abrogate the former Oaths— Protest thereon - - -	196
25.	The King's Message, recommending a Bill of Indemnity—Debate thereon - - -	198
	Debate on the Coronation Oath - - -	199
26.	Estimate for the Fleet, and Extract of the Treaty with Holland -	206
	Debate on settling a Revenue on the Princess Anne - - -	207
28.	Debate on the Coronation Oath - - -	208
April 4.	The Bill of Comprehension—Protest thereon - - -	212
11.	THE KING AND QUEEN CROWNED—The Speaker's congratulatory Speech to their Majesties upon the Coronation—The King's Answer	215
19.	Address of both Houses to the King, thanking him for his Care of the Protestant Religion—The King's Answer - - -	216
	Debate on the Lords' Amendment of the Bill for abrogating the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy—Conference on the said Bill —Protest against not agreeing with the Commons—The Lords' Reply to the Commons' Reasons—Debate on the said Reply— Debate thereon at a second Free Conference - - -	218
24.	Debate on rewarding the Duke of Schomberg - - -	231
	Address of the Commons for a War with France—The King's Answer	234
26.	The Civil List settled - - -	235
	A List of Perpetuities and Pensions during Life or Lives, &c. -	236
	Report concerning Sir Thomas Armstrong - - -	244
30.	Resolutions for raising the Navy Supplies - - -	245
May 1.	The Case of Edmund Prideaux, esq. - - -	245
4.	A Bill from the Lords rejected - - -	246
7.	Debate on some Words that passed between Captain Bertie and Mr. Harbord - - -	247
8.	Debate on the Bill of Rights and Succession - - -	249
10.	Twelve pence in the pound Land Tax granted—The Petition of George Speke, esq. - - -	253
13.	Sir H. Monson and Lord Fanshaw expelled, for refusing to take the Oaths - - -	253
14.	Debate on the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity - - -	255
17.	Debate on the Bill of Indulgence to Dissenters - - -	263
22.	Debate on the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill - - -	266
23.	Titus Oates's Petition to the Commons - - -	277
	Exceptions voted in the Bill of Indemnity - - -	278
	Report of Monies issued from the Exchequer for Crown Prosecutions —Resolutions thereon - - -	278
June 1.	Debate on the Neglect of relieving Londonderry - - -	280
3.	Debate on the Heads for the Bill of Indemnity - - -	284
	Debate on the Judgments against Titus Oates - - -	289
12.	Farther Debate on the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity - - -	296
13.	Debate on King James's Declaration - - -	302
14.	The Judges examined touching the Dispensing Power - - -	308
15.	Report of Mrs. Fitzharris's Case - - -	313
	Address of the Commons relating to the Irish Protestants - - -	314
	Further Debate on the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity - - -	315
18.	Debate on an Address to the King to secure the Garrisons, &c. -	329

		Page
June 18.	The Judges again examined touching the Dispensing Power -	332
	Debate on Mr. Justice Wythens—Lord Chief Justice Wright—Lord Chief Justice Bedingfield -	338
19.	Debate on the Lords' Amendments to the Bill of Rights and Succession -	339
	Debate on certain Treasonable Papers communicated to the Commons by order of the King -	341
	Further Debate on the Lords' Amendments to the Bill of Rights and Succession -	345
21.	Petition of John Bearcroft, esq. Serjeant at Arms to Charles II. -	347
22.	Debate on Irish Miscarriages -	348
24.	Case of Mr. Samuel Johnson—Resolutions thereon -	349
	ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against Sir Adam Blair and others, for dispersing King James's Declaration -	350
	Debate on the Breach of Privilege upon the Earl of Danby -	353
	Debate on Mr. Justice Bedingfield, touching the Dispensing Power -	354
25.	Debate on a Petition, being presented from the City of London, unsigned -	356
	Petition from the Common Council of London for taking off the Tests -	359
26.	Debate on the Impeachment of Sir Adam Blair and others -	360
28.	Report of the Warrant against the Earl of Danby—Debate thereon -	363
	The King's quickening Speech to both Houses -	368
	Debate in the Commons thereon -	369
July 1.	Further Debate on the Heads of Exceptions in the Bill of Indemnity -	371
10.	Sir F. Pemberton and Sir T. Jones examined—Reasons to be offered at a Conference on the Bill of Rights—Judgment of the King's Bench against a late Speaker reversed -	379
12.	The King's Message for a Recess—The King's Answers to two Addresses—Mr. Jephson's Vindication -	380
16.	Report of a Conference with the Lords on the Bill of Rights -	382
	The Duke of Schomberg takes leave of the House -	382
25.	Report from the Council Books, relating to the collecting of the Customs and Excise—Reasons for not agreeing with the Lords' Amendments to the Bill for an Additional Duty on Coffee, &c.—The Lords' Reasons for insisting on their Proviso to the said Bill -	384
31.	Report of the Conference on the Bill for reversing the Judgments against Oates—Protest thereon -	386
Aug. 13.	Reasons to be offered at a Conference with the Lords for settling the Order of Conferences -	397
	Petition against Colonel Copley -	399
	A tumultuous Petition of the Silk Weavers, occasioned by a Woollen Bill -	400
	Conference on the Bill of Attainder -	401
20.	The Speakers' Speech to the King at the Adjournment—The King's Speech to both Houses -	401

SECOND SESSION OF THE CONVENTION PARLIAMENT.

Oct. 25.	Proceedings against Burton, Graham, &c.—The Earls of Salisbury and Peterborough impeached—An Enquiry voted into the Conduct of the War -	405
Nov. 2.	Debate on the State of the War -	407
6.	Debate on the Bill of Rights -	411
	Debate on Major-General Ludlow's coming to England -	412
	Debate on attaching Lord Chancellor Jeffreys -	413
7.	Debate on the Supply -	415
11.	Debate on the State of Ireland -	418
	Case of Lord Griffin—Petition of Lord Preston -	420

	Page
Nov. 13. Mr. Trenchard and Mr. Hampden sent for by the Lords touching the Murder of Lord Russel—Debate thereon - - -	421
Debate on the Merchants' Petition against Captain Churchill - - -	425
14. Debate on the State of the Nation - - -	429
15. Debate on disfranchising the Borough of Stockbridge for Bribery and Corruption - - -	433
16. Debate on the Defect of Ordnance, &c. - - -	435
18. Debate on the Charge against Captain Churchill for taking Money for Convoys - - -	439
19. Dr. Walker receives the Thanks of the Commons for his gallant Defence of Londonderry - - -	443
Debate on a Petition from the Jews - - -	444
Resolutions on the Case of Sir Thomas Armstrong - - -	445
23. Debate on the State of the Nation - - -	446
Debate on Abuses in Victualling the Fleet - - -	447
26. Debate on Mr. Waller's Account of the State of the Army in Ireland	451
Debate on the State of the Nation - - -	453
Debate on the Misconduct of Commissary Shales - - -	454
29. Debate on a Clause in the Indemnity Bill - - -	461
Address against Commissary Shales—Debate thereon - - -	462
30. The King's Message for a Commission to be sent into Ireland - - -	467
Dec. 2. Debate, Whether any Member of the House should be put into the said Commission - - -	467
7. The Quakers exempted from Double Taxes - - -	473
14. Debate on the State of the Nation - - -	473
Further Proceedings on the Bill of Rights—Protest thereon - - -	481
16. The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Bill of Rights	483
THE BILL OF RIGHTS - - -	483
17. Debate on the Bill for continuing the Revenue for a Year - - -	490
Debate on the Grant to the Princess Anne - - -	492
20. The King's Answer to the Address relating to Commissary Shales - - -	501
21. Address on the State of the Nation—Debate thereon - - -	502
1689-90.
Jan. 10. Debate on the Corporation Bill - - -	508
18. Debate on Sir Robert Sawyer's Prosecution of Sir Thomas Armstrong	516
Sir Robert Sawyer expelled - - -	527
21. Debate on the Bill of Indemnity - - -	527
22. Debate on a Petition from Sir T. Pilkington, Lord Mayor of London, and others - - -	533
23. An Amendment to the Corporation Bill carried in the Affirmative—Protest thereon - - -	536
27. The King's Speech at the Prorogation—The Parliament dissolved	539
Proceedings on the General Election—Several Changes at Court - - -	540

FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

Mar. 20. List of the House of Commons - - -	541
Sir John Trevor chosen Speaker - - -	547
21. The King's Speech on opening the Session - - -	548
22. Debate on the King's Speech - - -	549
1690.
27. Debate on settling the Revenue - - -	552
31. Debate on the Supply - - -	562
April 5. Proceedings in the House of Lords on the Bill of Recognition—Protests thereon - - -	574
8. Debate on reversing a Judgment in a Quo Warranto against the City of London - - -	578
9. Debate in the Commons, on the Bill of Recognition - - -	580

1690.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

		Page
Apr. 17.	Debate in the Commons, on the Sheriffs of London being called in	586
22.	Debate on the Bill for reversing the Judgment against the City of London - - - - -	588
24.	Debate on the King's Change of the Lieutenancy of London - -	590
	Debate on the Abjuration Bill - - - - -	594
	Debate on securing the Government, and suspending the Habeas Corpus Act - - - - -	604
30.	Debate on the Regency Bill - - - - -	612
May 2.	Debate on Sir Edward Seymour's Charge against Mr. Rowe, for dispersing a Libel - - - - -	618
5.	Further Debate on the Regency Bill - - - - -	622
9.	Proceedings on the Bill of £.500 Forfeitures - - - - -	635
12.	Debate on two Members attending the House of Lords - -	637
13.	Debate on preserving the Peace of the Nation - - - - -	638
23.	The King's Speech at the Adjournment - - - - -	647

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

Oct. 2.	The King's Speech on Opening the Session—Address of Thanks -	649
Nov. 25.	The King's Speech respecting the Supplies - - - - -	651
30.	Report concerning Impeachments - - - - -	652
1690-1.
Jan. 5.	The King's Speech at the Close of the Session - - - - -	652

THIRD SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

1691.
Oct. 22.	The King's Speech on Opening the Session - - - - -	654
28.	The Thanks of the Commons given to General Ginkle - - -	655
Nov. 9.	Estimates for the Year 1692 - - - - -	655
	Debate on the Supply - - - - -	656
12.	Inquiries into the Conduct of the Fleet - - - - -	657
	Dr. Weiwood reprimanded by the House - - - - -	658
18.	Debate on the Bill for regulating Trials in Cases of Treason -	658
	Debate on the Supply - - - - -	660
Dec. 3.	Debate on the Accounts and Observations delivered by the Commissioners of Accounts—And on Secret Service Money paid to Parliament-Men - - - - -	666
9.	Debate on Fuller's Information - - - - -	672
11.	Debate on the Lords' Amendments to the Bill for the Regulation of Trials in cases of Treason - - - - -	675
17.	Report of a Conference respecting the Bill of Trials - - -	682
24.	The King's Speech on passing the Money Bills - - - - -	684
31.	Debate on the Conference with the Lords on their Amendments to the Bill of Trials - - - - -	684
1691-2
Jan. 4.	Debate on Fuller's further Information - - - - -	689
11.	Debate on a Motion for further Supply - - - - -	691
13.	Report of the Free Conference respecting the Bill of Trials -	691
	Debate on the said Report - - - - -	704
Feb. 24.	The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	706

FOURTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

1692.
Nov. 4.	The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	707
12.	Debate on the Conduct of the Fleet - - - - -	709
18.	Debate on the Bill for regulating Trials in cases of Treason -	712

1692.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
Nov. 21. Debate on employing Foreign General Officers - - - -	715
Debate on the King's asking the Advice of the House - - - -	722
26. Debate on Col. Churchill's Complaint of a Breach of Privilege -	734
Further Debate on the Bill of Trials—Question for a Conference passed in the Negative—Protest thereon - - - -	737
Dec. 20. Debate on Admiral Russel's Orders - - - -	743
22. Bill touching free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament -	744
The Speeches of Sir Charles Sedley and the Earl of Mulgrave thereon	745
1692-3.
Jan. 10. Debate on advising the King respecting the Admiralty - - -	752
16. A Bill for frequent Parliaments brought into the House of Lords -	754
18. Reasons for not agreeing with the Lords in an Amendment to the Land Tax Bill - - - -	754
21. Complaint against a Book entitled, "King William and Queen Mary Conquerors" - - - -	756
28. Debate on the Bill for frequent Parliaments - - - -	756
31. Trial of Lord Mohun - - - -	762
Feb. 9. Further Debate on the Bill for frequent Parliaments - - -	763
Mar. 10. Address of the Commons upon the State of Ireland - - -	768
14. The King's Speech at the close of the Session—Promotions - -	770

FIFTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

1693.

Nov. 7. The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - -	772
13. Debate on the King's Speech, and the Miscarriages of the Fleet -	775
15. Debate on the Miscarriages of the Fleet - - - -	778
28. Debate on the Bill for more frequent Parliaments - - - -	787
29. Debate on the King's Speech - - - -	788
Further Debate on the Miscarriages of the Fleet - - - -	789
Dec. 4. Debate on a Bill, touching free and impartial Proceedings in Parlia- ment - - - -	793
6. Further Debate on the Miscarriages of the Fleet - - - -	797
7. Charge against Lord Falkland—Debate thereon - - - -	800
8. Account of the Confederated Forces - - - -	807
9. Report of Sums issued for Secret Service, and paid to Members of Parliament—Debate thereon - - - -	807
11. Debate on the Supply - - - -	811
16. A Petition of the Quakers rejected - - - -	816
Articles of Impeachment against Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter - - - -	816
Debate thereon - - - -	818
18. Debate on the Bill for frequent Parliaments - - - -	820
20. Resolutions with regard to the Army and Navy - - - -	822
22. Further Debate on the Bill for frequent Parliaments - - - -	824
1693-4.
Jan. 10. Vote to acquit the Commanders of the Fleet—Protest thereon -	827
19. The East India Company obtains a New Charter - - - -	826
22. Order for observing Decorum in the House of Commons - - -	828
25. The King refuses to pass the Place Bill - - - -	828
26. Debate on the King's rejecting the Place Bill - - - -	829
27. The Commons' Representation to the King thereon - - - -	833
31. The King's Answer—Debate thereon - - - -	834
Feb. 8. The Million Annuity Bill passed - - - -	839
9. Account of Monies paid to Members of Parliament - - - -	839
17. Bishop of Worcester's Speech in the Great Cause of the Earl of Bath	841
Mar. 23. The King's Speech to both Houses pressing for Dispatch - -	849
24. Order concerning Protections—Protest thereon - - - -	849

1693-4.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	Page
Mar. 24. Sir John Knight's Speech against the Bill for naturalizing Protestant Foreigners—The said Speech ordered to be burnt by the Common Hangman - - - - -	849 1694.
Apr. 25. The King's Speech at the Close of the Session - - - - -	857
Preferments—Proceedings during the Recess - - - - -	858

SIXTH SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

Nov. 12. The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	859
The Triennial Bill passed—A Supply voted - - - - -	860
Dec. 21. Mr. Dyer, a News-Letter Writer, reprimanded for noticing the Proceedings of the House - - - - -	862
31. Both Houses address the King on the Death of the Queen - - - - -	863

WILLIAM THE THIRD.

1694-5.

Jan. 12. State of the Revenue - - - - -	865
PROCEEDINGS IN THE COMMONS AGAINST BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION—
Several Agents examined and committed—Agent Pauncefort ordered to the Tower—Mr. Guy, Secretary of the Treasury, sent to the Tower for taking a Bribe—Account of Fees and Salaries payable at the Exchequer—Resolutions respecting Fees, Salaries, and Pensions—Representation of the Commons to the King, on the Abuses and ill Practices of Agents, &c.—The King's Answer—Craggs, an Army Clothier, refuses to produce his Books—Commissioners of the Hackney Coaches corrupted—Report of Corruptions in the East India Company's Affairs—Report of Corrupt Practices in procuring the passing of the Orphans' Bill - - - - -	881
Mar. 12. The SPEAKER being charged with Corrupt Practices, absents himself from the House—Mr. Foley chosen Speaker—Sir John Trevor, the late Speaker, expelled - - - - -	906
18. Mr. Bird reprimanded for offering a Bribe to a Member - - - - -	910
1695.
Mar. 26. Mr. Hungerford expelled, and Sir Thomas Cooke sent to the Tower, for refusing to be examined - - - - -	911
April 6. A Bill to oblige Sir Thomas Cooke to answer sent up to the Lords, and opposed by the Duke of Leeds—Message to the Commons relating thereto—Sir T. Cooke heard by the Lords—The Duke of Leeds moves that he should purge the Peers upon Oath—Bill to indemnify Sir T. Cooke - - - - -	911
22. The King's short Speech for dispatch of Business - - - - -	913
24. Report of Sir T. Cooke's Examination by a Committee of both Houses	914
Debate upon the said Report - - - - -	921
27. Examination of Sir Basil Firebrace—And of Powell—And of Bates—Second Examination of Sir B. Firebrace—Examination of Sir Josiah Child - - - - -	922
Debate on the above Examinations - - - - -	930
The Duke of Leeds voted to be impeached—The Duke's Speech in the House of Lords—And in the House of Commons—Debate thereon - - - - -	933
29. Articles of Impeachment against the Duke of Leeds—The Duke's Speech thereon—The Duke complains of delay, and desires his Impeachment may be discharged - - - - -	937

May 2.	The offering of Money to a Member voted a High Crime and Misdemeanour - - - - -	939
3.	The Duke of Leeds arraigns the Conduct of the Commons - - -	940
	The Parliament prorogued - - - - -	941
	Proceedings relative to the Lancashire Plot - - - - -	942
	Case of Baronies by Writ—Protest thereon - - - - -	947
	Speech of the Marquis of Normanby in the Affair of the Convex Lights—Protest against acquitting the said Marquis - - -	949
	The ill state of the Coin redressed - - - - -	955
	Mr. Scobell's Report concerning the Coinage - - - - -	956
	The King's Speech at the close of the Session—Promotions—The Parliament dissolved - - - - -	957

FIRST SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT.

	List of the House of Commons - - - - -	958
Nov. 22.	Mr. Foley chosen Speaker - - - - -	963
	The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	964
	Addresses of both Houses—The King's Answer - - - - -	965
26.	Bill for regulating Trials in Cases of Treason - - - - -	965
	Order respecting Protections—The Supplies granted - - -	966
	Proceedings on the ill state of the Coin - - - - -	967
Dec. 14.	Proceedings relating to the Scotch East India Company - - -	975
	Lord Belhaven and others impeached thereon - - - - -	976
	A Council of Trade voted - - - - -	977
	A Grant of the Revenues of Wales to the Earl of Portland strongly opposed—Debate thereon - - - - -	978
	Mr. Price's memorable Speech against the said Grant - - -	979
	Address to the King respecting the said Grant—His Answer - -	985 1695-6.
Feb. 24.	The King's Speech on the Discovery of the Assassination Plot—Address of both Houses thereon—The King's Answer—Resolutions occasioned by the Plot - - - - -	987
	An Association signed by the Commons—Another by the Lords - -	991 1696.
April 2.	Bill for the Security of His Majesty's Person - - - - -	993
10.	A Bill for regulating Elections rejected - - - - -	993
27.	The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	994

SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT.

Oct. 20.	The King's Speech on Opening the Session - - - - -	995
	The Commons' Address—The King's Answer - - - - -	996
	Vote on the State of the Coin—Army and Navy Estimates - -	996
23.	Pamphlets censured—The Supplies voted - - - - -	997
	PROCEEDINGS AGAINST SIR JOHN FENWICK UPON A BILL OF ATTAINDER—A Bill of Attainder ordered—Mr. Manley, a Member, committed to the Tower—Debate concerning the Mace—The Bill read to Sir John—Mr. Serjeant Gould opens the Charge and Evidence—Debate thereon—Resolved, to give Sir John further time; but that Evidence may be given of the Treason of the Indictment—Porter's Evidence—Debate on admitting Evidence that Lady Fenwick had tampered with the Witnesses—Debate on admitting Goodman's Examination as Evidence—Debate on the Question for reading the Record of Cook's Conviction—Debate on calling for Cook's Jury as Evidence—Sir John's Letter to his Lady offered as Evidence; but rejected—The Gentlemen charged by Sir John, move, that he may prove the Charge—Sir John refuses to answer on that Head—Mr. Vernon relates the Endeavours made by Sir John to put off his Trial—Debate on committing the Bill—And on the third Reading—The Bill sent up to the Lords and passed—List of the Lords for and against the Bill—Protest thereon - - -	998

Nov. 27.	Proceedings for the purpose of relieving the Embarrassments of the Revenue - - - - -	1156
	Priviledged Places disfranchised - - - - -	1161
Dec. 8.	Case of Conrade Greibe—Address thereon—The King's Answer -	1161
9.	Inquiry into the Conduct of the Fleet - - - - -	1162
30.	Report of the Committee upon the Abuses of Prisons - - -	1162
1696-7.
Jan. 21.	Orders for dispersing a Mob—Votes relating to the Newfoundland Trade—The Printer of the Flying Post ordered into Custody—A Bill to restrain the Press rejected - - - - -	1163 1697.
Apr. 16.	The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	1164

THIRD SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT.

Dec. 3.	The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	1165
9.	The Commons' Address—The King's Answer - - - - -	1166
	The Commons resolve to disband the Army - - - - -	1167
20.	A Civil List settled on his Majesty for Life—Sums granted, and for what Uses - - - - -	1168
	Enquiry into the False Endorsements on Exchequer Bills: And Duncomb and Knight, two Members, expelled for the same - - -	1170
	A Bill of Resumption ordered - - - - -	1171
1697-S.
Feb. 9.	Address of the Commons to put the Laws in force against Profaneness and Immorality—The King's Answer—An Act for suppressing Atheism, &c. - - - - -	1172 1698.
	The Earl of Macclesfield's Case - - - - -	1173
Apr. 16.	Impeachment of Gaudet and Others of High Crimes and Misdemeanours—Issue of the said Impeachment - - - - -	1175
May 4.	The Dispute between the two East India Companies—A Bill passed in favour of the New Company—Protest thereon - - -	1177
21.	Molyneux's "Case of Ireland" complained of—Address thereon -	1181
July 5.	The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	1182
	The Parliament prorogued and dissolved - - - - -	1183

FIRST SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT.

Dec. 6.	List of the House of Commons - - - - -	1184
	Sir Thomas Littleton chosen Speaker - - - - -	1189
9.	The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	1191
	Vote to reduce the Army—The King's Speech thereon—Address of the Commons thereon—The King's Answer - - - - -	1191
1698-9.
Mar. 17.	The King's Message concerning the Dutch Guards—The Commons' Address in Answer thereto—The King's Answer - - - - -	1194
1699.
Mar. 29.	The Commons' Address on the State of the Navy—The King's Answer - - - - -	1196
	The Earl of Warwick and Lord Mohun tried for a Murder; and acquitted - - - - -	1197

	Page
April 3. Certain Letters of Mr. Chivers, a Member, complained of—Vote thereon - - - - -	1198
May 4. The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	1199

THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FOURTH PARLIAMENT.

Nov. 16. The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	1199
The Commons' Remonstrance thereon—The King's Answer - - - - -	1201
Dec. 6. Motion relative to Lord Bellamont - - - - -	1202
Report of the Commissioners for taking an Account of the Forfeited Estates—Debate on the Conduct of the said Commissioners - - - - -	1202
1699-1700.
Feb. 6. The Resumption Bill ordered—Votes relative to the said Grants laid before his majesty—The King's Answer—Ways and Means—Address relating to Capt. Kidd - - - - -	1215
1700.
April 8. Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill of Supply—Conference thereon—The King requests the Lords to pass the Bill; which they do—Proceedings thereon in the House of Lords—Protests against the Bill - - - - -	1217
10. An Address against Lord Chancellor Sommers negatived - - - - -	1221
11. The Parliament prorogued and dissolved—A remarkable Act against Papists—Lord Sommers removed from Administration—The King goes to Holland—Honours and Promotions - - - - -	1222

FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTH PARLIAMENT.

1700-1.
Feb. 6. List of the House of Commons - - - - -	1226
Mr. Harley chosen Speaker - - - - -	1232
11. The King's Speech on opening the Session - - - - -	1232
Address of the Commons to support the King—The King's Answer—A Second and Third Address—The King's Answer - - - - -	1233
17. The King communicates to both Houses, the Earl of Melfort's Letter to the Earl of Perth—Address of the Lords on the King's Speech - - - - -	1235
Mar. 3. First Vote in relation to the Protestant Succession—Heads of the Bill of Succession - - - - -	1236
18. The King's Message relative to the Partition Treaty—Address of the Commons thereon—The King's Answer—The Treaty debated in the House of Lords—Message to the Commons relative to the Treaty—Protests thereon—The Lords Address - - - - -	1237
1701.
Mar. 31. The King's Message concerning the French King's Answer to the Memorials—The humble Advice of the Commons thereon—The King's Answer - - - - -	1242
April 1. The Earl of Portland, Lord Sommers, the Earl of Orford, and Lord Halifax, impeached - - - - -	1243
The King's Letter to Lord Sommers—Lord Sommers's Answer - - - - -	1246
25. The Commons' Address to remove the impeached Lords from the King's presence for ever—The King's Answer—Counter Address of the House of Lords - - - - -	1248
May 8. The King's Message concerning the Negotiations at the Hague—Vote thereon - - - - -	1250
THE KENTISH PETITION—The Gentlemen who delivered it committed - - - - -	1250
THE LEGION LETTER AND MEMORIAL—Vote thereon - - - - -	1252
Difference between the two Houses relative to the Impeachments - - - - -	1257

		Page
May 9.	Articles of Impeachment against the Earl of Orford—The Earl of Orford's Answer - - - - -	1257
19.	Articles of Impeachment against Lord Sommers—Lord Sommers's Answer - - - - -	1266
21.	Second Message from the Lords respecting the Impeachments—Replication of the Commons to the Earl of Orford—Their Answer to the Lords—Second Message from the Lords—Third Message—Answer of the Commons—Fourth Message from the Lords—Conference—Fifth Message from the Lords—Answer of the Commons—Another Conference—A Free Conference - - - - -	1288
June 12.	The King's Speech on passing the Act of Succession - - - - -	1294
	Address of the Commons respecting Alliances—The King's Answer - - - - -	1295
	Sixth Message from the Lords respecting the Impeachments—Answer of the Commons—Report of a Conference, and the Offence given to the Commons thereat by Lord Haversham—Votes thereon—Message from the Lords—Vote thereon - - - - -	1295
14.	Articles of Impeachment against Lord Halifax—Lord Halifax's Answer - - - - -	1299
16.	Rules to be observed at the Trial of the impeached Lords - - - - -	1310
	Reasons of the Commons against proceeding to the Trial of Lord Sommers—Answer of the Lords - - - - -	1310
17.	Lord Sommers tried and acquitted—Remonstrance of the Commons thereon—Answer of the Lords - - - - -	1313
	Answer of Lord Haversham to the Complaint of the Commons - - - - -	1315
20.	The Commons refuse to appear at the Earl of Orford's Trial—The Earl acquitted—The Impeachments dismissed by the Lords - - - - -	1320
	A Bill for stating the Public Accounts amended by the Lords - - - - -	1321
24.	The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Money Bills - - - - -	1322
	The King's Speech at the close of the Session - - - - -	1322
	The Parliament prorogued and dissolved - - - - -	1323

FIRST SESSION OF THE SIXTH AND LAST PARLIAMENT OF WILLIAM III.

Dec. 30.	List of the House of Commons - - - - -	1324
	Mr. Harley chosen Speaker - - - - -	1329
31.	The King's last Speech in Parliament - - - - -	1329
1701-2.
Jan. 1.	Addresses of both Houses—The King's Answers - - - - -	1331
6.	The State of Affairs laid before the Commons—A Supply voted - - - - -	1333
9.	A Bill for the Security of his Majesty's Person brought in - - - - -	1333
	The pretended Prince of Wales attainted - - - - -	1334
	Act for abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales—Protest thereon - - - - -	1334
22.	Proceedings against Fuller for libelling the last House of Commons - - - - -	1336
	Some remarkable Proceedings in controverted Elections—Certain petitioning Burgesses of Malmsbury taken into custody—A Censure passed on the Earl of Peterborough - - - - -	1337
	Case of Mr. Colepeper, the Kentish Petitioner—The Aspersions cast on the last House of Commons voted scandalous, villainous, &c. and the said Colepeper committed - - - - -	1339
	Proceedings relative to the Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons - - - - -	1339
Feb. 28.	Message concerning an Union with Scotland - - - - -	1340
	The King's Illness,—and Fall from his Horse - - - - -	1340
Mar. 2.	Bills passed by Commission - - - - -	1342
	DEATH OF THE KING - - - - -	1342

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

II. ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT.

		Page
1689.	June 24. ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT against Sir Adam Blair and Others, for dispersing King James's Declaration, 350—Debate thereon - - - - -	360
1693.	Dec. 16. - - - - - against Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter—Debate thereon - - - - -	816
1695.	Apr. 29. - - - - - against the Duke of Leeds - - - - -	937
1698.	May 16. - - - - - against Gaudet and Others for High Treason -	1175
1701.	May 9. - - - - - against the Earl of Orford—The Earl's Answer	1257
	19. - - - - - against Lord Sommers—His Lordship's Answer	1266
	June 14. - - - - - against Lord Halifax—His Lordship's Answer -	1299

III. ADDRESSES.

1688.	Dec. 11. ADDRESS of the City of London to the Prince of Orange -	20
	25. - - - - - of the Lords assembled at Westminster to the Prince of Orange - - - - -	23
	28. - - - - - of the Lords to the Prince of Orange - - - - -	25
1688-9.	Jan. 22. - - - - - of both Houses to the Prince of Orange—The Prince's Answer - - - - -	33
1689.	April 9. - - - - - of both Houses to the King, thanking him for his Care of the Protestant Religion, and desiring him to call a Convocation—The King's Answer	216
	24. - - - - - of the Commons for a War with France—The King's Answer - - - - -	234
	June 14. - - - - - of the Commons relative to the Irish Protestants	314
	18. - - - - - to the King to secure the Garrisons - - - - -	329
	Nov. 29. - - - - - of the Commons, against Commissary Shales -	462
	The King's Answer - - - - -	501
	Dec. 21. - - - - - of the Commons, on the State of the Nation -	502
1692-3.	Mar. 10. - - - - - of the Commons, upon the State of Ireland -	768
1693-4.	Jan. 27. - - - - - of the Commons, on the King's rejection of the Place Bill—The King's Answer - - - - -	833
1694-5.	Feb. 26. - - - - - of the Commons, on the Abuses and ill Practices of Agents, &c.—The King's Answer - - - - -	892
	Dec. 14. - - - - - of the Commons, on a Grant to the Earl of Portland—The King's Answer - - - - -	985
1695-6.	Feb. 24. - - - - - of both Houses, on the discovery of the Assassination Plot—The King's Answer - - - - -	988
1696.	Oct. 20. - - - - - of the Commons for carrying on a War against France—The King's Answer - - - - -	996
1697-8.	Feb. 9. - - - - - of the Commons to put the Laws in force against Profaneness and Immorality—The King's Answer - - - - -	1172
1698.	June 22. - - - - - of the Commons, on "Molyneux's State of Ireland"—The King's Answer - - - - -	1181
1698-9.	Feb. 1. - - - - - of the Commons, in the King's Speech respecting the Vote for disbanding the Army—The King's Answer - - - - -	1193
	The Commons' Further Address—The King's Answer - - - - -	1194
1699.	Mar. 29. - - - - - of the Commons, on the State of the Navy—The King's Answer - - - - -	1196
	Nov. 10. - - - - - or Remonstrance of the Commons, on the King's Speech—The King's Answer - - - - -	1201

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

		Page
1700-1.	Feb. 6. ADDRESS of the Commons to support the King—The King's Answer, 1233—A Second and Third Address— The King's Answer - - - - -	1235
	- - - - - of the Lords, on the King's Speech - - - - -	1236
	Mar. 18. - - - - - of the Commons, on the Partition Treaty—The King's Answer - - - - -	1238
	- - - - - of the Lords on the Partition Treaty—The King's Answer - - - - -	1242
1701.	Apr. 25. - - - - - of the Commons to remove the Impeached Lords from the King's presence for ever—The King's Answer—Counter Address of the Lords - - - - -	1248
1701-2.	Jan. 1. - - - - - of the Lords, concerning the Pretender—The King's Answer - - - - -	1331
	5. - - - - - of the Commons, respecting the Pretender—The King's Answer - - - - -	1332

IV. DECLARATIONS.

1688.	Oct. 10. DECLARATION (First) of the Prince of Orange - - -	1
	Nov. 28. - - - - - (Counterfeit) of the Prince of Orange - - -	13
	Dec. 11. - - - - - of the Peers at Guild-hall - - -	19
1688-9.	Feb. 7. - - - - - of RIGHTS—The Prince of Orange's Answer thereto - - - - -	108

V. KING'S LETTERS.

WILLIAM III.

1688-9.	Jan. 22. THE KING'S LETTER to both Houses - - - - -	32, 35
1701.	April 1. - - - - - to Lord Sommers - - - - -	1246

VI. KING'S MESSAGES.

WILLIAM III.

1688-9.	Mar. 1. THE KING'S MESSAGE relative to the Hearth Money - - -	152
	- - - - - on committing several Persons - - -	153
	25. - - - - - recommending a Bill of Indemnity - - -	198
1689.	July 13. - - - - - for a Recess - - - - -	380
	Dec. 2. - - - - - for a Commission to be sent into Ireland - - - - -	467
1700-1.	Mar. 18. - - - - - relative to the Partition Treaty - - -	1237
1701.	May 8. - - - - - concerning the Negotiations at the Hague - - - - -	1250
1701-2.	Feb. 28. - - - - - concerning an Union with Scotland - - -	1340

VII. KING'S SPEECHES.

WILLIAM III.

1688.	Dec. 21. THE KING'S SPEECH to the Lords met at St. James's - - -	21
	23. - - - - - to the Peers at St. James's - - -	24
1688-9.	Feb. 18. - - - - - to both Houses - - - - -	118

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

		Page
1689.	Oct. 19. THE KING'S SPEECH to both Houses - - -	402
1689-90.	Jan. 27. - - - at the Prorogation - - -	539
	Mar. 21. - - - on opening the Session - - -	547
1690.	May 23. - - - at the Adjournment - - -	647
	Oct. 2. - - - on opening the Session - - -	649
	Nov. 25. - - - to both Houses - - -	651
1690-1.	Jan. 5. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	652
1691.	Oct. 22. - - - on opening the Session - - -	654
	Dec. 24. - - - on passing the Money Bills - - -	684
1691-2.	Feb. 24. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	706
1692.	Nov. 4. - - - on opening the Session - - -	707
1692-3.	Mar. 14. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	770
1693.	Nov. 7. - - - on opening the Session - - -	772
1693-4.	Mar. 4. - - - to both Houses, pressing for Dispatch - - -	849
1694.	Apr. 25. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	857
	Nov. 12. - - - on opening the Session - - -	859
1695.	Apr. 22. - - - for dispatch of Business - - -	913
	May 3. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	956
	Nov. 22. - - - on opening the Session - - -	964
1695-6.	Feb. 24. - - - on the Discovery of the Assassination Plot - - -	987
1695-6.	Apr. 27. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	994
1696.	Oct. 20. - - - on opening the Session - - -	995
1697.	Apr. 16. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	1164
	Dec. 3. - - - on opening the Session - - -	1165
1698.	July 5. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	1182
	Dec. 6. - - - on opening the Session - - -	1191
1698-9.	Feb. 1. - - - to both Houses on the Vote to reduce the Army - - -	1192
1699.	May 1. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	1199
	Nov. 16. - - - on opening the Session - - -	1199
1700-1.	Feb. 6. - - - on opening the Session - - -	1232
1701.	June 12. - - - on passing the Act of Settlement - - -	1204
	24. - - - at the close of the Session - - -	1322
	Dec. 30. - - - on opening the Session - - -	1329

VIII. LISTS OF THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

1688-9.	Jan. 22.	List of the Members of the Convention - - -	26
1689-90.	Mar. 20.	- - - of the House of Commons in King William's Second Parliament - - -	541
1695.	Nov. 22.	- - - of the House of Commons in King William's Third Parliament - - -	958
1698.	Dec. 6.	- - - of the House of Commons in King William's Fourth Parliament - - -	1184
1700-1.	Feb. 6.	- - - of the House of Commons in King William's Fifth Parliament - - -	1226
Dec. 30. 1701.		- - - of the House of Commons in King William's Sixth and Last Parliament - - -	1324

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

IX. PETITIONS.

	Page
1688. Nov. 5. PETITION of several Lords to the King for calling a Parlia- ment—The King's Answer - - - - -	16
1689. May 23. - - - - - of Titus Oates to the Commons - - - - -	277
June 21. - - - - - of John Bearcroft, esq. - - - - -	547
25. - - - - - from the Common Council of London for taking off the Tests - - - - -	359
Aug. 13. - - - - - against Colonel Copley - - - - -	399
14. - - - - - (a tumultuous) of the Silk Weavers - - - - -	400
Nov. 12. - - - - - of the Lord Viscount Preston - - - - -	421
1701.. May 8. - - - - - the Kentish - - - - -	1250

X. PROTESTS.

1688-9. Mar. 6. PROTEST on the Bill for regulating Trials - - - - -	162
22. - - - - - on the Bill to abrogate the former Oaths - - - - -	196
1689. April 4. - - - - - on the Bill of Comprehension - - - - -	212
20. - - - - - on the Bill for abrogating the Oaths - - - - -	223
July 28. - - - - - on the Bill for reversing the Judgments against Titus Oates - - - - -	396
Dec. 14. - - - - - on the Bill of Rights - - - - -	482
1689-90. Jan. 23. - - - - - on the Corporation Bill - - - - -	538
1690. Apr. 5. - - - - - on the Bill of Recognition - - - - -	575
1692. Dec. 22. - - - - - on the Bill touching free and impartial Proceed- ings in Parliament - - - - -	751
1693-4. Jan. 5. - - - - - on the Bill for free and impartial Proceedings in Parliament - - - - -	826
10. - - - - - on the Vote to acquit the Commanders of the Fleet - - - - -	827
Mar. 24. - - - - - on the Order concerning Protections - - - - -	849
1695. Apr. 18. - - - - - against acquitting the Marquis of Normanby - - - - -	952
1696. Dec. 1. - - - - - on the Bill of Attainder against Sir John Fenwick - - - - -	1155
1698. July 1. - - - - - on the Bill for a New East India Company - - - - -	1180
1699. April 4. - - - - - on the Bill of Supply - - - - -	1218
1700-1. Mar. 15. - - - - - respecting the Partition Treaty - - - - -	1239

XI. ARMY, NAVY, FINANCE, &c.

Army.

1695. Dec. 20. Resolutions with regard to the Land Forces - - - - -	822
1696. Oct. 28. Estimates of the Charge of the Army - - - - -	927

Navy.

1689. Mar. 26. Estimate for the Fleet - - - - -	206
1693. Dec. 20. Resolutions with respect to the Navy - - - - -	823
1695. Oct. 28. Estimates of the Charge of the Navy - - - - -	997

Finance, &c.

1688-9. Mar. 1. State of the Revenue - - - - -	150
16. Account of the Produce of the Excise - - - - -	187
Estimate of the Charge of Government - - - - -	189

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

		Page
1689.	Apr. 26. The Pension List - - - - -	236
1691.	Nov. 29. Estimates for the Year 1692 - - - - -	655
1693.	Dec. 9. Report of Sums issued for Secret Service and paid to Mem- bers of Parliament - - - - -	807
1693-4.	Feb. 9. Account of Monies paid to Members of Parliament -	839
1694-5.	Jan. 12. State of the Revenue - - - - -	865
	Feb. 21. Account of Fees and Salaries payable at the Exchequer -	887
1693.	- - - - - Account of the Acres and Houses, with the Proportional Tax, &c. of each County in England and Wales. Ap- pendix, No. X.
1693.	- - - - - An Essay upon Taxes, calculated for the present Juncture of Affairs in England. By the Marquis of Halifax. Ap- pendix, No. XII.
	A General Abstract of the RECEIPTS and ISSUES of the PUBLIC REVENUE, TAXES, and LOANS during the Reign of his late Majesty King William; that is to say, from the 5th of November 1688, from which time the Parliament appointed the said Accounts should commence, to the 25th of March 1702; being the first Determination of the Accounts after the Demise of his said late Majesty; which happened on the 8th of March preceding. Ap- pendix, No. XIX.

XII. PERSONS FILLING THE SEVERAL HIGH OFFICES OF STATE FROM THE REVOLUTION, IN 1688, TO THE AC- CESSION OF QUEEN ANNE, IN 1702.

Archbishops of Canterbury.

1688. William Sancroft, Dean of St. Paul's, deprived for not taking the Oaths to King William and Queen Mary.
1691. John Tillotson, Dean of St. Paul's.
1694. Thomas Tennison, translated from Lincoln.

Lord High Chancellors.

1690. Sir John Maynard, knt.; Sir Anthony Keck, knt.; and Sir William Rawlinson, knt., Commissioners or Keepers, from March 1, till June 3.
1690. Sir John Trevor, knt.; Sir William Rawlinson, knt.; and Sir George Hutchins, knt.; Commissioners or Keepers.
1693. Sir John Sommers, knt., Lord Keeper.
1697. - - - - - made Lord Chancellor, and created Lord Sommers.
1700. Sir Nathan Wright, knt., Lord Keeper, May 21.

Speakers of the House of Commons.

1689. Jan. 22. Henry Powle, esq., Member for Windsor.
1690. Mar. 20. Sir John Trevor, Yarmouth, Hants. On the 20th of March 1694, he was expelled the House for taking a Gratuity after the Orphans' Bill had passed. See p. 906.
1694. Mar. 14. Paul Foley, esq., Hereford City.
1698. Dec. 6. Sir Thomas Littleton, bart., Woodstock, Oxfordshire.
1700. Feb. 6. Robert Harley, esq., New Radnor.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Masters of the Rolls.

1689. Mar. 13. Henry Powle, esq.
1692. Jan. 13. Sir John Trevor, knight.

Attorneys General.

1688. Mar. 4. Henry Pollexfen, esq.
1689. May 7. Sir George Treby, knt.
1692. May 2. Sir John Sommers, knt., afterwards Lord Sommers.
1693. April 4. Edward Ward, esq.
1695. June 10. Sir Thomas Trevor, esq., afterwards Lord Trevor.
1701. July 5. Edward Northey, esq.

Solicitors General.

1688. May 4. Sir George Treby, knt.
1689. May 7. John Sommers, esq., afterwards Lord Sommers.
1692. Mar. 2. Thomas Trevor, esq.
1695. July 13. John Hawles, esq.

XIII. CONTENTS OF THE APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.—No. I.

Some OBSERVATIONS concerning the regulating of Elections for Parliament, found among the Earl of Shaftsbury's Papers after his Death, and now recommended to the Consideration of this present Parliament. [That is to say, the Convention Parliament which met on the 22nd of January 1688, for it was not till then that these OBSERVATIONS were made public] - -

ii

APPENDIX.—No. II.

A Debate upon the Quære, whether a King elected and declared by the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster 22d of January, 1688, coming to and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, doth not make as compleat a Parliament, and legislative Power and Authority, to all Intents and Purposes, as if the said King should cause a new Summons to be given and new Elections to be made by Writs - - -

x

APPENDIX.—No. III.

The Earl of SUNDERLAND's Letter to a Friend in the Country, plainly discovering the Designs of the Romish Party, and others, for the subverting of the Protestant Religion, and the Laws of the Kingdom. Licensed and Entered March 23, 1689 - - - - -

xiv

APPENDIX.—No. IV.

A VINDICATION of the Proceedings of the late Parliament of England, An. Dom. 1689, being the First in the Reign of their present Majesties King William and Queen Mary. By John Lord Sommers. - - - - - xviii

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

APPENDIX.—No. V.

	Page
The State of Parties, and of the Publick, as influenced by those Parties in this Conjuncture, offered to Englishmen. Printed about the Year 1692 -	xxxiv

APPENDIX.—No. VI.

Some CONSIDERATIONS about the most proper Way of RAISING MONEY in the present Conjuncture. Printed about the year 1692. Written by JOHN HAMPDEN, Esq. - - - - -	1
---	---

APPENDIX.—No. VII.

Some short CONSIDERATIONS concerning the STATE of the NATION. Printed about November, 1692: Written by JOHN HAMPDEN, Esq. - - -	lxvi
--	------

APPENDIX.—No. VIII.

An ENQUIRY; or a Discourse between a Yeoman of Kent, and a Knight of a Shire, upon the Prorogation of the Parliament to the 2nd of May, 1693. By Major WILDMAN and Mr. HAMPDEN - - - - -	lxxxii
--	--------

APPENDIX.—No. IX.

A Short State of our Condition, with relation to the present Parliament; com- monly called the "Hush-money Paper." By C. LAWTON, Esq. Printed about November 1693 - - - - -	xcix
---	------

APPENDIX.—No. X.

An Account of the ACRES and HOUSES, with the PROPORTIONAL TAX, &c. of each County in England and Wales. Humbly presented to the Lords and Commons, 1693 - - - - -	ciii
---	------

APPENDIX.—No. XI.

The Danger of Mercenary Parliaments - - - - -	cvii
---	------

APPENDIX.—No. XII.

An ESSAY upon TAXES, calculated for the present Juncture of Affairs in Eng- land. By the Marquis of HALIFAX, 1693 - - - - -	cxix
--	------

APPENDIX.—No. XIII.

A LETTER to a Member of Parliament, shewing that a Restraint on the PRESS is inconsistent with the Protestant Religion, and dangerous to the Liberties of the Nation. Printed in the Year 1697 - - - - -	cxxx
--	------

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

APPENDIX.—No. XIV.

CONSIDERATIONS upon the Choice of a SPEAKER of the House of Commons in the approaching Session. Printed in the Year 1698 - - - - - cli

APPENDIX.—No. XV.

CONSIDERATIONS on the Nature of Parliaments, and our present Elections. Published in the Year 1698 - - - - - clv

APPENDIX.—No. XVI.

A Letter to a Country Gentleman, setting forth the Cause of the Decay and Ruin of Trade. To which is annexed, A List of the Names of some Gentlemen who were Members of the last Parliament, and now are (or lately were), in public Employments. London, printed in 1698 - - - clxiii

APPENDIX.—No. XVII.

The HISTORY of the KENTISH PETITION, in 1701 - - - - - clxxiv

APPENDIX.—No. XVIII.

JURA POPULI ANGLICANI: or the Subject's Rights of PETITIONING set forth, occasioned by the Case of the KENTISH PETITIONERS. With some Thoughts on the Reasons which induced those Gentlemen to petition: and of the Commons Right of Imprisoning. Printed in 1701 - - - - - clxxxvii

APPENDIX.—No. XIX.

A General Abstract of the RECEIPTS and ISSUES of the PUBLIC REVENUE, TAXES, and LOANS, during the Reign of his late Majesty King William: that is to say, from the 5th of November 1688, from which Time the Parliament appointed the said Accounts should commence, to the 25th of March 1702; being the first Determination of the Accounts after the Demise of his said late Majesty; which happened on the 8th of March preceding - - - ccxxxix

APPENDIX.—No. XX.

A List of PUBLIC ACTS, passed from the Revolution in the Year 1688 to the Accession of Queen Anne, in the Year 1701-2 - - - - - ccl

XIV.

I N D E X

OF THE NAMES OF THE SEVERAL SPEAKERS IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

A.

ANNESLEY, Mr. 1209.
Arnold, Mr. 166, 254.
Austen, Col. 255, 259, 328,
431, 458, 530, 560, 564,
568, 621, 639, 735.

B.

Bellamont, Earl of, 818.
Bertie, Mr. 247, 248.
Birch, Col. 33, 36, 50, 57,
131, 143, 144, 153, 154, 161,
167, 169, 180, 183, 184, 192,
193, 195, 203, 221, 226, 259,
264, 268, 283, 286, 294, 297,
302, 303, 313, 332, 333, 344,
357, 361, 369, 409, 417, 430,
441, 456, 464, 469, 471, 494,
498, 519, 529, 573, 592, 593,
609, 614, 626.
Blake, Sir Francis, 564.
Boscawen, Mr. 49, 54, 120,
133, 148, 154, 171, 173, 178,
208, 221, 261, 267, 274, 275,
295, 320, 327, 331, 340, 358,
492, 1025, 1099, 1140.
Boyle, Mr. 1004, 1088.
Brewer, Mr. 301, 317, 325.
Brewster, Sir F. 1208.
Bridges, George Rodney, 1014.
Brockman, Mr. 288.
Bromley, Mr. 829.
Brotherton, Mr. 1015, 1039, 1101.

C.

Capel, Sir Henry, 34, 47, 122,
133, 138, 145, 148, 155, 164,
170, 181, 192, 199, 204, 208,
233, 248, 251, 256, 259, 260,
262, 265, 270, 287, 295, 305,
322, 324, 333, 424, 462, 469,
476, 492, 516, 526, 534, 536,
592.
Carter, Mr. 219, 255.
Cary, Mr. 595.
Cholmondeley, Col. 597.

Churchill, Capt. 439, 734.
Clarendon, Earl of, 75, 88, 89,
94, 98.

Clarges, Sir Tho. 34, 35, 42,
61, 121, 123, 130, 135, 136,
138, 139, 142, 145, 146, 148,
153, 155, 157, 158, 160, 161,
168, 171, 172, 177, 192, 200,
205, 207, 232, 233, 251, 253,
254, 255, 264, 265, 271, 272,
273, 297, 305, 331, 340, 343,
345, 346, 352, 360, 361, 365,
369, 370, 407, 408, 417, 418,
423, 426, 429, 436, 438, 446,
454, 461, 467, 471, 474, 476,
480, 493, 509, 512, 534, 551,
565, 581, 587, 594, 600, 609,
618, 624, 637, 661, 668, 705,
711, 717, 722, 727, 728, 737,
761, 776, 794, 812, 829.
Clayton, Sir Rob. 148, 156,
160, 169, 181, 303, 340, 425,
588, 590.

Colchester, Lord, 50, 465,
718.

Colleton, Sir Peter, 715.

Colt, Mr. 248, 281.

Coningsby, Mr. 201, 302, 414.

Coningsby, Lord, 818, 1020.

Copley, Sir Godfrey, 1039,
1050, 1115.

Coryton, Sir Wm. 1036.

Cotton, Sir Robert, 210, 221,
256, 269, 275, 296, 298, 301,
316, 319, 356, 364, 422, 495,
525, 553, 568, 571, 1132.

Cowper, Mr. 1007, 1141.

Crofts, Sir Herbert, 1108,
1130.

Cutts, Lord, 1019, 1034, 1043, 1070, 1118.

D.

Danby, Earl of, 353.

Dashwood, Sir S. 591.

Digby, Lord, 595, 1101.

Dolben, Mr. 36, 47, 51, 62, 520, 527, 646, 686, 1123.

Drake, Sir F. 147.

Dutton, Sir Ralph, 285.

Dyke, Sir Thomas, 218, 1019, 1059.

E.

Earle, Col. 718.

Ellwell, Mr. 331, 432.

Ely, Bishop of, 72, 73.

Ettrick, Mr. 201, 205, 218,
250, 264, 269, 271, 288, 302,
315, 318, 324, 374, 494, 514,
527, 559, 602.

Eyre, G. 107, 129, 138, 148, 173.

F.

Falkland, Lord, 52, 53, 55,
62, 124, 138, 141, 156, 252,
510, 580, 596, 727, 801.

Fanshaw, Lord, 50, 255.

Fenwick, sir J. 1055.

Finch, Mr. 39, 45, 49, 61,
144, 156, 169, 170, 174, 187,
202, 203, 209, 220, 435, 490,
496, 514, 556, 627, 630, 658,
680, 686, 738, 740, 759, 803,
1017, 1085.

Foley, Paul, 107, 161, 167,
221, 252, 264, 271, 295, 300,
434, 466, 473, 480, 493, 506,
514, 553, 591, 660, 670, 721,
730, 775, 821, 831, 1006,
1117.

Fox, Mr. 309.

G.

Garroway, Mr. 33, 53, 56, 139,
148, 149, 154, 168, 169, 192,
194, 195, 199, 200, 208, 232,
247, 249, 253, 259, 260, 262,
273, 274, 305, 307, 309, 310,
313, 325, 333, 344, 407, 409,
418, 455, 468, 478, 526, 530.
Godolphin, Mr. 133, 142, 178,
205, 221, 249, 250, 251, 266,
274, 298, 418, 446, 619, 825.
Godolphin, Lord, 979.

INDEX TO THE SPEECHES.

Goodrick, Sir H. 170, 198, 205, 209, 225, 229, 231, 233, 252, 263, 321, 330, 331, 365, 367, 435, 456, 511, 529, 564, 581, 598, 606, 628.
 Goodwell, Mr. 757.
 Gower, Leveson, 247, 254, 280, 308, 465, 476, 498, 629, 632, 633, 640.
 Granville, Col. 441, 568, 596, 607, 611, 643, 688, 726, 740, 1003, 1013, 1107.
 Grosvenor, Sir Tho. 597.
 Guise, Sir John, 141, 168, 232, 285, 299, 345, 354, 367, 374, 418, 430, 435, 447, 464, 470, 474, 476, 506, 518, 525, 529, 535, 559, 563, 565, 589, 599, 619, 634, 644.
 Guy, Mr. 192.
 Gwynn, Sir Rowland, 50, 339, 365.

H.

Hamond, Mr. 1132.
 Hawles, Mr. 250, 252, 258, 262, 270, 286, 288, 293, 295, 299, 302, 306, 307, 316, 317, 318, 319, 322, 325, 327, 337, 355, 415, 424, 434, 466, 471, 504, 516, 524, 530, 535.
 Hampden, John, 33, 34, 52, 61, 66, 84, 122, 123, 136, 153, 155, 157, 165, 178, 180, 181, 183, 187, 231, 247, 248, 250, 259, 260, 266, 269, 275, 282, 300, 303, 305, 324, 340, 341, 344, 345, 359, 425, 431, 435, 448, 462, 470, 477, 494, 511, 518, 520, 521, 535, 566, 583.
 Hampden, Mr. Jun. 57, 167, 175, 194, 195, 199, 200, 202, 207, 233, 264, 307, 321, 356, 462, 478, 480, 495, 496, 525, 610, 612, 621, 625, 627.
 Harbord, Mr. 40, 57, 176, 177, 178, 179, 192, 194, 198, 208, 232, 247, 248, 249, 257, 261, 262, 272, 282, 317, 328, 331, 366, 371, 574, 618.
 Harcourt, Mr. 582, 596, 606, 1016, 1032, 1067, 1136.
 Harley, Mr. 257, 725, 760, 793, 795, 813, 815, 830, 837, 1020, 1033, 1043, 1104.
 Harvey, Sir Eliab, 821.
 Haversham, Lord, 1298.
 Herbert, Mr. 248, 251.
 Holt, Serjeant, 70, 140, 174, 473.
 Howard, Sir Rob. 46, 50, 62, 96, 123, 125, 134, 137, 144, 145, 147, 148, 153, 158, 159, 166, 171, 173, 182, 187, 194, 195, 226, 231, 255, 257, 259, 261, 263, 264, 265, 271, 281, 288, 289, 292, 297, 301, 305, 310, 318, 320, 323, 367, 375, 408, 424, 446, 459, 470, 477, 515, 587, 591, 601, 631.

 Howe, John, 33, 40, 49, 124, 136, 142, 160, 177, 179, 184, 198, 199, 200, 205, 220, 226, 281, 285, 290, 295, 297, 298, 299, 301, 302, 306, 308, 309, 317, 318, 325, 327, 331, 341, 342, 363, 366, 369, 370, 371, 376, 429, 464, 468, 476, 503, 513, 528, 685, 706, 778, 831, 1008, 1020, 1021, 1035, 1043, 1049, 1079.
 Hussey, Sir Edw. 411, 606.
 Hutchinson, Mr. 553, 830, 835.

J.

Jennings, Sir Jonathan, 142, 179.
 Jennings, Sir Edmund, 553, 588, 608, 646.

K.

Knight, Sir John, 50, 849.

L.

Lee, Sir Tho. 33, 39, 56, 100, 125, 132, 133, 145, 148, 153, 158, 161, 164, 169, 171, 172, 174, 176, 178, 184, 193, 202, 211, 218, 220, 229, 231, 232, 254, 295, 296, 299, 301, 302, 322, 324, 328, 330, 331, 332, 356, 360, 361, 408, 416, 419, 423, 432, 443, 449, 481, 491, 504, 564, 584, 587, 594, 599, 610, 614, 620, 624, 629.
 Leeds, Duke of, 934, 938, 940.
 Living, Sir Rd. 1204.
 Littleton, Sir T. 63, 153, 154, 166, 174, 201, 220, 233, 254, 255, 264, 266, 273, 306, 313, 317, 325, 430, 593, 600, 628, 632, 761, 795, 835, 1006, 1021, 1031, 1027, 1078.
 London, Bishop of (Dr. Crompton) 230.
 Love, Mr. 146, 160.
 Lowther, Sir John, 146, 157, 172, 173, 182, 258, 260, 261, 267, 313, 316, 318, 319, 322, 323, 325, 329, 338, 339, 459, 468, 477, 518, 549, 552, 556, 562, 563, 565, 567, 580, 581, 586, 591, 601, 607, 616, 620, 626, 632, 640, 644, 647, 666, 670, 706, 716, 739, 759, 777, 813.
 Lowther, Sir Wm. 1104.

M.

Machell, Mr. 316.
 Mainwaring, Sir John, 597.
 Manley, Mr. 1030, 1047, 1054, 1120.
 Maynard, Serjeant, 36, 40, 45, 54, 72, 89, 90, 103, 124, 128, 131, 132, 183, 293, 294, 297, 305, 306, 320, 332, 365, 465, 504, 511, 531, 536, 552, 611, 613, 617, 623.
 Medlecot, Mr. 50, 119.
 Methwen, Mr. 1023, 1112.
 Mildmay, Col. 181, 247, 248, 269, 306.
 Monson, Sir H. 254.
 Montagu, Edw. 254, 283.
 Montagu, Charles, 775, 821.
 Montagu, John, 1012.
 Mordaunt, Capt. 723, 1003.
 Mulgrave, Earl of, 748, 949.
 Musgrave, Sir Christ. 39, 40, 58, 123, 133, 145, 156, 162, 172, 187, 193, 194, 198, 208, 232, 247, 250, 251, 259, 270, 274, 288, 307, 330, 343, 367, 369, 438, 441, 455, 468, 498, 510, 526, 553, 558, 559, 563, 569, 583, 593, 607, 620, 624, 688, 720, 738, 794, 803, 814, 821, 825, 838, 1011, 1025, 1037, 1046.

N.

Napier, Sir Robt. 267.
 Newport, Mr. 1062.
 Norreys, Lord, 248, 1019, 1110, 1132.
 Norris, Mr. 1083.
 Nottingham, Earl of, 72, 77, 82, 90, 91, 93, 103, 227, 231.

O.

Onslow, Sir Rd. 726.
 Oxendon, Sir James, 47.

P.

Paget, Mr. 1102, 1144.
 Palmes, Mr. 460, 815.
 Papillon, Mr. 168, 176, 177, 178, 319, 551.
 Pelham, Mr. 208, 254, 554, 759, 1034, 1077, 1130.
 Pembroke, Earl of, 80, 89, 90, 93, 103, 230, 231.
 Pilkington, Mr. 136.
 Pollexfen, Henry, 47, 55, 86, 89, 133, 139, 145, 148, 171, 174, 204.
 Powle, H. 32, 35, 170, 183, 187, 215, 218, 247, 248, 249, 254, 255, 260, 283, 289,

INDEX TO THE SPEECHES.

307, 353, 444, 483, 580, 602.
Price, Robert, 978, 979, 1010, 1041, 1045.
Pulston, Sir Roger, 978.
Pulteney, Sir Wm. 49, 140,
156, 170, 185, 490, 510, 630.
Pulteney, Mr. 1060.

R.

Raleigh, Sir C. 323.
Ranelagh, Earl of, 437, 717.
Rich, Sir R. 323, 324, 466, 474, 505, 522, 607, 633, 668.
Richard, Sir Robert, 1033.
Roberts, Mr. 50, 270, 600.
Rochester, Earl of, 84, 94.
Russel, Sir F. 267.
Russel, Admiral, 427, 430, 439,
1051.

S.

Sacheverell, Mr. 55, 85, 91, 92,
93, 137, 149, 156, 167, 169,
191, 198, 195, 210, 219, 251,
255, 297, 302, 316, 320, 340,
345, 416, 467, 508, 527, 551,
561.
Sackville, Col. 453.
Salisbury, Bishop of, (Dr. Burnet) 228, 231.
Sawyer, Sir Robt. 47, 51, 52,
62, 119, 130, 141, 146, 155,
209, 265, 268, 326, 327, 329,
517, 523, 582, 613, 617.
Sedley, Sir Charles, 562, 574,
622, 634, 640, 643, 658, 671,
684, 691, 745, 747, 757, 763.
Seymour, Mr. 35, 56.
Seymour, Sir Edw. 36, 122,
124, 125, 146, 157, 158, 160,
348, 353, 407, 415, 423, 432,
434, 436, 440, 442, 466, 480,
496, 555, 563, 572, 579, 608,
619, 634, 638, 642, 691, 715,

727, 759, 793, 824, 1016,
1126.

Seymour, Sir Tho. 1098.
Shackerley, Mr. 598.
Sloane, Mr. 1009, 1030, 1047,
1073, 1145.
Smith, Mr. 281, 310, 319, 342,
343, 353, 372, 419, 477, 726,
1008, 1035, 1135.
Swynfin, Mr. 571.
Sommers, John (afterwards
Lord), 42, 68, 93, 144, 201,
230, 252, 458, 492, 495, 513,
529, 583, 615, 631, 677, 680,
712.
Strickland, Sir W. 285, 328,
1095, 1123.

T.

Temple, Sir Rich. 38, 51, 53,
58, 61, 62, 63, 99, 103, 123,
132, 143, 155, 158, 161, 166,
173, 176, 180, 184, 233, 255,
256, 258, 262, 287, 322, 466,
1007, 1022, 1093, 1139.
Thompson, Sir John, 218, 253,
285, 323, 331, 343, 363, 366,
369, 416, 455, 558, 568, 606,
666, 667, 776, 829.
Tipping, Mr. 62, 332, 413, 481.
Titus, Col. 777, 825.
Treby, Sir George, 40, 78, 80,
100, 133, 134, 141, 143, 180,
222, 227, 228, 249, 347, 410,
491, 497, 532, 659, 678, 687.
Tredenham, Sir Joseph, 159,
164, 175, 194, 198, 199, 200,
211, 219, 256, 262, 268, 276,
283, 287, 300, 319, 330, 366,
368, 412, 429, 459, 758.
Tremaine, Serjeant, 613, 628.
Trenchard, Mr. 1210.
Trevor, Sir John, 298, 410, 422,
432, 434, 491, 520, 533, 677, 906.

Trumbel, Mr. 1024.

V.

Ventris, Peyton, 140.
Vernon, Mr. 1133.

W.

Waller, Mr. 731, 732, 1022.
Ward, Sir Patience, 51.
Warr, Bromley, 1134.
Wharton, Henry, 39, 52, 153,
272, 569, 603, 723, 1023, 1087.
Whitaker, Mr. 1015.
Whitlock, Sir Wm. 526, 623.
Wildman, Major, 51, 52, 161, 181.
Williams, Sir Wm. 42, 50, 53,
133, 137, 139, 143, 158, 167,
172, 175, 176, 179, 180, 185,
191, 193, 207, 209, 221, 228,
247, 263, 273, 276, 285, 287,
294, 295, 296, 298, 300, 305,
306, 307, 308, 310, 316, 324,
326, 328, 344, 346.
Williamson, Sir Joseph, 554, 560, 569, 602, 604, 611, 1014, 1038.
Winchcomb, Sir H. 285, 316,
317, 372, 433, 460, 490, 491,
512, 517, 519, 978.
Winchester, Marquis of, 299,
412.
Winchester, Bishop of, (Dr.
Stillington), 842.
Winnington, Sir F. 761, 794,
804, 831, 1012, 1096.
Wogan, Mr. 174, 183, 346.
Wywell, Sir Marmaluke, 1040.

Y.

Yonge, Sir Walter, 323, 368,
509, 839.

Parliamentary History.

Parliamentary History.

COBBETT'S

Parliamentary History.

4 JAMES II. A. D. 1688.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE'S FIRST DECLARATION.] October 10, 1688. While James the Second was labouring under great difficulties and distractions, providing for his security, and endeavouring to remove the fears and jealousies of his Protestant subjects, the Prince of Orange was embarking his troops with extraordinary diligence; and, to justify his undertaking to the world, he, this day, set forth the following Declaration:

"It is both certain and evident to all men, that the public peace and happiness of any state or kingdom cannot be preserved, where the Laws, Liberties, and Customs, established by the lawful authority in it, are openly transgressed and annulled; more especially where the alteration of Religion is endeavoured, and that a religion, which is contrary to law, is endeavoured to be introduced; upon which those who are most immediately concerned in it are indispensably bound to endeavour to preserve and maintain the established Laws, Liberties and Customs, and, above all, the Religion and Worship of God, that is established among them; and to take such an effectual care, that the inhabitants of the said state or kingdom may neither be deprived of their Religion, nor of their Civil Rights: which is so much the more necessary, because the greatness and security both of kings, royal families, and of all such as are in authority, as well as the happiness of their subjects and people, depend in a most especial manner upon the exact observation and maintenance of these their Laws, Liberties and Customs.—Upon these Grounds it is that we cannot any longer forbear to declare, that, to our great regret, we see, that those Counsellors, who have now the chief credit with the king, have overturned the Religion, Laws and Liberties of those realms, and subjected them, in all things relating to their Consciences, Liberties and Properties, to arbitrary Government; and that, not only by secret and indirect ways, but in an open and undisguised manner.—Those evil Counsellors, for the advancing and colouring this with some plausible pretexts, did invent and set on foot the king's Dispensing Power; by virtue of which they pretend, that, according to law, he can suspend and dispense with the execution of the laws, that have been enacted by the authority of the king and parliament, for the security and happiness of the subject; and so have rendered those laws of no effect: though there is nothing more certain, than that, as no laws can be made but by the joint concurrence of king and parliament, so likewise laws so enacted, which secure the public peace and safety of the nation, and the Lives and Liberties of every subject in it, cannot be repealed or suspended but by the same authority.—For though the king may pardon the punishment that a transgressor has incurred, and to which he is condemned; as in cases of treason or felony; yet it cannot be, with any colour of reason, inferred from thence, that the king can entirely suspend the execution of those Laws relating to Treason or Felony, unless it is pretended, that he is clothed with a despotic and arbitrary power, and that the Lives, Liberties, Honours, and Estates of the subjects, depend wholly on his good-will and pleasure, and are entirely subject to him; which must infallibly follow on the king's having a Power to suspend the execution of laws, and to dispense with them.—Those evil Counsellors, in order to the giving some credit to this strange and execrable maxim, have so conducted the matter, that they have obtained a Sentence from the Judges, declaring, that this Dispensing Power is a Right belonging to the crown; as if it were in the power of the Twelve Judges to offer up the Laws, Rights, and Liberties of the whole nation to the king, to be disposed of by him arbitrarily, and at his pleasure, and expressly contrary to laws enacted for the security of the subjects. In order to the obtaining this judgment, those evil Counsellors did, beforehand, examine secretly the opinion of the Judges, and procured such of them, as could not in conscience concur in so pernicious a Sentence, to be turned out, and others to be substituted in their rooms, till, by the changes which were made in the courts of judicature, they at last obtained that judgment. And they have raised some to those trusts, who make open profession of the Popish Religion, though those are by law rendered incapable of all such employments.—It is also manifest and notorious, that, as his majesty was, upon his coming to the crown, received and acknowledged by all the subjects of England, Scotland, and Ireland, as their king, without the least opposition, though he made then open profession of the Popish Religion, so he did then promise and solemnly swear at his coronation, that he would maintain his subjects in the free enjoyment of their laws, rights, and liberties; and in particular, that he would maintain the Church of England, as it was established by law. It is likewise certain, that there have been, at divers and sundry times, several laws enacted for the preservation of those Rights and Liberties, and of the Protestant Religion; and, among other Securities, it has been enacted, That all persons whatsoever, that are advanced to any Ecclesiastical dignity, or to bear office in either University, as likewise all others that should be put in any employment civil or military, should declare, that they were not Papists, but were of the Protestant Religion, and that, by their taking of the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and the Test: yet these evil Counsellors have, in effect, annulled and abolished all those laws, both with relation to Ecclesiastical and Civil Employments.—In order to Ecclesiastical Dignities and Offices, they have, not only without any colour of law, but against most express laws to the contrary, set up a Commission of a certain number of persons, to whom they have committed the cognisance and direction of all Ecclesiastical matters; in the which commission there has been, and still is, one of his majesty's ministers of state, who makes now public profession of the Popish Religion; and who, at the time of his first professing it, declared, that for a great while before he had believed that to be the only true Religion. By all this, the deplorable state to which the Protestant Religion is reduced is apparent, since the affairs of the Church of England are now put into the hands of persons, who have accepted of a Commission that is manifestly illegal, and who have executed it contrary to all law; and that now one of their chief members has abjured the Protestant Religion, and declared himself a Papist; by which he is become incapable of holding any public employment. The said Commissioners have hitherto given such proof of their submission to the directions given them, that there is no reason to doubt, but they will still continue to promote all such designs, as will be most agreeable to them. And those evil Counsellors take care to raise none to any Ecclesiastical Dignities but persons, that have no zeal for the Protestant Religion, and that now hide their unconcernedness for it under the specious pretence of moderation. The said Commissioners have suspended the bishop of London, only because he refused to obey an order, that was sent him to suspend a worthy divine, without so much as citing him before him to make his own defence, or observing the common forms of process. They have turned out a President chosen by the Fellows of Magdalen College, and afterwards all the fellows of that college, without so much as citing them before any court that could take legal cognisance of that affair, or obtaining any Sentence against them by a competent judge: and the only reason that was given for turning them out, was, their refusing to choose for their President a person that was recommended to them by the instigation of those evil Counsellors, though the right of a free election belonged undoubtedly to them; but they were turned out of their Freeholds, contrary to law, and to that express provision in Magna Charta, That no man shall lose life or goods but by the law of the land: and now these evil Counsellors have put the said College wholly into the hands of the Papists; though, as is above said, they are incapable of all such employments, both by the law of the land, and the statutes of the college. These commissioners have also cited before them all the chancellors and archdeacons of England, requiring them to certify to them the names of all such clergymen as have read the king's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, and of such as have not read it, without considering that the reading of it was not enjoined the Clergy by the Bishops, who are their Ordinaries. The illegality and incompetency of the said court of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was so notoriously known, did so evidently appear, that it tended to the subversion of the Protestant Religion, that the most reverend father in God William archbishop of Canterbury, primate and metropolitan of England, seeing that it was raised for no other end but to oppress such persons who were of eminent virtue, learning and piety, refused to sit or to concur in it.—And, though there are many express laws against all Churches or Chapels for the exercise of the Popish Religion, and also against all Monasteries and Convents, and more particularly against the Order of the Jesuits; yet those evil Counsellors have procured Orders for the Building of several Churches and Chapels for the exercise of that Religion: they have also procured divers Monasteries to be erected; and, in contempt of the law, they have not only set up several Colleges of Jesuits in divers places, for corrupting of the youth, but have raised up one of the Order to be a privy counsellor, and a minister of state: by all which they do evidently shew, that they are restrained by no rules or law whatsoever; but that they have subjected the honours and estates of the subjects, and the Established Religion, to a despotick power, and to arbitrary government: in all which they are served and seconded by those Ecclesiastical Commissioners.—They have also followed the same methods with relation to Civil affairs; for they have procured orders to examine all lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and also all others that were in any public employment, if they would concur with the king in the repeal of the Test and the Penal Laws: and all such whose consciences did not suffer them to comply with their designs, were turned out, and others were put in their places, who they believed would be more compliant to them in their designs of defeating the intent and execution of those laws which had been made with so much care and caution for the Security of the Protestant Religion: and in many of these places they have put professed Papists; though the law has disabled them, and warranted the subjects not to have any regard to their orders.—They have also invaded the Privileges, and seized on the Charters of most of those Towns that have a right to be represented by their burgesses in parliament, and have secured Surrenders to be made of them; by which the magistrates in them have delivered up all their Rights and Privileges to be disposed of at the pleasure of those evil Counsellors; who have thereupon placed new magistrates in those Towns, such as they can most entirely confide in; and in many of them they have put Popish magistrates, notwithstanding the incapacities under which the law has put them.—And whereas no nation whatsoever can subsist without the administration of good and impartial justice, upon which mens lives, liberties, honours and estates do depend; those evil Counsellors have subjected these to an arbitrary and despotic power. In the most important affairs they have studied to discover beforehand the opinions of the Judges, and have turned out such as they found would not conform themselves to their intentions; and have put others in their places of whom they were more assured, without having any regard to their abilities: and they have not stuck to raise even professed Papists to the Courts of Judicature, notwithstanding their incapacity by law, and that no regard is due to any Sentences flowing from them. They have carried this so far, as to deprive such Judges, who, in the common administration of justice, shew, that they were governed by their consciences, and not by the directions which the others gave them: by which it is apparent, that they design to render themselves the absolute masters of the lives, honours and estates of the subjects, of what rank or dignity soever they may be; and that, without having any regard either to the equity of the cause, or to the consciences of the judges; whom they will have to submit in all things to their own will and pleasure: hoping by such ways to intimidate those other judges, who are yet in employment; as also such others as they shall think fit to put in the rooms of those whom they have turned out; and to make them see, what they must look for, if they should at any time act in the least contrary to their good-liking; and that no failings of that kind are pardoned in any persons whatsoever. A great deal of blood has been shed in many places of the kingdom, by Judges, governed by those evil Counsellors, against all the rules and forms of law; without so much as suffering the persons that were accused, to plead in their own defence.—They have also, by putting the Administration of justice in the hands of Papists, brought all the matters of Civil Justice into great uncertainties, with how much exactness and justice soever that these Sentences may have been given: for, since the laws of the land do not only exclude Papists from all places of judicature, but have put them under an incapacity, none are bound to acknowledge or obey their judgments; and all Sentences given by them are null and void of themselves: so that all persons, who have been cast in trials before such Popish Judges, may justly look on their pretended Sentences as having no more force than the sentences of any private and unauthorized person whatsoever: so deplorable is the case of the subjects, who are obliged to answer to such Judges, that must in all things stick to the rules, which are set them by those evil Counsellors; who, as they raised them up to those employments, so can turn them out of them at pleasure; and who can never be esteemed lawful Judges: so that all their Sentences are, in the construction of the law, of no force and efficacy. They have likewise disposed of all Military Employments in the same manner; for, though the laws have not only excluded Papists from all such employments, but have, in particular, provided, that they should be disarmed; yet they, in contempt of those laws, have not only armed the Papists, but have likewise raised them up to the greatest military trusts, both by sea and land; and that, strangers as well as natives, and Irish as well as English; that so, by these means, they having rendered themselves masters both of the Affairs of the Church, of the Government of the Nation, and of the Course of Justice, and subjected them all to a despotic and arbitrary Power, they might be in a capacity to maintain and execute their wicked designs by the assistance of the Army, and thereby to enslave the nation.—The dismal effects of this Subversion of the Established Religion, Laws and Liberties in England, appear more evidently to us by what we see done in Ireland; where the whole government is put in the hands of Papists; and where all the Protestant inhabitants are under the daily fears of what may be justly apprehended from the arbitrary power which is set up there: which has made great numbers of them leave that kingdom, and abandon their estates in it; remembering well that cruel and bloody Massacre which fell out in that Island in the year 1641.—Those evil Counsellors have also prevailed with the king to declare in Scotland, that he is clothed with absolute power, and that all the subjects are bound to obey him without reserve ; upon which he has assumed an arbitrary power, both over the Religion and Laws of that kingdom. From all which it is apparent, what is to be looked for in England, as soon as matters are duly prepared for it.—Those great and insufferable Oppressions, and the open contempt of all law, together with the apprehensions of the sad consequences that must certainly follow upon it, have put the subjects under great and just Fears, and have made them look after such lawful Remedies as are allowed of in all nations : yet all has been without effect. And those evil Counsellors have endeavoured to make all men to apprehend the loss of their Lives, Liberties, Honours and Estates, if they should go about to preserve themselves from this oppression by Petitions, Representations, or other means authorized by law. Thus did they proceed with the archbishop of Canterbury, and the other bishops ; who, having offered a most humble Petition to the king, in terms full of respect, and not exceeding the number limited by law, (in which they set forth, in short, the Reasons for which they could not obey that Order, which by the instigation of those evil Counsellors was sent them, requiring them to appoint their Clergy to read in their Churches the Declaration for Liberty of Conscience) were sent to prison, and afterwards brought to a Trial, as if they had been guilty of some enormous crime. They were not only obliged to defend themselves in that pursuit, but to appear before professed Papists, who had not taken the Test, and by consequence were men whose interest led them to condemn them : and the Judges that gave their opinions in their favours were thereupon turned out.—And yet it cannot be pretended, that any kings, how great soever their power has been, and how arbitrary and despotic soever they have been in the exercise of it, have ever reckoned it a crime for their subjects to come, in all submission and respect, and in a due number not exceeding the limits of the law, and represent to them the Reasons that made it impossible for them to obey their orders. Those evil Counsellors have also treated a peer of the realm as a criminal, only because he said that the subjects were not bound to obey the orders of a Popish Justice of Peace ; though it is evident, that, they being by law rendered incapable of all such trust, no regard is due to their orders ; this being the Security, which the people have by the law, for their Lives, Liberties, Honours and Estates, that they are not to be subjected to the arbitrary proceedings of Papists, that are, contrary to law, put into any employments civil or military.—Both We ourselves, and our dearest and most entirely beloved Consort the Princess, have endeavoured to signify in terms full of respect to the king, the just and deep regret which all these proceedings have given us ; and, in compliance with his majesty's Desires, signified to us, we declared, both by word of mouth to his envoy, and in writing, what our thoughts were, touching the Repealing of the Test and Penal Laws ; which we did in such a manner, that we hoped we had proposed an expedient, by which the peace of those kingdoms, and a happy agreement among the subjects of all persuasions, might have been settled ; but those evil Counsellors have put such ill constructions on those our good intentions, that they have endeavoured to alienate the king more and more from us, as if we had designed to disturb the happiness and quiet of the kingdom.—The last and great Remedy for all those evils is the calling of a Parliament, for securing the nation against the evil practices of those wicked Counsellors ; but this could not be yet compassed, nor can it be easily brought about : for those men apprehending, that a lawful Parliament being once assembled, they would be brought to an account for all their open violations of law, and for their Plots and Conspiracies against the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of the Subjects, they have endeavoured, under the specious pretence of Liberty of Conscience, first to sow divisions amongst Protestants, between those of the Church of England and the Dissenters ; the design being laid, to engage Protestants that are all equally concerned to preserve themselves from Popish oppression, into mutual quarrellings, that so, by these, some advantages might be given to them to bring about their designs ; and that, both in the Election of the Members of Parliament, and afterwards in the Parliament itself : for they see well that if all Protestants could enter into a mutual good understanding one with another, and concur together in the preserving of their Religion, it would not be possible for them to compass their wicked ends. They have also required all the persons in the several counties of England, that either were in any employment, or were in any considerable esteem, to declare beforehand, that they would concur in the Repeal of the Test and Penal Laws ; and that they would give their voices in the Elections to Parliament only for such as would concur in it. Such as would not thus pre-engage themselves were turned out of all employments ; and others who entered into those Engagements were put in their places, many of them being Papists. And, contrary to the Charters and Privileges of those Boroughs that have a right to send burgesses to parliament, they have ordered such Regulations to be made, as they thought fit and necessary for assuring themselves of all the members that are to be chosen by those Corporations : and by this means they hope to avoid that punishment which they have deserved ; though it is apparent, that all acts made by Popish Magistrates are null and void of themselves ; so that no parliament can be lawful, for which the elections and returns are made by Popish sheriffs and mayors of towns : and therefore as long as the authority and magistracy is in such hands, it is not possible to have any lawful parliament. And though, according to the constitution of the English government, and immemorial custom, all Elections of parliament-men ought to be made with an entire liberty, without any sort of force, or the requiring the electors to choose such persons as shall be named to them; and the persons thus freely elected ought to give their opinions freely upon all matters that are brought before them, having the good of the nation ever before their eyes, and following in all things the dictates of their conscience; yet now, the people of England cannot expect a Remedy from a free parliament legally called and chosen; but they may perhaps see one called, in which all Elections will be carried on by fraud or force; and which will be composed of such persons of whom those evil Counsellors hold themselves well assured, in which all things will be carried on according to their direction and interest, without any regard to the good or happiness of the nation: which may appear evidently from this, that the same persons tried the members of the last parliament, to gain them to consent to the Repeal of the Test and Penal Laws; and procured that parliament to be dissolved, when they found, that they could not, neither by promises nor threatenings, prevail with the members to comply with their wicked designs.—But, to crown all, there are great and violent presumptions inducing us to believe, that those evil Counsellors, in order to the carrying on of their ill designs, and to the gaining to themselves the more time for the effecting of them, for the encouraging of their complices, and for the discouraging of all good subjects, have published, that the Queen hath brought forth a Son; though there hath appeared, both during the Queen's pretended bigness, and in the manner in which the Birth was managed, so many just and visible grounds of suspicion, that not only we ourselves, but all the good subjects of those kingdoms, do vehemently suspect, that the pretended Prince of Wales was not born by the Queen. And it is notoriously known to all the world, that many both doubted of the Queen's bigness, and of the birth of the child; and yet there was not any one thing done to satisfy them, or to put an end to their doubts.—And since our dearest and most entirely beloved Consort the Princess, and likewise ourselves, have so great an interest in this matter, and such a right, as all the world knows, to the Succession to the Crown; since also the English did, in the year 1672, when the States General of the United Provinces were invaded in a most unjust war, use their utmost endeavours to put an end to that war, and that in opposition to those who were then in the government; and by their so doing, they run the hazard of losing both the favour of the court and their employments; and since the English nation has ever testified a most particular affection and esteem, both to our dearest Consort the Princess, and to ourselves; we cannot excuse ourselves from espousing their interests in a matter of such high consequence; and from contributing all that lies in us for the maintaining, both of the Protestant Religion, and of the Laws and Liberties of those kingdoms; and for the securing to them the continual enjoyment of all their just Rights: to the doing of which we are most earnestly solicited by a great many lords, both spiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and other subjects of all ranks.—Therefore it is, that we have thought fit to go over to England, and to carry over with us a force sufficient, by the blessing of God, to defend us from the violence of those evil Counsellors; and we, being desirous that our intention in this may be rightly understood, have, for this end, prepared this Declaration, in which we have hitherto given a true account of the Reasons inducing us to it; so we now think fit to declare, that this our Expedition is intended for no other design, but to have a free and lawful Parliament assembled as soon as is possible; and that in order to this, all the late Charters, by which the elections of burgesses are limited contrary to the ancient custom, shall be considered as null and of no force; and likewise, all magistrates, who have been unjustly turned out, shall forthwith resume their former employments; as well as all the boroughs of England shall return again to their ancient Prescriptions and Charters; and more particularly, that the ancient Charter of the great and famous city of London, shall again be in force; and that the Writs for the members of Parliament shall be addressed to the proper officers, according to law and custom; that also none be suffered to choose or to be chosen members of parliament, but such as are qualified by law; and that the members of parliament being thus lawfully chosen, they shall meet and sit in full freedom, that so the two houses may concur in the preparing of such Laws as they, upon full and free debate, shall judge necessary and convenient, both for the confirming and executing the law concerning the Test, and such other laws as are necessary for the security and maintenance of the Protestant Religion; as likewise for making such Laws as may establish a good agreement between the Church of England and all Protestant Dissenters; as also, for the covering and securing of all such who would live peaceably under the government, as becomes good subjects, from all persecution upon the account of their Religion, even Papists themselves not excepted; and for the doing of all other things, which the two houses of parliament shall find necessary for the peace, honour and safety of the nation, so that they may be in no more danger of the nation's falling at any time hereafter under arbitrary government. To this Parliament we will also refer the inquiry into the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, and of all things relating to it, and to the Right of Succession.—And we, for our part, will concur in every thing that may procure the peace and happiness of the nation, which a free and lawful Parliament shall determine; since we have nothing before our eyes, in this our undertaking, but the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the covering of all men from Persecution for their Consciences, and the securing to the whole nation the free enjoyment of their Laws, Rights and Liberties, under a just and legal government.—This is the Design that we have purposed to ourselves in appearing upon this occasion in arms; in the conduct of which, we will keep the Forces under our command under all strictness of martial discipline, and take a special care, that the people of the countries through which we must march shall not suffer by their means; and, as soon as the state of the nation will admit of it, we promise, that we will send back all those foreign forces that we have brought along with us.—We do therefore hope, that all people will judge rightly of us, and approve of these our proceedings: but we chiefly rely on the blessing of God, for the success of this our undertaking, in which we place our whole and only confidence.—We do, in the last place, invite and require all persons whatsoever, all the peers of the realm, both spiritual and temporal, all lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, and all gentlemen, citizens, and other commons of all ranks, to come and assist us, in order to the executing of this our Design, against all such as shall endeavour to oppose us, that so we may prevent all those miseries which must needs follow upon the nation's being kept under arbitrary government and slavery, and that all the violences and disorders, which may have overturned the whole Constitution of the English government, may be fully redressed, in a free and legal Parliament.—And we do likewise resolve, as soon as the nations are brought to a state of quiet, we will take care that a Parliament shall be called in Scotland, for the restoring the ancient constitution of that kingdom; and for bringing the Matters of Religion to such a Settlement, that the people may live easy and happy; and for putting an end to all the unjust violences that have been in a course of so many years committed there.—We will also study to bring the kingdom of Ireland to such a state, that the Settlement there may be religiously observed; and that the Protestant and British interest there may be secured. And we will endeavour, by all possible means, to procure such an Establishment in all the three kingdoms, that they may all live in a happy union and correspond together; and that the Protestant Religion, and the Peace, honour, and happiness of these nations may be established upon lasting foundations.—Given under our hand and seal, at our court in the Hague, the 10th day of October, in the year 1688. WILLIAM HENRY, Prince of ORANGE.”

The Prince of Orange's Additional Declaration.] The above Declaration was printed and ready to be sent over to England, together with another to the same effect for Scotland; when his highness being informed that king James had taken measures to render it ineffectual, caused the following Addition to be made to it:

“After we had prepared and printed this our Declaration, we have understood, that the Subverters of the Religion and Laws of those kingdoms, hearing of our Preparations to assist the people against them, have begun to retract some of the arbitrary and despotic powers that they had assumed, and to vacate some of their unjust Judgments and Decrees. The sense of their guilt, and the distrust of their force, have induced them to offer to the city of London, some seeming relief from their great oppressions; hoping thereby to quiet the people, and to divert them from demanding a secure re-establishment of their Religion and Laws under the shelter of our arms. They do also give out, that we intend to conquer and enslave the nation: and therefore it is, that we have thought fit to add a few words to our Declaration.—We are confident, that no persons can have such hard thoughts of us, as to imagine that we have any other design in this undertaking, than to procure a Settlement of the Religion, and of the Liberties and Properties of the subjects upon so sure a foundation, that there may be no danger of the nation's relapsing into the like miseries at any time hereafter. And as the Forces that we have brought along with us, are utterly disproportioned to that wicked design of conquering the nation, if we were capable of intending it, so the great numbers of the principal nobility and gentry, that are men of eminent quality and estates, and persons of known integrity and zeal, both for the Religion and Government of England; many of them being also distinguished by their constant fidelity to the crown, who do both accompany us in this Expedition, and have earnestly solicited us to it, will cover us from all such malicious insinuations. For it is not to be imagined, that either those who have invited us, or those who are already come to assist us, can join in a wicked attempt of conquest, to make void their own lawful titles to their honours, estates and interests. We are also confident, that all men see how little weight there is to be laid on all promises and engagements that can be now made; since there has been so little regard had in time past to the most solemn promises. And as that imperfect redress that is now offered, is a plain confession of those violations of the government that we have set forth, so the defectiveness of it is no less apparent; for they lay down nothing which they may not take up at pleasure; and they reserve entire, and not so much as mentioned, their claims and pretences to an arbitrary and despotic power; which has been the root of all their oppression, and of the total subversion of the government. And it is plain, that there can be no Redress nor Remedy offered but in parliament; by a Declaration of the Rights of the subjects that have been invaded; and not by any pretended Acts of Grace, to which the extremity of their affairs has driven them. Therefore it is that we have thought fit to declare, that we will refer all to a free Assembly of the nation, in a lawful Parliament.—Given under our hand and seal, at our court in the Hague, the 24th day of Oct. in the year 1688. WILLIAM HENRY, Prince of ORANGE."

A counterfeit Declaration published in the Prince's Name.] Besides the above, a spurious Declaration* was published in the Prince's name, which is said to have produced a considerable effect. It was as follows:

"We have in the whole course of our life, and more particularly by the apparent hazards both by sea and land, to which we have so lately exposed our person, given to the world so high and undoubted proofs of our fervent zeal to the Protestant Religion, that we are fully confident no true Englishman and good Protestant can entertain the least suspicion of our firm resolution, rather to spend our dearest blood, and perish in the attempt, than not to carry on the blessed and glorious design, which, by the favour of Heaven, we have so successfully begun, to rescue England, Scotland and Ireland from Popery and Slavery, and in a free parliament to establish the Religion, the Laws and Liberties of these kingdoms on such a sure and lasting foundation, that it shall not be in the power of any prince for the future to introduce Popery and Tyranny.—Towards the more easy compassing this great design, we have not been hitherto deceived in the just expectation we had of the concurrence of the nobility, gentry, and people of England with us, for the security of their Religion, and the establishment of their Liberties and Properties. Great numbers of all ranks and qualities have joined themselves to us; and others, at great distances from us, have taken up arms and declared for us: and, which we cannot but particularly mention, in that Army which was raised to be the instrument of Slavery and Popery, many, by the special providence of God, both officers and common soldiers, have been touched with such a feeling sense of religion and honour, and of true affection to their native country, that they have already deserted the illegal service they were engaged in, and have come over to us, and have given us full assurance from the rest of the army, that they will certainly

* "This was the boldest attempt that ever was made by a private person; and was supposed to have been done by Ferguson or Johnson; but of late Mr. Hugh Speke has assumed the honour of it to himself: a thing which we know not how fully to believe, or wholly to contradict. But, whoever was the author of this Declaration, which the prince of Orange totally disowned, it did his highness no small service at this nice juncture: the Roman Catholics were dreadfully alarmed at it; and several justices of the peace caused it to be published. A certain captain likewise boldly delivered a copy of it to the lord mayor of London, charging him, before witnesses, to see it exactly put in execution; and the inferior officers of justice desired his lordship's assistance, that they might better obey his highness's orders." Echard.

follow this example, as soon as we shall approach near enough to receive them without hazard of being prevented or betrayed.—To which end, and that we may the sooner execute this just and necessary Design we are engaged in for the public safety and deliverance of these nations, we are resolved with all possible diligence to advance forwards, that a free Parliament may be forthwith called, and such preliminaries adjusted with the king, and all things settled upon such a foot, according to law, as may give us and the whole nation just reason to believe, the king is disposed to make such necessary condescensions on his part, as will give entire satisfaction and security to all, and make both king and people once more happy. And that we may effect all this, in the way most agreeable to our desires, if it be possible, without the effusion of blood, except of those execrable criminals who have justly forfeited their lives for betraying the Religion, and subverting the laws of their native country, we do think fit to declare, that as we will offer no violence to any, but in our own necessary defence, so we will not suffer any injury to be done to the person, even of any Papist, provided he be found in such place, and condition, and circumstances as the law requires. So we are resolved, and do declare, that all Papists who shall be found in open arms, or with arms in their houses, or about their persons, or in any office civil or military, upon any pretence whatsoever, contrary to the known laws of the land, shall be treated by us and our forces, not as soldiers and gentlemen, but as robbers, free-booters and banditti; they shall be incapable of quarter, and entirely delivered up to the discretion of our soldiers. We do farther declare, that all persons who shall be found any ways aiding or assisting to them, or shall march under their command, or shall join with, or submit to them in the discharge or execution of their illegal commissions or authority, shall be looked upon as partakers of their crimes, enemies to the laws, and to their country.—And whereas we are certainly informed, that great numbers of armed Papists have of late resorted to London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, where they remain, as we have reason to suspect, not so much for their own security, as out of a wicked and barbarous design, to make some desperate attempt upon the said cities, and their inhabitants, by fire, or sudden massacre, or both; or else to be more ready to join themselves to a body of French troops designed, if it be possible, to land in England, procured of the French king, by the interest and power of the Jesuits, in pursuance of the engagements, which, at the instigation of that pestilent society, his most Christian majesty, with one of his neighbouring princes of the same communion, has entered into for the utter extirpation of the Protestant Religion out of Europe. Though we hope we have taken such effectual care to prevent the one, and secure the other, that, by God's assistance, we cannot doubt but we shall defeat all their wicked enterprizes and designs.—We cannot however forbear, out of the great and tender concern we have to preserve the people of England, and particularly those great and popular cities, from the cruel rage and bloody revenge of the Papists, to require and expect from all the lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, and justices of the peace, lord mayors, mayors, sheriffs, and all other magistrates and officers, civil and military, of all counties, cities and towns of England, especially of the county of Middlesex, and cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, that they do immediately disarm and secure, as by law they may and ought, within their respective counties, cities and jurisdictions, all Papists whatsoever, as persons at all times, but now especially, most dangerous to the peace and safety of the government, that so, not only all power of mischief may be taken from them, but that the laws, which are the greatest and best security, may resume their force, and be strictly executed. And we do hereby likewise declare, that we will protect and defend all those who shall not be afraid to do their duty in obedience to these laws. And that for those magistrates and others, of what condition soever they be, who shall refuse to assist us, and, in obedience to the laws, to execute rigorously, what we have required of them, and suffer themselves, at this juncture, to be cajoled and terrified out of their duty, we will esteem them the most criminal and infamous of all men; betrayers of their religion, the laws, and their native country; resolving to expect and require at their hands the life of every single Protestant that shall perish, and every house that shall be burnt or destroyed by their treachery and cowardice.—Given under our Hand and Seal, at our Head Quarters at Sherborn-Castle, the 28th of Nov. 1688. WILLIAM HENRY, Prince of Orange.”

The King's Answer to the Prince of Orange's Declaration.] On the 5th of Nov. the Prince of Orange landed at Torbay; soon after which, the King set forth the following Answer to his Declaration:

“That it was but too evident, by a late Declaration published by the Prince of Orange, that, notwithstanding the many specious and plausible pretences it carries, his Designs in the bottom did tend to nothing less than an absolute usurping of his majesty's crown and royal authority, as might fully appear by his assuming to himself in the said Declaration the regal style, requiring the peers of the realm, both spiritual and temporal, and all other persons of all degrees, to obey and assist him in the execution of his designs; a prerogative inseparable from the imperial crown of this realm: adding, that, for a more undeniable proof of his immoderate ambition, and which nothing could satisfy but the immediate possession of the crown itself, he called in question the legitimacy of the prince of Wales, his majesty's son and heir apparent; though by the providence of God, there were present at his birth so many witnesses of unquestionable credit, as if it seemed the peculiar care of heaven, on purpose to disappoint so wicked and unparalleled an attempt. That, in order to the effecting his ambitious designs, he seemed desirous to submit all to a free Parliament, hoping thereby to ingratiate himself with the people; though nothing was more evident than that a parliament could not be free so long as there was an Army of Foreigners in the heart of his majesty's kingdoms, so that in truth he was the sole obstructor of such a Free Parliament. His majesty being fully resolved, as he had already declared, so soon as by the blessing of God his kingdom should be delivered from this invasion, to call a Parliament, which could no longer be liable to the least objection of not being freely chosen, since his majesty had actually restored all the boroughs and corporations to their ancient rights and privileges. Upon which considerations, and the obligations of their duty and natural obedience, his majesty could no ways doubt, but that all his faithful and loving subjects would readily and heartily concur and join with him in the entire suppressing and repelling of his enemies and rebellious subjects.”

The Petition of several Lords to the King for calling a Parliament.] Soon after this, most of the Protestant lords, both spiritual and temporal, who were then in London, namely, the abp. of Canterbury, the abp. of York elect, the bishops of St. Asaph, Ely, Rochester, Peterborough and Oxford; the dukes of Grafton and Ormond; the earls of Dorset, Clare, Clarendon, Burlington, Anglesey and Rochester; viscount Newport, and the lords Paget, Chandos and Ossulston, drew up a Petition, which was considered, agreed on, and signed at the bishop of Rochester's house at Westminster. And, though they had heard that his majesty had protested, he would take it highly ill of any man that should offer him a thing of that nature, yet the two archbishops, with the bishops of Ely and Rochester, ventured to deliver it. The Petition runs in these words:

“May it please your majesty; We your majesty's most loyal subjects, in the deep sense of the miseries of a war, now breaking forth in the bowels of your kingdom, and of the danger to which your majesty's sacred person is thereby like to be exposed, as also of the distractions of your people by reason of the present Grievances, do think ourselves bound in conscience of the duty we owe to God and our holy Religion, to your majesty and our country, most humbly to offer to your maj. that in our opinion, the only visible way to preserve your majesty, and this your kingdom, would be the Calling of a Parliament, regular and free in all its circumstances. We therefore most earnestly beseech your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased with all speed to call such a parliament; wherein we shall be most ready to promote such councils and resolutions of Peace and Settlement in Church and State, as may conduce to your majesty's honour and safety, and to the quieting the minds of your people. We do likewise humbly beseech your majesty, in the mean time, to use such means [viz. a Treaty with the Prince, and those who had declared for him] for the preventing the effusion of Christian blood, as to your majesty shall seem most meet."

The King's Answer.] This Petition was printed, and two days after, the king set forth the following Answer :

"My Lords ; What you ask of me, I most passionately desire ; and I promise upon the faith of a king, that I will have a Parliament, and such a one as you ask for, as soon as ever the prince of Orange has quitted this realm : for how is it possible a parliament should be free in all its circumstances, as you petition for, while an enemy is in the kingdom, and can make a return of near a hundred voices ?"

Lord Devonshire's Paper.] The sense of the nation at this alarming period may be collected from the two following Papers, the first of which was delivered to the mayor of Derby by the earl of Devonshire, and the second was subscribed by a great number of the nobility, gentry, &c. at Nottingham.

"That as with grief they apprehended the calamities that might arise from the landing of a foreign army in this kingdom, so they could not but deplore the occasion given for it, by so many invasions made of late years on their Religion and Laws. And, whereas they could not think of any other expedient to compose their differences, and prevent effusion of blood, than that which procured a Settlement in these kingdoms, after the late Civil Wars, viz. the meeting and sitting of a Parliament, freely and duly chosen, they thought themselves obliged, as far as in them lay, to promote it ; and the rather, because the Prince of Orange, as appeared by his Declaration, was willing to submit his own pretensions, and all other matters, to their determination. They heartily wished, and humbly prayed, that his majesty would consent to this expedient, in order to a future Settlement, and hoped that such a temperament might be thought of, as that the army then on foot might not give any interruption to the proceedings of a parliament. But if, to the great misfortune and ruin of these kingdoms, it should prove otherwise, they farther declared, that they would to their utmost defend the Protestant Religion, the laws of the kingdom, and the Rights and Liberties of the subject."

The Nottingham Paper.] "That not being willing to deliver their posterity over to such a condition of Popery and Slavery, as their oppressions inevitably threatened, they would, to the utmost of their power, oppose the same, by joining with the Prince of Orange, for the recovery of their almost ruined laws, liberties and Religion. And herein they hoped all good Protestant subjects would, with their lives and fortunes, be assistant to them, and not be bug-bear'd with the opprobrious terms of rebels, by which the court would fright them, to become perfect slaves to their tyrannical insolences and usurpations. For they assured themselves, that no rational and unbiassed person would judge it Rebellion to defend their Laws and Religion, which all English princes have sworn at their coronation ; which oath, how well it had been observed of late, they desired a free Parliament might have the consideration of. They indeed owned it rebellion to resist a king that governed by law ; but he was always accounted a tyrant that made his will his law ; and to resist such an one they justly esteemed no rebellion, but a necessary defence : and on this consideration they doubted not of all honest men's assistance, and humbly hoped for, and implored the great God's protection, that turned the hearts of people as pleased him best ; it having been observed, that people could never be of one mind without his inspiration, which had in all ages confirmed that observation, 'Vox populi est vox Dei.'

The King's Proclamation declaring a general Pardon.] Soon after this, the ruinous state of the king's affairs produced the following Proclamation : "That for the Security of all persons both in their elections and service in Parliament, notwithstanding they had taken up arms, or committed any act of hostility, or been any way aiding or assisting therein : and for the better assurance thereof, his majesty had directed a General Pardon to all his subjects to be forthwith prepared to pass his great seal. And for the reconciling all the public breaches, and obliterating the very memory of all past miscarriages, his majesty did hereby exhort, and kindly admonish all his loving subjects, to dispose themselves to elect such persons for their representatives in Parliament, as might not be biassed by prejudice or passion, but qualified with parts, experience and prudence, proper for this conjuncture."

The King's Proposals to the Prince of Orange.] What followed next, were the Proposals in behalf of the king, by the lords Halifax, Nottingham and Godolphin, to the prince of Orange, viz :

"Sir ; The king commanded us to acquaint you, that he observeth all the difference and causes of complaint, alledged by your highness, seem to be referred to a free Parliament. His majesty, as he hath already declared, was resolved before this to call one ; but thought, that, in the present state of affairs, it was advisable to defer it till things were more composed ; yet, seeing that his people still continue to desire it, he hath put forth his Proclamation in order to it, and hath issued his writs for the calling of it. And to prevent any cause of interruption in it, he will consent to every thing that can be reasonably required for the security of those that shall come to it. His majesty hath therefore sent us to attend your highness for the adjusting of all matters that shall be agreed to be necessary to the freedom of elections, and the security of sitting, and is ready immediately to enter into a treaty in order to it. His majesty proposes, that, in the mean time, the respective armies may be restrained within such limits, and at such a distance from London, as may prevent the apprehensions that the parliament may be in any kind disturbed; being desirous that the meeting of it may be no longer delayed, than it must be, by the usual and necessary forms."

His Highness's Answer.] To which the Prince gave the following Answer:

"We, with the advice of the lords and gentlemen assembled with us, have, in Answer, made these following Proposals. 1. That all Papists, and all such persons as are not qualified by law, be disarmed, disbanded, and removed from all employments, civil and military. 2. That all Proclamations which reflect upon us, be recalled; and that if any persons, for having assisted us, have been committed, that they be forthwith set at liberty. 3. That for the security and safety of the city of London, the custody and government of the Tower be immediately put into the hands of the said city. 4. That if his majesty shall think fit to be at London, during the sitting of the parliament, that we may be there also, with equal number of our guards: or if his majesty shall please to be in any place from London, whatever distance he thinks fit, that we may be at a place of the same distance; and that the respective armies be from London 30 miles; and that no farther forces be brought into the kingdom. 5. That for the security of the city of London, and their trade, Tilbury Fort be put into the hands of the said city. 6. That a sufficient part of the Public Revenue be assigned us, for the support and maintenance of our troops, until the sitting of a Free Parliament. 7. That to prevent the landing of the French, or other foreign troops, Portsmouth may be put into such hands, as by his majesty and us shall be agreed on."

The King leaves Whitehall, and throws the Great Seal into the Thames.] Notwithstanding this Treaty, the king, resolving to take sanctuary in France, first, by letter, disbanded his Army, and then ordered all those writs to be burnt that were not sent out for the calling of the parliament, and entered a caveat against making use of those few that were already sent out. And lastly, when he left Whitehall, and took water, he threw the Great Seal into the Thames.

Meeting of the Peers at Guild-Hall—Their Declaration.] Dec. 11. About thirty of the lords spiritual and temporal, then in and about town, namely, the archbishops of Canterbury and York; the bishops of Winchester, St. Asaph, Ely, Rochester and Peterborough; the earls of Pembroke, Dorset, Mulgrave, Thanet, Carlisle, Craven, Aylesbury, Burlington, Berkeley, and Rochester; viscount Newport and Weymouth; and the lords Wharton, North and Grey, Chandois, Montague, Jermyn, Vaughan, Carbery, Colepeper, Crewe and Ossulston, all solemnly met at Guild-Hall, and sending for the lord mayor and aldermen of the city, who readily attended, made this memorable Declaration:

"We doubt not but the world believes that in this great and dangerous conjuncture, we are heartily and zealously concerned for the Protestant Religion, the Laws of the land, and the Liberties and Properties of the subject. And we did reasonably hope, that the king having issued out his proclamation and writs for a Free Parliament, we might have rested secure under the expectation of that meeting: but his majesty having withdrawn himself, and, as we apprehend, in order to his departure out of this kingdom, by the pernicious councils of persons ill-affected to our nation and religion, we cannot, without being wanting to our duty, be silent under these calamities, wherein Popish councils, which so long prevailed, have miserably involved this realm. We do therefore unanimously resolve to apply ourselves to his highness the Prince of Orange, who, with so great kindness to these kingdoms, such vast expence, and so much hazard to his own person, has undertaken, by endeavouring to procure a Free Parliament, to rescue us, with as little effusion, as possible, of Christian blood, from the imminent dangers of Slavery and Popery. —And we do hereby declare, that we will, with our utmost endeavours, assist his highness in the obtaining such a parliament with all speed, wherein our Laws, our Liberties and Properties may be secured, and the Church of England in particular, with a due liberty to Protestant Dissenters; and in general, that the Protestant religion and interest over the whole world may be supported and encouraged, to the glory of God, the happiness of the established government in these kingdoms, and the advantage of all princes and states in Christendom, that may be herein concerned. In the mean time we will endeavour to preserve, as much as in us lies, the peace and security of these great and populous cities of London and Westminster, and the parts adjacent, by taking care to disarm all Papists, and secure all Jesuits and Romish priests, who are in or about the same. And if there be any thing more to be performed by us, for promoting his highness's generous intentions for the public good, we shall be ready to do it, as occasion shall require."

Address of the City of London to the Prince.] This was followed by an Address from the city of London to the Prince, which runs thus: "We the lord-mayor, &c. taking into consideration your highness's fervent zeal for the Protestant Religion, manifested to the world in your many hazardous enterprizes, wherein it hath pleased Almighty God to bless you with miraculous success, do render our deepest thanks to the divine majesty for the same, and beg leave to present our most humble thanks to your highness, particularly for your appearing in arms in this kingdom, to carry on and perfect your glorious designs to rescue three kingdoms from Slavery and Popery, and in a Free Parliament to establish the Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of these kingdoms upon a sure and lasting foundation. We have hitherto looked for the same remedy for those oppressions and imminent dangers, which we, together with our Protestant fellow-subjects, laboured under, from his majesty's concessions and concurrences with your highness's just and pious purpose expressed in your gracious Declaration. But herein finding ourselves finally disappointed by his majesty's withdrawing himself, we presume to make your highness our refuge; and do in the name of this capital city, implore your highness's protection, and most humbly beseech your highness to repair to this city, where your highness will be received with universal joy and satisfaction."

The Lords meet the Prince of Orange at St. James's.] Dec. 21. The lords spiritual and temporal, to the number of above 60, appeared and assisted the Prince at St. James's in a great council. To whom his highness made this short Speech:

"My Lords; I have desired you to meet here to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of my Declaration in calling a Free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, the restoring the Rights and Liberties of the kingdom, and settling the same, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted."

Upon speaking of which, his highness withdrew. After the reading of the Prince's Declaration, the lords voted their particular Thanks for his highness's coming over; and, the better to consider the most effectual means to obtain the ends of his Declaration, and settle a Form of Government, they resolved to assemble for the future in their antient house at Westminster. For which purpose, they named five of the most eminent lawyers, viz. sir John Maynard, Mr. Holt, Mr. Pollexfen, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Atkinson, to assist them in their important consultations, and to explain to them the laws and constitutions of the realm, in the room of the Judges, who were most of them absent from London. They also appointed Mr. Francis Gwin to sign such Orders as should be from time to time by them made. It was farther proposed, that the whole assembly should sign the Association, formerly mentioned, which the nobility and gentry had already subscribed at Exeter; to which proposal all agreed, except the duke of Somerset, the earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, the lord Wharton, and all the bishops, save that of London, who set his hand to the association. The main objection of the Bishops was upon the account of the unchristian word 'Revenge,' which being afterwards changed for that of 'Punishment,' they were better satisfied.

The King's Paper left behind him when he took Shipping for France.] Dec. 23. The king took shipping for France, having first left behind him a Paper written with his own hand, which was as follows:

"The world cannot wonder at my withdrawing myself now this second time. I might have expected somewhat better usage after what I writ to the prince of Orange by my lord Feversham, and the instructions I gave him: but instead of an Answer, such as I might have hoped for, what was I to expect after the usage I received, by making the said earl a prisoner, against the practice and law of nations; the sending his own guards at eleven at night, to take possession of the posts at Whitehall, without advertising me in the least manner of it; the sending to me at one a-clock after midnight, when I was in bed, a kind of an Order by three lords, to be gone out of my own palace before twelve that same morning? After all this, how could I hope to be safe, so long as I was in the power of one, who had not only done this to me, and invaded my kingdoms without any just occasion given him for it; but that did, by his first Declaration, lay the greatest aspersion upon me that malice could invent, in that clause of it which concerns my son? I appeal to all that know me, nay, even to himself, that in their consciences, neither he, nor they, can believe me in the least capable of so unnatural a villainy, nor of so little common sense, to be imposed on in a thing of such a nature as that. What had I then to expect from one, who by all arts hath taken such pains to make me appear as black as hell to my own people, as well as to all the world besides? What effect that hath had at home, all mankind have seen by so general a defection in my Army, as well as in the nation, amongst all sorts of people.—I was born free, and desire to continue so; and though I have ventured my life very frankly on several occasions, for the good and honour of my country, and am as free to do it again, (and which I hope I shall yet do, as old as I am, to redeem it from the slavery it is like to fall under) yet I think it not convenient to expose myself to be so secured, as not to be at liberty to effect it; and for that reason do withdraw, but so as to be within call whenever the nation's eyes shall be opened, so as to see how they have been abused and imposed upon by the specious pretences of Religion and Property. I hope it will please God to touch their hearts, out of his infinite mercy, and to make them sensible of the ill condition they are in, and bring them to such a temper, that a legal Parliament may be called; and that, amongst other things which may be necessary to be done, they will agree to Liberty of Conscience to all Protestant Dissenters; and that those of my own persuasion may be so far considered, and have such a share of it, as they may live peaceably and quietly, as all Englishmen and Christians ought to do, and not be obliged to transplant themselves; which would be very grievous, especially to such as live in their own country: and I appeal to all men, who are considering men, and have had experience, whether any thing can make this nation so great and flourishing, as Liberty of Conscience? Some of our neighbours dread it. I could add much more, to confirm what I have said, but now is not the proper time."

The Peers assemble at Westminster: and address the Prince of Orange.] There being now an actual Interregnum, about ninety peers met at their house at Westminster, and agreed upon the following Address to the Prince of Orange:

"We the lords spiritual and temporal, assembled in this conjuncture, do desire your highness to take upon you the administration of Public Affairs both civil and military, and the disposal of the Public Revenue, for the preservation of our Religion, Rights, Laws, Liberties and Properties, and of the Peace of the nation; and that your highness will take into your particular care the present condition of Ireland, and endeavour by the most speedy and effectual means to prevent the dangers threatening that kingdom: all which we make our requests to your highness to undertake and exercise, till the Meeting of the intended Convention, the 22d day of Jan. next; in which, we doubt not, such proper methods will be taken, as will conduce to the establishment of these things upon such sure and legal foundations, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted. Dated at the house of lords, Westminster the 25th of December."

Having made this first step, their lordships proceeded to consider of the most effectual way for summoning the said Convention, and, the same day, drew up their opinions, in this second Address to the Prince:

"We the lords spiritual and temporal, assembled at Westminster in this extraordinary conjuncture, do humbly desire your highness to cause Letters to be written, subscribed by yourself, to the lords spiritual and temporal, being Protestants; and to the several counties, universities, cities, boroughs, and cinque ports of England, Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed: the Letters for the counties to be directed to the coroners of the respective counties, or any one of them; and in default of the coroners, to the clerk of the peace of the respective counties: and the Letters for the universities, to be directed to every vice-chancellor: and the Letters to the several cities, boroughs, and cinque ports, to be directed to the chief magistrate of each respective city, borough and cinque port; containing Directions for the chusing, in all such counties, cities, universities, boroughs and cinque ports, within ten days after the receipt of the respective Letters, such a number of persons to represent them, as are of right to be sent to parliament: of which elections, and the times and places thereof, the respective officers shall give notice, within the space of five days in the least. Notice of the intended elections for the counties, to be published in the churches, immediately after the time of divine service, and in all the market-towns within the said respective counties: and notice of the intended elections for the cities, universities, boroughs and cinque ports, to be published within the said respective places. The said Letters, and the execution thereof, to be returned, by such officer and officers who shall execute the same, to the clerk of the crown in the court of chancery; so as the persons so to be chosen may meet and sit at Westminster, on the 22d day of January next."—These two Addresses were subscribed by about ninety lords, who were then present in the house.

The Prince of Orange summons the Commons, &c.] Dec. 23. This day the Prince of Orange issued forth the following Order: viz. "Whereas the necessity of affairs does require speedy Advice; we do desire all such persons as have served as knights, citizens or burgesses in any of the parliaments that were held during the reign of the late king Charles II. to meet us at St. James's, upon Wednesday the 26th of this instant Dec. by ten of the clock in the morning. And we do likewise desire, that the lord mayor and court of aldermen of the city of London would be present at the same time; and that the common-council would appoint fifty of their number to be there likewise. And hereof we desire them not to fail."

His Speech to them.] Pursuant to this Summons, many members of the parliaments in king Charles's reign, to the number of about 160, and the aldermen and deputies of the common-council of the city of London, assembled at St. James's, on the appointed day; where the Prince made this following Speech to them: "You, gentlemen, that have been members of the late parliaments, I have desired you to meet me here, to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of my Declaration, in calling a Free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the restoring the Rights and Liberties of the kingdom, and settling the same, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted. And you the aldermen and members of the common-council of the city of London, I desire the same of you. And in regard your numbers are like to be great, you may, if you think fit, divide yourselves, and sit in several places." The lord mayor being absent, upon the account of his indisposition, the Prince gave the copy of his Speech to sir Thomas Allen, as being eldest alderman, and styled Father of the City, desiring that he and the rest would take that Paper into immediate consideration.

They form themselves into a House.] Accordingly, by agreement, they all repaired to the commons house in Westminster; where being seated, and having chosen Henry Powle, esq. for their chairman, the first question they debated, was, What Authority they had to assemble? Upon which it was soon agreed, That the request of his Highness the Prince was a sufficient warrant. The next Question of moment was, How his highness could take upon him the administration of affairs without a distinguishing name or title? Which objection being started by sir Robert Southwell, was sufficiently answered by serjeant Maynard, who said, That the Assembly would lose a great deal of time, if they waited till sir Robert could conceive how that was possible. A temporary offer of the government being made to his highness, one proposed that it should be, not for a month only, but for a whole year; to whom it was answered, that the Convention ought only to consider of that. Others moved that the Association, that had been signed by the lords, might likewise be subscribed by this assembly; but it was carried, that the said association should be left upon the table, and every one be at liberty to sign it or not.

Their Address to the Prince.] After these previous debates, they resolved upon Heads for an Address to be made to his highness, and appointed persons to draw up and prepare the same; and, in the afternoon, it was done accordingly, and read and approved in this form:

"We who have served as members of parliaments during the reign of the late king Charles II. together with the court of aldermen, and members of the common-council of the city of London, assembled at your highness's desire, in this extraordinary conjuncture, do, with an unanimous consent, tender to your highness our humble and hearty Thanks, for your coming into this kingdom, and exposing your person to so great hazards, for the preservation of our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, and rescuing us from the miseries of Popery and Slavery: and desire your highness, (for the pursuance of these ends, and for the preservation of the peace of the nation) will take upon you the Administration of Public Affairs, both civil and military, and the disposal of the Public Revenues. We do also desire, that your highness will take into your particular consideration, the present condition of Ireland; and endeavour, by the most speedy and effectual means to prevent the dangers threatening that kingdom. All which, we desire your highness to undertake and execute, until the Meeting of the intended Convention, the 22d day of January next." Then, for the chusing of members for the said Convention, they proposed the same which has been mentioned in the Lords Address; and so concluded in these words, "This we humbly offer to your highness, as our best advice, in this exigency of affairs, for attaining the ends of your highness's Declaration; and as the best means tending to such an Establishment, as that our Religion, Laws and Liberties, may not be in danger of being again subverted."

The Prince's Answer.] His highness having appointed to receive the Address the next morning, he was then attended by a body of them; and the Address was presented and read by Mr. Powle to his highness; who was pleased to declare, That it being a matter of weight, he would consider thereof, and give his Answer the next day. Accordingly, on Friday morning, Dec. 28, his highness first gave the following Answer at St. James's to the lords spiritual and temporal: "My lords; I have considered of your Advice; and, as far as I am able, I will endeavour to secure the peace of the nation, until the meeting of the Convention in January next; for the election whereof I will forthwith issue Letters, according to your desire. I will also take care to apply the Public Revenue to the most proper uses that the present affairs require; and likewise endeavour to put Ireland into such a condition, as that the Protestant Religion, and English Interest may be maintained in that kingdom. And I further assure you, That as I came hither for the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of these kingdoms, so I shall always be ready to expose myself to any hazard for the defence of the same." And in the afternoon, his highness was pleased to return the same Answer to the Commons.

MEETING OF THE CONVENTION.

List of the Members of the Convention.] January 22, 1688-9. This day the Convention met at Westminster*, agreeably to the Letters issued by the Prince of Orange, at the desire of the lords, commons, and citizens of London. The following is a List of its Members:

Abington, Thomas Medlicott.	Arundel, William Morley,
Agmondesham, Edmund Waller,	William Garraway,
St. Albans, Sir William Drake.	Ashburton, Sir Walter Young,
George Churchill,	Edward Reynel.
Samuel Grimston.	Aylsbury, Thomas Lee,
Aldborough, (Suffolk) Sir Henry Johnson,	Richard Beak.
Sir William Johnson.	Bambury, Sir Robert Dashwood.
Aldborough, (Yorkshire) Christopher Tancred,	Barnstaple, Richard Lee,
Sir Michael Wentworth.	Sir A. Chichester.
Allerton, North, William Robinson,	Bath City, Sir William Basset,
Thomas Lascels.	Visc. Fitzharding.
Andover, Francis Powlet,	Beaumaris, Sir William Williams.
John Pollen.	Bedfordshire, Edward Russel,
Anglesea, Visc. Bulkley.	William Duncomb.
Appleby, Sir John Lowther,	Bedford Town, Thomas Hillersden,
Henry Wharton.	Thomas Christie.

* "It was upon the appointed time, the longed-for 22d day of January, that the Grand Convention met; not only with the expectations of the British dominions, but of all the neighbouring kingdoms and nations. Being divided into two houses, as usual in parliament, (of whose rules they were strictly observant) they immediately proceeded to the choice of their Speakers. In the house of peers, the marquis of Halifax carried it against the earl of Danby; and in the lower house, Mr. Powle was unanimously chosen; though it was expected that sir Ed. Seymour, who had so early joined the Prince at Exeter, would have stood in competition with him. Both houses had their clerks and several officers, as in a regular parliament." Echard,

Bedwin,
Sir Edmund Warnford,
John Wildman.
Berkshire,
Montagu Bertie,
Sir Hum. Winchcomb.
Berwick,
Francis Blake,
Philip Babington.
Beverly,
Sir John Hotham,
Michael Wharton.
Bewdley,
Henry Herbert.
Bishops Castle,
Richard Moore,
Walter Warring.
Bletchingly,
Thomas Howard,
John Glydd.
Bodmin,
Sir John Cutler,
Nicholas Glynn.
Borlston,
John Elwill,
Joseph Maynard.
Boroughbridge,
Sir Thomas Meleverer,
Sir Henry Goodrick.
Bossiny,
Sir Peter Colliton,
Humphrey Nicholas.
Boston,
Sir William York,
Lord Willoughby.
Brackley,
John Parkhurst,
Lord Wenman.
Bramber,
John Alfred,
Charles Goring.
Brecon County,
Edw. Jones.
Brecon Town,
Thomas Morgan.
Bridgwater,
Henry Bull,
Sir Francis Warre.
Bridport,
Richard Broadrepp,
John Manley.
Bristol,
Sir Richard Hart,
Sir John Knight.
Bridgenorth,
Sir Edward Acton,
Sir William Whitmore.
Buckinghamshire,
Thomas Wharton,
Sir Thomas Lee.
Buckingham Town,
Sir Ralph Verney,
Sir Richard Temple.
Calne,
Henry Chivers,
Li. Duckett.
Cambridgeshire,
Sir Levinz Bennet,
Sir Robert Cotton.
Cambridge Town,
John Cotton,
Sir Thomas Chichley.
Cambridge University.

Sir Robert Sawyer,
Isaac Newton.
Camelford.
Henry Manaton,
Ambrose Manaton,
Canterbury,
Sir Edw. Honynwood,
Henry Lee.
Cardiff,
Thomas Mansel.
Cardigan County,
Hector Philips.
Cardigan Town,
John Vaughan.
Carlisle,
Jer. Bubb,
Sir Christ. Musgrave.
Caermarthen County,
Sir Rice Rudd.
Caermarthen Town,
Richard Vaughan.
Caernarvon County,
Sir William Williams.
Caernarvon Town,
Sir Robert Owen.
Castle-rising,
Sir Robert Howard,
Robert Walpole.
Chester County,
Sir Robert Cotton,
John Mainwaring.
Chester City,
Robert Whitley,
Sir Thomas Grosvenor.
Chichester,
Thomas Miller,
Thomas May.
Chippenham,
Henry Baynton,
Nich. Baynton.
Chipping Wycombe,
Thomas Lewis.
William Jephson.
Christ Church,
Francis Gwynn.
William Etterick.
Cirencester,
John How,
Thomas Maisters.
Clifton,
Charles Boon,
William Hayne.
Clithero,
Christ. Wilkinson,
Anthony Parker.
Cockermouth,
Sir Henry Capel,
Henry Fletcher.
Colchester,
Samuel Reynolds,
Isaac Rebow.
Corf-Castle,
William Okeden,
Richard Fownes.
Cornwall,
Sir John Carew,
Hugh Boscawen.
Coventry,
John Stratford,
Sir Roger Cave.
Cricklade,
Charles Fox,
Edmund Webb.

Cumberland,
Sir John Lowther,
Sir George Fletcher.
Denbighshire,
Sir Richard Middleton.
Denbigh Town,
Edward Brereton.
Derbyshire,
Sir John Gell,
Sir Gilbert Clarke.
Derby Town,
Anthony Grey,
John Coke.
Devizes,
Sir William Pincent,
Walter Grubb.
Devonshire,
Francis Courtney,
Samuel Roll.
Dorchester,
Gerard Napier,
John Trenchard.
Dorsetshire,
Thomas Strangeways,
Thomas Freak.
Dover,
Sir Basil Dixwell,
Thomas Papillon.
Downton,
Maurice Buckland,
Sir Chas. Rawley.
Droitwich,
Lord Coot,
Samuel Sandys.
Dunwich,
Sir Thomas Allen,
Roger North.
Durham County,
Robert Byerly,
William Lambton.
Durham City,
George Morland,
Henry Lyddell.
East Loth,
Henry Trelawny,
Charles Trelawny,
Edmunds Bury,
Sir Robert Davers,
Sir Thomas Harvey.
Essex,
Henry Mildway,
John North.
Evesham,
Henry Parker,
Sir J. Matthews.
Exeter,
Henry Polexfen,
Sir Edward Seymour.
Eye,
Thomas Knivet,
Henry Pooley.
Flintshire,
Sir R. Pulestone.
Flint Town,
Sir John Hanmer.
Fowey,
Shadrach Vincent,
John Rashleigh.
Gatton,
Thomas Turgis.
Sir John Thompson.
Germain's,
Sir Walter Moyle,

Daniel Elliot.
Glamorgan,
Bussey Mansel.
Gloucestershire,
Sir John Guise,
Sir Ralph Dutton.
Gloucester City,
Sir Duncomb Colchester,
Sir William Cook.
Grampound,
Edward Hearle,
John Tanner.
Graham,
Sir John Brownlow,
Sir William Ellis.
Grimby,
Sir Thomas Brinsden,
Sir Edward Askew.
Grimstead,
Sir Thomas Dyke,
Thomas Sacville.
Guildford,
Foot Ouslow.
John Weston.
Hartwich,
Sir Thomas Middleton,
John Eldred.
Haslemere,
White Titchborn,
Dennis Ouslow.
Haslings,
Thomas Mun,
John Ashburnham.
Haverford West,
William Wogan.
Helston,
Sir John St. Aubin,
Charles Godolphin,
Herefordshire,
Sir Edward Harley,
Sir John Morgan.
Hereford City,
Sir William Grevil,
Paul Foley.
Hertfordshire,
Sir Charles Caesar,
Sir Thomas Blunt.
Hertford Town,
Sir William Cowper,
Sir Thomas Bide.
Heydon,
Matthew Appleyard,
Henry Guy.
Heytesbury,
William Sacheverell,
William Ash.
Higham,
Sir Rice Rudd.
Hindon,
John Milner,
Robert Hyde.
Honiton,
Richard Courtney,
Edmund Walrond.
Horsham,
Anthony Eversfield,
John Mitchel.
Huntingdonshire,
Robert Montagu.
Robert Bernard.
Huntingdon Town,
Sidney Wortley,
John Bigg.

Hythe,
 Edward Hales,
 Julius Deeds.
Ilchester,
 Sir Edward Windham,
 William Hellier.
Ipswich,
 Peyton Ventris,
 Sir John Barker.
Ives, (St.)
 James Praed,
 Walter Vincent.
Kellington,
 Jon. Prideaux,
 William Coriton.
Kent,
 Sir Vere Fane,
 Sir John Knatchbull.
Kingslon,
 William Gee,
 John Ramsden.
Knareborough,
 Lord Latimer,
 William Stockdale.
Lancaster County,
 Lord Brandon,
 Sir Charles Houghton.
Lancaster Town,
 John Belson,
 John Raven.
Lanceston,
 William Harbord,
 Edward Russel.
Leicestershire,
 Thomas Halford,
 Lord Sherrard.
Leicester Town,
 Thomas Bellis,
 Laurence Carter.
Leominster,
 John Duttoncolt,
 Thomas Coningsby.
Leskard,
 Sir Boucher Wray,
 John Buller.
Lestwithiel,
 Francis Roberts,
 Walter Kendal.
Lewes,
 Thomas Pelham,
 Richard Bridger.
Lincolnshire,
 Lord Castleton,
 Sir Thomas Hussey.
Lincoln City,
 Sir Christopher Nevil.
 Henry Monson, Litchfield,
 Sir Michael Bidulph,
 Robert Burdet.
Liverpool,
 Lord Colchester,
 Thomas Norris.
London,
 Sir Patience Ward,
 Sir Robert Clayton,
 William Love,
 Thomas Pilkington.
Ludlow,
 Charles Baldwin,
 Francis Herbert.
Ludgershall,
 John Smith,

John Dean.
Lyme,
 John Burridge,
 John Pool.
Lymington,
 Richard Holt,
 John Burrard.
Lynn,
 Sigismund Trafford,
 Sir John Turner.
Maidstone,
 Sir Thomas Taylor,
 Caleb Banks.
Malden,
 Charles Montagu,
 Thomas Darcy.
Malmsbury,
 Henry Wharton,
 Charles Godfrey.
Malton,
 Sir William Strickland,
 William Palms.
Marlborough,
 Sir J. Earnly,
 George Willoughby.
Marlow,
 Lord Faulkland,
 Sir John Borlace.
Mawes, (St.)
 Sir J. Tredenham,
 Henry Seymour.
Melcomb,
 Sir John Morton,
 Sir Robert Napier.
Merionethshire,
 Sir John Wynne.
Midhurst,
 Sir Wm. Morley.
 John Lukner.
Middlesex,
 Sir Charles Garrard,
 Ralph Hawley.
Milbourn,
 Thomas Saunders,
 John Hunt.
Minehead,
 Nathaniel Palmer,
 Francis Lutterell.
Michael, (St.)
 Francis Vivian,
 Lord Fenshaw.
Monmouthshire,
 Sir Trevor Williams,
 Lord Worcester.
Monmouth Town,
 John Arnold.
Morpeth,
 Roger Fenwick,
 Lord Morpeth.
Montgomeryshire,
 Edward Vaughan.
Montgomery Town,
 Lord Herbert.
Newark,
 Lord Eland,
 Nicholas Saunderson.
Newcastle, (Staffordsh.)
 Sir John Gower,
 John Lawton.
Newcastle, (Northum.)
 Sir William Blacket.
 Sir Robert Carr.

Newport, (Cornwall)
 William Morrice,
 John Specot.
Newport, (Hants)
 Sir Robert Dillington,
 Wm. Stevens.
Newton, (Lancashire)
 Francis Cholmley,
 Sir John Chichley.
Newton, (Hants)
 Lord Ranelagh,
 Thomas Done.
Norfolk County,
 Sir William Cook,
 Sir Henry Hobart.
Northamptonshire,
 Edward Montagu.
 Edward Harby.
Northampton Town,
 Sir John Langham,
 Sir Justinian Isham.
Northumberland County,
 William Forster,
 Philip Bickerstaff.
Norwich,
 Thomas Blofield,
 Sir Neville Catlyn.
Nottinghamshire,
 Lord Houghton,
 Sir Scroop How.
Nottingham Town,
 Francis Pierrepont,
 Edward Bigland.
Okehampton,
 Henry Northleigh,
 William Carey.
Orford,
 Sir John Duke,
 Thomas Glemham.
Oxfordshire,
 Sir Robert Jenkinson,
 Sir John Cope.
Oxford City,
 Sir Edward Norris,
 Henry Bertie.
Oxford University,
 Heneage Finch,
 Sir Thomas Clarges.
Pembrokeshire,
 Sir Hugh Owen.
Pembroke Town,
 Arthur Owen.
Penryn,
 Anthony Rowe,
 Alexander Pendarvis.
Peterborough,
 Gilbert Dolben,
 Charles Fitzwilliams.
Petersfield,
 Robert Mitchell,
 Thomas Bilson.
Plymouth,
 Sir John Maynard,
 Arthur Herbert.
Plimpton,
 Sir George Treby,
 John Pollexfen.
Pool,
 Henry Trenchard,
 Thomas Chaffin.
Pontefract,
 Lord Down,
 Sir Thomas Yarborough.

Portsmouth,
 Richard Norton,
 Henry Slingsby.
Preston,
 James Stanley,
 Thomas Patten.
Queenborough,
 James Herbert,
 Robert Crawford.
Radnor County,
 Sir Rowland Gwyn.
Radnor Town,
 Richard Williams.
Reading,
 Sir Wm. Rich,
 Sir Henry Fane.
Retford,
 Evelyn Pierrepont,
 John Thornhaugh.
Richmond,
 Thomas York,
 John Darcy.
Rippon,
 Sir Edw. Blacket,
 Sir Jon. Jennings.
Rochester,
 Sir Roger Twisden,
 Sir John Banks.
Rumney,
 John Brewer,
 James Chadwick.
Rutlandshire,
 Bennet Sherrard,
 Sir Thomas Mackworth.
Rye,
 Sir John Darrel,
 Thomas Frewen.
Ryegate,
 Roger James,
 Sir John Parsons.
Salop County,
 Richard Newport,
 Edw. Kynaston.
Salop Town,
 Sir Francis Edwards,
 Andrew Newport.
Saltash,
 Bernard Greenville,
 John Warden.
Sandwich,
 Sir James Oxenden,
 John Thurbane.
Sarum New,
 Thomas Hoby,
 Giles Eyre.
Sarum Old,
 John Young,
 Thomas Pitt.
Scarborough,
 William Herbert,
 Francis Thompson.
Seaford,
 William Champion,
 Sir Nicholas Pelham.
Shaftsbury,
 Edward Nicholas,
 Sir Matthew Andrews.
Shoreham,
 John Monk,
 Sir Edw. Hungerford.
Somersetshire,
 Edward Gorges,
 George Horner.

Southampton County,
 Lord Pawlet,
 Lord Wiltshire.
Southampton Town,
 Sir Richard Bret,
 Sir Benj. Newland.
Southwark,
 Sir Peter Rich,
 John Arnold.
Staffordshire,
 Sir Walter Baggot,
 John Gray.
Stafford Town,
 Philip Foley,
 John Chetwynd.
Stamford,
 William Hyde,
 Charles Bertie.
Sleynning,
 Sir John Morton,
 Sir John Fagg.
Stockbridge,
 Richard Whitehead,
 Essex St. John.
Sudbury,
 Sir John Poley,
 Philip Gurdon.
Suffolk,
 Sir John Cordel,
 Sir John Rous.
Surry County,
 Sir Richard Onslow,
 George Evelyn.
Sussex,
 Sir John Pelham,
 Sir William Thomas.
Tamworth,
 Henry Sidney,
 Sir Henry Gough.
Tavistock,
 Sir Francis Drake,
 Robert Russel.
Taunton,
 Sir W. Portman,
 John Sandford.
Tewkesbury,
 Sir Francis Russel,
 Richard Dowdeswell.
Thetford,
 William Harbord,
 Sir Francis Guybon.
Thirsk,
 Richard Staines,
 Thomas Frankland.
Tiverton,
 Samuel Foot,
 William Coleman.
Tolness,
 Sir John Fowell,
 Richard Mallock.
Tregony,
 Charles Boscawen,
 Hugh Fortescue.
Truro,
 John Manley,
 Henry Vincent.
Wallingford,
 Thomas Tipping,
 William Jennings.
Warwickshire,
 Sir Richard Newdigate,
 Sir Richard Verney.

Warwick Town,
 William Colemore,
 Lord Digby,
Wareham,
 George Reeves,
 Thomas Erle.
Wells,
 Thomas Wyndham,
 Edward Berkeley.
Wendover,
 John Hampden,
 Richard Hampden.
Wenlock,
 William Forrester,
 George Weld.
Weobly,
 John Birch.
 James Morgan.
Westbury,
 Peregrine Bertie,
 Richard Lewis.
West Low,
 Piercy Kirk,
 James Kendall.
Westminster,
 Sir William Pulteney,
 Philip Howard.
Westmoreland,
 Henry Wharton,
 Sir John Lowther.
Weymouth,
 Michael Harvey,
 Henry Henninge.
Whitchurch,
 Lord Russell,
 Henry Wallop.
Winchelsea,
 Richard Austin,
 Samuel Western.
Winchester,
 Lord Pawlet,
 Francis Morley.
Windsor,
 Sir Christopher Wren.
 Henry Powle.
Wilton,
 Thomas Penruddock,
 Thomas Wyndham.
Wiltshire,
 Thomas Mompesson,
 Lord Cornbury.
Woodstock,
 Sir John Doyley,
 Sir Thomas Littleton.
Woolton Basset,
 Henry St. John,
 John Wildman.
Wygan,
 Sir Edw. Chisnal,
 William Banks.
Worcestershire,
 Sir John Rushout,
 Thomas Foley.
Worcester City,
 John Somers,
 William Bromley.
Yarmouth, (Norfolk)
 George England,
 Lord Huntington.
Yarmouth, (Hants)
 Richard Norton,
 Henry Slingsby.

Yorkshire,
 Sir John Key,
 Lord Fairfax,

York City,
 Lord Dumblain,
 Edward Thompson.

SPEAKER.—Henry Powle.

Mr. Powle chosen Speaker.] The earl of Wiltshire put the house in mind that the first business to be done was to chuse a Speaker, and that there was an honourable person in his eye, whom he conceived very well experienced in methods of parliament, and every way qualified for that place. He then proposed the right hon. Henry Powle, esq. who being approved by a general call, to the Chair, was conducted to and placed in the same by the earl of Wiltshire, and sir Vere Fane, knight of the Bath; where being seated, he spake to the following effect: "Gentlemen, I know very well that excuses from this place, are looked upon only as formalities; but I am so sensible of my own defects, and so desirous that this house may not receive any prejudice by them, that I most earnestly intreat you, that, among so many honourable and experienced members as are here met this day, you would make choice of one that is better able to perform the duty of this place."—But his Excuse not being allowed, the mace was called for and placed upon the table; after which, the house proceeded to the choice of their officers.

The Prince of Orange's Letter to both Houses.] And then Mr. Jephson, secretary to the Prince of Orange, presented to the Speaker a Letter from his highness, which the Speaker read to the house as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I have endeavoured to the utmost of my power to perform what was desired from me in order to the public peace and safety; and I do not know that any thing hath been omitted which might tend to the preservation of them, since the administration of affairs was put into my hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the foundation of a firm security for your Religion, your Laws and your Liberties. I do not doubt, but that by such a full and free representative of the nation, as is now met, the ends of my Declaration will be attained: and since it hath pleased God hitherto to bless my good intentions with so great success, I trust in him, that he will complete his own work, by sending a spirit of peace and union to influence your counsels, that no interruption may be given to a happy and lasting Settlement.—The dangerous condition of the Protestants in Ireland requiring a large and speedy succour, and the present state of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unreasonable divisions among ourselves, nothing can be so fatal as too great a delay in your consultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to rescue this nation, may suddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the service of their troops, which are now here, and of your early assistance against a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war against them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon such exigencies, so I am confident, that their chearful concurrence to preserve this kingdom with so much hazard to themselves, will meet with all the returns of friendship and assistance, which may be expected from you as Protestants and Englishmen, whenever their condition will require it. Given at St. James's the 22d of Jan. 1688-9."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Garroway. All England is sensible of the great deliverance that we have had from Popery and Slavery by this generous Expedition of the prince of Orange. I need not urge arguments to give him Thanks; and, in the mean time, till we can proceed to a Settlement of the Nation, and till the lords and commons shall make farther application to him, desire 'that he will be pleased to take the Administration of the Government upon him.'

Mr. Hampden. I do concur in the motion. As the Prince's Letter requires haste, so I would have no time lost in considering it, so as things may not be precipitated which require due deliberation. Be pleased, in the mean time, to thank the prince, for the great action he has done in delivering the nation from Popery and Slavery; and, in the same words, to desire him to continue the Administration of the Government, till the lords and commons shall make farther application to him.

Col. Birch. 'That Thanks should be returned to the Prince, for his Deliverance of us, &c.' I would not have it so; but, 'that God has done it by his means.' I could never have believed, some months since, what God, by his hand, hath wrought for this kingdom.

Several other motions were made for an Addition to the question.

Sir Tho. Lee. Nothing will save your time more than to let two or three gentlemen withdraw, and pen you an Address, upon the debate of the house.

Mr. John Howe. I think it as proper for us to say, by whose means we were brought into Popery and Slavery, as by whom we were delivered out.

Address of both Houses to the Prince.] The lords sent a Message, with an Address much of the same nature with that above debated, for the concurrence of the house; which was agreed to as follows:

"We, the lords spiritual and temporal and commons assembled at Westminster, being highly sensible of the great Deliverance of this kingdom from Popery and arbitrary Power, and that our preservation is (next under God) owing to your highness, do return our most humble Thanks and Acknowledgments to your highness, as the glorious instrument of so great a blessing to us. We do further acknowledge the great care your highness has been pleased to take in the administration of the public affairs of the kingdom to this time. And we do most humbly desire your highness, that you will take upon you the administration of public affairs, both civil and military; and the disposal of the public revenue, for the preservation of our religion, rights, laws, liberties, and properties, and of the peace of the nation. And that your highness will take into your particular care the present condition of Ireland; and endeavour, by the most speedy and effectual means, to prevent the dangers threatening that kingdom. All which we make our request to your highness to undertake and exercise, till further application shall be made by us; which shall be expedited with all convenient speed; and shall also use our utmost endeavours to give dispatch to the matters recommended to us by your highness's letter."

The Prince's Answer.] The Prince's Answer was as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am glad that what I have done hath pleased you; and since you desire me to continue the Administration of Affairs, I am willing to accept it. I must recommend to you the consideration of affairs abroad; which maketh it fit for you to expedite your business, not only for making a Settlement at home upon a good foundation, but for the safety of all Europe."

Debate on filling up the Vacancies of the House.] Sir Henry Capel. This assembly has been chosen with freedom. There has not been a better election a great while, without force of the lord lieutenants. You have done a great deal in one day, but this is not enough; so consider the word 'Administration;' it is but a small trust you repose in the prince; it will roll, and be uncertain. The prince has told you who has helped him to come over hither, the Protestants. I have seen quick bills for Money pass here, to fight against Protestants: I hope we shall now fight with them. His troops are wanted in Holland. I hope you will not neglect a day to consider them: The Protestants abroad are uneasy till they hear how we proceed. I have observed that we have not had above 160 formerly, at giving great sums; whereas, now we have no king, we are a full house. Therefore, pray take the State of the Nation into consideration as soon as you please.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The matter before you is of the greatest weight; therefore I hope you will proceed with prudence and wariness. Whole counties, as yet, have no members: and, that there may be no imputations upon us, and that all exceptions may be taken away, I would have this great affair debated in a full house.

Mr. Hampden. It is proper to resolve upon filling the Vacancies of the house. I would not preclude the motions for it; but it is the order of the house, on a Vacancy, to send your Letter for filling up that vacancy. If you apply to the proper officer, he must have a seal; but now he has none, so cannot execute your order. Make a general rule for filling the Vacancies here, that, upon such a motion, application may be made to the Prince for his Letter to fill up that vacancy.

Mr. Scymour. We are in so unfortunate an age, that it has improved precedents especially on mistaken grounds. There never was a Letter sent to the Chancellor for a writ to fill up a vacancy, but by a warrant from the Speaker of the commons of England assembled. 'You are to take care to chuse, &c.' It must be first made known to you, and it is the easiest way by warrant or order from you, and not to trouble the Prince upon this occasion.

Sir Tho. Clarges. A warrant from this house is a warrant for the lord keeper or chancellor, and he has always obeyed it, and thought it sufficient authority to send out a writ. Now you are here as a Convention, which is a resemblance of a parliament. The king, before he calls a parliament, sends his writ to chuse members: after you have sat here, then your precept; and now that we are sat here, you may send your warrant or letter to the coroner.

The Speaker. Anciently, you sent to the lord keeper or chancellor to issue out his writ, &c. There was, I remember, a great controversy [in 1672*] about my lord chancellor Shaftsbury sending out Writs to fill Vacancies, on his own motion, before he had notice from this house. There are two ways now proposed; one for a letter from the Prince to the coroner, and the other for the Speaker to send his Letter in your name, &c. I am ready to put the question which way you please.

Resolved, "That where any Vacancies have already happened, or shall hereafter happen, by death or removal of any members, or double returns, Mr. Speaker do, for the future, upon motion to this house, by his Letter, make application to his highness the prince of Orange, desiring him to issue out his Letter, directed to the respective coroner or coroners or chief magistrates, as formerly, for the supplying such Vacancies, by electing other members therein."

The King's Letter to the Lords and Commons.] About this time, the King, now at St. Germain's, directed the following Letter to both houses; in which, with great concern, he told them, "That he thought himself obliged in conscience to do all he could to open his people's eyes, that they might see the true interest of the nation in this important conjuncture: that finding he could no longer stay with safety, nor act with freedom, he had left the Reasons of his withdrawing from Rochester, under his own hand: that understanding that Letter [here repeated at length] was not taken to be his, but was maliciously suppressed by the Prince of Orange, he wrote to several of his privy-council, and directed copies thereof to divers of them, the peers of the realm, believing none durst intercept or open any of his letters: that of all these he had no account, nor did he wonder that all arts were used to hinder them from knowing his sentiments: that he was resolved that nothing should be omitted on his part, that could contribute towards the Redress of all former errors, or present disorders, or add to the securing of the Protestant Religion, or the Property of the subject; intending to refer the whole to a parliament legally called, freely elected, and held without constraint: and that none might despair of his mercy, he declared on the word of a king, that his pardon should be extended even to those that betrayed him, (some few excepted) resolving in that parliament, by an Act of Oblivion, to cover all faults."—This Letter was sent by the lord Preston to the house of commons, and directed to their Speaker: but the house understanding that it came from king James, did not think fit to take any notice of it, and so rejected it unopened.

Debate on the State of the Nation.] Jan. 28. Col. Birch. It has been moved, by one or two, 'That the Speaker leave the chair.' I have known it moved, in granting Money, and all ordinary business; but to leave it now, in a great business, you will make it twice as long. I move you to consider, that, as it will hinder the work, so it will lower the greatness of it, and make it less than it is.

Serjeant Maynard. It is a great affair now upon you. It is never done till debated first in the house. How many propositions will happen at a grand committee, without your directions first! You must, at a committee, know whereupon to go. First consider of the business, and then refer it as occasion requires.

Sir Edw. Seymour. What resolution soever you take, I would not have you go out of the method of usual proceedings. I know how strait-laced, in such a great matter, men will be in the house, where they can speak but once. It will look as if you were not willing it should take effect, as if ill done. But that it may freely be done, pray leave the Chair, to debate freely the Establishment of the nation.

The Speaker then left the Chair, and the house went into a Grand Committee.

Mr. Dolben.* I take leave to remind you of the order of the house on Monday, 'to consider of the State of the Nation;' but not at the same time to debate the Remedies for the misfortunes we are fallen under. First, consider the condition of the nation, as to that which concerns the Vacancy of the government, by the absence of the king. I tell you freely my opinion, that the king is demised, and that James 2. is not king of England. For I lay it down as an undoubted proposition, that, when the king does withdraw himself from the administration of the government, without any provision to support the commonwealth; when, on the contrary, he stops the use of the great seal, by taking it away with him, this amounts to what the law calls demise,

* See vol. iv. p. 507.

* Son to the late archbishop of York.

id est, a cession; and 'demised' is 'deserted the government.' This is evident in law, as it is evident in reason and authority. The meaning of the word demise is demisio, laying down; whether actually relinquishing the government, or passively by death; in either of which cases, it is a demise. In the necessity of government, all these cases have the same consequences. When the interruption is in the administration, or it is demised; where there is the same mischief, there must be the same remedy. It is the same thing for the king to withdraw his person, which makes a parenthesis in the government. By withdrawing the seal, the chancery ceases, and no justice can be obtained. The Common Pleas cannot be possessed of any cause without an original writ out of Chancery; and when these fail, the law fails; and, by consequence, it is a demise, for want of the administrators of the government; which the law cannot suffer. 'Qui cessat regnare cessat judicare.' There is one authority in the Rolls, instar omnium, in the case of Ed. 4. There was a rumour that the earl of Warwick advanced towards him; he fled from Nottingham beyond sea; which was a clear demise, and all proceedings in Westminster-Hall ceased, and it was judged a demise. In 14 Hen. 6. there are many resolutions of causes discontinued, by that demise; 'remansit sine die,' because 'le roi se demise,' in effect felo de se. Writs of attachment were discontinued, because justices came not into the country, and the king went beyond sea, without leaving a lieutenant. The great oracle of the law, judge Littleton, pronounced this departure of Edw. 4. a demise. Perhaps it may be objected, that Edw. 4. did return again to the administration of the government, and resumed the government by conquest, not in a legal way, but by the sword. There are two other authorities that carry force in them. Edw. 2. resigned the crown, but by duress; yet he made the resignation the 25th of Jan. and immediately it was judged a demise. Rd. 2.'s Resignation was per minas, yet that was judged a demise (as in Rastall) 'Quod recordatum de regimine regni sui se demisit R. 2. &c.' These precedents seem stronger in our case, which is a voluntary departure, without duress. But, that our king was frightened or forced away, others can better tell; but, by what is notorious to the world, there is a sufficient conviction that it was not force; but that he did abandon his palace by night, and did go to sea, and was taken and returned again to his own guards, that papists might not raise any disturbance in the apprehension of his being detained prisoner. But this weighs most with me; that it was not probable that he was driven away by force, when he stole away from his guards, and repeated the attempt to be gone. There is the king's Letter to lord Feversham, wherein he is obliged to follow the queen. We have not only our law in the case, but the authority of foreign writers. By the civil law, when the king does voluntarily abandon the government, it is a demise, and cessation of the government, according to Grotius, and other learned writers, by many arguments from the law of God. Grotius lays down some: 'Si princeps habet imperium pro direlicto,' &c. he is but a private man then, he certainly ceases to be a prince. Not that he was negligent in the administration of government, but did direlict; and we argue well, that a direliction is a desertion of the government. Hoffman, the civilian, says, 'If a prince relinquishes the government, he ceases to be a king.' Regularly, I must end with a motion; which is, that you will pass a vote, that it is the opinion of the committee, "That king James 2. having voluntarily forsaken the Government, and abandoned and forsaken the kingdom, it is a voluntary demise in him."

Mr. Arnold seconded the motion.

Sir Rd. Temple. This learned gentleman has said enough to convince us, that the gravity of this committee is great, and that we have liberty to deliver the thoughts in every man's breast. I shall farther declare, that the king has endeavoured to destroy the government of the nation in parliaments, by practising to get votes before they meet, and to turn all out of the government, who would not comply with him in corporations to deliver up their charters. This has been so notorious, that I shall not mention where; though it has been the rights and privileges of the people, yet they shall not be chosen till they declare they will destroy the government. How has Westminster-hall been tutored, judges packed for purposes, and turned out, unless they assert power in kings to dispense with the laws, so that Westminster-hall was become an instrument of slavery and popery, ordinary justice destroyed, and extraordinary ways promoted, in that little and short time of the late king James's reign! When a king attempts to destroy the roots of government, he differs in nothing from a tyrant. All he has done may be reduced to that head of the destruction of the Church, by suspending the ecclesiastical laws, to destroy all that will not comply with Popery. The mischiefs are so recent and conspicuous, that, when you come to give reasons, you will satisfy the nation that king James has rendered himself inconsistent with government. If there be not a Vacancy, and he has left the government, what do we do here? He has quitted the government, without assurance of any thing: he has suppressed the parliament writs: he has taken away the great seal; and here is an apparent end of the government. The king is fallen from the crown, and may think he is under an obligation of conscience to break the laws against Popery. He may say, 'I will never live in that torture:' and if he has said so, would any man doubt but that this is a renunciation of the government? All his actions have tended this way. If he be recalled, he will do the same thing again, and tell the world, 'This is not from the lords, but a company of miserable men of the house of commons, and they may go home again; for the king can do no wrong, nor can forfeit his crown by male administration.' But, suppose the case were of an infant, or lunatic, the nation may, in that case, provide for the government; and, were the king a person that took care of the government, he would never have left the nation thus. He has taken none, and therefore it is our duty to do it.

Sir Tho. Lee. When you have put the question, 'That there is an avoidance in the government,' then your second part is, how to provide for it.

Mr. Finch. The question now is of Vacancy in the government: that of the right and title to fill it up comes too late after the other question. Your question is, Whether the right itself is gone?

Sir Christ. Musgrave.* As to the matter of deposing kings, I shall leave that to the long robe, to exercise their abilities upon. I live near a kingdom (Scotland) where I know not how ill neighbours they will be, if they concur with your sense. I would be clear, whether the intention is to depose the king; and, if he has forfeited his inheritance to the crown, I would know from the long robe, whether you can depose the king, or no.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton.† I am glad gentlemen have explained themselves. The gentleman makes a question, whether the king may be deposed? but, whether he may be deposed, or deposes himself, he is not our king. It is not for mine, nor the interest of most

* "A gentleman of a noble family in Cumberland, whose life had been regular, and his deportment grave. He had lost a place in king James's time; for though he was always a high Tory, yet he would not comply with his designs. He had, indeed, contributed much to increase his revenue, and to offer him more than he asked; yet he would not go into the taking off the Tests. Upon the Revolution, the place out of which he had been turned was given to a man that had a good share of merit in it. This alienated him from the king; and he, being a man of good judgment, came to be considered as the head of the party; in which he found his account so well, that no offers that were made him could ever bring him over to the king's interests. Upon many critical occasions, he gave up some important points, for which the king found it necessary to pay him very liberally." Burnet.

† Eldest son of lord Wharton, to which title he succeeded on his father's death. He was one of the first of rank who joined the prince of Orange on his landing, and, upon his advancement to the throne, had considerable places under him, as he had also in the reign of queen Anne, being appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, and created earl of Wharton, &c. In 1714, he was appointed by king George I. lord privy seal, and soon after was created a marquis. He died in 1715.

here, that he should come again. Abdication and direliction are hard words to me, but I would have no loop-hole to let in the king; for I believe not myself nor any Protestant in England safe, if you admit him.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I believe we are in great danger, should the king return again; but I would willingly know the opinion of the long robe; and I hope they have that candour and tenderness, that they will clearly give their thoughts in this great and extraordinary affair.

Serj. Maynard. I know not the meaning of this, but I am afraid of a meaning. The question is not, whether we can depose the king; but, whether the king has not deposed himself. It is no new project; our government is mixed, not monarchical and tyrannous, but has had its beginning from the people. There may be such a transgression in the prince, that the people will be no more governed by him. All governments, both military and civil, he disposes of, and because he asked a million for life, and we asked, the last parliament, but that some officers, not qualified by law, might be removed from their places, the parliament was dissolved. It is a mistake, that Ireland was conquered; it was yielded to Hen. 2. by calling him to take possession of it; and for 500 years it was part of the monarchy of England. The last Rebellion was by the influence of the Priests and Jesuits, and in 1641, the Protestants were all massacred. They slew 200,000 Protestants; and all that has been done in Ireland, would have been done in England. All authority, civil and military, was in Irish hands. Was this done like a king of England? What shall we think of this? Ireland to be in Popish hands! Can the king give away that kingdom? This has been long creeping upon us. There is no Popish prince in Europe but would destroy all Protestants; as in Spain, France, and Hungary; and in Spain they destroyed a gallant young prince (don Carlos) whom they suspected to incline to the Protestants; and now they would make Magdalen College a new St. Omers.

Mr. Harbord. If the question be, whether you have power to depose the king, that may tend to calling him back again, and then we are all ruined.

Mr. Howe. Some of the counsel talk as if they were instructing juries. I wish they would come plainly to the point.

Sir George Treby. I am sorry for this heat in a matter that requires our utmost deliberation. It is no less a question than, whether we shall be governed by Popery and arbitrary government, or whether we shall be rid of both. One gentleman would have the long robe declare, whether we have power to depose the king; though he speaks pertinent, yet it is not proper now; for we have found the crown vacant, and are to supply that defect. We found it so, we have not made it so. Mr. Finch would have it, the king going out of his wits, not out of the government. He knows the case; we are fallen out of the king's hands, and the government must be provided for, before you go any other way than what was first proposed. But, to what has been said of 'our not representing the fourth part of the nation, accounting women and children, and all persons not freeholders, of 40*l.* per annum, who are part of the nation, and in a Convention ought to be represented, when the government is to be disposed of,' I say, we represent the valuable part, and those that deserve a share in the government. You have advised the prince of Orange to take upon him the supreme authority of the administration of the government. The condition of the nation is incumbent on you to provide for; and I am in conscience satisfied, that the king has lost his legal government, and is fallen from it. That king that cannot, or will not, administer the government, is no longer king; and this king neither will nor can; which are sufficient reasons to declare the throne vacant. There are but two parts in government, to command and obey the legislature; but it is by the people's consent we make laws; and the king, in executing them, assumed a power to dispense with the laws in a lump. He dispensed with the Statute of Provisoes; and the consequence was, the Pope sent a Nuntio hither; and the consequence is, he declares 'he can no longer nor farther treat with his people in parliament.' As soon as that is done, he assumes an inherent indispensable authority to vacate all our laws, dispense with the Act of Uniformity, and set up the Ecclesiastical Commissions: no authority is above them; they judge without appeal; they would have deprived all the Protestant bishops and ministers in England, and filled up their bishopricks and livings with Popish priests. The cement of the government is for the people to depend upon the king for the administration of the government, and the people for the execution of laws, preservation of their grants and charters. The king, by this dispensing power, might have packed members of parliament, like the parliament of Paris, which is in the nature of Registers, only to record the king's will and pleasure by his dragoons; so, by this time, we might have been chosen by regulators or dragoons; and parliaments would have represented none of the people, except Papists. When the constitution of parliament is thus invaded, instead of redress of Grievances we should have no parliament called but of such as made grievances. If the prince of Orange had not rescued us from Popery, we should have delivered up, by law, both religion and kingdom. The height of the article against Rd. 2. was, 'That he would have the laws in his own breast, and packing of parliaments.' It was the judgment of king James 1. in the parliament of 1607, 'That, when a king breaks in upon his laws, he ceases to be a king.' It was the great argument, in the Exclusion Bill. What hurt can be done by a Popish king, is in the royal office only; but it is impossible in the rest of the offices of the government; for no Papist could come into them by law, because of the Tests: and this was the judgment of king James's friends then, and that it was that preserved the crown to him. How far this is a renouncing the crown, is the question. This was king James 1.'s own judgment; he is fallen from the crown, and is under an obligation of conscience to break these laws. I think it was an error to let him into the throne, and I would not do another in not keeping him out. Our Deliverer has taken care of us; therefore put the question, 'Whether king James 2. has not made an Abdication of the government, and that the Throne is void.'

Sir Tho. Clarges. To say 'that the crown is void,' is a consequence of an extraordinary nature. The consequence must be, we have power to fill it, and make it from a successive monarchy an elective; and whether a commonwealth, or alter the descent, is yet ambiguous. How came we hither the 22d of Dec. but to confer with the members of former parliaments? I told them then, 'It was to consider how to pursue the ends of the prince of Orange's Declaration, according to his Letter.' And the advice ended, to call a Convention by the Prince's Letter; that so a full and free representation of the people might advise to prosecute the ends of the Declaration, which would be tantamount to a legal parliament.

Sir Wm. Williams. Should you go to the beginning of government, we should be much in the dark: every man in town and country can agree in the fact of the state of things. It is plain that king James 2. is gone out of England into France; that is a plain fact. It is a wilful, voluntary, or mixed action. I hear of no direction for administration of the government, when the king left the kingdom; how he has disposed either of courts of justice, or of the parliament. If this fact be true, he is become useless, and has left no remedy to preserve the peace of the kingdom. This is partly the State of the Nation; and in that kingdom where we had always disrelished him in several parliaments, he has left several places void in the government; then what is to be done in this case? I propose it to be the first step, to declare, 'That James 2. by withdrawing himself from England, has deprived the kingdom of England of the exercise of kingly dignity.' Can any man deny all this? Then the consequence is, we are deprived of a king.

Mr. Somers.* What you do in this case will

* Afterwards the great lord Somers. "He was born at Worcester in 1652. He was educated at a private school in Staffordshire, and then entered at Trinity College, Oxford, from which he removed to the Middle Temple. He afterwards highly distinguished himself as an able and eloquent pleader, and was in 1683, one of the counsel for Pilkington, lord Grey, and others who had caused a riot in London, and in 1688, for the seven Bishops. In the satisfy the world abroad, if it be like other cases. Sigismund king of Sweden's case is parallel to ours. King James 1. (upon an occasion most have heard of) protested, 'That if his posterity were not Protestants, he prayed to God to take them from the throne.' Sigismund made the like imprecation. He was so considerable as to be chosen king of Poland. After the crown of Sweden descended to him, he sent to take the government upon him: he returned, when he had changed his religion, and brought Jesuits along with him, who were resty, and would disturb the government, and invade the laws, as they have ever done. The king prepared to force his way to the crown;

Convention Parliament of 1688-9, he was member for Worcester, and was one of the managers of the Commons, at a Conference with the Lords about the word 'Abdicated.' He was soon after made Solicitor-General and knighted, and in 1692 appointed Attorney General. In 1697, he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, but in 1700, he was removed from his high situation, and accused by the commons of high crimes and misdemeanors, of which, upon trial before his peers, he was acquitted. He now abandoned the struggles of political life for studious retirement, and was soon after chosen president of the Royal Society. He, however, occasionally laboured for the prosperity of his country in the house of lords, and projected the Union between Scotland and England. In 1708, he was president of the Council, but was removed by the change of ministry two years after. He grew so infirm, that he held no office under George 1. He died of an apoplectic fit, 26th April 1716, after surviving for some time the powers of his mind. He was never married. He wrote various pieces, and translated Plutarch's Life of Alcibiades, in the 'Lives by several hands,' and also 'Dido's Letter to Æneas from Ovid, &c.'" Lempriere.

"He held the seals seven years, with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, and diligence, and was in all respects the greatest man I had ever known in that post. He was very learned in his own profession, with a great deal more learning in other professions, in divinity, philosophy, and history. He had a great capacity for business, with an extraordinary temper; for he was fair and gentle, perhaps to a fault, considering his post; so that he had all the patience and softness, as well as the justice and equity, becoming a great magistrate. He had always agreed in his notions with the Whigs, and had studied to bring them to better thoughts of the king (William) and to a greater confidence in him." Burnet.

"John, lord Somers, was one of those divine men, who, like a chapel in a palace, remain unprofaned, while all the rest is tyranny, corruption, and folly. All the traditional accounts of him, the historians of the last age, and its best authors, represent him as the most incorrupt lawyer, and the honestest statesman, but before they came to a battle, they entered into treaty, and the king promised to call a parliament, and that religion should be settled; but before they met, he withdrew to the kingdom of Poland: so they settled Charles 8. upon that throne. First and last, the matter was jesuited, to change religion, subvert the government, and to withdraw from the kingdom. That withdrawing of Sigismund was much less than ours. He went to the kingdom he came from; ours has withdrawn to another kingdom, which has always been against the interest of England, and he cannot come out of the French king's power without his consent, and all to his advantage. Some have taken notice of things before, and some since, his desertion: but the king's going to a foreign power, and casting himself into his hands, absolves the people from their allegiance. He sent an ambassador to Rome, received a nuncio from thence, received a foreign jurisdiction, and set up Romish bishops in England, that the Popish religion might intervene with the government, thereby to subject the nation to the Pope, as much as to a foreign prince. Ireland, which has cost England so much treasure to reduce, and now to deliver it up to the Irish, to subject it to a foreign power! And to do things by such hands, as, by the constitution of the kingdom, are incapable! The hands were as much out of the way as the design—just like Sigismund, after he had left the kingdom, to send away the seal, call a parliament, and then desert the nation! My motion is, 'That you will appoint a committee to draw a Vote upon the debate.'

as a master orator, a genius of the finest taste, and as a patriot of the noblest and most extensive views; as a man, who dispensed blessings by his life, and planned them for posterity. He was at once the model of Addison, and the touchstone of Swift: the one wrote for him, the other from him. The former, however, has drawn a laboured, but diffuse and feeble character of him in the Freeholder, neither worthy of the author nor his subject." Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors.

Mr. Seward, in the second volume of his Anecdotes, p. 273, has produced the following notice of lord Somers from a MS. in the possession of the late Dr. Birch: "April 26, 1716, died John lord Somers. Burnet hath done him justice in several places, and Addison has given his character in colours so strong, that little remaineth to be added. His application and capacity were equally great and uncommon. At his first going to school he never gave himself any of the diversions of children of his age, for at noon the book was never out of hand. To the last years of his life a few hours of sleep sufficed: at waking, a reader attended, and entertained him with the most valuable authors. Such management raised him to the highest eminency in his own profession, and gave him a superiority in all kinds of useful knowledge and learning."

Serj. Maynard. The difference is but in words: I will speak to the last only. I am not of opinion that the king, being a Papist, has made himself incapable of the crown.

Mr. Finch.* You have had variety of motions, and have well collected them. Give me leave to examine the motions; and I ask pardon if I differ in some things. It is moved, that, by acts done by the king, he has lost his crown that way; by going away, he has abdicated the crown, and made a total refusal of the government. It is moved to vary the state of the question, and only for the present to declare the Throne vacated. What question, in point of law, there is between 'demised, abdicated, and deserted,' the consequence can be but one and the same: if it be meant 'vacancy in the Throne,' and you must fill it, and that it is devolved upon the people, that is, I believe, farther than gentlemen would go: I believe no body will urge that so far, the constitution of the kingdom and government not admitting it. If we were in the state of nature, we should have little title to any of our estates. That the king has lost his title to the crown, and lost his inheritance, is farther than any gentleman, I believe, has, or will explain himself. The provision you will make will be but little acceptable to such a foundation. The consequence is but this; since the monarchy is hereditary, be it vacated, or whatever you will call it, the descent is the consequence of all. No man will say the monarchy is elective, let the administration be ever so ill, and that the king has no more in the monarchy than the exercise of it. If by neglect, or male-administration, he can forfeit no more than is in him, then this consequence is no more, than that his personal exercise of the crown is gone; but still it must subsist somewhere. This is of the highest consequence that ever any debate was here, for Law and Religion to be established sure and firm. However we may weather it, posterity may curse our memory in after-ages, if we fail in this weighty matter. What to propose is difficult. I will not go about to say that what the king has done is any way justifiable. Here has been an actual invasion of our Religion and Properties, when they did get men in to give up the whole rights of the kingdom. These are things of a high nature, and call for your timely assistance. Consider the difficulty that will arise in the consequence, to say, that the king has made a total renunciation of the kingdom. That the king may renounce, all agree, that such renunciation must be voluntary and public; and whether such desertion be an abdication? If he has lost it, the monarchy will either be hereditary or elective, and here will be consequences. I am not of opinion that you should send proposals to the king; it will not consist with the security of the nation. Suppose the kingdom under a state of infancy, or frenzy, the safety of the government is in the unanimous opinion of the nation. It is not hard to say, that the parliament must provide for the administration of the government, but to call this 'a direct forfeiture of the Crown!' I will not excuse the king, and say he can do no wrong; but would avoid all doubts, and not say, in real common parliamentary construction, that the king can do no wrong, or that he has forfeited his crown by male-administration. But suppose it the case of a lunatic, or infant, the nation may provide for the government; and were the king a person that took care of the government that he ought to have taken care of —

Sir Rob. Howard. I differ in the circumstances of what has been said, though I agree in the main. There is an inconvenience in resting upon the word 'demise.' Richard ii. would have no laws but what were in his own breast; but our king would not be satisfied with arbitrary government in the laws temporal, but in the laws of the church too, thereby to influence our souls as well as our bodies; and, by an arbitrary government, to subvert the civil and ecclesiastical power; and it was no wonder, when a Jesuit and Papist sat in council, that all corporations were subverted, and parliament-men closeted. This was the design of Rd. ii. to try sheriffs, to pack a parliament, to make the people own their destroyers. But if the demise of the government fail, where is the foundation we are upon? It must be somewhere. By a legal and just trial, no man has wrong done him. The king has none done him, in disposing of the government, for he acts as a private man, he ought to act from his laws. When he acts by his will, and not by the laws, he is no king; for he acts by power and tyranny. I have heard, 'that the king has his crown by divine right,' and we (the people) have divine right too; but he can forfeit, if he break that pact and covenant with his people, who have right, by reason of their election, as well as in the name of Mr. King. This original of power, resistance or non-resistance, is judged by the power resolved by people and king. The constitution of the government is actually grounded upon pact and covenant with the people. If this be so, what remains but that the king has made abdication of the government, and at one time has lopped off both Church and State? Could he have compassed Liberty of Conscience, he would have cut off Church and State at one stroke, and settled Popery. Here has not been one thing unattempted to destroy us: and if this be so, it is my opinion that there is an abdication of the government, and it is devolved into the people, who are here in civil society and constitution to save them. And if divine right does consecrate all these violations of our laws, it is strange! If the king be of another religion from his people, and makes a combination with a foreign power, shall he carry all away with him to destroy us? I am of opinion, 'that James 2. has abdicated the government.'*

* Second son to the earl of Nottingham, and removed from being Solicitor General in 1686. In 1702 he was created lord Guernsey, and in 1714 earl of Aylesford.

Mr. Pollexfen.† The question that has been proposed is, 'Whether, by a voluntary departure of the king, the government is demised?' I would not have gentlemen surprized by the word 'voluntary going away;' there is more meant by that than you suppose. There is a descent of the crown, if a voluntary departure; and then what do you here, if you admit that? But if it be a 'demise,' then the crown is full by succession; and then too what do you here? If force has been upon the king, and then he fly, will you call this 'a voluntary departure?' Was it 'voluntary' his flight from Salisbury to London? The stronger did chase the weaker. If this is 'voluntary,' what means the noise of arms? And is all this 'a voluntary driving away?' I would not have you caught with this, to entangle the debate. It is an unnecessary question to carry at first sight; and if the crown be vacant, trouble yourselves no farther in the matter. If the crown be demised, you must think of the succession of it.

Mr. Dolben. I would not be thought to catch the house, by any motion from me. I must still call the king's departure, when he needed not, and might have stayed, though there was 'noise of arms,' yet if the king would not stick to his laws, nor redress the grievances of his people, I must call that 'a voluntary demise.' It is true, upon a demise, there must be a descent; but the question is, whether the crown be vacant, now the king is departed, and no body to fill it up?

Sir James Oxenden. It is 'a voluntary departure' in the king, to go away, and stir up foreign princes to bring a foreign power to destroy us. I cannot call it otherwise.

Sir Henry Capel. It is said, 'the king might have stayed, and called a parliament.' But Popery and a Protestant government are inconsistent. I move, that you will vote, that the Crown is vacant.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. The gentleman that first moved in this debate, put it upon 'a demise.' 'Devolution' and 'abdication' seem to be the same thing called by various authors. You have been moved for other words, and in case of 'abdication,' it is not difficult. As to the next step, there is a great difference between the throne being vacant by abdication, and dissolution of the government. The vacancy of the throne makes no dissolution of the government, neither in our law, nor any other. If the government be fallen to the people, which people we are, what do the lords and we here? If it be devolved upon the people, we have nothing to do here; we are not the people collectively: we are representatives of the people in the three estates of the nation, and the king. And our oaths of allegiance, which we take before we sit, are to the hereditary succession of the crown; the third estate, which is the house of commons, represents the freeholders and burghers, who are not the fourth part of the kingdom. If the government be devolved to the people, copy-holders, leaseholders, all men under 40s. a year are people. What needs the advice of the lords to reduce things to a settlement? Is it not then the right of all the people to send representatives, and our sitting under this frame of government is void, as we ought not to be here, so it restores not the rights of the kingdom. Restore those rights by what free parliament we can, in such a form, and frame, and constitution as the government will admit. What do the lords there? Are they representatives of the people? No; of their own estate only. If the government be devolved upon the people, what do the lords there? And we are not the people. Once a government did dispose of crowns. And they were not the fourth part of the kingdom that disposed of the crown in 1648. This has not only relation to ourselves, but to another nation, Scotland. If we proceed on a sandy foundation, we shall destroy all we do. The people have a judgment of assent or dissent, but not a superiority of determination. If he relinquish the possession of the throne, but not the title, whether does that amount to an abdication of the government? I take the king's departure out of the kingdom to be an abdication of the government. He refuses to govern, that acts otherwise than the laws direct. And he that will go out of the kingdom, does make an abdication and direction of the whole government. In all I have read, I never met, in so short a reign, the laws so violated, and the prerogative so stretched. In his Declaration, he wishes that all his subjects were Catholics, and, if in his power, would certainly have effected it; we must all have been Catholics, or not safe. The Church and State were turned topsyturvy. As to his suborning a parliament, this and Rd. 2. are the only instances I have met with, that so we might have had neither Liberty nor Property in the nation. His intention was to govern without law. The Protestant religion here was interwoven with all the Protestant States of Europe; and that principle justifies the prince of Orange's coming over, and all that joined with him; which interest, if it fall, all falls with it. From the time the king has withdrawn, here has been no application made from him; and therefore I believe he has no intentions to govern according to the constitution of the government: therefore no obligation remains upon us to him, in case this be an abdication of the government.

* "Sir Robert Howard entertained the committee with a long harangue; and he was the first who ventured to assert the Vacancy of the Throne, and the breach of the Original Contract, by a continued series of illegal acts (many of which he enumerated and displayed) throughout the whole course of king James's reign." Echard.

† "An honest and learned, but perplexed lawyer." Burnet. He was soon after made lord chief justice.

Mr. Boscawen. I have hearkened to Sawyer a great while, but I know not how to understand, 'that the fourth part of the people of England are not here represented,' and 'that this is not a parliament.' I would know of him, what other way he can propose of calling a parliament, than what has been in calling this? I am of opinion, that, if we sit here till he finds a way to sit better than as you are, you may sit till doomsday. Gentlemen, in former parliaments, may remember they were told, 'that the king could not be true to his religion, if he did not what he has done:' and I believe none are willing to go into Egypt again. To settle things now, is the way to maintain both your Laws and Religion. If the king's going away be a demise, then you must supply the throne. And here is not only the king, but a little one beyond sea too, that will pretend. I would say no more, but 'that the Throne is void;' then take the best way you can; and there is but one to defend you from him that is gone, that endeavoured to destroy your laws. We must not fight with a bulrush: therefore declare 'that the Throne is void,' and fill it. And pray put the question, 'that the Throne is void.'

Sir Wm. Pulteney. I shall speak short to the question, whether 'abdication,' or 'the Throne void.' I would have both in the question, for what he has destroyed was without making any provision for the administration of the government. We come to supply what he has taken from us. Have not you made another determination of putting the government into another's hand for the present, which you have already, in effect, declared 'a demise?'

Mr. Howe. People were not free from slavery till the tyrant ran away. I will not say that any king may have the same guilt, but we may have the same fears of Popish lord-lieutenants set over us: therefore put into the question all this. The last use he made of the great seal was to pardon malefactors, that have reduced you to this condition.

Mr. Finch. I desire to explain myself. It is insinuated as if, from what I should have said, a loop-hole may be left for the king's return. I am so far from that, that I think there can be no safety in the king's return, by unanimous consent of the nation. I think the government not safe by his administration; but all men will agree to be secured. I did say no more. I did not mean to capitulate, but to establish things by such a regent during the king's life; if there may be such a security, all men will agree to it, and this is no loop-hole to let in the king again to the government; for the king by going away, &c. and his male-administration, ought not to be trusted; and we may fear that, in the regency, power may be exceeded: therefore we have a right to demand security, that we be invaded no more: yet the disposing of the crown is another question. All men can agree, that there is no security in his return. But whether his administration does so cease as to lose his titles, every man must swear to his vote, that he whom you shall place on the throne is lawful and rightful king.

Vol. V.

Sir Rob. Howard.* A regency and the king are all one. The question, as moved and amended, takes in the sense of the house. Much is said of the Succession; but we are the people; and threaten ourselves by ourselves when the question is asked, shall we dare to chuse? To talk of preserving the Succession as sacred, is to suppose the title of the Prince—a thing well cozened. If the young gentleman beyond the seas should die, the king of France will find another for you.

Lord Fanshaw. It is said the king has withdrawn himself. He is gone away by compulsion, in my judgment. I heard him say, 'That he was afraid of being seized by his own subjects.' When he was at liberty at Feversham he came back. Have we power to depose? In law, the king can do no wrong; for that reason ministers are called to account. There is no occasion for haste. Let the question be adjourned to another day.

Mr. Roberts. If the question is to have no other consequence than would follow on the king's natural demise, I will go nem. con.

Lord Colchester moves to report it presently.

Sir Wm. Williams moves the house to sit tomorrow, and receive the Report.

Sir J. Knight would immediately have a head.

Sir Rowland Gwyn. Time is precious, I would report now.

Mr. Medlicot. Security depends on dispatch.

Sir J. Knight. Consider the bleeding condition of Trade.

Vote declaring the Throne Vacant.] At length, the house came to this grand Resolution:—Resolved, "That king James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the Constitution of the Kingdom, by breaking the original Contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits, and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental Laws, and having withdrawn himself out of this Kingdom, has abdicated the Government, and that the Throne is thereby become vacant."† Which was agreed to by the house, and the lords concurrence was desired.

Further Debate on the State of the Nation.] Jan. 29. The house of commons went into a Grand Committee, on the State of the Nation.

Col. Birch. When I consider the extraordinary hand of God that brought us hither, and the freedom we are here met in, it amazes me; and I am not able to comprehend this work of God in such an extraordinary manner; and, concerning king James's deposing himself, it is the hand of God. These 40 years we have been scrambling for our Religion, and have saved but little of it. We have been striving against Anti-Christ, Popery, and Tyranny. If we go through with this work, let every one understand what he means: therefore I shall tell you what I mean. King James 1 was so fond of the Spanish match (though that proved a French match at last) that he lost the Palatinate by it: then followed pulling members out, and committing them to prison. When once king Charles 1 married a Papist, all things, from that time forward, went the contrary way; all things tended to Popery and a Civil War. At last I was in it, and, I thought, on the right side—(I am sure, I endeavoured to make it so before I left it.) When the two estates remonstrated, and begged that the Customs might not be levied without Law, and Ship-money, there were smooth tongues in this house then to carry it on. Then came the breaking the laws and liberties, when things were near a conclusion. It was not the fault of the ministers of the Church of England; nay, nor the Non-conformists, but Popery was in the box, and Idolatry. I remember what was said in this house, when the late king James was married to this queen: 'men will follow their Interest; and it was his interest to destroy the Protestant Religion, our Laws and Liberties.' Popery will not prosper but in an arbitrary, tyrannical soil. If there had never a book been written on this subject, yet men may see, that, if God had not stopped him, we had been led like sheep to the slaughter. If then we are like to be ruined, if governed by a Popish prince, my motion is, 'That you will vote it inconsistent with a Protestant State to be governed by a Popish Prince.'

* The remainder of this day's debate is transcribed from Lord Somers's Notes taken with a pencil. See Hardwicke Papers, vol. ii. p. 411.

† "The above complicated Resolution (when ratified by both houses) was perhaps the most remarkable of all the English Records." Echard.

Sir Rd. Temple. I hope this will have no debate; for we have found by experience, that a Popish king is inconsistent with the government of a Protestant nation.

Sir Patience Ward. The prospect of a Popish successor was that which laid all the plots against the life of the late king Charles, and the Protestant Religion.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. This debate is preparatory to what farther you intend to do. I move, 'that you will vote it inconsistent with a Protestant Government to have a Popish prince.' There is a possibility that a Papist may be saved, and a possibility that a Popish king may govern well; but where the Papists govern the king, it is next to an impossibility that the government should be Protestant.

Mr. Dolben. There is nothing in statute nor common law against a Popish prince, but it is against the interest of the nation.

Major Wildman. The lawyers tell you, 'there is neither common nor statute law against a Popish king;' but the government of this kingdom of England is an independant supremacy, that neither foreign potentate, either ecclesiastical or civil, has any thing to do here. There is no Popish prince but does acknowledge the Pope to be supreme; but it is treason to acknowledge that supremacy here: therefore to say, 'that there is no statute law, &c.' is strange to be averred by the long robe. I move, therefore, that you will not only declare it to be against the interest of the Protestant Religion to be governed by a Popish prince, but 'that it is against our law.' Our free independent government is not consistent with a nuntio from the Pope: 400 years together we have laboured to keep the Church of Rome from our government.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Will that gentleman say, that the laws 400 years since, and some in Hen. 8th's time, were inconsistent with the Popish government? I am sure, without doors, it will be strangely thought of, if Hen. 8 should not be some time a Popish prince.

Major Wildman. Hen. 8 renounced Popery utterly. We speak of princes holding communion with the Church of Rome; and you may lay the word 'Papist' aside.

Mr. Hampden. I have a great deference to the learned person; but the Pope's supremacy was never heard of before the first nuntio came into England, at the instance of William the Conqueror, who found his clergy high, and therefore he got a foreign power over them, but complained afterwards, as the greatest grievance, of the Pope's power in Appeals, upon which the Statute of Provisors was made. Hen. 8 was the first prince that totally shook off the Pope's power, and the grounds justified him, being against the constitution of the government; and all agreed to it, and the laws against nuntios from the Pope. Q. Mary, not soon, prevailed with Cardinal Pole to come over for nuntio. I desire the question as moved.

Lord Falkland. For the honour of your proceedings, let what you do to-day be consistent with what you did yesterday. If it be inconsistent with the law to have a Popish king, pursue your Vote of yesterday.

Resolved, "That it hath been found, by experience, to be inconsistent with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom, to be governed by a Popish Prince."

Mr. Wharton. You resolved, by Vote, yesterday, 'That the Throne was vacant;' and I suppose every gentleman, and those few that were against the Vote, are now for filling the throne, and re-settling the government; and I hope it will be done as near the ancient government as can be. It is a matter of the greatest weight, and deserves the greatest consideration. Consider of it a thousand years, and you cannot cast your eyes upon a person so well to fill it as the prince and princess of Orange. To them we owe all our safety; most of us, by this time, must either have been slaves to the Papists, or hanged. I hope, that, for the future, we shall have security and preservation from them, and put them in a condition of saving us from our dangers for the future. As you did yesterday, so I desire you will now call upon the gentlemen of the long robe to put you in some way practicable. I have read the story of Philip and Mary; that was not a good reign, and so not a good precedent; but I hope we shall be all happy under king William and queen Mary.

Lord Falkland. It concerns us to take such care, that, as the Prince of Orange has secured us from Popery, we may secure ourselves from Arbitrary Government. The Prince's Declaration is for a lasting foundation of the government. I would know what our foundation is. Before the question be put, who shall be set upon the Throne, I would consider what powers we ought to give the crown, to satisfy them that sent us hither. We have had a prince that did dispense with our laws; and I hope we shall never leave that doubtful. The king set up an Ecclesiastical Court, as he was Supreme Head of the Church, and acted against law, and made himself head of the Charters. Therefore, before you fill the throne, I would have you resolve, what power you will give the king, and what not.

Mr. Garroway. We have had such violation of our liberties in the last reigns, that the prince of Orange cannot take it ill, if we make conditions, to secure ourselves for the future; and in it we shall but do justice to those who sent us hither, and not deliver them up without very good reason.

Sir Wm. Williams. When we have considered the preservation of the laws of England for the future, then it will be time to consider the persons to fill the Throne. The Prince's Declaration has given us a fair platform. Some of your laws have been very grievous to the people, though not Grievances; and perhaps those occasioned arbitrary government. Those are to be redressed. Because king Charles 2 was called home by the Convention, and nothing settled, you found the consequence. Charles 2 was a young man, in the strength of his youth, and, you know, much money was given him, and what became of it? The act of the Militia is worthy your consideration, and he in whose hands you will put it should be our head. I take it to be your security to settle your safety for the future, and then to consider the person. I now speak for all England. I would consider purging Corporations, and arbitrary power given the late king by the judges: weak judges will do weak things; their master commands them; they read no books, and know nothing to the contrary. I could give many more instances.

Sir Rd. Temple. I hope you will not leave till you see how we got out of our rights. Secure your liberties, and you cannot better recommend the government to one to succeed than by settling these things. I will reduce my thoughts to three heads essentially necessary: 1. Encroachment upon Parliament, (tho' in the hands where you will place the government there may be no danger) to secure posterity; and you may have time to call persons to account that break parliaments, when they will not do what pleased; to provide for their certainty and frequency, and that persons obtain not Pardons when they have ruined the nation; and to provide for Elections of Parliaments, that Corporations may not be made tools to nominate whom they please; to provide against a Standing Army without consent of parliament, not in peace, when there is no war nor rebellion. An Army was no part of the government till the late king's time. The Militia Act was made use of to disarm all England. 2. Your care should be, that Westminster-hall be better filled with Judges, and not, under pretence of the king's prerogative, to give away all. That the Judges be 'during life,' and that they have Salaries instead of Fees: that Sheriffs make not unjust returns of juries, and that Westminster-hall have as little power as you can. Formerly Westminster-hall decided not great cases, but left them to parliament. The Judges now do not only lex dicere but facere. In new and difficult cases, this will be the way to preserve you from what they are bid to judge. 3. The Coronation-Oath to be taken upon entrance into the government; and, as we are sworn to our kings, so they to be sworn to protect us. Pursue the ends of the Prince's Declaration, with some such securities as I have mentioned, that these things may be taken care of; to recommend to posterity what you have done for them.

Mr. Boscawen. We know, that the Prince's Declaration pursues all those ends mentioned. But Arbitrary Government was not only by the late king that is gone, but by his ministers, and farthered by extravagant acts of the Long Parliament. The Act for regulating Corporations was upon a specious pretence to secure the crown, but had the end with the commissions for regulating Corporations. Though ever so loyal, yet if they differed from the designs of the ministry, they were put out. The Militia, under pretence of persons disturbing the government, disarmed and imprisoned men without any cause: I myself was so dealt with. There is a clause in the Militia-Act, for a week's tax after 70,000*l.* for trophies, and not to exceed it; but as it is now practised, 2 or 3 years have been collected together, without regard to the act. Arbitrary Power is ill in a prince, but abominable to one another. The Triennial Bill for parliaments was but a device, when we were going into slavery; but by such an act, if we have no redress of Grievances (as Mr. Vaughan, of this house, then said, who was as much for the king as any) 'better to have no law at all.' I move, that these things may be taken into consideration.

Resolved, "That, before the Committee proceed to fill the Throne, now vacant, they will proceed to secure our Religion, Laws, and Liberties."

Serjeant Maynard. I agree to the Vote; but I fear, if we look so much one way on Arbitrary Government, we may sit five years, and never come to an end of what has been moved. One says, 'in the Saxon time, the people were much puzzled. One king made one law, and another king another.' Another drives at a new Magna Charta. The former Parliaments cared not which way they run, so Pensions were paid. The management of the Militia was an abominable thing. Many speak, in coffee-houses and better places, of fine things for you to do, that you may do nothing but spend your health, and be in confusion. Take care of over-loading your horse, not to undertake too many things. I would go only to things obvious and apparent, and not into particulars too much.

Lord Falkland. We must not only change hands, but things; not only take care that we have a king and prince over us, but for the future, that he may not govern ill. Some, perhaps, are dissatisfied with the power, some with the army. It is for the people's sake we do all, that posterity may never be in danger of Popery and Arbitrary Power.

Mr. Sacheverell. Since God hath put this opportunity into our hands, all the world will laugh at us, if we make a half settlement. As the case stands, no man can tell that what he has is his own. Unless you look backward how men have been imprisoned, fined, severely dealt with; the same may happen to other gentlemen. We must look a great way backward. I cannot find three laws, from 20 years upwards, that deserve to be continued. In the great joy of the king's return, the parliament overshot themselves so much, and to redress a few Grievances they got so much Money, that they could live without you; pensions were agreed for so much in the hundred for all they gave; Warrants of Commitments, Arms taken from persons, &c. They were ill-affected to the government, because they endeavoured to chuse persons they liked not. You may look back a great way; but secure this house, that parliaments be duly chosen, and not kicked out at pleasure; which never could have been done, without such an extravagant Revenue that they might never stand in need of parliaments. Secure the Right of Elections, and the Legislative Power.

Mr. Pollexfen. First make a Settlement of the Laws, that they may be asserted, and those must all be consulted by lords and commons; and then settle the crown. Every man sees the nature of this proposition; if this be to confound you, it is a dreadful proposition: I am as much for amendment of the government as any man, and for repressing the exorbitances of it; but the way you are in will not settle the government, but restore king James again. If but a noise of this goes beyond sea, that you are making laws to bind your prince, it will tend to confusion. The greatest enemy you have cannot advise better. One kingdom sone a lready, and this is in confusion. Some of the Clergy are for one thing, some for another; I think they scarce know what they would have: and the more we divide, the more it makes way for the Popish interest. Popery is the fear of the nation, and all that have voted against Popery may fear Popery. But now we begin to forget it. Formerly it was thought impossible that Popery should come in, and that the Tests would keep it out. But how can we bring to pass all these Proposals, before he is king? We cannot; and when he is king, perhaps he will not pass these into laws. To stand talking, and making laws, and in the mean time have no government at all! they hope better things from our actions abroad, and a better foundation of the Protestant interest. The Prince's Declaration is the cause of your coming hither, that the kingdom may be established, and the laws and government secured from being subverted again. If we stand talking here, we shall do as strange things as those who prevailed by arms in the late times; and, not coming to a Settlement, it ended in their own destruction, and never came into any settled government; so the authority of the king swept away all at last. We lately had a bill of Exclusion; it was talked of so long, that both parties suffered, one formerly, the other since. A law you cannot make till you have a king. The thing you go upon is not practicable. One gentleman is of opinion 'to take away all laws since this king came to 'the crown;' another 'to make a new Magna Charta;' If you sit till all these motions are considered, we may think to make our peace with king James as well as we can, and go home.

Mr. Garroway. I would not draw this debate out at length; somewhat must be done: a great many things have been named by several persons to be redressed. I hope we do not go about to sit here till all be done. All we can do for the present is, to represent to the Prince that these things may be done, and, under some short Heads, to present the Prince with what you would have done to give security to the government; and let an Oath be administered to him; and in a few days you may come to your end.

Mr. Seymour. We shall suffer by our doing more than by reason of not doing at all. Will you think fit to leave the dispensing power unquestioned in Westminster-Hall? Though the clock do not strike twelve at once, must it not strike at all? Will you do nothing, because you cannot do all? Will you let men go in the same practices they have formerly? Will you establish the Crown, and not secure yourselves? What care I for what is done abroad, if we must be slaves in England, in this or in that man's power? If people are drunk and rude below, as was complained of, must that stop proceedings in parliament?

Sir Thomas Lee. I find there is a difference in the committee, how to word the question. I know not how to propose words to reach every man's sense. If you put it so general, how our Liberties have been invaded, perhaps a few days will state it. There was an opinion, formerly, of the long robe that must be exploded, 'That the king may raise what Army he pleases, if he pay them.' That is the support of slavery, when there is other support to the king than the people's affections to their prince.

Col. Birch. I am as much afraid of losing time as any body: whereas disorders of the Army in Ireland are spoken of, they will be still worse, unless provision be made to keep us from Slavery and Popery. I differ from what gentlemen say, as to the time it will take you up. I think it will not take you a day's time, when you have filled the Vacancy of the Throne. Prepare what you would have repealed, and present it. As to the Fast moved for, I know not what we should fast for. I will not call to-morrow Sunday, (January 30.) for I do not find it called so in books: I would sit to-morrow, and I hope to make an end to-morrow. There is a Tax called Hearth-money; take that away, and the Prince will have ten times more safety than in all his Army; and that may be in one line.

Mr. Hampden, jun.* You are, by order, to consider the State of the Nation. Though you have voted, that king James has abdicated the crown, you have not done all; we are still free, and not tied by Oaths. The time presses hard, on many accounts; and to rise without doing more than filling the Throne that is vacant, is not for the safety of the people. It is necessary to declare the Constitution and Rule of the government. In the late Convention, there was a Vote passed, 'That the Government was in king, lords, and commons.' I move that the Journal may be inspected. You have voted, 'That king James has violated the Constitution of the nation,' call the chief governor what you will.

Mr. Harbord. You have an infallible security for the administration of the government: all the Revenue is in your own hands, which fell with the last king, and you may keep that back. Can he whom you place on the throne support the government without the Revenue? Can he do good or harm without it? It is reasonable that you should be redressed by laws;

* "Grandson of him who had pleaded the cause of England in the point of Ship-money, with king Charles 1. His father was a very eminent man, and zealous in the Exclusion. He was a young man of great parts, and one of the learnedest gentlemen I have ever known, for he was a critic both in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was a man of great heat and vivacity, but too unequal in his temper." Burnet.

He was tried at the court of King's Bench in 1683, for a conspiracy to disturb the peace of the realm, and fined 40,000*l.* the most extravagant fine that had been ever set for a misdemeanor in that court. He was afterwards, on king James's accession, tried for high treason at the Old Bailey, for the same offence, and condemned, but his life was saved. He afterwards cut his own throat.

but unless you preserve your government, your papers cannot protect you. Without your sword, how will you be secured from the dangers from Ireland, and the mutiny of the Army? All may be lost, whilst you are considering.

Sir Rd. Temple. We here represent all the nation. Place the government in some person, and then provide for the rest.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. In justification of your Vote yesterday, to declare your Grievances, you are to declare wherein king James 2. has broken the laws, and whom you have put by the government. You must have wheels, before you can put the cart upon them. In the first place, put the question, "That you will proceed in asserting the Rights and Liberties of the nation; and that you will appoint a Committee to bring in general Heads; of such things as are absolutely necessary for securing the Laws and Liberties of the nation." A Committee was appointed accordingly.

Thanks voted to the Clergy, Army, and Navy.] The commons resolved, nem. con. "That the Thanks of this house be given to the Clergy of the Church of England, who have preached and written against Popery, and refused to read, in their Churches, the late king's Declaration for Toleration, in opposition to the pretended Dispensing Power, claimed in the reign of the late king James 2. and have opposed the late illegal Ecclesiastical Commission."

Resolved, nem. con. "That the Thanks of this house be given to the Officers, Soldiers, and Mariners, in the Army and Fleet, for having testified their steady adherence to the Protestant Religion, and being instrumental in delivering this kingdom from Popery and Slavery; and also to all such who have appeared in arms for that purpose."

Proceedings in the H. of Lords on the Vote of Vacancy.] On receiving the Vote from the commons declaring the Throne vacant, the house of lords resolved into a committee of the whole house, of which the earl of Danby was chairman. The first motion that was made, was, 'Not to agree with the Commons, That the Throne was vacant,' but only first to suppose it, for the present, leaving it to be farther examined afterwards, in order to cut short several other questions, by determining this first, 'Whether the Throne being vacant, it ought to be filled up by a Regent or a King?' This question was debated with great learning, much skill, and no little warmth: among the orators, the earl of Nottingham brought many arguments from the English history to support his opinion for a Regency with the regal power, leaving the title and dignity on king James; adding a fresh instance from Portugal, where Don Pedro had only the title of a Regent conferred upon him, while his deposed brother was alive. This Speech is said to have had so great an influence upon the house, that it would have been followed by the majority, had it not been strenuously opposed by the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Danby, who by their great skill laid open the inextricable difficulties attending that proposal. So that the question being put to the vote, 51 were for a king, and 49 only for a regent; namely, the dukes of Somerset, Ormond, Southampton, Grafton, Beaufort and Northumberland; the earls of Kent, Pembroke, Clarendon, Rochester, Craven, Westmoreland, Scarsdale, Chesterfield, Litchfield, Yarmouth and Lindsey; viscount Weymouth, the lords Coventry, Brook, Leigh, Ferras, Maynard, Chandois, Jermin, Arundel of Trevis, Dartmouth, Godolphin, Griffin, and five more; the archbishop of York, the bishops of Norwich, Winchester, Ely, St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chichester, Rochester, St. Davids, Oxford, Gloucester and Lincoln. The earls of Huntingdon and Mulgrave did not appear in the house; and the lord Churchill likewise kept at home upon some indisposition. The archbishop of Canterbury was also absent; and indeed the prejudices conceived against a deposing power, as an art and act of Popery, had made so great an impression upon the minds of the clergy, that no bishops came into the opinion of filling up the Throne, except the bishops of London and Bristol. However, the party for a king was soon after strengthened by four dukes who came over to them, viz. the dukes of Ormond, Southampton, Grafton and Northumberland.—On the next day, Jan. 30, the lords proceeded farther upon the Grand Vote of the other house, and put this question, ‘Whether or no there was an Original Contract between king and people?’ Which Question occasioned many warm disputes; not a few maintaining, that kings held their crowns by divine right; which others vehemently denied, asserting, That all power originally belonged to the community, and to the king only by mutual compact. Thereupon the house being divided, 53 were for the last position, and 46 only for the negative; by which it appeared, that the party that were for a Regency began to lose ground. The next Question was, ‘Whether king James had broke that Original Contract?’ but this being so manifest, it was soon carried in the affirmative. On the next day, their lordships took into consideration the word ‘Abdicated;’ and concluded that ‘Deserted’ was more proper. They next examined the word ‘Vacant’ and put this Question, ‘Whether king James having broke that Original Contract between him and his people, and deserted the government, whether the throne was thereby ‘vacant?’ This question was debated with more heat and contention than any of the former, and upon a division, one party, who maintained it as a maxim of our law, ‘That the king never dies,’ and therefore, ‘that the Throne can never be vacant,’ carried the negative of the question by 11 voices. From this, some peers presently inferred, that the crown was devolved upon the next heir; and moved that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared king and queen, which was also carried in the negative by five voices. The next day their lordships agreed to communicate their Resolutions to the house of commons; but before they rose, the marquisses of Hallifax and Winchester, the earls of Danby and Devonshire, the lord Delamere and others, to the number of 40, entered their Protestations against the Vote of the day before, namely, ‘That the Throne was not vacant.’*

A tumultuous Petition set on foot.] Feb. 1. While these matters were warmly debated in the Convention and the town, and all men still in suspense which way they would be determined, this day some zealous persons set on foot the following Petition, and endeavoured to get it subscribed by the multitude indifferently, going to all public places to solicit men’s hands: “To the lords spiritual and temporal assembled in the grand Convention, the humble Petition of great numbers of citizens, and other inhabitants of the cities of London and Westminster. Whereas, we are in a deep sense of the danger of delays, and perplexed debates about settling the Government, at this time vacant, by reason whereof the necessary ends of government cannot be duly administered, we humbly desire that his most illustrious highness the Prince of Orange, and his royal consort the Princess, may be speedily settled on the Throne, by whose courage, conduct and reputation, this nation and the Protestant Religion may be defended from our enemies at home and abroad; and that Ireland, now in a bleeding and deplorable condition, may be rescued from its miseries, and these kingdoms settled on a lasting foundation in Peace and Liberty.”—Whereupon, his highness the Prince being informed of the ill consequences and scandal of this way of proceeding, caused the following Order to be made and published to suppress it: “By the Lord-Mayor, &c. Whereas his highness the Prince of Orange has been pleased to signify to me this day, that divers persons (pretending themselves to be citizens of London) in a tumultuous and disorderly manner have lately disturbed the present Convention of the lords and commons at Westminster, upon pretence of petitioning; it being regular and usual for the citizens of this city, that are under the apprehension of any Grievance, to make their application to myself, and the Court of Aldermen: therefore, with the advice of my brethren, the aldermen of this city, these are to require you, that you command within your ward, that they forbear any tumultuous disturbance, or assembly, as they will answer the contrary at their utmost peril.”*

Feb. 2. Their lordships sent a Message to the commons, to acquaint them, That they had considered of their Vote of the 28th of January last, to which they concurred, with these two Amendments; first, instead of the word ‘Abdicated,’ they would have ‘Deserted’ be put in; and next, these words, ‘And that the Throne is thereby vacant,’ to be left out.

* Echard.

Debate in the Commons on the Lord's Amendment of the Word 'Abdicated.'] Sir Rd. Temple. You have considered the word 'abdicated' as the only proper word. As for 'deserted,' I appeal whether it is a proper conclusion to the premises. The lords have left out the whole conclusion in the matter. They have agreed 'that king James has subverted the Constitution of the government, has violated the original contract, and has withdrawn himself, &c.' Consider whether this be a proper conclusion. By doing these acts, he has most plainly, 'abdicated the government;' by the premises plainly, by subverting the constitution, he will govern by an arbitrary power, though sworn to rule according to original contract. The hour he does it, it is a renunciation of the government. Hottoman, and all approved authors, call this 'Abdicating the Government.' Henry 6. upon fear of the earl of Warwick, went out of the kingdom, and left it; and, that, by all the Judges, was judged 'a Demise.' I desire you will not agree with the lords.

Mr. Hampden. The dispute with the lords is about a word changed. It is your word now, the word of the house, and I was ever of opinion the most proper word. 'Forsaken, forfeited,' and other words, were mentioned here; but, I think, 'abdication' was in request among the Romans. When a parent 'abdicated' his child, he gave him no maintenance: though the child never forsook the father, yet if he deserved it, he was 'abdicated.' If you say such things have been done as violating the original contract, &c. is not 'Self-Abdication' more than desertion? If it comes to be disputed, you will then see the value of the word. Should you say, king James has deserted, is gone from Rochester, and may come again, for doing a thing, justly to be abdicated, the question is, whether you will retain or change your word; agree or not agree with the lords.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is a great business before you; all tends to the settlement of the nation. Union is so necessary at this time, that I hope we shall agree with the lords in the Amendments. 'Desertion' seems more proper than 'Abdication,' which is not so needful nor proper. As for precedents, it must be voluntary. That of Charles 5 and the queen of Sweden, tant-amount to that of Alphonso king of Portugal; his government was destructive to his people. Edw. 2. committed all manner of irregularities and oppressions, by the advice of wicked counsellors, to subvert all the laws of the nation. In Riley's Collections of Records, the parliament at Bristol, upon report that the king had forsaken the kingdom, (decessit regno as the words of the Record are, had left the kingdom,) by unanimous consent, elected the duke of Aquitain Custos regni. Therefore I move to agree with the lords in the word 'Desertion.'

Mr. Finch. I would agree with the lords, for those very reasons offered against it. The departure of Edw. 4. out of the kingdom was judged 'a Demise.' If you say king James deserted the kingdom, the question is still entire; whether he did 'abdicate' or 'desert,' is not material. There is good reason why you should agree with the lords; and I take 'desert' to be the more proper word: I am sure it is most proper to agree with the lords. But whether 'deserted' or 'abdicated,' I would not differ with the lords; for the consequence is entire to you, and you may agree.

Sir Rd. Temple. I am mis-recited, and therefore desire to be rectified. I did not say 'that king James deserted the kingdom,' but the government. His renunciation is by something done by fact, not by solemn instrument.

Lord Falkland. If this Vote be grounded merely upon the king's leaving the kingdom, he may come again, and resume the government. But 'Abdication' relates to breaking your laws; and though the lords stand by the premises, yet they desert the conclusion, in leaving out 'the Throne vacant.' I would therefore not agree with the lords.

Mr. Dolben. The precedent I cited the other day, and inferred my opinion upon was, that Edw. 4.'s withdrawing himself from the kingdom and the government, was a demise, and it was so judged by the opinion of all the Judges; and from all considerations together, you pronounced it an 'Abdication' in king James. But barely 'a Demise,' and 'a withdrawing,' without the consideration of all the breaches he had made in the government, the house did not call it, but the word 'Abdication.' I would agree with the lords if I could agree with ourselves, and our own senses, first. The lords have so far concurred with your Vote, 'That king James has broken the original contract betwixt the king and people.' The premises must agree with the conclusion; ours is the more proper inference, and we must stand by it.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Authors that write of 'Abdication' say, 'to desert' is 'to abdicate.' All that the lords mean by 'Abdication,' you mean by 'Desertion.'

Sir Rob. Howard. 'Desertion' is a Latin word, and 'Abdication' is another. If there be no more intended by the lords than the word, then the king has only deserted the government, and the Throne is not vacant; and the king may have the help of a Regency. They are both Latin words alike, and both English: 'Abdication' arises from 'vacated.' If it be not so, the lords have made room for their last Amendment, 'That the Throne is not vacated.'

Mr. Tipping. The lords are of opinion that the throne is full, but they tell you not who is in the throne. I am sorry to hear of a great number that would bring the king back again; how pernicious that would be to all good Protestants, you may easily judge. I am sure it will be of ill consequence to join the Prince of Orange with him in the throne. But I believe the true reason of this disagreeing with your Vote is the delay that the house has made, that they proceeded not to fill the Vacancy of the Throne. If you had proceeded speedily to fill the throne, possibly you would have had another Answer. Put the question of disagreeing with the Lords, and then declare, 'that you will supply the Vacancy of the Throne.'

Sir Tho. Littleton. The lords cannot expect that we, who have said the Throne is vacant, should not intend to fill it up: the best way is, to go on and fill it up, and put all out of doubt.

The question being put, "That the house do agree with the lords in these two Amendments," it passed severally in the negative, nem. con.

Sir Rd. Temple. No doubt but you can maintain your Reasons for your Vote, at a Conference. If the Throne be full, what do we here? I move you to prepare Reasons, &c. for the Lords at a Conference.

A Committee was appointed accordingly.*

* "Thus ended this busy week. The next day was Sunday; and both houses took advantage of it; not to rest from their labours, but to gain time to strengthen their respective cabals, and further their several purposes. The opposing lords, who had now the ascendant in the house, had still a Regency in view, as their main point, and subordinately cast their eyes on the two princesses. Against a Regency, the two great rivals, Halifax and Danby, as we have seen, co-operated; but, at the same time, laboured separately; the former for the Prince, and the latter for his consort. 'The earl of Danby,' says Burnet, 'sent one over to the Princess, and gave her an account of the present state of that debate; and desired to know her own sense of the matter; for, if she desired it, he did not doubt but he should be able to carry it for setting her alone on the Throne. She made him a very sharp answer; she said, she was the Prince's wife, and would never be other than what she should be in conjunction with him, and under him; and that she would take it extremely unkindly, if any, under a pretence of their care of her, would set up a divided interest between her and the Prince. And, not content with this, she sent both lord Danby's Letter, and her Answer, to the Prince. Her sending it thus to him was the most effectual discouragement possible to any attempt for the future to create a misunderstanding or jealousy between them.' He adds, 'the Prince bore this with his usual phlegm: for he did not expostulate with the earl of Danby upon it, but continued still to employ and to trust him.'—And again, 'During all these Debates, and the great heat with which they were managed, the Prince's own behaviour was very mysterious. He staid at St. James's; he went little abroad; access to him was not very easy; he heard all that was said to him, but seldom made any answers; he did not affect to be affable or popular; nor would he take any pains to gain any one per-

Feb. 4.—Mr. Hampden reported the following Reasons, from the committee, why they cannot agree with the lords Amendments of their Vote of the 28th of January.—"To the first Amendment proposed by the lords to be made to the Vote of the Commons, of the 28th of Jan. instead of the word 'abdicated,' to insert the word 'deserted,' the commons do not agree; because the word 'deserted' doth not fully express the conclusion necessarily inferred from the premises, to [which your lordships have agreed; for your lordships have agreed, That king James 2nd hath endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the Original Contract between king and people, and hath violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom. Now, the word 'deserted' respects only the withdrawing, but the word 'abdicated' respects the whole; for which purpose the commons made choice of it.—The commons do not agree to the second Amendment, to leave out the words, 'And that the Throne is thereby vacant.' 1. Because they conceive, that, as they may well infer from so much of their own Vote as your lordships have agreed unto, That king James the 2nd has abdicated the government, and that the Throne is thereby vacant; so that if they should admit your lordships Amendment, That he hath only deserted the government; yet even thence it would follow that the Throne is vacant as to king James the 2nd deserting the government, being in true construction deserting the Throne. 2. The commons conceive they need not prove unto your lordships, that as to any other person, the Throne is also vacant; your lordships (as they conceive) have already admitted it, by your addressing to the Prince of Orange the 25th of Dec. last, to take upon him the administration of public affairs, both civil and military; and to take into his care the kingdom of Ireland, till the meeting of this Convention. In pursuance of such Letters, and by your lordships renewing the same Address to his highness, (as to public affairs, and the kingdom of Ireland) since you met, and by appointing days of public thanksgivings to be observed throughout the whole kingdom, all which the commons conceive do imply that it was your lordships opinion, that the Throne was vacant, and to sig-son over to his party; he said, he came over, being invited, to save the nation; he had now brought together a free and true representative of the kingdom; he left it therefore to them to do what they thought best for the good of the kingdom; and, when things were once settled, he should be well satisfied to go back to Holland again. Those who did not know him well, and who imagined that a crown had charms which human nature was not strong enough to resist, looked on all this as an affectation, and as a disguised threatening, which imported that he would leave the nation to perish unless his method of settling it was followed.'" Ralph, nify so much to the people of this kingdom. 3. It is from those who are upon the throne of England (when there are any such) from whom the people of England ought to receive protection; and to whom, for that cause, they owe the allegiance of subjects; but there being none now from whom they expect regal protection, and to whom, for that cause, they owe the allegiance of subjects, the commons conceive, the throne is vacant."

A Conference with the Lords thereon.] Resolved, "That the earl of Wiltshire do go up to the Lords, to desire a Conference upon the subject matter of the Amendments."—The earl of Wiltshire reports, "That he having attended the lords, to desire a Conference, they had given Answer, That they did consent to a Conference immediately in the Painted Chamber."

Resolved, "That the Committee, to whom it was referred to prepare Heads of Reasons at a Conference with the lords, be the Managers of the said Conference."

Mr. Hampden reports from the Committee appointed to manage the Conference with the lords, That they had attended the lords at the Conference, and communicated unto their lordships the Reasons why this house doth not concur with their lordships in the said Amendments.

Feb. 5. Mr. Hampden reports from the Conference with the lords, that the earl of Nottingham spoke to this effect:

"That the lords had desired this Conference with the commons, that they might be as happily united to the commons in opinion, as they are inseparable in their interest; and that they are, at this time, uneasy that they cannot concur with the commons in every thing; because it is of so great a concern to the nation, and from so great and wise a body." That he then delivered what the lords had done in reference to the subject matter of the last Conference, and said, "That the lords did insist upon the first Amendment of the Vote of the house of commons of the 28th of Jan. last, instead of the word 'abdicated' to have the word 'deserted.' 1. Because the lords do not find, that the word 'abdicated' is a word known to the common law of England, and the lords hope the commons will agree to make use of such words, only, whereof the meaning may be understood according to law, and not of such as will be liable to doubtful interpretations. 2. Because in the most common acceptation of the civil law, abdication is a voluntary express act of renunciation, which is not in this case, and doth not follow from the premises, that king James 2. by having withdrawn himself, after having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the government, by breaking the Original Contract between king and people, and having violated the fundamental laws, may be more properly said to have abdicated than deserted."—He said, the lords did insist on the second Amendment, to leave out the words, 'And that the Throne is vacant, for this Reason: "For that although the lords have agreed, that the king has deserted the government, and therefore have made application to the Prince of Orange, to take upon him the administration of the government, and thereby to provide for the peace and safety of the kingdom, yet there can be no other inference drawn from thence, but only that the exercise of the government by king James 2. is ceased: so as the lords were, and are willing, to secure the nation against the return of the said king into this kingdom; but not that there was either such an abdication by him, or such a vacancy in the Throne, as that the crown was thereby become elective, to which they cannot agree: 1. Because, by the constitution of the government, the monarchy is hereditary, and not elective. 2. Because no act of the king alone can bar, or destroy, the right of his heirs to the crown; and therefore in answer to the third Reason alledged by the Commons, if the Throne be vacant of king James 2. allegiance is due to such person as the right of succession doth belong to."

The question being put, That this house do agree with the lords in the said first Amendment, it passed in the negative.

The question being put, That this house do agree with the lords in the said second Amendment: the house divided. Yeas 151. Noes 282. And so it was resolved in the negative.

DEBATE AT A FREE CONFERENCE RELATING TO THE WORD "ABDICATED."] Resolved, "That a Free Conference be desired with the lords upon the subject matter of the last Conference." Ordered, "That it be referred unto sir Robert Howard, Mr. Pollexfen, Mr. Paul Foley, Mr. serj. Maynard, Mr. serj. Holt, lord Falkland, sir George Treby, Mr. Somers, Mr. Garroway, Mr. Boscawen, sir Tho. Littleton, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Hampden, sir Henry Capel, sir Tho. Lee, Mr. Sacheverel, major Wildman, col. Birch, Mr. Ayres, sir Rd. Temple, sir Henry Goodrick, Mr. Waller, sir John Guyse, to manage the Conference."

Ordered, "That Mr. Dolben do go up to the lords, and desire a Free Conference with the lords upon the subject matter of the last Conference."—Mr. Dolben reported, "That he having, according to the order of this house, attended the lords, to desire a Free Conference with their lordships, upon the subject matter of the last Conference, they had agreed to a Free Conference presently in the Painted Chamber."

And the Managers went to the Free Conference* in the Painted Chamber, which was thus opened by Mr. Hampden.

* "In this Conference, according to the sense of the whole nation, the commons had clearly the advantage on their side. The lords had some more colour for opposing the word 'abdicate,' since that was often taken in a sense that imported the full purpose and consent of him that abdicated; which could not be pretended in this case. But there were good authorities brought, by which

My lords; the commons have desired this Free Conference from your lordships upon the subject matter of the last Conference, that they may make appear unto your lordships, that it is not without sufficient reason, that they are induced to maintain their own Vote, to which your lordships have made some Amendments; and that they cannot agree to those Amendments made by your ldp.'s for the same reasons.—My lords; the commons do very readily agree with your lordships, That it is a matter of the greatest concernment to the kingdom in general, its future peace, and happy government, and the Protestant interest, both at home and abroad, that there be a good issue and determination of the business now in debate between both houses, and as speedy a one as can consist with the doing of it in the best manner. This way of intercourse between both houses by free conference, where there is full liberty of objecting, answering, and replying, the commons think the best means to attain this end, and to maintain a good correspondence between both houses, which is so necessary at all times, but more especially in the present conjuncture; this, my lords, will bring honour and strength to the foundation that shall be laid after all our late convulsions, and discourage our enemies from attempting to undermine it.—It is true, my lords, the present difference between your lordships and the commons is only about a few words; but the commons think their words so significant to the purpose for which they are used, and so proper to the case unto which they are applied, that in so weighty a matter as that now in debate, they are by no means to be parted with.—The word 'abdicated,' the commons conceive, is of larger signification than the word your lordships are pleased to use 'desert,' but not too large to be applied to all the recitals in the beginning of the commons Vote, to which they meant it should be applied. Nor ought it to be restrained to a voluntary express resignation, only in word or writing, overt-acts there are that will be significant enough to amount to it.—My lords; that the common law of England is not acquainted with the word, it is from the modesty of our law, that it is not willing to suppose there should be any unfortunate occasion of making use of it: and we would have been willing, that we should never have had such an occasion as we have, to have recourse to it. Your lordships next Amendment is, That your lordships have left out the last words in the commons vote, 'And that the Throne is thereby vacant.'—My lords; the commons conceive it is a true proposition, 'and that the Throne is vacant;' and they think, they make it appear that this is no new phrase; neither is it a phrase that perhaps some of the old records may be strangers to; or not well acquainted with. But they think it not chargeable with the consequence that your lordships have been pleased to draw from it, 'That it will make the crown of England become elective.' If the Throne had been full, we know your lordships would have assigned that as a reason of your disagreement, by telling us who filled it; and it would be known by some public royal act, which might notify to the people in whom the kingly government resided; neither of which had been done; and yet your lordships will not allow the Throne to be vacant.—My lords, I am unwilling to detain your lordships longer, from what may be better said for your lordships satisfaction in these matters, by those whose Province it is: I am to acquaint your lordships, that the commons do agree, it is an affair of very great importance. Here are other gentlemen that are appointed to manage this Conference, and will give their assistance to bring it, we hope, to a happy conclusion, in the agreement of both houses, in this so very considerable a point.

it appeared, that when a person did a thing upon which his leaving any office ought to follow, he was said to 'abdicate.' But this was a critical dispute; and it scarce became the greatness of that assembly, or the importance of the matter." Burnet.

Mr. Somers. My lords, what is appointed me to speak to, is your lordships first Amendment, by which the word 'abdicated,' in the commons vote, is changed into the word 'deserted;' and I am to acquaint your lordships what some of the grounds are that induced the commons to insist upon the word 'abdicated,' and not to agree to your lordships Amendment.—1st, The first Reason your lordships are pleased to deliver, as for your changing the word, is, that the word 'abdicated' your lordships do not find is a word known to the common law of England; and therefore ought not to be used: and the next is, that the common application of the word amounts to a voluntary express act of renunciation, which (your lordships say) is not in this case, nor what will follow from the premises.—My lords, as to the first of these Reasons, if it be an objection, that the word 'abdicated' hath not a known sense in the common law of England, there is the same objection against the word 'deserted:' for there can be no authority, or book of law produced, wherein any determined sense is given to the word 'deserted;' so that your lordships first Reason hath the same force against your own Amendments, as it hath against the term used by the commons.—The words are both Latin words, and used in the best authors, and both of a known signification; their meaning is very well understood, though it be true, their meaning be not the same: the word 'abdicated' doth naturally and properly signify entirely to renounce, throw off, disown, relinquish any thing or person, so as to have no farther to do with it; and that whether it be done by express words or in writing, (which is the sense your lordships put upon it, and which is properly called resignation or cession) or, by doing such acts as are inconsistent with the holding or retaining of the thing; which the commons take to be the present case, and therefore made choice of the word 'abdicate,' as that which they thought did, above all others, most properly express that meaning: and in this latter sense it is taken by others, and that it is the true signification of the word, I shall shew your lordships out of the best authors.—The first I shall mention is Grotius, "de Jure Belli & Pacis," l. 2. c. 4. §. 4. 'Venit enim hoc non ex jure civili, sed ex jure naturali, quo quisque suum potest abdicare, & ex naturali presumptione qua voluisses, qui creditur, quod sufficienter significavit.' And then he goes on, 'recusari hæreditas non tantum verbis, sed etiam re potest, & quovis indicio voluntatis.'—Another instance, which I shall mention, to shew that for the abdicating a thing, it is sufficient to do an act which is inconsistent with the retaining of it, though there be nothing of an express renunciation, is out of Calvin's Lexicon Juridicum, where he says, 'generum abdicat, qui sponsam repudiat.' He that divorceth his wife, abdicates his son-in-law. Here is an abdication without express words; but is by doing such an act as doth sufficiently signify his purpose.—The next author, that I shall quote, is 'Brissonius de Verborum significatione,' who hath this passage, 'Homo liber qui seipsum vendit, abdicat se statu suo;' that is, He who sells himself, hath thereby done such an act as cannot consist with his former estate of freedom: and is therefore properly said, se abdicasse statu suo.—Budæus in his Commentaries "ad legem secundam de origine juris," expounds the words in the same sense, 'abdicare se magistratu, est idem quod abire penitus magistratu.' He that goes out of his office of magistracy, let it be in what manner he will, has abdicated the magistracy.—And Grotius in his book De Jure Belli & Pacis, l. i. c. 4. §. 9. seems to expound the word 'abdicare,' by 'manifeste habere pro derelicto:' that is, That he who hath 'abdicated' any thing hath so far relinquished it, that he hath no right of return to it. And that is the sense the commons put upon the word. It is an entire alienation of the thing, and so stands in opposition to 'dicare.' 'Dicat qui proprium aliquod facit; abdicat qui alienat,' so says Præleus in his Lexicon Juris. It is therefore insisted upon as the proper word by the commons.—But the word 'deserted' (which is the word used in the Amendment made by your lordships) hath not only a very doubtful signification; but in the common acceptance both of the civil and canon law, doth signify only a bare withdrawing, a temporary quitting of a thing, and neglect only, which leaveth the party at liberty of returning to it again. 'Desertum pro neglecto,' says Spigelius in his Lexicon: but the difference between 'deserere' and 'derelinquere,' is expressly laid down by Bartolus, upon the 8th law of the 58th title of the 11th book of the Code; and his words are these, 'nota diligenter, ex hac lege, quod aliud est agrum deserere, aliud derelinquere; qui enim derelinquet, ipsum ex pænitentia non revocat: sed qui deseret, intra biennium potest.' Whereby it appears, my lords, that that is called desertion, which is temporary and relievable: that is called dereliction, where there is no power or right to return. So in the best Latin authors, and in the civil law, 'Deserere exercitum' is used to signify soldiers leaving their colours; cod. lib. 12. §. 1. And in the Canon Law to desert a benefice, signifies no more than to be non-resident; so is Calvin's Lexicon, Verb. Desert. secund. Canones.—In both cases, the party hath not only a right of returning, but is bound to return again: which, my lords, as the commons do not take to be the present case, so they cannot think that your lordships do: because it is expressly said, in one of your Reasons given in defence of the last Amendment, That your lordships have been, and are willing to secure the nation against the return of king James; which your lordships would not in justice do, if you did look upon it to be no more than a negligent withdrawing, which leaveth a liberty to the party to return.—For which Reason, my lords, the commons cannot agree to the first Amendment, to insert the word, 'deserted,' instead of 'abdicated;' because it doth not, in any sort, come up to their sense of the thing: so, they do apprehend, it doth not reach your lordships meaning, as it is expressed in your Reasons; whereas they look upon the word 'abdicated,' to express properly what is to be inferred, from that part of the Vote to which your lordships have agreed, That king James II. by going about to subvert the constitution, and by breaking the original contract between king and people, and by violating the fundamental laws, and withdrawing himself out of the kingdom, hath thereby renounced to be a king according to the constitution, by avowing to govern by a despotic power, unknown to the constitution, and inconsistent with it; he hath renounced to be a king according to the law, such a king as he swore to be at his coronation, such a king to whom the allegiance of an English subject is due; and hath set up another kind of dominion, which is to all intents an 'abdication,' or abandoning of his legal title, as fully as if it had been done by express words.—And, my lords, for these Reasons the commons do insist upon the word 'abdicated,' and cannot agree to the word 'deserted.'

Mr. Serj. Holt. My lords; I am commanded by the commons to assist in the management of this Conference, and am to speak to the same point that the gentleman did, who spoke last to your lordships first Amendment. As to the first of your lordships Reasons for that Amendment, (with submission to your lordships) I do conceive it not sufficient to alter the minds of the commons; or to induce them to change the word 'abdicated,' for your lordships word 'deserted.'—Your lordships Reason is, That it is not a word that is known to the common law of England. But, my lords, the question is not so much, whether it be a word as ancient as the common law, (though it may be too) for that will be no objection against the using it, if it be a word of a known and certain signification; because that, we think, will justify the commons making use of it, according to your lordships own expression. That it is an ancient word, appears by the authors that have been quoted, and it is frequently met with in the best of Roman writers, as Cicero, &c. and by the derivation from 'dico,' an ancient Latin word.—That now it is a known English word, and of a known and certain signification with us, I will quote to your lordships an English authority, and that is the Dictionary set forth by our countryman Minshew, who hath the word 'abdicare' as an English word, and says that it signifies to 'renounce,' which is the signification the commons would have of it: so that I hope your lordships will not find fault with their using a word that is so ancient in itself, and that hath such certain signification in our own language.—Then, my lords, for that part of your lordships objection, That it is not a word known to the common law of England, that cannot prevail; for your lordships very well know, we have very few words in our tongue that are of equal antiquity with the common law; your lordships know the language of England is altered greatly in the several successions of time, and the intermixture of other nations; and if we should be obliged to make use only of words then known and in use, what we should deliver in such a dialect would be very difficult to be understood.—Your lordships second Reason, for your first Amendment in changing the word 'abdicated,' is, because in the most common acceptation of the civil law, abdication is a voluntary express act of renunciation. That is the general acceptation of the word, and, I think the commons do so use the word in this case, because it hath that signification: but I do not know, whether your lordships mean a voluntary express act or formal deed of renunciation: if you do so I confess I know of none in this case. But, my lords, both in the common law of England, and the civil law, and in common understanding, there are express acts of renunciation that are not by deed; for if your lordships please to observe, the government and magistracy is under a trust, and any acting contrary to that trust is a renouncing of the trust, though it be not a renouncing by formal deed: for it is a plain declaration, by act and deed, though not in writing, that he who hath the trust, acting contrary, is a disclaimer of the trust; especially, my lords, if the actings be such as are inconsistent with, and subversive of this trust: for how can a man, in reason or sense, express a greater renunciation of a trust, than by the constant declarations of his actions to be quite contrary to that trust?—This, my lords, is so plain, both in understanding and practice, that I need do no more but repeat it again, and leave it with your lordships, That the doing an act inconsistent with the being and end of a thing, or that shall not answer the end of that thing, but quite the contrary, that shall be construed an Abdication and formal Renunciation of that thing.

The Earl of Nottingham. Gentlemen, you of the committee of the commons; we differ from you indeed about the words 'abdicated' and 'deserted'; but the main Reason of the change of the word and difference, is upon the account of the consequence drawn in the conclusion of your Vote, that the throne is thereby vacant; that is, what the commons mean by that expression? whether you mean, it is so vacant as to null the Succession in the hereditary line, and so all the heirs to be cut off? which we say will make the crown elective. And it may be fit for us to settle that matter first; and when we know what the consequence of the throne being vacant means in the Vote, as you understand it, I believe we shall much better be able to settle the difference about the two words.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. My lords, when there is a present defect of one to exercise the administration of the government, I conceive, the declaring a vacancy, and provision of a supply for it, can never make the crown elective.—The commons apprehend there is such a defect now; and, by consequence, a present necessity for the supply of the government; and that will be next for your lordships consideration, and theirs afterwards. If the attempting the utter destruction of the subject, and subversion of the constitution, be not as much an abdication, as the attempting of a father to cut his son's throat, I know not what is.—My lords, the constitution, notwithstanding the vacancy, is the same; the laws that are the foundations and rules of that constitution are the same: but if there be, in any particular instance, a breach of that constitution, that will be an abdication, and that abdication will infer a vacancy. It is not that, the commons do say, the crown of England is always and perpetually elective; but it is more necessary that there be a supply where there is a defect, and the doing of that will be no alteration of the monarchy, from a successive one to an elective.

The Bishop of Ely. Gentlemen, the two Amendments made by the lords to the Vote of the commons, are as to the word 'Abdicated,' and as to the Vacancy of the throne: that 'abdicated' may be tacitly by some overt acts, that gentleman, (I think I may name him without offence) Mr. Somers, very truly did alledge out of Grotius; but, I desire to know, whether Grotius, that great author, in treating on this subject, doth not interpose this caution, If there be a yielding to the times: if there be a going away, with a purpose of seeking to recover what is, for the present, left or forsaken: in plain English, if there were any thing of force or just fear in the case, that doth void the notion of abdication: I speak not of male-administration now, of that hereafter.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. But, my lords, that is not any part of the case declared by the commons in this Vote; when the whole kingdom, and the Protestant religion, our laws and liberties, have been in danger of being subverted, an enquiry must be made into the authors and instruments of this attempt; and if he, who had the administration intrusted to him, be found the author and actor in it, what can that be, but a renunciation of his trust, and consequently his place thereby vacant?—My lords, Abdication (under favour) is an English word; and, your lordships have told us, the true signification of it is a Renunciation. We have indeed, for your lordships satisfaction, shewn its meaning in foreign authors; it is more than a deserting the government, or leaving it with a purpose of returning. But we are not, I hope, to go to learn English from foreign authors; we can, without their aid, tell the meaning of our own tongue. If two of us make a mutual agreement to help and defend each other from any one that should assault us in a journey, and he that is with me turns upon me and breaks my head, he hath, undoubtedly abdicated my assistance and revoked the said agreement.

The Lord Bishop of Ely. The objection of the lords against the word 'abdicated,' is, That it is of too large a signification for the case in hand. It seems to be acknowledged, that it reacheth a great way; and therefore the lords would have a word made use of, which (by the acknowledgment of that learned gentleman) signifieth only, The ceasure of the exercise of a right. If there be such a defect as hath been spoken of, it must be supplied; there is no question of that. And I think we have, by another Vote, declared, 'That it is inconsistent with our laws, liberties, and religion, to have a papist to rule over this kingdom.' Which I take to be only as to the actual exercise and administration of the government.—It is Grotius's distinction between a right, and the exercise of that right; and, as there is a natural incapacity for the exercise, as sickness, lunacy, infancy, doating old age, or an incurable disease, rendering the party unfit for human society, as leprosy, or the like; so I take it, there is a moral incapacity: and that I conceive to be a full irremovable persuasion in a false religion, contrary to the doctrine of Christianity. Then there must be a provision, undoubtedly, made for supplying this defect in the exercise, and an intermediate government taken care for; because become necessary for the support of the government, if he to whom the right of Succession doth belong makes the exercise of his government impracticable, and our obedience to him, consistently with the constitution of our religion, impossible: but that, I take it, doth not alter that right, nor is an abdication of the right.—Abdication, no doubt, is by adoption an English word; and well known to English men conversant in books: nor is it objected, that it is not a word as ancient, and it may be more ancient than the common law of England; we find it in Cicero, and other old Roman writers. But as to Cicero, I would observe that there is a double use of the word, sometimes it is mentioned with a preposition, and then it signifies the renouncing an actual exercise of right, as 'abdicare a triumpho:' and sometimes it hath the accusative case following it, and then it signifies the renouncing of the very right, as that which was mentioned, 'abdicare magistratum;' so that the signification (as the lords say in their Reason) is doubtful: and such words, we hope, the commons will not think fit to use in a case of this nature and consequence, as ours now in debate.—And besides the lords apprehend, that great inconveniencies will follow upon the use of this word, if it mean a renouncing absolutely of the right. It seems the commons do not draw the word 'abdicated' from his withdrawing himself out of the kingdom; for then 'deserted' would (no doubt) have answered. That abdication is the same whether a man go out of the kingdom or stay in it; for it is not to be esteemed according to the place, but the power. If a man stays in the kingdom, this is 'abdicare,' with a preposition, to abdicate the exercise of the government, but not the right of governing, according to the constitution; and to such an abdication (if it be so declared) my lords, I believe, may soon agree.—Then, gentlemen, there is another distinction in those authors that write concerning this point, which are chiefly the Civilians; there may be an Abdication that may forfeit the power of a king only; and there may be one that may forfeit both that and the crown too. It is a distinction indeed in other words, but to the same sense: I will tell you presently why I use it. Those Abdications, that are of power only, are incapacities; whether those I call natural and involuntary, as defects of sense, age, or body, or the like; or moral and voluntary, as contrariety in Religion; an instance whereof there was lately in Portugal, which was a forfeiture only of the power, and not of the name and honour of a king; for though the administration was put into the younger brother's hand, the patents and other public instruments ran in the elder brother's name.—This is, without all doubt, naturally an Abdication in the full extent of the word; nor do I here (as I said) consider whether that the king be gone out of the kingdom, or stay in it; but only, whether he be fit for the administration, which must be provided for, be he here, or gone away.—But the highest instance of an Abdication is, when a prince is not only unable to execute his power, but acts quite contrary to it; which will not be answered by so bare a word as endeavour. I take these to be all the distinctions of abdications.—Now if this last instance of an Abdication of both power and right, take place in a successive monarchy, the consequence will be, that there is a forfeiture of the whole right; and then that hereditary succession is cut off; which I believe is not intended by the commons: there is indeed one instance of the use of such an abdication in monarchy, and that is, that of Poland; and such an abdication there makes the throne vacant, and those with, and in whom the power is invested of making laws, (to wit, the senate) appoint one to fill it: but that, and whatever other instances of the like kind, these may be all of elective kingdoms; for though some of them are, or may be in kingdoms now hereditary, yet they were, in these times, elective, and since altered into hereditary successions.—But here is one thing that is mentioned in this Vote, which I would have well considered, for the preservation of the Succession, and that is the Original Compact: we must think sure that meant of the Compact, that was made at the first time, when the government was first instituted, and the conditions that each part of the government should observe on their part; of which this was the most fundamental, That king, lords, and commons, in parliament assembled, should have the power of making new laws, and altering of old ones. And that being one law which settles the Succession, it is as much a part of the Original Compact as any: then if such a case happens, as an Abdication in a successive kingdom, without doubt, the compact being made to the king, his heirs, and successors, the disposition of the crown can not fall to us, till all the heirs do abdicate too. There are indeed many examples, and too many interruptions in the lineal succession of the crown of England: I think, I can instance in seven since the Conquest, wherein the right heir hath been put by: but that doth not follow, that every breach of the first original contract, gives us power to dispose of the lineal succession; especially, I think, since the statutes of queen Eliz. and king James 1 that have established the Oath of Allegiance to the king, his heirs, and successors, the law is stronger against such a disposition: I grant that from William 1 to Henry 8 there have been seven interruptions of the legal line of hereditary succession; but, I say, those statutes are made since that time, and the making of new laws being as much a part of the original Compact, as the observing old ones, or any thing else, we are obliged to pursue those laws till altered by the legislative power, which singly, or jointly, without the royal assent, I suppose, we do not pretend to; and these laws being made since the last interruption, we are not to go by any precedent that was made before the making those laws.—So that all that I conceive ought to be meant by our Vote, is but a setting aside the person that broke the Contract: and, in a successive kingdom, an ‘Abdication can only be a forfeiture as to the person himself.—I hope, and am persuaded, that both lords and commons do agree in this, Not to break the line of Succession, so as to make the crown elective. And if that be declared, that this ‘Abdication’ of king James 2 reaches no farther than himself, and that it is to continue in the right line of Succession, that, I hope, will make all of one mind in this important affair.

The Earl of Clarendon. As I remember,

Mr. Somers, who spoke to the signification of the word ‘abdicated,’ did quote Grotius, Calvin’s Lexicon, and other civil lawyers, where the express words make it to be a voluntary act, and so are all the instances that ever I read or heard of, that is, there either was some formal Deed of Renunciation, or Resignation; or some voluntary act done of the party’s own; and such whereby they have shewn they did divest themselves of the royalties.—I think truly, gentlemen, it is very apparent that the king, in this case, hath done nothing of this nature: it is indeed said by that learned and ingenious gentleman Mr. Somers, that it may arise from the facts, that in the Vote it has been declared he hath done it, by breaking the fundamental laws, and the Original Contract; and endeavouring to subvert the constitution of the kingdom. I will not discourse the particulars that have been alleged to make out this charge; but I may say this much in general, that this breaking the Original Contract is a language that hath not been long used in this place; nor known in any of our law-books, or public records. It is sprung up, but as taken from some late authors, and those none of the best received; and the very phrase might bear a great debate, if that were now to be spoken to. Mr. Somers did likewise speak something to the particular case, and the grounds of the Vote; he said, the king is bounded by law, and bound to perform the laws made, and to be made. That is not denied; I would take notice, that his obligation thereunto doth not proceed from his Coronation-Oath; for our law saith, He is as much king before he is crowned, as he is afterwards: and there is a natural allegiance due to him from the subjects immediately upon the descent of the crown upon him. And though it is a very requisite ceremony, to put him under a farther obligation by the conscience of his oath; yet I think it will not, nor can be denied but that, as king, he was bound to observe the laws before; and no body will make that Oath to be the Original Contract, as I suppose.—But, my lords and gentlemen, if you do admit that it was never intended by the house of commons, to relate any farther than to this king himself, I believe my own opinion would concur to secure us against his return to govern us: but then, why is there such a contention about a word? Doth all this imply more than desertion?—But it is said, that ‘Abdication’ doth imply a perfect Renunciation, which I cannot see how it is in this case, so as to leave us at liberty to supply as we please, and break the line of succession.—Mr. Serj. Maynard says, that it is not indeed to make the government perpetually elective. I would know what he means by perpetually: our breaking through the Line now, by a choice out of the lineal course, is an alteration and a precedent: and why may not others take the same liberty we do? And will not that make it perpetually elective?—But truly, I think, no act of ours can alter the lineal Succession; for, by all the laws we have now in being, our government appears to be hereditary in a right line of descent: and upon any descent, when any one ceaseth to be king, allegiance is by law due to his legal heir, as successor, as well before coronation as after.—I was in great hopes that you would have offered something in answer to one of my lord's Reasons, against that part of the vote which declares 'the Throne to be vacant;—That no act of the king's alone can bar or destroy the right of his heir to the crown, which is hereditary, and not elective. And then, if this matter goes no farther than king James 2 in his own person, how comes the Vacancy and the Supply to be devolved upon the people? For if he only be set aside, then it is apparent, whither the crown is to go, to the person that hath the next right of succession; and consequently there is no vacancy.

The Earl of Nottingham. Gentlemen, I would not protract time, which is now so necessary to be husbanded; nor perplex debates about any affair like that which now lies before us: it is not a question barely about words, but things, which we are now disputing.—The word 'abdicated,' it is agreed by Mr. Somers, is a word of art; and he hath told us what its signification is, from those that are skilled in the art to which it belongs: he doth acknowledge that it is no law-word among English lawyers; nor known to the common law: but then, he saith neither is the word, used by the lords, 'deserted.'—I agree to him, that neither the one nor the other are words used in our law; but the inference I would draw thence is this, that we have no words applicable to this case; because we never before had such a case; and we must not draw inferences of law in such a case, that are not deducible from rules well known in our laws.—I will not dispute what the sense of the word 'Abdication' is in the civil law; but that it is a civil law word is agreed to by me; and if it be, for that reason I am against using of it; because I am so much in love with our own laws, that I would use no words in a case that so much concerns our legal constitution, but what are fetched from thence.—I hope I shall never see our old laws altered; or if they be, God forbid we should be the voluntary agents in such an alteration.—But then we are told the word 'deserted' doth not reach our case; because the signification of the word is but a temporary leaving or forsaking of his power, which he may re-assume; nay, which in some cases there is a duty upon him to return unto. If that were all, Mr. Somers hath given himself an Answer to that Objection, out of what he alleges of the lords Reasons, who have declared, that they are willing to secure the nation against the return of king James into this kingdom; and will therefore concur with the commons in any act, that shall be thought necessary to prevent such his return: so that it should seem we were agreed in that matter; and if that were the point, we should find words proper soon enough to express our meaning by. But I find neither of these words will, on the one side or on the other, be allowed to signify the meaning; therefore we should (as I take it) come presently to think of some other that would. But the Reason why my lords did chiefly insist upon the alteration of the word 'abdicated,' was because they did apprehend, that it being a word not known to our laws, there might be other inferences drawn from it, than they do apprehend our laws will warrant, from the case, as it is stated in the fact of this Vote; and, as they conceive is done in the concluding of the throne's being vacant.—Therefore, I think, it would shorten the present debate, if we did settle that point first; and as we frequently, in parliamentary proceedings, postpone this and that paragraph in a Bill, till some others that may be thought fit to be determined first be agreed to; so we should postpone the debate about the word 'abdicate,' till the vacancy of the throne be settled: for if we were sure that the throne were, or were not vacant, we should easily light upon what word were proper to be used in this case.—I should therefore propose that we might debate that first; because if there be an English word of known signification in our law, which should signify no more than renouncing for a man's self; and which would not amount to so much as setting aside the right of others, that word may be used; and if no other, the word renouncing itself may be taken, which would be best agreed to.—Acting against a man's trust (says Mr. Serjeant Holt) is a renunciation of that trust, I agree it is a violation of his trust to act contrary to it; and he is accountable for that violation, to answer what the trust suffers out of his own estate; but I deny it to be presently a renunciation of the trust, and that such a one is no longer a trustee.—I beg his pardon if I differ from him in opinion, whom I acknowledge to have much more learning in his profession, than I can pretend unto; but if the law be as he says, in a private case, then I must beg leave to forbear giving my opinion, in a case of this public nature that is now before us, till I know what such a trust is, and what the law says in such a case.—If indeed you do pretend 'that the Throne is vacant,' and both houses agree to that conclusion, I think it will be no matter what word is used about it: but if we do not agree to that conclusion, I think it will be afterwards easy to shew which is the fittest word to be stood upon; or to agree upon some other. I pray therefore (to shorten the debate) that you gentlemen would speak to this point first; and when that is resolved, I hope we shall easily come to an agreement about the other.

Sir George Treby. I think, my lords, that we may not consent to begin at the end, and first to enquire of the conclusion, before the premises are settled: for the 'Vacancy of the Throne' follows, as an inference drawn from the acts of the king, which are expressed most fully by the word 'Abdication;' and to enquire what the consequence is, when the fact is doubtful, from which the consequence is to ensue, is beginning at the wrong end; till we state the fact, we can assign no consequence at all to it: therefore, my lords, I think the present debate is to begin, where the difference between the two houses doth begin, and that is at the word 'abdicated;' and when that is over, we shall regularly come to the other point in difference.—We are gone too far, when we offer to enquire into the Original Contract, Whether any such thing is known or understood in our law or constitution? or, whether it be new language amongst us? and I offer this to your lordships consideration for two Reasons. First, it is a phrase and thing used by the learned Mr. Hooker, in his book of Ecclesiastical Polity, whom I mention as a valuable authority, being one of the best men, the best churchman, and the most learned of our nation in his time, and his works are very worthily recommended by the testimony of king Charles 1. He alloweth, That government did originally begin by Compact and Agreements. But I have yet a greater authority than this to influence this matter, and that is your lordships own, who have agreed to all the Vote but this word, 'abdicated,' and 'the Vacancy of the Throne.' And therefore so much is enough to be said to that: and to go back to debate what is not in difference, is to confound ourselves, instead of endeavouring to compose differences.—And truly, my lords, by what is now proposed, I think, we are desired to go as much too far forwards, when the 'Vacancy of the Throne' is proposed to be the question to be first disputed before the 'Abdication,' from which it is inferred.—But sure I am, it is very much beyond what the Vote before us doth lead us unto, to talk of the right of those in the Succession: for that goes farther than the very last part of the Vote; and it is still to lead us yet farther, to say any thing about making the crown elective: for, I hope, when we come to answer your lordships Reasons, we shall easily make it out, that it is not in this case; neither was there any occasion given by this vote to infer any such thing: we shall therefore keep to the points as they are, both in order of place in the vote, and of reason in the thing; and, as we have done hitherto, speak to the words 'abdicated' and 'deserted,' the words to be disputed about in the first place. Another lord did give one Reason against the using the word 'abdicated,' Because it is a word belongs to the civil law; and said, He would by no means exchange our own English common law for that. I entirely concur with that noble lord in that point; but he did agree to us also, That there is no such word in our common law as 'deserted;' that is, which should signify, by the stamp the law puts upon it, any sense applicable to the matter in hand.—Then if we must not use our word, because unknown to our common law; neither must we use your lordships for the same reason, and so shall be at an entire loss what word to use; and so, indeed, they may well come to consider the conclusion first, who leave us at uncertainties on what terms we are to discourse: and there cannot be a greater confusion in any debate, than to state a conclusion without the premises; which we must do, if we cannot agree how to word the fact we infer from.—My lords, I shall not much differ from what in general has been said concerning the sense of the word 'abdicated;' for it seems to be agreed on all hands that it is a Renunciation: Neither will I contend for an 'involuntary Abdication;' because I think it means a 'voluntary Act:' but truly what your lordships mean, in your Reason against it, by the word 'express,' I cannot so well understand.—That a king may 'renounce' his kingship, I think, may be made out both in law and fact, as well as any other Renunciation; and that, as far as I can discern by your lordships Reasons, and this day's debate hitherto, is not intended to be denied by any. Indeed, some of my lords have told us, That there it is meant of the exercise of a right which may be renounced, without renouncing that right. Whether that be a true distinction or no, is not very material; but if it be, that the very kingship itself (as including a right to govern) may be 'renounced,' and hath been, it will be no difficulty to make out, by instances in all countries, not only where the crown is, or was, elective, but also where it was hereditary and successive.—If a king will 'resign' or 'renounce,' he may do so, as particularly Charles the 5th.

The Earl of Pembroke. That was an express solemn Renunciation.

Sir George Treby. My lords, the particular manner of doing it, is, I take it, not matter in debate just now before us, till it be settled whether a king can 'abdicate' at all, or 'renounce' his kingship at all; this then being granted, That a king may renounce, may resign, may part with his office, as well as the exercise of it, then the question indeed is, Whether this king hath done so or no?—That he may do it, I take it for granted, it being an act of the will: then let us now enquire into the facts, as set out in the Vote, whether this will of his be manifest. For that you have heard it may be discovered several ways; the discovery may be by writing, it may be by words, it may be by facts: Grotius himself, and all the authors that treat of this matter, and the nature of it, do agree, That if there be any word, or action, that doth sufficiently manifest the intention of the mind and will, to part with his office, that will amount to an Abdication, or Renouncing.—Now, my lords, I beg leave to put this case, That had king James 2 come here into the assembly of the lords and commons, and expressed himself in writing, or words, to this purpose; 'I was born an heir to the crown of England, which is a government limited by laws made in full parliament, by king, nobles, and commonalty; and, upon the death of my last predecessor, I am in possession of the throne; and, now I find, I cannot make laws without the consent of the lords and representatives of the commons in parliament; I cannot suspend laws that have been so made, without the consent of my people: this indeed is the title of kingship I hold by original contract, and the fundamental constitutions of the government, and my succession to and possession of the crown, on these terms, is part of that contract. This part of the contract I am weary of, I do renounce it, I will not be obliged to observe it; nay, I am under an invincible obligation not to comply with it; I will not execute the laws that have been made; nor suffer others to be made, as my people shall desire, for their security in religion, liberty, and property, which are the two main parts of the kingly office in this nation.' I say, suppose he had so expressed himself, doubtless this had been a plain renouncing of that legal, regular title which came to him by descent: if then he by particular acts, such as are enumerated in the Vote, has declared as much, or more than these words can amount to, then he thereby declared his will to renounce the government: he hath, by these acts mentioned, manifestly declared, that he will not govern according to the laws made; nay, he cannot so do; for he is under a strict obligation, (yea the strictest) and superior to that of the original compact between king and people, to act contrary to the laws, or to suspend them.—By the law, he is to administer justice, and to execute his office according to the tenour of those laws; and the Coronation Oath obligeth him likewise to consent to such laws as the people shall chuse: but, on the contrary, by that unfortunate persuasion (in point of Religion) that he hath embraced, he is obliged to suspend the laws that defend the established religion, and to treat it, as it has been (as we well know) called, as the 'North-ern Heresy;' and, under pain of damnation, to extirpate it: and in order to it, did sap and repeal all the legal fences of it, without consent of parliament. What the endeavours and practices of that kind have been in the last reign, I suppose, we are not now to be told of, or instructed in: and if (as is very plain) this doth amount to a manifest declaration of his will, no longer to retain the exercise of his kingly office, thus limited, thus restrained, then in common sense, as well as legal acceptations he has sufficiently declared his renouncing of the very office. As for his departure out of the kingdom, it is not material, whether it was voluntary or involuntary; but it is sufficient, that his acting declares, quo animo, he went away; he no longer could pursue what he designed; and the contrary of which he was so strongly obliged unto by the duty of his office and relation, and the obligation of the Original Contract, as likewise his own Coronation-Oath; and then he desires no longer to be here.—So that taking both these things together, that he will not; nay, he cannot (as thus persuaded in point of Religion) govern according to law; and thereupon hath withdrawn himself out of the kingdom: it is a manifest declaration of his express renouncing and parting with his kingly office. And therefore I cannot depart from insisting upon this word 'abdicated,' which doth so well correspond to the fact of the case, and so well express the true meaning of the commons in their Vote: nor can we consent to the postponing this point, till the other, about 'the Vacancy of the Throne,' be determined; for this is the very foundation upon which we are to proceed for establishing the superstructure of the other conclusion.

The Earl of Nottingham. This learned gentleman that spoke last, says, it is necessary to prefer the premises before the conclusion, as being the foundation to the superstructure. Truly, I apprehend, that this word 'abdicated' was part of the conclusion, and not of the premises; the Vote runs thus, That by breaking the Original Contract, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, he has abdicated the government, and the throne is thereby vacant.—I take it to be (as I say) part of the conclusion, the other part being joined by a copulative; therefore that which is but the other part of the conclusion, is not to be inferred from the other part of the premises. But take it to be (as you say,) That the Vacancy of the Throne is another distinct conclusion from all that preceded, as the premises, and therefore it is to be considered last. I would then beg the favour of you, gentlemen of the house of commons, to answer me one question about this point of Abdication: Whether you mean by Abdication, a renouncing for himself, or for himself and his heirs?—If you mean only Abdication for himself, it will have a different influence upon the debate and resolution of the case, as to the meaning of that you call the conclusion; for then, How can the Throne be vacant?—But if it be meant for himself and his heirs, then I apprehend it is no more than what you say at the end, 'That the Throne is indeed vacant;' and then this Abdication cannot be part of the premises, but must be the same thing with, or part of the conclusion. I will not undertake to dispute, Whether a king of England may, or may not renounce his kingdom. For my own part, I think he can, and I may go so far in agreement with those that have spoken to this point, to yield that he may do it by implicit acts, contrary to the kingly office.—For a king to say, he will not govern according to law; and for a king to act wholly contrary to law; and do that which would subvert the constitution, is (I think) the same thing.—But then I must say also, That I think there is a difference between saying so, and doing something inconsistent with what the laws require; for every deviation from the law is a kind of breach of the fundamental laws: for I know no law, as laws, but what are fundamental constitutions; as the laws are necessary, so far as to support the foundation.—But if every transgression, or violation, of the law, by the prince's connivance or command, were such a breach of the fundamental laws, as would infer an Abdication, then were it in vain to call any of his ministers or officers to account for any such action.—Then the action is the king's, and not theirs; and then adieu to the maxim of a king's not doing wrong: and we may have recourse to that other respondent superior, as more effectual satisfaction.—I take this matter to be so plain, as to the distinction that I have mentioned, that nothing can be more: and it has been thought so essentially necessary to have it clear and manifest, that those two great instances of Edward 2 and Richard 2 were express solemn renunciations, and those confirmed in parliament by the lords and commons, by the act of deposing them. Therefore I cannot infer from the facts enumerated in the Vote, That this should be an abdication for himself and his heirs.—But therefore, because in this first point it is disputable what is meant by a word not of known signification in the law, it might, I think, do well to consider, what is to be inferred from it: and therefore all I have now said is only to this purpose, that either both make one conclusion, or else the latter cannot be inferred from the former.

Sir George Treby. I beg leave to say something to what this noble lord has last spoke unto: when I called this point of the Vacancy of the Throne a conclusion, I did not mean altogether to exclude abdication from being a conclusion from the particulars enumerated before; for, indeed it is in the nature of a double conclusion: one, from the particular facts mentioned, that thereby king James has abdicated the government. The other, from the abdication, that thereby the 'Throne is vacant:' by the instanced acts, he hath abdicated the government; and by his abdicating the government, 'the Throne is vacant.' As to the rest of that which his lordship is pleased to say, I perceive he does (as he must) agree with me, that a king may renounce by acts, as well as words, or writings. But then I would add, and agree with his lordship also, That God forbid, every violation of the law, or deviation from it, should be reckoned an abdication of the government. I desire to deliver myself from the imputation of any such absurd conceit.—When a king breaks the law in some few particular instances, it may be sufficient to take an account of it from those evil ministers that were instrumental in it, why such a thing was done, which was against the laws? Why such a law was not executed by them, whose duty it was to see it put in execution? You may, in ordinary cases of breaking the law, have remedy in the ordinary courts and course of justice.—But sure! he does not take this to be such a case, or these to be ordinary violations of the law: and therefore in extraordinary cases, the extraordinary remedy is to be recurred unto; for the king having a limited authority, by which he was obliged to keep the laws made, as to the executive part of the government, and to observe the constitution for making such new laws, as the people should find necessary, and present him for his consent; when he doth violate, not a particular law, but all the fundamentals; not injure a particular person in Religion, Liberty or Property, but fall upon the whole constitution itself, what doth all this speak?—He therein saith, 'I will no more keep within my limited authority, nor hold my kingly office upon such terms. This title I had by the Original Contract between king and people; I renounce that, and will assume another title to myself: that is, such a title, as by which I may act as if there were no such law to circumscribe my authority.'—Where shall any man come to have redress in such a case as this, when the malefactor comes to be party, unto whom all applications for relief and redress from injuries should be made, and so he himself shall be a judge of his own breaches of law? This most apparently was the case as to the Quo Warrantos, which was a plain design to subvert the constitution in the very foundation of the legislature.—It is because the king hath thus violated the constitution, by which the law stands, as the rule both of the king's government, and the people's obedience, that we say, he hath abdicated and renounced the government; for all other particular breaches of the law, the subject may have remedy in the ordinary courts of justice, or the extraordinary court of parliamentary proceedings: but where such an attempt as this is made on the essence of the constitution, it is not we that have brought ourselves into this state of nature, but those who have reduced our legal well-established frame of government into such a state of confusion, as we are now seeking a redress unto.

The Earl of Rochester. The lords have given their Reasons why they altered the word 'abdicated;' because it is a word not known to the common law, and of doubtful signification: therefore it would be well if the commons would please to express their own meaning by it. I believe my lords would be induced to agree, that the king hath abdicated, that is, renounced the government for himself, if you mean no farther than that; and if you do so, why should you not be pleased to explain yourselves, that every one may know how the matter stands, and to preserve a good correspondence between both houses, in such a juncture and conjunction as this. But if you do mean any thing more by it than Abdications for himself only, though their lordships should agree to the using of the word 'abdicated;' yet this would prove a greater argument against their agreeing in the other point, about the Vacancy of the Throne: therefore we would be glad to have you explain yourselves what you mean by it.

Then there was a little pause.

Mr. Hampden. If the lords have nothing further to offer upon this point, it will be fit for us to go on to the other Amendment made by the lords to our Vote.

No lord offering to speak, the commons proceeded to the second Amendment.

Mr. Sacheverel. My lords; your lordships second Amendment to the commons Vote, (to wit, to leave out the words, 'and that the Throne is thereby vacant,') the house of commons cannot agree with your lordships to that Amendment; and they do conceive they have many and great reasons why they should not do it. But, my lords, they very much wonder how it comes here to be laid upon them (as it seems to be, by one of your lordships Reasons) that they, by using those words of Abdication and Vacancy, signify an intention of making an alteration of the constitution of the government.—I would not misrepresent your lordships words, or misrepresent your meaning: but you are pleased to say, that you cannot agree to such an Abdication or Vacancy, as that the crown should thereby become elective: as if the commons had thoughts of making the kingdom elective, when no such thing was either meant by them, or can be deducted from their words. But, my lords, one Reason why they differ from you is, they think (upon the nature of your proceedings) they are in the right, to insist upon their Vote, as they sent it up to your lordships: and they conceive, as to all the Reasons your lordships have been pleased to give them for your Alterations, not one of them hath so much argument in them, as they might well expect.—The commons Reason for their disagreeing to this Amendment was, because they conceive (that, as they may well infer) from so much of their own Vote, as your lordships have agreed unto, That king James 2 hath 'abdicated' the government; and that the Throne is thereby vacant: so if they should admit your lordships Amendments, that he hath only deserted the government, yet, even thence would follow, 'It is vacant as to king James 2 deserting the government, being, in true construction, deserting the throne.'—Now, to this they do desire, that your lordships will consider and see, whether you give any answer to this reason, or rather, whether you do not leave the matter still in the dark; and (in truth) leave the nation in a perpetual state of war.—Your lordships answer to that, that although you have agreed, that the king has deserted the government, and therefore you have made application to the prince of Orange, to take upon him the administration of the government, and thereby provide for the safety and peace of the kingdom; yet there can be no inference drawn from thence, but only that the exercise of the government by king James 2 was ceased: so, as that the lords were, and are willing, to secure the nation against the return of the said king into this kingdom; but not that there was either such an 'abdication' by him, or Vacancy in the Throne, as that the crown thereby became elective; to which they cannot agree. I desire now to know of your lordships, what part of this Reason hath given an answer to what the commons said in their first Reason; that they may very well conclude from their own Vote, as to what your lordships have therein agreed to, that the Throne is vacant, as to king James 2; deserting the government, and deserting the throne, being, in true construction, the same. Instead of answering this Reason, your lordships come and apply it here, only to a bare giving over the exercise of the government by king James: and pray, my lords, let us consider where we are.—If the case be so, then king James 2, who has only left the exercise, continues in the office, and is king still; and then all the acts that we have done in this Convention, are wholly (as we conceive) not justifiable; you are in no place or station to relieve yourselves, or nation, in this exigence; unless you will think of setting up another Regency by your own authority, without his consent; which, I conceive, by the laws of England, you cannot do.—What then follows upon all we have done? We have drawn the nation into a snare, by the steps we have taken; and leave all in such an intricacy, as we have no power by law, to deliver them out of; nor can we answer for what we have done, unless the king should die, and that would leave the Succession uncertain.—My lords, I only apply myself, to consider the Reasons of your lordships, for insisting upon this second Amendment; because, I conceive, your lordships have therein given no answer to the Reason first given by the commons, why they cannot agree to your lordships Amendment.

Mr. Pollexfen. My lords; your own Reasons (under favour) do shew, that your lordships do intend, that the king is still in the government: this, I think, is most apparent out of your own Reasons. For, when you have declared, that the king hath 'deserted' the government, and then say, no inference can be drawn thence, but only that the exercise of the government by king James 2 was ceased; then you do thereby still say, that king James 2 is in the government; for if only the exercise be ceased, the right doth still remain: then I am sure we have no reason to agree with their lordships in that point.—Next, my lords, truly we cannot see how this thing that you would have can be inferred from your own Vote, that only the exercise of the government by king James is ceased; since you do not say that he deserted the exercise of the government. And if your lordships had any purpose to express your meaning by a public Vote, that only the exercise ceased, surely your lordships would have put in the word 'Exercise' there: but when in your Vote you say the government was 'deserted,' you cannot mean only the exercise of it.—And that is the first Reason that the commons give your lordships, why we cannot by any means admit of your lordships Amendment, because Throne and Government are in true construction the same; but the Exercise of the Government only (as you express it) and the Government itself (if your Reason conclude right) are not the same : and we are to reason from the words expressed in the Vote.—Next, my lords, we say, it cannot be inferred from the words, as they rest in your lordships Vote, that only the exercise of the government, as to king James II. did cease. For if we read that part about deserting the government, with the rest of the particulars that go before, his endeavouring to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, breaking the Original Contract, violating the fundamental laws, and withdrawing himself out of the kingdom ; then can any man of understanding think that this deserting of the government can be any thing else, but somewhat that is agreeable to all those precedent acts, which are not a ceasing of the exercise of the government only, but a destruction of the government itself?—But besides, my lords, under favour, the administration or exercise of the kingly government is in construction and consideration of law all one and the same : and, I think, nobody that would reason aright from thence can say there is any distinction between government and the exercise of the government ; for whosoever takes from the king the exercise of the government, takes from the king his kingship ; for the power and the exercise of the power are so joined that they cannot be severed. And the terms themselves (taking them as the law of England, which we are to argue from in this case, teacheth them) are so co-incident, that they cannot either subsist without consisting together : if a man grant to another the government of such a place, this imports the exercise of the government there, to be granted thereby. As if the Islands belonging to this crown and dominion of England, (as the Plantations abroad) if the king grants to any one the government of Jamaica, or the like, sure no one will say, that that is not a grant of the exercise of the government there. So that wherever a government is granted, the exercise of that government is meant and included, and therefore the supposed distinction may be something indeed, if they be only notionally considered ; but it is a notion altogether disagreeing to the laws of England.—When your lordships say in your Reasons, That the exercise of the government as to King James 2 is ceased, which is as far as you can go in this point, the commons can by no means agree to this Reason ; for by the words so used (the exercise ceased) we apprehend, that you mean the kingship continueth still in him, and that only the exercise is gone.—And if it be so, and it be utterly unlawful, and as great a crime (as what law saith it is not ?) to take away from the king the exercise of the government, as to take from him the government ; then it may do well for your lordships to consider, whether you are not guilty of the same crime and thing which you would decline by your Amendment.—The commons therefore cannot admit, that there should be a taking away of the exercise of the government from the king, any more than the taking away the government which (we say) he hath himself given away by ‘ Abdication.’ And if king James be our king still, we cannot by any means agree to the keeping of him out of the kingdom ; for if it be his right to be king still, God forbid but that he should enjoy it, and be admitted to the exercise of it again.—Then, my lords, for the Conclusion that your lordships have added to your Reason, (as making it from the very words of your Vote,) That it would infer such a vacancy in the throne, as that the crown should thereby become elective ; this, we conceive, is a conclusion, that hath no premises either from our actions, or our sayings, or our votes, or any thing else in this case ; nay, it is quite varying from all the premises. But, when such a conclusion can be shewn to follow from them, then it will be time enough for us to give our Answer to it.—But, my lords, this is that we do insist upon ; that if the right of kingship be still (after all that is agreed on both hands) due to him, we cannot in justice agree to keep him from it. And if it be not his due right, but by these acts, his subversion of the constitution, his breaking the Original Contract, and violation of the fundamental laws, he hath abdicated it (as we say,) and this Abdication hath put him by his right, and so his right is gone from him (as we conceive it is) ; then, I think, we may lawfully go on to settle the peace and welfare of the nation.—But the right to be still in him, to have a regency upon him without his own consent, or till his return, we take it to be a strange and unpracticable thing, and would be introductive of a new principle of government amongst us. It would be setting up a Commonwealth instead of our ancient regulated government, by a limited monarchy ; then, I am sure, we should be justly blamed : and therefore we can by no means submit to your lordships Alterations of our Vote, upon any of the grounds and reasons that have as yet been offered.

The Earl of Clarendon. As to what Mr. Pollexfen hath offered, I desire to observe a word or two, and that is from the commons second Reason, for their disagreeing to their lordships Amendments. You say there, That the commons do conceive they need not prove to your lordships, that as to any other person besides king James, the throne is also vacant : doth not this shew, that the meaning of the vacancy is a vacancy throughout, as well as with respect to king James ? I ask your pardon if I do not declare my own opinion about the vacancy as to him ; but all that I mention this for, is to know your meaning in this point, how far the vacancy is to extend. You said before, That he had abdicated the government, and thereby the throne was vacant. How is it vacant ? Is it only as to king James, or is it as to him and all or any of his posterity, or any of those that are in the remainder in the royal line in succession ? If it be as to them too, then it must necessarily follow, that the kingdom must thereby become elective still, or the government be changed into a Commonwealth ; neither of which, we hope, the commons intend by it. And therefore that made me ask before, what a grave and learned gentleman meant, when he said it should not be perpetually elective.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. I am sure, if we be left without a government, as we find we are, (why else have we desired the Prince to take upon him the administration ?) sure we must not be perpetually under anarchy : the word 'elective' is none of the Commons' word ; neither is the making the kingdom elective the thing they had in their thoughts or intentions : all they mean by this matter, is to provide a Supply for this defect in the government brought upon it by the late king's male-administration. And I do say again, this provision must be made ; and if it be, that would not make the kingdom perpetually elective. I stand not upon any word, but am for the thing, that a provision be made to supply the defect.

Mr. Pollexfen. Do your lordships agree, that the Throne is vacant as to king James II. ? If so, or if you will say it is full of any body else, and will name whom it is full of, it will then be time for the commons to tell what to say to it. If your lordships will please to shew that, we will go on to give it an Answer.

The Earl of Clarendon. Your own words in your second Reason are, That you need not prove to us, that as to any other person the throne is also vacant : then how should we name who it is full of ? Admit for discourse sake, but we do not grant it, for my part I do not ; I say, taking it to be vacant as to king James 2, then you ask us, who it should be supplied by ? Must it not be supplied by those that should have come if he were dead ?—For, I pray consider, I take this government by all our laws to be an hereditary monarchy, and is to go in succession by inheritance, in the royal line ; if then you say this government is vacant, that would be to put all those by that should take the succession, and that will make the kingdom elective for that time. You say, the throne is vacant ; then I may very well ask, who hath the right of filling up that vacancy ? We say, there is no vacancy ; if there is, pray is there any body that hath the right of filling it up ?

Mr. Serj. Maynard. That is not the question before us, yet that will come properly in debate when we are agreed upon the Vacancy.—The noble lord says, It is by our law an hereditary monarchy. I grant it ; but though it should in an ordinary way to descend to the heir, yet as our case is, we have a maxim in law, as certain as any other, which stops the course ; for no man can pretend to be king James's heir while he is living : 'Nemo est hæres viventis.'

The Earl of Pembroke. To that point I think my lord Clarendon gave an answer, That it should go to the next in the line that were to take it, if the king were dead ? For as we should be understood, we should make it a case of demise of our kings, as our law calls it ; that is, the king is dead in law by this Abdication or Desertion of the government, and that the next heir is to take by descent.—You, gentlemen, ask us who the throne is full of ? I think it is sufficient to know that there are heirs who are to take the lineal succession, though we do not, or cannot positively name the particular person ; and therefore we may well conclude there is no vacancy.—Suppose I should be told, such a gentleman is in such a room, and there I find him and another man with him ; and I come out and tell you so, and ask which is he ; you may be doubtful which of the two is the man, but sure the one of them is he : but because you cannot tell which it is, shall I conclude no such one is there ? If there be a doubtful title (that is, dubious in whom the title resides, but a certain title as to some one) and I cannot directly name him that hath the immediate right, yet it is sufficient to prevent the vacancy, that there is an heir or successor, let him be whom he will.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. But your lordship will neither agree it is vacant, nor tell us how it is full. King James is gone, we hear or know of no other ; what shall the nation do in this uncertainty ? When will you tell us who is king, if king James be not ? Shall we everlastingly be in this doubtful condition ?

The Earl of Pembroke. Sure, Mr. Serj. Maynard, you will agree there is one, and no more than one, to whom a right does belong of succeeding, upon failure of king James. Has he no heir known ?

Mr. Serj. Maynard. I say, no man can be his heir while he lives. If he has any, it is in nubibus, our law knows none ; and what shall we do till he be dead ? It cannot descend till then.

The Earl of Pembroke. You agree, that notwithstanding king Charles II. was abroad at his father's death, and did not actually exercise the government ; yet in law, immediately upon his father's decease, he was not the less heir for that ; nor was the throne vacant.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. That is not like this case, because the descent was legally immediate ; but there can be no such thing during king James's life, as an hereditary descent : so that either here must be an everlasting war entailed upon us, his title continuing, and we opposing his return to the exercise of the government ; or we have no government for want of a legal descent and succession.—Pray, my lords, consider the condition of the nation till there be a government ; no law can be executed, no debts can be compelled to be paid, no offences can be punished, no one can tell what to do to obtain his right, or defend himself from wrong.—You still say, the throne is not void, and yet you will not tell us who fills it. If once you will agree, that the throne is vacant, it will then come orderly in debate, how it should, according to our law, be filled.

The Earl of Nottingham. The objection

(as I take it) that is made to these Reasons the lords have given for their insisting upon the amendments is, That we have not fully answered in them the Reasons given by the commons for their not agreeing to those Amendments.

Mr. Sacheverel. My lords, we say you have not fully answered the first of our Reasons.

The Earl of Nottingham. Gentlemen, I intend to state the objection so: That first Reason of yours I take to be this in effect, that our word 'deserted' being applied to the government, implies our agreeing that the king hath deserted the throne, those two being in true construction the same; and then, by our own confession, the throne is vacant as to him.—To this you say, my lords have given no answer: truly, I think it is a clear answer, that the word 'deserted' may have another sense, and doth not necessarily imply renouncing entirely of a right, but a ceasing of the exercise. But then, if that does not vacate the throne as to him, the other Reason comes to be considered, how came you to desire the Prince of Orange to take the administration upon him, and to take care of Ireland till the Convention, and to write his Letters circularly for this meeting? And to renew your Address to the Prince, and to appoint a Day of public Thanksgiving?—In answer to that, my lords say, that though the king's deserting the government (as they agree he has done) did imply the throne to be vacant, yet they might justly do all those acts mentioned in the commons Reasons; because, if barely the exercise of the government were 'deserted,' there must be a supply of that exercise in some persons taking the administration; and as none so fit, because of the Prince's relation to the crown (and his presence here) to address unto about it, so none so proper to make that Address as the lords: for in the absence of the king, they are the king and kingdom's Great Council, and might have done it by themselves without the commons; but being met in a full representative body, they joined with them.—Mr. Pollexfen indeed has said, There is no distinction in law between the kingship and the exercise of it: and, That it is the same crime, in consideration of law, to take away the exercise, as to take away the kingship.—I shall not dispute with that learned gentleman (whom I very much honour for his knowledge in the profession of the law) what offence either of them would be now; for we are not discoursing concerning a Regency, how the government should be administered, but we are barely upon the question, whether the throne be vacant, so that we may have another king? But if we should grant a vacancy, as to the king himself, we are then told, the next in succession cannot take, because no one can be heir to one that is alive. Yet, I think, the answer given by my lords before is a very good one, That though the king be not dead naturally, yet if (as they infer) he is so civilly, the next of course ought to come in as by hereditary succession; for I know not any distinction between successors in the case of a natural death, and those in the case of a civil one.—For I would know if the next heir should be set aside in this case, and you put in another, whether that king shall be king of England to him and his heirs, and so being once upon the throne, the ancient lineal succession be altered? If that be so, then indeed it is sufficiently an elective kingdom, by taking from it the right heir.—If it be not so, then I would ask, whether such king as shall be put in, shall be king only during king James's life; that, I suppose, for many reasons is not your meaning; but, at least he must be made king during his own life; and then if there be a distinction made as to the succession between a natural and a civil death, if king James should die during the life of the new king, what would become of the hereditary monarchy? Where must the succession come in, when the next heir to king James may not be next heir to the present successor?—Therefore we must reduce all to this point, which my lords have hinted at in their Reasons, whether this will not make the kingdom elective? For if you do once make it elective, I do not say that you are always bound to go to election, but it is enough to make it so, if by that precedent there be a breach in the hereditary succession; for I will be bold to say, you cannot make a stronger tie to observe that kind of succession, than what lieth upon you to preserve it in this case.—If you are under an obligation to it, it is part of the constitution. I desire any one to tell me what stronger obligation there can be? and that, I say, is reason enough for my lords to disagree to it, it bringing in the danger of a breach upon the constitution.—Next, gentlemen, I would know of you, if the throne be vacant, whether we be obliged to fill it? If we be, we must fill it either by our old laws, or by the humour of those that are to chuse; if we fill it by our own old laws, they declare, that it is an hereditary kingdom, and we are to take the next to whom the succession would belong, and then there would be no need of standing upon a vacancy.—If we are to fill it according to the humour of the times, and of those that are to make the choice, that diverts the course of inheritance, and puts it into another line: and I cannot see by what authority we can do that, or change our ancient constitution, without committing the same fault we have laid upon the king.—These are the Objections against the Vacancy of the Throne, which occur to me; and we, gentlemen, desire a satisfaction to them before we agree to the Vacancy.—And, I think, the answering them will lead us unto that which I take to be the main point in question, whether the Vacancy of the Throne, and filling it again, will not, as my lords say, endanger the turning this hereditary monarchy of ours into an elective one?

Mr. Sacheverel. My lords, it seems very strange to us, that this question should be asked us, when we come to shew, that your lordships Reasons for leaving out this part of our Vote are not satisfactory, neither do answer the Reasons we gave for our not agreeing to your lordships Amendments: and it is much stranger that we should be asked, whether this Vacancy extends to the heirs, when you will not tell us, whether it be vacant as to king James himself. —You put it upon us to say, the execution or exercise of the government is ceased; but you will not say the throne is vacant, so much as to him: and if it be not, what have we to do, to consider, or debate, of any consequence, whether it will infer an election or not?—We desire of your lordships that which we think is very proper; first, to know whether the throne be vacant at all? If it be, then our proposition in the conclusion of our vote is true, 'That the Throne is thereby vacant.'—My lords, I think we come here very much in vain till this point be settled; what satisfaction can it be to your lordships, or us, or the nation, to know that such things as are mentioned in the Votes had been done by king James, and that he has deserted (as you say) the government, if he still retain a right to it; and your lordships will not declare he hath no right, but amuse the kingdom with the doubtful words of the exercise (as to him) ceasing. If that be all you mean, what need the question be asked, how far it is vacant, for it should seem it is not vacant at all.

The Earl of Nottingham. Will you please to suppose it vacant as to king James, that is, that he hath no Right? Then let us go on to the next step.

Mr. Sacheverel. That, my lords, we cannot do, for all our business is to maintain our own, 'that the Throne is vacant.'

Mr. Somers. My lords, your lordships, as a Reason against the word 'abdicate,' say it is not a word known in our common law. But the word 'vacant,' about which we are now disputing, cannot have that objection made to it; for we find it in our Records, and even applied in a parallel case to this of ours, in 1 Hen. 4 where it is expressly made use of more than once, and there it doth import what I think it doth import in this Vote of the house of commons, now in debate; and to require any farther or other explication of it than the Record gives, will be very hard and unreasonable; for we are here to give the commons Reasons for maintaining their own Vote, and nothing else.—If your lordships please to look into the Record in that case, there was first a Resignation of the crown and government made and subscribed by king Rd. 2,* and this is brought into the parliament, and there they take notice, that the 'Sedes Regalis' (those are the words) 'fuit vacua;' and the Resignation being read both in Latin and English, in the great hall at Westminster, where the parliament was then assembled, it was accepted by the lords and commons.—After that, it proceeds farther; and there are Articles exhibited against Rd. 2, and upon these Articles they went on to Sentence of Deposition and Deprivation, and then follow the words in the record; 'Et confessum ut constabat ex præmissis & eorum occasione regnum Angliæ cum pertinentiis suis vacare.' Then Henry 4 riseth up out of his place as duke of Lancaster, where he sat before, and standing so high that he might be well enough seen, makes this claim to the crown: the words in the Record are, 'Dictum regnum Angliæ sicut præmittitur vacans una cum corona vendicat.'—After that, the Record goeth on, That upon this Claim the lords and commons being asked, what they thought of it? they unanimously consented, and the archbishop took him by the hand, and led him 'ad sedem regalem prædictam,' &c.—Nay, after all this, it is there taken notice of, and particularly observed, that 'prius vacante sede regali,' by the lesion and deposition aforesaid, all the public officers ceased; there is care taken for Henry 4's taking the Royal Oath, and granting of new commissions.—My lords; the commons do therefore apprehend, that with very good reason and authority they did in their Vote declare the throne to be vacant. But as to the going farther to enquire into the consequences of that, or what is to be done afterwards, is not our commission, who came here only to maintain their expressions in their Vote against your lordships amendments.

The Earl of Rochester. In a free Conference the points in question are freely and fully to be debated; and my lords, in order to their Agreement with the commons, are to be satisfied what is meant, and how far it may extend. You gentlemen, that are managers for the house of commons, it seems, come with a limited commission, and will not enter into that consideration which (as our Reasons express) hath a great weight with my lords, whether this Vote of the commons will not make the monarchy of England, which has always heretofore been hereditary, to become elective? That the Vacancy of the Throne will infer such a consequence, to me appears very plain: and I take it from the argument that last gentleman used for the word 'vacant,' out of the record of Rd. 2's time, that is cited for a precedent for that word. But as that is the only precedent, yet it is attended with this very consequence; for it being there declared, that the royal seat was vacant, immediately did follow an election of Henry 4th, who was not next in the right line; did not then this hereditary monarchy in this instance become elective? When king Charles 2 died, I would fain know, whether in our law the throne was 'vacant?' No sure, the next heir was immediately in the throne. And so it is in all hereditary successive governments.—Indeed, in Poland when the king dies there is a vacancy, because there the law knows no certain successor: so that the difference is plain, that wherever the monarchy is hereditary, upon the ceasing of him in possession, the throne is not vacant; where it is elective, it is vacant.

The Earl of Clarendon. I would speak one word to that Record which Mr. Somers mentioned, and which the lord that spoke last hath given a plain answer unto, by making that difference (which is the great hinge of the matter in debate) between hereditary and elective kingdoms. But I have something else to say to that Record. First, It is plain in that case king Rd. 2 had absolutely resigned, renounced, or (call it what you please) 'abdicated' in writing under his own hand. What is done then? After that, the parliament being then sitting, they did not think it sufficient to go upon, because that Writing might be the effect of fear, and so, not voluntary; thereupon they proceed to a formal deposition upon Articles, and then comes in the claim of Hen. 4. After all this, was not this an election? He indeed saith, that he was the next heir, and claimed it by descent from Henry 3; yet he that was really the next heir did not appear, which was the earl of March; so that Henry 4 claimed it as his indubitable right, being the next heir that then appeared.—But, gentlemen, I pray consider what followed upon it; all the kings that were thus taken in (we say elected, but the election was not of God's approbation) scarce passed any one year in any of their reigns, without being disturbed in the possession.—Yet, I say, he himself did not care to owe the crown to the election, but claimed it as his right. And it was a plausible pretence, and kept him and his son (though not without interruption) upon the throne. But in the time of his grandson Henry 6 there was an utter overthrow of all his title and possession too: for if you look into the Parliament Roll. 1 Edward 4, the proceedings against king Rd. 2, as well as the rest of the acts during the Usurpation (as that Record rightly calls it) are annulled, repealed, revoked, reversed, and all the words imaginable used and put in, to set those proceedings aside as illegal, unjust and unrighteous. And, pray what was the reason? That Act deduceth down the pedigree of the royal line, from Henry 3 to Rd. 2, who died without issue, and then Henry 4, (saith the Act) usurped; but that the earl of March, upon the death of Rd. 2, and consequently Edward 4 from him, was undoubted king by conscience, by nature, by custom, and by law. The Record is to be seen at length, as well as that 1 Hen. 4; and being a latter act, is of more authority.—And after all this, (I pray consider it well) the right Line is restored, and the Usurpation condemned and repealed. Besides, gentlemen, I hope you will take into your consideration, what will become of the kingdom of Scotland if they should differ from us in this point, and go another way to work; then will that be a divided kingdom from ours again. You cannot but remember how much trouble it always gave our ancestors, while it continued a divided kingdom; and if we should go out of the Line, and invert the Succession in any point at all, I fear you will find disagreement there, and then very dangerous consequences may ensue.

* See vol. i. p. 251.

Sir Robert Howard. My lords; the proceeding and expressions of the house of commons in this Vote are fully warranted by the precedent that hath been cited, and are such as wherein there has been no interruption of the government according to the constitution.—The late king hath by your lordships concession done all those things, which amount to an 'abdication' of the government, and the throne being thereby 'vacant': and had your lordships concurred with us, the kingdom had long ere this been settled, and every body had peaceably followed their own business. Nay, had your lordships been pleased to express yourselves clearly, and not had a mind to speak ambiguously of it, we had saved all this trouble and been at an end of disputing.—Truly, my lords, this Record that hath been mentioned of Henry 4 I will not say is not a precedent of election, for the archbishop stood up and looked round on all sides, and asked the lords and commons, whether they would have him to be king; and they asserted, (as the words of the Roll are) that he should reign over them. And so it is done at every coronation.—As to his Claim, they did not so much mind that, for they knew that he claimed by descent and inheritance, when there was a known person that had a title before him.—For, that which a noble lord spoke of touching the public Acts that have been done since the king left us, I may very well say, we think them legally done; and we do not doubt but that power which brought in another Line then, upon the vacancy of the throne by the lesion of Rd. 2, is still, according to the constitution, residing in the lords and commons, and is legally sufficient to supply the vacancy that now is.—That noble lord indeed said, that your lordships might not only, with the commons, advise the Prince of Orange to take upon him the administration, and join with us in the other things; but that you might have done it of yourselves, as being, in the absence of the king, the great council of the nation.—My lords, I shall not say much to that point, your lordships honours and privileges are great, and your councils very worthy of all reverence and respect.—But I would ask this question of any noble lord that is here, Whether had there been an heir, to whom the crown had quietly descended in the line of succession, and this heir certainly known, your lordships would have assembled without his calling, or would have either administered the government yourselves, or advised the Prince of Orange to have taken it upon him? I doubt you have been (pardon me for saying it) all guilty of high treason, by the laws of England, if a known successor were in possession of the throne, as he must be if the throne were not 'vacant.'—From thence, my lords, your lordships see where the difficulty lies in this matter and whence it ariseth, because you would not agree the throne to be 'vacant,' when we know of none that possess it.—We know some such thing hath been pretended to as an heir male, of which there are different opinions, and in the mean time we are without a government; and must we stay till the truth of the matter be found out? What shall we do to preserve our constitution, while we are without a safe or legal Authority to act under the same, according to that constitution; and in a little time it will, perhaps, through the distraction of our constitution, be utterly irremediable?—I do not deny, but that your lordships have very great hardships to conflict with in such a case; but who is the occasion of them?—We all do know the monarchy is hereditary; but how, or what shall we do to find out the successor in the right line?—You think it will be a difficult thing to go upon the examination who is heir; perhaps it will be more difficult to resolve in this case, than it might be in another: For, though heretofore there have been 'abdications' and 'vacancies,' it has been where the king has been of the same Religion of the established worship of the nation; and amongst those that pretended to the succession, the several Claimers have been persons born and bred up in that Religion that was established by law; or it may be there hath been a child in the womb, at the time of the vacancy.—But then, my lords, there would not be much difficulty to examine, who should inherit, or what were fit to be done. I confess, I say, there are difficulties of all sides, or else your lordships sure would have spoke out before now: and if you had been clear in it yourselves, you would have let the commons and the world have known it. But it not being clear, must we always remain thus? Use what words you will, 'fill up, nominate,' or 'elect,' it is the thing we are to take care of, and it is high time it were done.—My lords, there is no such consequence to be drawn from this vote, as an intention or a likelihood of altering the course of the government, so as to make it elective; the throne hath all along descended, in an hereditary succession; the main constitution hath been preserved. The precedent of Henry iv. is not like that of elections in other countries; and I am sorry there should be any occasion for what is necessary to be done now.—But when such difficulties are upon the nation, that we cannot extricate ourselves out of, by fixing who is the lineal successor, your lordships, I hope, will give us leave to remember 'salus populi est suprema lex.'—And if neither you nor we can do any thing in this case, then we, who are met under the notion of an assembly or convention of the states, have met to no purpose; for after we have voted ourselves to be without a government, (which looks as if something were really intended as to a Settlement) all presently sinks, and we are as much in the dark as we were before.—And, my lords, I pray give me leave to say one thing more: your lordships say, you will never make a precedent of Election, or take upon you to alter the Succession.—With your lordships favour, the settlement of the constitution is the main thing we are to look after. If you provide for the supply of the defect there, that point of the Succession will, without all question, in the same method, and at the same time, be surely provided for.—But, my lords, you will do well to consider: have not you yourselves already limited the very Succession, and cut off some that might have a lineal right? Have you not concurred with us in our Vote, That it is inconsistent with our religion and our laws to have a Papist to reign over us? Must we not come then to an election, if the next heir be a Papist? Nay, suppose there were no Protestant heir at all to be found, would not your lordships then break the line?—But your lordships Vote is inconsistent; you do suppose a case of the greatest consequence that can be, may happen; and if that should happen to be our case, that the whole Protestant line should fail, would not that necessitate an election, or else we must submit to that which were inconsistent with our Religion and our Laws?—If your lordships then, in such a case, must break through the Succession, I think the nation has reason to expect you should take care to supply the present defect, where the Succession is uncertain.—My lords, if this should not be agreed unto, what will be the consequence? We that used, and justly, to boast of living under the best of governments, must be left without any one; for, your lordships, it seems, cannot agree with us to supply and fill up this gap in it, or tell us who is the Successor: and we must not do it ourselves by election; which is the only way left us to provide for our settlement.—Truly, my lords, upon the whole, I cannot tell what condition we shall be in, or what we can do farther; but we must even part, and break up in confusion, and so leave the nation to extricate itself, as well as it can, out of this distraction. But then, at whose door that will lie, I must leave to your lordships own thoughts.

VOL. V.

The Earl of Pembroke. We have indeed passed such a Vote, as that gentlemen says, against a Popish prince's reigning over us; but I should think that amounts to no more than a resolution, that by a law to be made we will take care of it in parliament: therefore I think that which we aim at, and that which the constitution of our government does require, is, to put things in a legal method: and, in order to it, I would have the legal Successor declared and proclaimed, and then a parliament summoned in that prince's name; and the whole matter settled there.—An act made by a king de facto, is void as to a king de jure; therefore I would have the constitution preserved, and would desire, that all that is done in this matter may be again done in parliament.

The Earl of Clarendon. Sir Robert Howard was pleased to say, That by the same method that the throne now should be filled, by the same the successor should be declared, and the right line settled.' Is not that declaring the crown to be elective? Suppose you say nothing but fill the throne, is it not to take away the right line of inheritance? And will not such a Successor claim it for his posterity? Truly, I think, if the right line be declared in the same way that the Successor is, then we take upon us to dispose of the inheritance of the crown absolutely; which, I think, by all the law I ever read or could hear of among us, is ~~not~~ of our power; and, that neither house, nor both houses together, have power to do any thing relating to the Succession, but by act of parliament; which the two houses by themselves cannot make.

H

Sir R. Temple. I think we are now going too far in this matter; the question before us is only, Whether there be a vacancy in the throne? After we have done with that, I do not see how this will preclude the consideration of any claim to the succession.—Your lordships say, You are under great difficulties upon this subject. But, my lords, till you have declared the throne vacant, I must presume to say, I do not see how it is possible for any of us to make one step towards a Settlement.—If there be any claims to the crown, that consideration will be next, and how to determine them: I conceive we are in the same capacity as our predecessors were, to provide for all exigencies as shall emerge, and for the supplying all defects in the government.—It is true, by the acts of queen Elizabeth and king James i. we have the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance that are to be, and have been taken by all persons.—But, my lords, there is an old Oath of Fidelity, that useth to be required in Leets, and that by the ancient law of England every man ought to take who is sixteen years of age; and this was as much obliging to the king, his heirs and successors, as any of those later Oaths are; for they seem only to be made to exclude foreign authorities, and not to infer any new obedience or subjection: therefore I am only saying, we are in as natural a capacity as any of our predecessors were, to provide for a remedy in such exigencies as this.—I do not intend to trouble your lordships any farther than the words of the Vote lead me. If the throne were full, what do we here; nay, how came we hither? I would fain know, Whether all that is mentioned in one of our reasons of the Administration being committed to the prince, and those other acts, do not all imply, at least, that we are in such a case as wherein the Throne is vacant? otherwise, if it had been full, I appeal to any one, Whether we could have assembled or acted in any other name, or by any other authority, than his that filled it? Then do not all these things declare, that there is a vacancy?—My lords, I have done, having said this, that it is a subsequent consideration, how the throne shall be filled, and all the particulars that relate to it remain entire, after this resolution taken.—But, I think, we are at present to go no farther. No man, I hope, thinks there is a just ground for any apprehension of an intention to change the government; I am sure there is no ground for any such apprehension: so that we have all the reason in the world to insist, that your lordships should agree with us, that the throne is vacant, or we shall not be able to move one step farther towards a settlement.

Sir Thomas Lee. My lords; so much has been said in this matter already, that very little is to be added. But give me leave to say unto your lordships, That those amendments your lordships have made to the commons Vote are not agreeing with your other Votes, nor any of the acts done since the Abdication. Had it been in the common, ordinary case of a vacancy by the king's death, your lordships in December last would sure have let us know as much: but it is plain you were sensible we were without a government, by your desiring the prince to take the administration, and to issue out his letters for this convention.—But, my lords, I would ask this question, Whether upon the Original Contract there were not a power preserved in the nation, to provide for itself in such exigencies?—That contract was to settle the constitution as to the legislature, which a noble lord in the beginning spoke of; so we take it to be: and it is true, that it is a part of the contract, the making of laws, and that those laws should oblige all sides when made; but yet so as not to exclude this original constitution in all governments that commence by compact, that there should be a power in the states to make provision in all times, and upon all occasions, for extraordinary cases and necessities, such as ours now is.—I say nothing now as to the hereditary succession; our government has been always taken to be hereditary, and so declared when there has been occasion to make provision otherwise than in the direct line.—But our matter is singly upon a point of fact, Whether the throne be vacant (as the commons say it is) by the Abdication of king James ii.—The present vacancy is nearest that of Richard ii. of any that we meet with in our records; and the phrase being there used, we insist upon it as very proper. And when that is agreed unto, the house will, no doubt, declare their minds in another consequential question that shall arise in a proper way. But this is all we can speak to now.

Sir George Treby. To discourse, whether the crown of England would by this means become elective, is altogether unnecessary; and, I think, your lordships have given no reasons that are sufficient to make the objection out, neither any answers to the commons reasons for their vote. It seems to me an odd way of reasoning, first to mistake the meaning, and then give reasons against that mistaken meaning. The question is only here, Whether we can make good this Proposition, 'That the throne is vacant by the Abdication of the late king?'—I confess, it is a melancholy thing to discourse of the miscarriages of governments, but it is much more afflictive to talk of unhinging all the monarchy, by a breach upon the direct line of the Succession; as, if the crown of England did actually descend to

Lewis the fourteenth, it would not be in the power of the states of this kingdom to devolve it upon another head.—A noble lord put an instance of two men in one room, one of whom was really such a one : but though a stander-by could not directly tell which was he, yet it could not be said by him, that such a one was not there. But, if you please, I will put this case :—Suppose there were two men in one room, that no one alive could tell which was which ; as suppose this to be the case of the two children of Edward 2, that they had been kept close prisoners by their uncle Richard 3, so long, that there were no living witnesses able to tell which was the eldest of the two, that would occasion a difficulty much as intricate as ours here. One of them must be eldest, but by reason of the uncertainty, must not an election be made of them? And could any thing else do but an election? But, I say, the proper single question here is, Whether we have well affirmed upon the premises that are mentioned in the former part of the vote, that he has abdicated, and that the throne is thereby vacant.—Your lordships in part agree ; for you say, ' he has deserted the government ;' then you say, ' he is not in it.' And it is as much as to say, he has left the kingdom destitute of a government?—Now if there be any sense in which our proposition is true, will you deny the whole proposition, because it may be taken in a sense that is dubious and uncertain, as to the consequences? You cannot say the throne is full : if then there be a doubt with you, to be sure it is not like to be evident to us, especially in this case, considering who your lordships are. You are the persons that usually are, or ought to be present at the delivery of our queens, and the proper witnesses to the birth of our princes. If then your lordships had known who was on the throne, we should certainly have heard his name from you, and that had been the best reason against the vacancy that could have been given.—My lords, we say no more than our ancestors have said before us, as you see by the Parliament-Roll, 1 Hen. 4, and I must maintain the record to this purpose, that the government is vacant, and it is there declared, as it is expressed in our vote : so that we have not invented or coined a word for our turn, neither is the notion new, it is a word that has been used before in a case as near this as any can be. But it is objected, That that should be no precedent, because of what followed upon that vacancy of the throne. I desire that your lordships would read the Record.—The next thing there, is, Hen. 4 cometh himself, and says, he claimed the crown as descended from Hen. 3, and the lords and commons assented. It is true, the archbishop did propose him (as was usual at coronations) and he did there actually ask them, ' Whether they did chuse him for their king?' They agreed to it, and the archbishop makes a discourse upon the virtues of a man to govern the nation better than a child ; and then he is placed on the throne. And this I take to be a proper, plain, applicable precedent in our case.—But that noble lord's objection strikes at the very heart of it, if the objection be rightly made, that all these proceedings, and so consequently the words and phrases there used, are all repealed, 1 Edw. 4. My lords, it is very well known, and readily agreed by us, that Edw. 4 came in, in disaffirmance of the title of the house of Lancaster.—As those times went, whenever there was any turn in government, (as there were several) there were new and contrary declarations about the title to the crown made constantly in parliament ; and what one parliament had settled, another undid. But then this advantage we have on our side, that as we have this first precedent for us, so we have the last ; for I need go no farther, than the Parliament-roll of 1 Hen. 7 12. 16. where the Record is set right again.—The act for deposing Richard 2 is indeed by 1 Edw. 4 repealed, and saith, that Henry 4 usurped the crown, and murdered Richard 2 ; and thereupon it proceeds to attaint Henry 6. But then comes in Henry 7 ; and 1 Henry 7 there is an act made, that sets aside all the acts and attainders made against his line, and consequently repealed 1 Edw. 4 which repealed 1 Hen. 4.—And I would observe one thing, by the way, concerning Henry 7. He was of the line of Lancaster, and when he came to the crown, would not endure to have his crown reckoned only matrimonial, or suffer the stile to go in the names of Henry and Elizabeth, as he must have done if he had stuck to the title of the right line of succession ; no, he always stood up for his own title, though he had the heiress of the house of York in his bosom.—Therefore, my lords, his act for restoring the Record of 1 Henry 4 again, is as good an authority as it was before, and somewhat better ; for it hath the last act on its side, which is unrepealed to this day. Henry 7 had a good right and title by marriage to the crown, ' in re uxoris.' No one can question but his own title, as descended from Henry 4 was an usurpation ; and he would not suffer any one to prescribe which title was best, as long as it was acknowledged he had one good one.—That this kingdom is hereditary, we are not to prove by precedent in the list of our kings and queens ; for we shall scarce find above three in any direct line, without some interruption : and therefore we are not to fetch our precedents or proofs, so far as those days. And this I speak for the reason which was hinted before.—The laws made are certainly part of the Original Contract ; and by the laws made, which establish the oath of allegiance and supremacy, we are tied up to keep in the hereditary line, being sworn to be true and faithful to the king, his heirs and successors ; whereas the old oath was, only to bear true allegiance to the king. There (I take it) lies the reason why we cannot (of ourselves) without breaking that contract, break the succession, which is settled by law, and cannot be altered but by another, which we ourselves cannot make.

Sir George Treby. Your lordship is pleased to say, Hen. 7's title by descent was an usurpation. I think it is pretty hard to determine what title he did govern by, since, though his wife was the lineal heir, yet she had no part, or so much as a name in the administration. And if it were too great an issue to be tried then, it will be harder to do it now. And it has been said, it was his mother's council to him, not to declare particularly upon what foot his title stood.—But, my lords, if we should allow none for acts of parliament but those that were made in the reigns of hereditary kings, and in the right line, I doubt we should want the greatest part of those laws that compose the volume of Statute Books, and the Records by which we enjoy a great part of our inheritances and possessions.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. If we look but into the law of nature (that is above all human laws) we have enough to justify us in what we are now a doing, to provide for ourselves and the public weal in such an exigency as this.

Sir Rd. Temple. If laws made about the succession be so obliging, what then shall we say to the succession of queen Elizabeth, who had an act of parliament (to the keeping of which an oath was required) against both her and her sister.

The Earl of Pembroke. But to shew what opinion she herself and the wise men of her times had, and were of, in this point, there is an act made in her reign, and yet in being, which declares it to be a præmunire to affirm, the parliament cannot settle the succession of the crown, or alter it. Entails in parliament have been of the crown, both ancient and modern, yet the authority of another subsequent act has prevailed against such an entail: so that it should be done, I say, in parliament.

Sir Rd. Temple. I think we are in as full a capacity to take care of the government as any of our predecessors, in such an exigence; and if we do as they have done before us, that is not to be called a changing of the monarchy from an hereditary to an elective.

The Earl of Nottingham. After this long debate, pray let us endeavour to come as near as we can to an agreement: we have proposed some questions about which my lords desired to be satisfied: you, gentlemen, have not been pleased to give an answer to them, and we have no great hopes of getting one from you, as this debate seems to be managed.—On your part you have declared, that you do acknowledge the monarchy is hereditary and successive in the right line; then I cannot see how such an acknowledgment consists with the reasons you give for your vacancy; for I cannot imagine how a kingdom can be an hereditary kingdom, and that king who hath children now in being (at the time of his forsaking the government) can have the throne vacant both of him and his children.—The course of inheritance, as to the crown of England, is, by our law, a great deal better provided for, and runs stronger in the right line of birth than of any other inheritance. No attainder of the heir of the crown will bar the succession to the throne, as it doth the descent to any common person. The very descent, by order of birth, will take away any such defect.—And so was the opinion of the great lawyers of England, in the case of Hen. 7th. Then cannot I apprehend how any act of the father's can bar the right of the child; (I do not mean that an act of parliament cannot do it) I never said so, nor thought so; but, I say, no act of the father's alone can do it, since even the act of the son, which may endanger an attainder in him, cannot do it, so careful is the law of the royal line of succession. This is declared by many acts of parliament, and very fully and particularly by that statute 25th Henry 8. cap. 22. entitled, 'An Act concerning the King's Succession;' where the succession of the crown is limited to the king's issue male first, then female, and the heirs of their bodies one after another, by course of inheritance, according to their ages, as the crown of England hath been accustomed and ought to go in such cases.—If then the king hath done any thing to divest himself of his own right, it doth not follow thence, that that shall exclude the right of his issue; and then the throne is not vacant, as long as there are any such issue; for no act of the father can vacate for himself and children. Therefore if you mean no more than only the divesting his own right, I desire you would declare so: and then suppose the right gone as to him, yet if it descend to his lineal successor, it is not vacant. And I told you, one reason my lords did stand upon, against agreeing to the vacancy, was, because they thought your vote might extend a great deal farther than the king's own person.—But your all owning it to be a lineal inheritance, and this vacancy, methinks, do not by any means consist. You declare, you never meant to alter the constitution; then you must preserve the succession in its ancient course: so I did hear a worthy gentleman conclude it to be your intention to do. But by what methods can it be done in this case by us? I desire to be satisfied in a few things about this very matter.—I desire first to know, whether the lords and commons have power by themselves to make a binding act or law? and then I desire to know, whether, according to our ancient legal constitution, every king of England, by being seated on the throne, and possessed of the crown, is not thereby king, to him and his heirs? And without an act of parliament, (which we alone cannot make) I know not what determination we can make of his estate.—It has been urged, indeed, that we have in effect already agreed to what is contained in this vote, by voting, that it is inconsistent with our religion and laws, to have a Popish prince to rule over us. But I would fain know, whether they that urge this, think that the crown of Spain is legally and actually excluded from the succession by this vote? No man sure will undertake to tell me, that a vote of either house, or both houses together, can alter the law in this or any other point. But because I am very desirous that this vote should have its effect, I desire that every thing of this nature should be done in the ancient usual method, by act of parliament.—God forbid that since we are happily delivered from the fears of Popery and arbitrary power, we should assume any such power to ourselves; what advantage should we then give to those, who would quarrel with our settlement for the illegality of it? Would not this, which we thus endeavour to crush, break forth into a viper?—For the Record of 1 Henry 4. I acknowledge the words of the royal seat being vacant are used. But since you yourselves tell us of it, that Henry the 4th did claim by inheritance from his grandfather, that methinks may come up to what I would have the declared sense of both houses upon this question; (to wit) the throne might be vacant of Richard the Second, but not so vacant but the claim of the immediate successor was to take place, and not be excluded, but entirely preserved.—And Richard 2. seems to have had the same opinion, by delivering over his signet to them. Our laws know no inter-regnum; but upon the death of the predecessor the next heir is king 'in uno & eodem instante.'—It was so resolved even in Richard the 2nd's own case; for at his grandfather's death it was a question, whether king Richard 2. or the eldest son of his grandfather then living, should succeed; and it was resolved, that he ought to have it, because of his right of inheritance: which is the more remarkable, because of the contest.—And when Richard 3. usurped his crown, to make his claim good to the right of inheritance, he bastardized his own nephews.—And so it was in all the instances of the breaches that were made upon the line of succession, which were some seven (but all illegal) for such was the force of the laws, that the usurpers would not take the crown upon them, unless they had some specious pretence of an hereditary title to it. That which I would have avoided by all means, is, the mischievous consequences that I fear will ensue upon this vacancy of the throne, (to wit) the utter overthrow of the whole constitution of our government. For if it be so, and the lords and commons only remain as part of it, will not this make the king one of the three estates? Then is he the head of the commonwealth, all united in one body under him. And if the head be taken away, and the throne vacant, by what laws or constitution is it that we retain lords and commons? For they are knit together in their common head; and if one part of the government be dissolved, I see not any reason but all must be dissolved.—Therefore it is of very great importance that we come to an explanation, how far you mean the throne to be vacant; and that if it reach to the king and his heirs, (notwithstanding all the acts of parliament about the succession) we may consider how the consequences of that will affect the constitution; for I presume to say, it may then be in your power as well to say we shall have no king at all.—I was mistaken by the gentleman who took notice of what I said the lords might do of themselves, in the absence of the king: I would not be understood to say, the government would be devolved upon the lords; but I may say they are the government's great council in the interval of parliaments, and may have greater sway by the privilege of their birth, in the exigencies of the state: as appears in several instances, and particularly the first of Henry 6. and during his infancy.—There was a case put by one gentleman, about the two sons of Edward 4. being kept prisoners so long, till it could not be known by any living witnesses which was the eldest: I would only ask that gentleman, whether in that case he would say the Throne were vacant; certainly there would have been one in the throne.—But then it followeth, that though there should be an uncertainty of the particular person, yet that would not infer a necessity that the throne should be vacant.—Upon the whole matter, you seem to understand your own words to signify less than they do really import.—I do not find that you purpose to make the kingdom elective; and yet you talk of supplying the vacancy by the lords and commons.—You do not say, that the king has left the crown for himself and his heirs; and yet your words speak of a vacancy, and nothing of the succession: but you do not tell us what you mean.—Therefore if this matter were explained, that my lords may know how far the intention of the Vote reacheth, that it may not abroad, or hereafter, be construed to go beyond such meaning, (that is) as to the king himself, and not to his heirs, perhaps there might quickly be a happier accommodation than can be expected while things remain thus, still in doubt, and in the dark.—Gentlemen, if any of you can settle this matter in its true light, it would do very well; and it is you must do it; for the words are yours, and so we must be told your signification and intention by yourselves.—If you mean by 'Abdication and Vacancy' only that the king has left the government, and it is devolved upon the next successor, that may perhaps satisfy my lords, and we may agree upon some settlement.—I must confess any government is better than none; but I earnestly desire we may enjoy our ancient constitution.—Therefore I again renew my request, that you would come to such an explanation, as may breed an union between the two houses, for the strength of your consultation and resolutions in this great emergency.—If the kingdom were indeed elective, we were in a capacity of electing, but 'pro hac vice,' according to the constitution, this question would be greater than what it was before; but then the great debate in it would only be, who should first have the honour of laying the very foundation of the new government.—But as this case stands upon the foot of our ancient laws, and fundamental constitution, I humbly beseech you to consider, whether at the same time that, in this way, you get an established government, you do not overturn all our legal foundations.

Mr. Paul Foley. I hope, my lords, there is no danger of shaking our fundamentals in this case; but we are pursuing those methods that agree with our laws and constitution: for though the monarchy of this nation be hereditary in the ordinary course of succession, yet there may fall out a case wherein that cannot be complied with, and a plain vacancy may ensue. For, put the case the whole royal line should fail, (as they are all mortal, as well as we ourselves are) should we in that case have no government at all? And who then should we have but the lords and commons? And I think that case comes nearest to the case in question, where the successor is not known; for if he had been, we should have heard of him before now. And what is the reason that it should then in the former case devolve to lords and commons, but that there is no king? And they being the representative body of the kingdom, are the only remaining apparent parts of the government, and are only to supply the defect by providing a successor. And, is there not the same reason here? We are without a king, I am sure I do not know of any that we have: If that fall out to be the case now, that will infer a vacancy with a witness, and it will be of necessity that the lords and commons take care to supply it.

Mr. G. Eyre. My lords, we are led, and I think, out of the way, into a very large field, hunting after the consequences of a vote not yet settled or agreed unto: we have, as I conceive, nothing but the vote itself to consider of, or debate upon: we do not intend to prejudice any legal right: but what the consequences of this vote may be, before the vote itself be passed, I believe no man can reasonably pretend to ascertain, unless we have the spirit of prophecy.—The throne may be vacant as to the possession, without the exclusion of one that has a right to the succession, or a dissolution of the government in the constitution; neither will there be room for the objection of a king ‘de facto,’ and not ‘de jure,’ which some of the lords were pleased to express their fears of.—This gentleman that stands by me instanced in a Record, and that was mistaken as a precedent for the proceeding in this case: it was only mentioned by him to shew, that by using the word ‘vacant,’ the commons did no more than our ancestors did before us; and therefore it was not an unknown word or thing to have the throne ‘vacant.’ We do apprehend we have made a right and apt conclusion from the premises, for otherwise all the Vote is but historical. We declare the late king hath broke the Original Contract, hath violated the fundamental laws, and hath withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, that he hath abdicated, and actually renounced the government. What occasion was there for such a Declaration as this, if nothing were concluded from it? That were only to give the kingdom a compendious history of those miseries they have too well learnt by feeling them. Therefore there was a necessity to make some conclusion, and none so natural as this; that we are left without a king; in the words of the Vote, that the Throne is thereby vacant, which it may be as to the possession, and yet the Right of Succession no way prejudiced.—But, my lords, we come here by the command of the house of commons, to debate the Reasons of their Vote and your lordships Amendments; not to dispute what will be the Consequences, which is not at present our province.

And so the conference ended, and the members of each house returned to their respective houses.

The Lords agree to the Vote of Vacancy.] Feb. 7. A Message was sent from the lords to the commons by sir Robert Atkins and sir Edw. Nevil, viz.

“Mr. Speaker; the lords have commanded us to tell you, that they have agreed to the Vote sent them up of the 28th of January last, (touching which there was a free conference yesterday) without any Alterations.”

THE DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.] Feb. 15. This day, about ten of the clock, Mr. Speaker, attended with the mace, and the house of commons following him in a body, went in their coaches to Whitehall: where the right hon. the marquis of Halifax, Speaker of the house of lords, with the house of lords, being placed on the right side of the door, within the Banqueting-House; and the right hon. Henry Powle, esq. Speaker of the house of commons, with the commons on the left side of the door of the said Banqueting-House; waited the coming of the Prince and Princess of Orange: who, immediately after, entering in at the upper end of the Banqueting-House, came and stood upon the step under the canopy of state: where being placed, the Speakers of both houses, together with the lords and commons that accompanied them, were brought up by the gentleman-usher of the black-rod, making three obeisances, one at the lower end of the room, one in the middle, and one at the step where their Highnesses stood. And then the Speaker of the house of lords acquainted their Highnesses, That both houses had agreed upon a DECLARATION to be presented to their Highnesses; which he desired might be read; which being granted by their Highnesses, the clerk of the house of lords, by order of that house, read the Declaration as followeth:

“Whereas the late king James 2, by the assistance of divers evil Counsellors, Judges and Ministers employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this kingdom: By assuming and exercising a Power of dispensing with, and suspending of Laws, and the execution of Laws, without consent of parliament: By committing and prosecuting divers worthy Prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excused from concurring to the said assumed Power: By issuing and causing to be executed, a Commission under the Great Seal, for erecting a Court called, 'The Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes:' By levying Money for and to the use of the crown, by pretence of Prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the same was granted by parliament: By raising and keeping a Standing-Army within this kingdom in time of peace, without consent of parliament; and quartering Soldiers contrary to law: by causing divers good subjects, being Protestants, to be disarmed, at the same time when Papists were both armed and employed contrary to law: By violating the Freedom of Election of Members to serve in Parliament: By prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench for matters and causes cognizable only in parliament; and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses. And whereas of late years, partial, corrupt, and unqualified persons, have been returned and served on Juries in Trials, and particularly divers Juries in Trials for High-Treason, which were not freeholders: and excessive Bail hath been required of persons committed in criminal cases, to elude the benefit of the laws made for the Liberty of the Subjects: and excessive Fines have been imposed; and illegal and cruel Punishments inflicted: and several Grants and Promises made of Fines and Forfeitures, before any Conviction or Judgment against the persons upon whom the same were to be levied: All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes, and freedom of this realm.—And whereas the said late king James 2, having abdicated the Government, and the Throne being thereby vacant, his Highness the Prince of Orange (whom it hath pleased Almighty God to make the glorious instrument of delivering this kingdom from Popery and Arbitrary Power) did (by the Advice of the lords spiritual and temporal, and divers principal persons of the Commons) cause Letters to be written to the lords spiritual and temporal, being Protestants, and other Letters to the several counties, cities, universities, boroughs, and cinque-ports, for the choosing of such persons to represent them, as were of right to be sent to parliament, to meet and sit at Westminster, upon the 22d day of January in this Year 1688, in order to such an Establishment, as that their Religion, Laws and Liberties, might not again be in danger of being subverted: Upon which Letters, Elections having been accordingly made; and thereupon the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, pursuant to their several Letters and Elections, being now assembled in a full and free Representative of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid, do in the first place (as their ancestors in like case have usually done) for vindicating and asserting their ancient Rights and Liberties, declare; That the pretended Power of suspending of Laws, or the Execution of Laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal: That the pretended Power of dispensing with Laws, or the Execution of Laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal: That the Commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other Commission and Courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious: That Levying of Money, for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of Prerogative, without Grant of Parliament, for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal: That it is the Right of the Subjects to petition the king, and all Commitments and Prosecutions for such petitioning, are illegal: That the raising or keeping a Standing-Army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law: That the subjects, which are Protestants, may have Arms for their Defence suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law: That Elections of Members of Parliament ought to be free: That the Freedom of Speech, and Debates, or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Parliament: That Excessive Bail ought not to be required, nor Excessive Fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual Punishments inflicted: That Jurors ought to be duly empannelled and returned, and Jurors, which pass upon men in Trials of High-Treason, ought to be Free-Holders: That all Grants and Promises of Fines and Forfeitures of particular persons, before Conviction, are illegal and void: And that for Redress of all Grievances, and for the amending, strengthening and preserving of the Laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently. And they do claim, demand and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted Rights and Liberties; and no Declarations, Judgments, Doings or Proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example. To which Demand of their Rights they are particularly encouraged by the Declaration of his highness the Prince of Orange, as being the only means for obtaining a full Redress and Remedy therein.—Having therefore an entire confidence, that his said highness the Prince of Orange will perfect the Deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the Violation of their Rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their Religion, Rights and Liberties; the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled at Westminster, do resolve, That William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and be declared King and Queen of England, France and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the Crown and Royal Dignity of the said Kingdoms and Dominions, to them the said Prince and Princess during their lives, and the life of the Survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the Regal Power be only in, and executed by the said Prince of Orange, in the names of the said Prince and Princess during their joint lives; and after their deceases the said Crown and Royal Dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the said Princess; and for default of such issue, to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange.—And the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, do pray the said Prince and Princess of Orange, to accept the same accordingly: And that the Oaths hereafter mentioned be taken by all persons of whom the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might be required by law, instead of them; and that the said Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy be abrogated: “I A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, That I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their majesties, king William and queen Mary. So help me God.” “I A. B. do swear, That I do from my heart abhor, detest and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, That Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, That no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God.”

The Prince's Answer thereto.] After the public reading of this Declaration, the marquis of Halifax, Speaker of the house of lords, made a solemn tender of the Crown to their highnesses, in the name of both houses, the representative of the nation; whereupon the Prince of Orange returned the following Answer:

“My lords and gentlemen; This is certainly the greatest proof of the trust you have in us, that can be given; which is the thing which makes us value it the more; and we thankfully accept what you have offered to us.—And as I had no other intention in coming hither, than to preserve your Religion, Laws and Liberties, so you may be sure, that I shall endeavour to support them, and shall be willing to concur in any thing that shall be for the good of the kingdom; and to do all that is in my power to advance the welfare and glory of the nation.”

William and Mary proclaimed King and Queen.] Then the lords and commons there present, about 11 of the clock in the afternoon, came down to Whitehall Gate; where the officers of arms, and other persons, usually concerned in solemnities of that nature, being ready, Garter principal king of arms, having received a Proclamation for proclaiming the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen, read the same in the presence of the said lords and commons, and multitudes of the people there assembled. From whence they proceeded in this manner: first, the head-bailiff of Westminster, with his men: next the knight-marshal, and his men: then a class of trumpets, followed by the serjeant-trumpeter: then an officer of arms, singly, followed by six other; each accompanied by a serjeant at arms: then Garter king of arms, with the Proclamation, accompanied by the gentleman-usher of the black rod: then the lord marquis of Halifax, attended by the eldest serjeant at arms and mace, in his coach: then Mr. Speaker of the house of commons, attended by another serjeant at arms, in his coach: then the duke of Norfolk, earl marshal of England, in his coach; and other of the nobility in their coaches: then the members of the house of commons in their coaches. And, in this order, came to Temple-Bar; where the gates being shut, two of the officers of arms, attended by a serjeant at arms, and two trumpets, knocked thereat: and the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, coming to the gate, and inquiring of the occasion; and being informed thereof, ordered the gates to be opened: and the whole proceeding entered, except the bailiff of Westminster and his men, who returned back again from thence: and the lord mayor, recorder, and aldermen of the city of London, with the sheriffs, receiving them in their formalities; a second Proclamation was made, in like manner as before, between the two Temple gates: from whence the lord mayor, being indisposed in his health, going in his coach; and the aldermen, sheriffs, and recorder, riding on horseback before the lords and commons; they proceeded to the middle of Cheapside; and there made a third Proclamation; and from thence to the Royal Exchange, where a fourth Proclamation was made in the like manner; a lane being made all the way between Temple-Bar and the Exchange, by several companies of the Trained-Bands of the city.—The said Proclamation was as followeth:

“Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God in his great mercy to this kingdom, to vouchsafe us a miraculous Deliverance from Popery and Arbitrary Power; and that our preservation is due, next under God, to the resolution and conduct of his highness the Prince of Orange, whom God hath chosen to be the glorious instrument of such an inestimable happiness to us and our posterity: and being highly sensible, and fully persuaded of the great and eminent virtue of her highness the Princess of Orange, whose zeal for the Protestant Religion will, no doubt, bring a blessing along with her upon this nation: And whereas the lords and commons now assembled at Westminster, have made a Declaration, and presented the same to the said Prince and Princess of Orange, and therein desired them to accept the Crown, who have accepted the same accordingly: We therefore the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, together with the lord-mayor and citizens of London, and others of the commons of this realm, do with full consent publish and proclaim, according to the said Declaration, William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, to be King and Queen of England, France and Ireland, with all the dominions and territories thereunto belonging: who are accordingly so to be owned, deemed and taken, by all the people of the aforesaid realms and dominions, who are from henceforth bound to acknowledge and pay unto them all faith and true allegiance; beseeching God, by whom kings reign, to bless King William and Queen Mary, with long and happy years to reign over us."

Settlement of the Court, Council, and Ministry.] King William's first care after his advancement to the throne, was to settle a Privy-Council,* and appoint a Ministry. The earl of Danby, created marquis of Carmarthen, was made president of the council. He had, by his accomplishing the king's marriage with the queen, and heartily concurring in the Revolution from the very beginning, atoned in some measure for his proceedings under Charles 2. He is said to have pushed for the Treasurer's staff, a post he had formerly enjoyed, but was refused by the king, who was resolved the Treasury should be in the hands of commissioners. The Privy Seal was given to lord Halifax, who for zealously promoting all the steps that were lately made for the king, was hated by the Tories, and for his opposition to the Bill of Exclusion, was not beloved by the Whigs. The affair of surrendering up the Charters, and the remissness in relieving of Ireland, were also charged on him. He had for some time great credit with the king, but lord Carmarthen not being able to bear the equality, or rather preference that seemed to be given him, brought on a storm that quickly fell on him. The earl of Devonshire was made lord steward of the household, and the earl of Dorset, lord chamberlain. As they were both Whigs, the household was made up of such, except where there were buyers for places, which were set to sale. And though the king seemed to discourage such practices, yet he did not encourage proposals for detecting them. Mr. Bentinck, afterwards earl of Portland, was made groom of the stole and privy purse. He continued for ten years to be entirely trusted by the king, and served him with great fidelity and obsequiousness, but could never bring himself to be acceptable to the English nation. Mr. Sidney, made first lord Sidney, and then earl of Rumney, was made one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, and afterwards secretary of state, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and in other great posts. The king's chief personal favour lay between Bentinck and him. He was brother to the earl of Leicester, and to Algernon Sidney, beheaded by king James. He was the man who had the secret of all the correspondence, that was before the Revolution, between the Prince of Orange and his party in England, and the conduct of that whole affair, was, by the prince's own order, chiefly deposited in his hands. He was a graceful man, and had lived long at court, where he had some adventures that became very public. He was a person of a sweet and caressing temper, had no malice in his heart, but too great a love of pleasure. He had been sent envoy to Holland in the year 1679, where he entered into such particular confidences with the prince, that he had the highest measure of his trust and favour, that any Englishman ever had. Marshal Schomberg was made master of the ordnance, he had been of great service to the king in his expedition into England, and the king had been very earnestly pressed to bring him over with him, both because of the great reputation he was in, and because it was thought to be a security for the king's person, and to the whole design, to have another general with him, to whom all would submit in case of any accident.—The earl of Shrewsbury was declared secretary of state, and had the greatest share of the king's confidence. He had been educated a Papist, but had renounced that religion upon a very critical and anxious inquiry into matters of controversy. Some thought, that though he had forsaken popery, he was too sceptical, and too little fixed in the principles of religion. However, he seemed to be a man of great probity, and to have a high sense of honour. He had no ordinary measure of learning, a correct judgment, with a sweetness of temper, that charmed all who knew him. He had so great a command of himself, that during all the time he continued in the ministry, no person was heard to complain of him, except for his silent and reserved answers, with which his friends were not always well pleased. His modest deportment gave him such an interest in the king, that he never seemed so fond of any of his ministers, as he was of him. His method was only to lay in general the state of affairs before his majesty, without pressing too much.—It was for some time under consideration, who should be the other secretary; at last the earl of Nottingham was pitched upon for that post. He had stood at a great distance from the court all king James's reign, and though a privy-counsellor, never went to the board. When the Prince of Orange's coming over was proposed to him, he first agreed to it, but afterwards refused to proceed any farther. However he declared, that though his principles restrained him, so that he could not go on, his affection would make him wish well to the cause, and would be so far a criminal as concealment could make him. Accordingly, he opposed the settlement with great earnestness; but always said, that though he would not make a king, yet, upon his principles, he could obey him when made, better than those, who were so much for making one. The Tories apprehended, that the opposition, which they had given to the king's advancement, and the zeal, that the Whigs had shewn for it, would alienate him from them, and throw him into the others hands, from whom they could expect no favour, but severe returns for the hardships they had put on the Whigs, the latter end of king Charles 2's reign. These apprehensions grew daily amongst that party, and made them begin to look back towards king James. It was therefore thought advisable, in order to avoid exasperating so large a body, to employ the earl of Nottingham. The great increase of business in chancery having led many to apprehend, that it was too much to be trusted with one person, it was resolved to put that court into commission, and the earl was proposed to be the first in the commission, but he refused it, and accepted of the place of secretary of state. This gave as much satisfaction to the Tories, as it begot distrust in the Whigs. The Tories hoped for protection and favour by his means; they reckoned, that he would infuse all the prerogative notions into the king, and give him such a jealousy of every step, that the Whigs should make in their prejudice, that from thence his majesty would see cause to suspect all the shew of kindness, that they might put on towards him, when at the same time they were undermining some of those prerogatives, for which the earl seemed to be so zealous. This had a great effect on the king, who being ignorant of the constitution, and naturally cautious, saw reason enough to dislike the heat he found among those, who expressed much zeal for him, but who appeared, at the same time, to have it with a great mixture of republican principles. They on the other hand, were much offended at the employing the earl; and he gave them daily cause to be more displeased at it; for he set himself with a most eager partiality against the whole party, and against all the motions made by them; and he studied to possess the king with a very bad opinion of them. And whereas secretaries of state have a particular allowance for such spies, as they employ to procure intelligence, how exact soever he might be in procuring foreign intelligence, he spared no cost nor pains to have an account of all that passed in the city and in other angry cabals; and he furnished the king very copiously that way, which made a deep impression on him, and had very bad effects.—The marquis of Halifax having also refused the offer made to the earl of Nottingham with respect to the Chancery, sir John Maynard was made first commissioner, and Anthony Keck and William Rawlinson were knighted, and joined with him.—The Treasury being also put in commission, lord Mordaunt, afterwards earl of Monmouth, was made first commissioner. He was the first of all the English nobility that came over to see the king when prince of Orange. He was a man of much heat, many notions, and full of discourse. He was brave and generous, but had not true judgment. His thoughts were indigested, and his secrets were soon known. Lord De la Mere, afterwards earl of Warrington, was chancellor of the exchequer. The lord Godolphin* was likewise brought into the treasury, to the great grief of the other two, who soon saw that the king considered him more than them both. For as he understood Treasury-business well, so his calm and cold way suited the king's temper. Mr. Rd. Hampden and sir Henry Capel were the other commissioners. The earls of Monmouth and Warrington, though both staunch Whigs, became great enemies. Monmouth generously gave the inferior places, but sought out men of republican principles: and Warrington is said to sell every thing that was in his power.—The Admiralty was also committed to the care of commissioners; and admiral Herbert, afterwards earl of Torrington, was first in the commission. He was brother to chief justice Herbert. Being pressed by king James, to vote for the repeal of the Test, he absolutely refused, and chose rather than comply, to lose places

* The names of the Privy-Counsellors were as follows; his royal highness George prince of Denmark, William Sancroft, abp. of Canterbury, Henry Compton bishop of London, Henry duke of Norfolk, Charles marquis of Winchester, George marquis of Halifax, Thomas earl of Danby, Robert earl of Lindsey, Aubrey earl of Oxford, Charles earl of Shrewsbury, Charles earl of Dorset and Middlesex, William earl of Bedford, John earl of Bath, Charles earl of Macclesfield, Daniel earl of Nottingham, Thomas viscount Falconberg, Charles viscount Mordaunt, Francis viscount Newport, Richard viscount Lumley, Philip lord Wharton, Ralph lord Montagu, Henry lord Delamere, John lord Churchill, Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Henry Sidney, sir Robert Howard, knt. sir Henry Capel, knt. Mr. Henry Powle, Mr. Edward Russel, Mr. Hugh Boscawen, and Mr. Richard Hampden, to whom were added on the 20th of Feb. Thomas Wharton, esq. and sir John Lowther, of Lowther, bart.

VOL. V.

* "He was a younger brother of an antient family in Cornwall, that had been bred about king Charles 2 from a page, and was considered at the time that the earl of Sunderland, lord Hide, and he managed affairs, as one of the ablest men belonging to the court. He was the most silent and modest man that was perhaps ever bred in a court. He had a clear apprehension, and dispatched business with great method, and with so much temper, that he had no personal enemies. He loved gaming beyond what men of business usually do, and gave one reason for it, because it delivered him from much talking. He had true principles of religion and virtue, and was free from all vanity, and never heaped up wealth. He had much of the confidence of four succeeding kings. He was Secretary of State in 1684, which he quitted, and was made a Baron the same year. He was concerned in the scheme laid at lady Portsmouth's, by Barillon and lord Sunderland; and was sent by king James to the Prince of Orange at Hungerford." Tindal.

to the value of 4,000*l.* a year ; though his circumstances were very indifferent. He was a man of great pride, as well as great humour, and set a high value on himself, and expected the same from others. With all this, he had a good understanding, and a great reputation for his conduct in sea affairs. He quitted king James and went over to Holland, and was made lieut. general admiral of the Dutch Fleet, that brought over the king. There were six other commissioners named with him.—Nothing gave a more general satisfaction than the naming of the Judges, the king ordered every privy-counsellor to bring a list of twelve, and out of these, were chosen twelve very learned and worthy Judges. This nomination was generally well received over the nation. The first of these was sir John Holt, made lord chief justice of England, then a young man for so high a post, who maintained it during his whole life, with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, courage and great dispatch. So that since sir Matthew Hale's time, the King's-bench has not been so well filled as it was by him. The rest of the Judges were sir Wm. Dolben, sir Wm. Gregory, and Giles Eyre, justices of the King's-bench ; sir Henry Pollexfen, lord chief justice, and sir John Powel, sir Tho. Rokeby, and Peyton Ventriss, justices of the common pleas ; sir Robert Atkins, lord chief baron, and sir Edward Nevil, Nicholas Lechmere, and John Turton, barons of the exchequer ; and John Trenchard, chief justice of Chester, sir George Treby, attorney general, John Somers, solicitor general, and Henry Powle, master of the Rolls.—All these employments were disposed of at several times within the space of two months. And as Dr. Burnet had been one of the chief promoters of the Revolution, so he was the first ecclesiastic, who reaped the fruits of it, having been elected bishop of Sarum, pursuant to his majesty's Conge D'Elire, on the 9th of March, and consecrated on the 31st of the same month at Fulham, by the bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Landaffe, St. Asaph, and Carlisle, by virtue of a commission from the abp. of Canterbury, who refused to perform the ceremony himself ; and three days after the new bishop was sworn and admitted chancellor of the order of the garter.—In this manner were settled the Court, the Council and the Ministry. As they chiefly consisted of Whigs, the Tories could not but be disgusted as well as some others who had expected a share in the promotions. These last, improving the disaffection and prejudices of the others, a faction was soon formed, which embraced all occasions to oppose and distress the administration. How early this opposition began, will appear in the proceedings of the Convention, which are now going to be related †

* These were the earl of Carbury, sir Michael Wharton, sir Thomas Lee, sir John Chicheley, sir John Lowther of Whitehaven, and Mr. William Sacheverel. This last, who had distinguished himself by several speeches for the bill of exclusion, being little acquainted with maritime affairs, desired the king to excuse him from acting at the admiralty board, on account of his insufficiency. The king replied, ' There are enough who do understand the business, which a man of sense would soon be master of, and he could depend on his integrity.' Sacheverel persisted in excusing himself saying, ' since he was not qualified for the service, he could not in conscience accept the salary.' Oldmixon.

The Convention turned into a Parliament.] The first thing that was judged necessary to be done was to turn the Convention into a Parliament. For it had been already said in the house of commons ; that the Convention not having been called by the king's writs, their acts were not valid. To obviate this objection which might be infused into men's minds, and to avoid the usual delays, occasioned by the calling of a new parliament, and to preserve a great number of members, that were entirely satisfied with the present settlement, the king, the first time he advised with his privy-council, proposed the question to them " Whether the Convention might be legally turned into a Parliament ?" ‡ As there were some in the council, who still adhered to forms, without considering the state of things, the council was divided upon the question, but the majority agreed in the affirmative.

The King's Speech to both Houses.] Feb. 18. Accordingly, this day, the king went in great solemnity to the house of lords, and taking possession of the throne, made the following Speech to both houses :

" My lords and gentlemen ; I have lately told you how sensible I am of your kindness, and how much I value the confidence you have reposed in me. And I am come hither to assure you, that I shall never do any thing that may justly lessen your good opinion of me.—I think it necessary to acquaint you, that the condition of our Allies abroad, and particularly that of Holland, is such, that unless some speedy care be taken of them, they run a greater hazard than you would have them exposed to.—You yourselves must be sensible, that the posture of affairs here require your serious consideration ; and that a good Settlement at home is necessary, not only for your own peace, but for the support of the Protes-

* " Archbishop Sancroft refused to consecrate him, but to avoid a premunire, he granted a commission to any three of the bishops of his province, in conjunction with the bishop of London, to exercise his metropolitical authority during pleasure. Thus, he authorized others to do, what he seemed to think an unlawful act. He was afterwards ashamed of it himself, and sent for the original warrant out of the office, and got it into his own hands." Burnet.

† Tindal's Continuation of Rapin.

‡ See Appendix No. III.

tant interest both here and abroad. And particularly the state of Ireland is such, that the dangers are grown too great to be obviated by any slow methods.—I must leave it to you, to consider of the most effectual ways of preventing the inconveniencies, which may arise by delays, and to judge what forms may be most proper to bring those things to pass for the good of the nation, which I am confident are in all your minds, and which, I on my part shall be always ready to promote.”

This Speech was received with a general applause; and pursuant to the last clause of it, the lords immediately brought in ‘A Bill to remove and prevent all Questions and Disputes concerning the assembling and sitting of this present Parliament:’ which was read twice that afternoon, passed the next day, and sent to the commons for their concurrence.

Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech. Feb. 19. The house went into a grand committee on the King's Speech.

Mr. Medlicot. To prepare ourselves against any foreign invasion, or intestine troubles at home, there will be a necessity of raising Money, which must be done in a parliamentary way. And if we stay to call a new Parliament, it will be too late; therefore I move to turn this Convention into a Parliament. This being not convened in the royal name, I hope formalities will not be insisted upon to lose the substance. Resolving such an assembly into a Parliament is not without reason nor precedent, both formerly and lately. After the death of Wm. the Conqueror, Robert being in Normandy, Wm. Rufus, the second brother, was declared king, by a mutual stipulation betwixt the king and people, in the nature of Magna Charta. In the 12th Ch. 2, a Convention was called at that king's instance when beyond sea: it was called by desire of the king, when at Breda, and after it was convened several Acts passed; some were confirmed by the subsequent parliament, and some not; and those not confirmed were thought valid by the Judges. I infer from thence that the subjects may upon emergencies meet as well as if called formally by writ, when forms cannot be had; and move to have an Act to declare this a Parliament to all intents and purposes.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. We are to consider the king's Speech, &c. for a speedy Settlement of the Nation; and the only way to come at this is a free parliament; and Money being the great matter to consider of, it cannot be raised without a parliament. There are some precedents spoken of, which, if they would at all come up to our case, I should agree to. What is mentioned of Wm. Rufus is mistaken as to the case of a Convention. There was no parliament seven days after he was elected: Lanfranc, abp. of Canterbury, and the rest of the bishops and clergy, were especially concerned in it, and by them he was declared king. As for the precedent spoken of, of the Convention in Ch. 2's time, that Convention was originally a Parliament, and by the seal of that time called to meet in parliament, and had all the formality of the consent of the people; nay, every Act of Confirmation, in the subsequent parliament, styles them a Parliament at their first meeting; they were called by the government in esse at that time, and were returned as such; and to this parliament, before they did any thing, the king signified his approbation of their meeting; and when the king came into England, he called them a Parliament. There was then a king de facto, and a government de facto, and by his consent it is a parliament, and that gives it the virtue of a parliament. The calling it one way or other alters not the case; but the single thing I insist upon is the People's consent. We represent the People to this special purpose; that now, upon king James's withdrawing, we are called hither to supply that defect; and we can proceed no farther, till a Free Parliament with the People's consent be called. If this body may continue to act as a parliament, without breach of elections of the people, I should be for it. It cannot be done unless we break our trust. Therefore as that of Ch. 2 was a Parliament by the king's consent, therefore I move that the king may be advised to issue out new writs to call a parliament.

Mr. Boscawen. I appeal to the house whether Sawyer be mistaken, or no, in several things he has said. I will say farther, that the People, who sent us hither, do not only assert the Government, but would have us prevent running back from whence we came; and now that we are got to the top of the hill not to let all fall! I have not contributed to invade the liberties of the people, and am as far from it as that gentleman. But that Convention which brought in Ch. 2 was not so much a Parliament as this Convention. A Parliament is nothing but parler le ment. That parliament was called by some members included, and some excluded, the Long Parliament, by the Seal from the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and then with such limitations, that such and such were only to be returned, as if they were taking tests; none that had been engaged in the king's party during the war, nor the sons of them, unless they had given testimony of their affections to the government; which renders that parliament as far from freedom of choice, as white is from black. And in the Bill for Triennial Parliaments, the chancellor was of course to issue out writs, and for defect of his issuing them out, the officers of the country were to do it by themselves; from whence I gather, that there is no such essential thing as a Writ for chusing Members. If you take the advice of the learned gentleman (Sawyer) to call another parliament, and dissolve this, Ireland may be lost; and the king of France would give 100,000*l.* to accomplish it. I am jealous there is a snake hid in the grass, and that there is something more in this, than we see. Consider, if this be no Parliament, then you may suppose that the Throne never was vacant, and that it is now full; and how will you get a parliament? and some look on the other side of the water. Upon the whole, I would consider the relief of Ireland, and to assist Holland, which has helped to preserve us, and take up this debate for the present. No other design can be in this, but to put us all to stand upon our guard again, and fight out our way, and be upon no bottom: if we retract, and go so far as is moved, we shall be all ruined, and go back again to our misfortunes.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am not of Boscawen's mind. I hope I may say I never did any thing to infringe the Liberties of the People; and though the wind has been in my face, gentlemen that were never in the parliament before know, whither this matter may be carried. In the two last reigns, there was making distinctions of persons here; we were reproached that we voted against the king, when we gave our votes freely according to our judgments, and that, by these practices, we represented but part of the people, and not the whole nation. I meant no otherwise than that the king should govern well. I brought in the Habeas Corpus Bill, and what I say now is with my conscience and mind. As to what is now in debate, I hope we may have a free-chosen Parliament in 25 days, the formality of 40 days from the test of the writ to the election not being necessary. In the Assembly at London before this Convention, the proposition was, how the prince of Orange might come to a free Parliament. It was advised, that Letters should be sent from the Prince into the counties and boroughs, &c. in order to the choice of a Free Parliament; and I gave my voice for it preparatory to that: and since it has been voted here, that the Throne was vacant, I am satisfied, though I was then against it. I question whether, upon this change, our alliances do subsist against that great monster the French king, who invades the Hollanders. I hope the Revenue, which is 2,200,000*l.* may support Ireland. When you met the 22d of Jan. and proposed that the Prince should have the Administration of the Government, you omitted one great thing; viz. to advise him to possess himself of the Revenue. I propose now that all the Revenue of James 2 may be used by the king, and there will be no fear of running back from whence we came, as you have been told; but by not calling a Parliament, we put all to hazard, and that the Money we shall raise will not be paid; and will the Judges in Westminster-Hall declare this to be a Parliament? I sat in the parliament of 1660, which had qualifications from the members, but they were not observed. It was summoned in March to meet the 25th of April. Here was then a king de jure kept out by wilful means. The Convention, in 1660, had Letters from the king, who recognized them a Parliament, and it was never called a Convention by the king, nor by any act of parliament; and the Acts afterwards ran 'Whereas by act of parliament, &c.' Lord chief justice Hale, who sat in that parliament, was of opinion, it was a Parliament, and that they were under the trust of the People, and the writs that called us, were not called 'no writs;' and if you make this a Parliament, you elude the Prince's Declaration, which says, 'No Money to be raised but by Parliament.' Can it have any other meaning than that writs shall be issued out to chuse a parliament; and shall we give occasion to say that the king enters into the government by prerogative, and our parting with our Privileges? It has been said, 'How can we have a Free Parliament chosen in time? The necessity of affairs cannot bear it.' I can consent to an Ordinance, or any declaratory instrument, that the Oaths and Test ought to be taken by members, before admitted: and when a Free Parliament shall meet, I doubt not but they will ratify what we shall do; and now, that there is a Revenue for the present necessity of affairs, and a new Great Seal now made to issue out writs of summons, who would put this upon a mere point, whether this be a parliament, or not?

Debate on the Bill for preventing Doubts concerning the assembling and sitting of this Parliament.] This day, a Bill was sent from the lords to prevent all doubts and disputes, which may arise concerning the assembling and sitting of this present Parliament; which was read the first time.

Mr. Hampden. I hope this bill will tend to your Settlement. I observe, the lords make it more frequent to read bills twice in a day than here. The house of commons are always strict to their Order; and I would not be thrust on by the lords to hasten the reading this bill. I move, that it may be read again to-morrow morning.—Which was ordered.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I see gentlemen speak here under great disadvantages. If they are not free in this Convention, what shall we do in Parliament! When gentlemen speak with reflections, and cry, 'hear him, hear him,' they cannot speak with freedom. I speak not this to the Chair (the Speaker) who keeps order well, but to what passed at the committee. Shall you put it into the power of the lords to lay aside any of your debates, by sending you a bill down? I would not remove land-marks to posterity. If you are satisfied that this is not a pretended necessity, but really; not in name, as the Ship-Money was made, of necessity, which disturbed all your laws, I would have you leave the chair, and go into a Grand Committee, for freedom of debate, to establish our security upon a good foundation. It is not 4 or 500 votes can do it; but to arrive at the knowledge of this matter, I desire to go into a Grand Committee.

Sir Henry Capel. The Chair has taken care of order; and I have seen no disorder to-day. When Seymour was in the Chair, I have heard 'Hear him, hear him,' often said in the house. Seymour says, 'He would not have us tied up by the lords to what they do.' I take it, the lords and commons are to take care of the government, and we ought to agree with the lords as soon as we can. Had the committee begun upon Heads, we might have gone on; but by degrees we are gone into the matter of the lords Bill. Seymour told you, 'That it was necessity that first brought on the Ship-money;' but it was the practice of ill ministers and lawyers, who turned old Rolls to ill interpretation against the Liberties of the People. If ever there was a necessity to warrant making us a Parliament, there is one now. Are we in Peace? Is the state of Christendom in so good a case as we can boast of? Seymour tells you of 'the Great Man of War.' If you sit not here as a Parliament, the king of France will give millions to make a separation in the nation.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am called up by what fell from Capel about Peace, &c. I hear no war declared yet, but I would put nothing to hazard: You may have a Parliament in three weeks; and we are better justified in that than any other method. The Revenue for the present will supply Ireland. We have forces already in pay, besides those the king brought in. I am glad to see so many worthy persons promoted to dignities; and I believe they will preserve our privileges. But as to the method lately taken, to make distinctions, and to be pointed at in Westminster-Hall, as one of 150 against the Throne vacant; to have printed papers of men of one side and the other: yea, the Peers, —I hope the gentlemen of the council will prevent these distinctions.

Mr. Hampden. We are collaterally launching into what is not resolved on by the house; to talk of the formality of calling a Parliament in less than 40 days—But pray keep your own formalities. The motion to adjourn the debate must properly be put; or put any thing regularly, and I will serve you to an 'And' and an 'I.' If you debate this, you would all day long debate what you resolve not, viz. Whether you will debate it, or not.

Sir Rob. Howard. You have already resolved to read the lords Bill to-morrow, and then the proper debate will arise that you are upon to-day. I have heard no arguments to-day to discourage the debate. We are obliged to read the lords Bill a second time. Put the question for adjournment.

Sir Rd. Temple. I hope we may arrive at all the ends that any gentleman can desire. To-morrow, at the Grand Committee, you will have all the freedom of debate you can desire; and I would not anticipate the debate till it be regularly before you. But it is a strange thing I hear from Sawyer, 'That we cannot speak for the Bill at the first reading,' which you may throw out. Is it not a hard thing to speak against it, and not for it?

Sir C. Musgrave. Gentlemen tell you, that the question is, Whether adjourn, or not? but with great submission, I affirm, Reasons may be given why you should not adjourn. You are told, 'When you read the Bill to-morrow, you have the same liberty as now;' but then your Bill is to be committed by a question, and that is gaining the point. The point, then, is only agreeing with the committee; but when it comes to the house, you may throw it out, or not. It is a matter of the greatest consideration, that there should be freedom in debate. Some men can declare their thoughts at one time; others are not so happy, but must speak oftener. If, then, it be necessary to speak twice, God forbid but a gentleman should do it! But if not, no man here can believe you are inclined to make this a free Parliament. I would proceed to the consideration of the king's Speech.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I speak to order. It is not the lords Bill you are upon by order; it is the king's Speech, and you cannot restrain it.

Feb. 20. Sir Henry Capel delivered a Message from the king, to hasten the matters before the house recommended in his Speech. After a long silence, Lord Falkland. The last part of the king's Speech ought to be considered first, as I take it. If we have not the power of a parliament, we can go upon nothing. There are precedents to justify the lords Bill that they have sent us. We have great works upon our hands; as that of the Relief of Ireland, and to assist our Allies, &c. and the Nation is in an unsettled condition. The lords Bill is a foundation for us to build upon: and I move, that we may follow the lords example.

Mr. Howe. We have had learned discourses upon this subject yesterday, and precedents were brought us. If the matter arise upon what is law, I shall not speak to that part, nor what has been done formerly, but to what is fit now. I respect our ancestors, who always followed the necessity of affairs. It is unreasonable in a sick man not to take any physic but what has been prescribed him formerly. We are come out of the greatest tide; and, to prevent the danger, let us throw a good defence against it; but if we cannot make a perfect one, it is our malicious enemies that throw it down. The French king was so formerly, and our own late king, a Papist now in France. There is a certain sort of loyalty, called 'Passive Obedience,' preached by some of our Clergy, who would pick holes in our bank to keep out the tide. They say, 'Necessity has no law;' let us make one for it, and agree to the lords Bill.

Serj. Maynard. I do not wonder that men are silent in a matter of so great consequence. On the consequence of this debate to-day will not only be the safety of the nation, but the Protestant Religion abroad. We make not a step, but we are told of errors in the method, still to put a stop to it. Here has been a great ado about words, 'the Crown vacant,' and 'Abdication.' And we have been told what the People were, and 'that we must look to our safety' (by Sawyer;) but you are past all these; and now you are moved to make this Convention a Parliament; but I think we are one already. What is a Parliament, but king, lords, and commons? Pray read the 1 chap. of 12 Ch. 2. When the king came in, that Convention (or call it what you will) Resolved, 'That, without a writ from the king, they are a Parliament,' notwithstanding they had no writ from the king. It is grounded upon the greatest law in the world, the law of the 12 Tables of the Romans: 'Salus populi suprema lex esto.' All laws must give place to that law: It is the great law of all, self-preservation. Now read that statute of the 25th of April.—[The Statute was read.] When the king came in, the 20th of May, the parliament had no writ to call them. We sat here, before this king was declared, and we are so far like that parliament. I shall hearken to the debate, and give my opinion.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would not trouble you, but that I find you entirely at leisure. Says Maynard, 'You cannot make this a parliament, because you are one already from the beginning.' If nobody be against it, pray let the Speaker take the chair.

Sir Rob. Howard. Here seems a general satisfaction in what has been said: therefore report it to the Chair.

Sir Edw. Seymour. If I were satisfied this was a Parliament, I would not go about to offer reasons against it. If I am put on that stress, to say my opinion, I will not justly move to exceptions. If I do not fully come up to their sense, I hope they will give me their pardon, as I shall do to them. If you concluded 'the Vacancy of the Throne,' I am concluded by it. For the preservation of the Protestant Religion, those ways are most prudent that are most legal and lasting. This Bill from the lords began there; on Monday it was twice read, and came down here on Tuesday: it is a great rarity, and much done in little time; and I never saw a Bill of so different a nature. It makes every man in as high a nature criminal as the law can make it. You declare yourselves a Parliament, and the law says, you are not a parliament; and so we are all liable to the statute of the Tests, and all incapacitated to sit here: and, then, those who were for dispensing with the Penal Laws, and joined in those things, you bring yourselves under the same capacity. I would have the gentlemen of the long robe tell you, whether if you declare yourselves a Parliament, you are not liable to the statute? When it is neither legal nor prudential to do it, whether then is it necessary? That Statute, which Maynard mentioned, could not make that a parliament which was none before. That parliament had the consent of the king de facto and de jure; there wanted only the king's writ of summons. If they say, you were no parliament before, what record will make you a parliament now, is no where to be found. The law requires, that the sheriff return the jury of nisi prius, and the criminal, &c. who are not always the best men of the county. Suppose the bench impannel the best men in it, there is the substance, the judge, and the bench, but there is not the form. Necessity is a great commander, but an ill companion, and a worse counsellor. And this house must expect, in other cases, never to want that argument. Some precedents have been spoken of, to induce this method; one of Wm. Rufus, (which is of no authority to govern you) how the nobles did assist him against his brother Robert, who claimed the crown; but that was no parliament, nor had the power of a parliament. The only precedents mentioned are those of Wm. Rufus, and the 12th of Charles 2. They made not themselves a Parliament, but in relation to the Long Parliament that dissolved itself, and that done with a 'ne trahatur in exemplum.' When the people are called together, by such writ as this, I am bold to say, there are no precedents. It has been said, out of doors, this is by the precedent of Edw. 3. I find that matter totally mistaken: Edw. 2. was driven out of the kingdom by his son and his mother: he absconded, and by a wind was driven into Wales, and her son was custos regni. And the first act of Edw. 3. does declare, 'That, whereas the late lord Edw. 2. by the general advice and assent of his earls and barons, had voluntarily removed himself out of the realm, they declare Edw. 3. regent of the realm.' I would not, as other gentlemen say, stick at precedents, and think that you are as well qualified to make precedents as to follow others. Yet, there is no necessity to remove ancient land-marks, and to let our purses run out at the back-door. Our condition is attended with many difficulties; Ireland is in ill condition, and we hear nothing from Scotland but uncertainty. The king of France has been the Devil and walking Ghost in every parliament. What could you expect from Ireland? They will own no obedience to the Prince of Orange, but when he is crowned. They are so far from coming to you, that they are driven from you. The person (Hamilton*)

* "Lieut. Gen. Hamilton was sent over to Ireland. He was a Papist, but was believed to be a man of honour, and had great interest with the earl of Tyrconnel. So he undertook to go over to Ireland, and to prevail with the earl of Tyrconnel to deliver up the government; and promised that he would either bring him to it, or that he would come back, and give an account of his negotiation. This step had a very ill effect; for before Hamilton came to Dublin, the earl of Tyrconnel was in such despair, looking on all as lost, that he seemed to be very near a full resolution of entering on a treaty to get the best terms he could. But Hamilton's coming changed him quite. He represented to him, that things were turning fast in England in favour of the king; so that, if he stood firm, all would come round again. He saw, that he must study to manage this so dexterously, as to gain as much time as he could, that so the prince might not make too much haste, before a Fleet and Supplies might was so far from bringing them over to obedience, that he makes it his endeavour to keep them from you. I speak with good intention to the Protestant Religion in Ireland, which is in danger to be gone with him. Through all the course of my life, I had rather have unkindness than carry on an ill thing about me. A great many preliminaries ought to be thought of; you will not think fit that England should be at all the charge to reduce Ireland: you know formerly there were Adventurers, and you may raise a great deal of money that way. There are two ways to reduce Ireland; present supply of arms and money; but, if not, such as will preserve you, and master them: they will be masters of whatever you send, if you attempt, and fail in the attempt; and it will be hard to reduce it after. I speak this, not thinking there is a necessity for Money to carry it on. The present Revenue will go a great way towards it, together with the public security; and no doubt but loyal London will supply their Prince upon this exigency, and will supply fully, rather than let the work stand still. We are called as a Council, and may so continue; for we have no declared enemy, and are in a condition of peace till war be declared; and there is none, and we have no league. Can we require any thing to be done, before the king be civilly dead, and parties not in being? I speak not this to reflect on him that has done so much for us. I would not only have him paid the charge he has been at, but have come from France. So several letters were wrote over by the same management, giving assurances, that the earl of Tyrconnel was fully resolved to treat and submit. And, to carry this farther, two Commissioners were sent from the Council-board to France. Their Instructions were to represent to the king the necessity of Ireland's submitting to England. Tyrconnel pretended that, in honour, he could do no less than disengage himself to his master before he laid down the government. Yet he seemed resolved not to stay for an answer or a consent; but that, as soon as this Message was delivered, he would submit upon good conditions: and for these, he knew, he should have all that he asked. With this management he gained his point, which was much time; and he now fancied, that the honour of restoring the king would belong chiefly to himself. Thus Hamilton, by breaking his own faith, secured the earl of Tyrconnel to the king, and this gave the beginning to the war of Ireland. Those who had advised the sending over of Hamilton, were much out of countenance; and it was believed that it had a terrible effect on sir Wm. Temple's son, who had raised in the Prince a high opinion of Hamilton's honour. Soon after that, he, who had no other visible cause of melancholy besides this, went into a boat on the Thames, near the bridge, where the river runs most impetuously, and leaped into the river, and was drowned." Burnet.

England's bounty too to go along with him. England has done formerly for Holland, as Holland has done now for England. But I should be glad to see us a legal Parliament, that we may have the people's hearts along with us; and then we shall be sure of their Money. As a Council, we may sit, and represent to the king, that we are not impowered by those that sent us, and desire him to issue out writs to chuse a parliament. The Revenue last year was 2,100,000 and odd pounds; the expences 1,800,000*l.*; a large proportion of it to the Fleet; many Pensions, and for Secret Service; I hope we shall hear no more of that: besides the Privy Purse 150,000*l.* You have sufficient for all your difficulties, and need not turn yourselves into a Parliament for that. In the Palatinate War, you had a committee to manage it. And you may have time to digest all for Ireland, and writs may go out. In the mean time, we may sit as a Council, and this will bring us into no difficulties. I have delivered my opinion, and now do what you please.

Serj. Maynard. If Seymour speaks confusedly, I must answer him confusedly. He seems to speak with great reason at first sight; but, looked into, it is just nothing. I will answer him to what is material as well as my old memory will run along with him. 'When we cannot have a legal parliament, how shall we possess that which is legal?' He spoke of the Statute, &c. and Tests: the objection is true; no parliament can sit here, till they have taken the Oaths and Tests: but, under favour, that will not come to our case; that Oath was to the late king, and now, what oath can we take to a king out of the throne? You remember what he did, and your Vote upon it. Can we swear still? I hold it impossible to take that oath, and that act does cease of itself. I do not say we make ourselves a parliament. But if this be declared a parliament by a parliament of the whole nation, who dares say against it? It is impossible to take the Oath of Allegiance, without being perjured ipso facto. I would have Seymour answer me, as I do him: shall I swear to an impossibility? A man in a wilderness, and out of his way, asks, Where is the high-way? That gentleman cries, where is the Law? When we cannot find it, we must have recourse to the law of nations. Salus populi suprema lex esto. Says Seymour, 'There is no necessity to make this a Parliament; there is no king, nor any declared enemy beyond sea:' but he that would destroy his own people for Religion, I am sure, is no friend of ours. Is he not an enemy that receives all that go from us in discontent? I would not have you entangled with a fine speech; I hope we shall not farther dispute upon words, as we have done some weeks, but necessity puts us upon the best way we can take. All the event of this will be to make a difference betwixt the lords and us. I will not say it is Seymour's intent, but what greater difference can there be than when the lords say we are a parliament, and we shall say, we are not a parliament? There is a great danger in sending out writs at this time, if you consider what a ferment the nation is in; and I think the clergy are out of their wits; and, I believe, if the clergy should have their wills, few or none of us should be here again; and never any Popish prince but would not only be the destruction of the Protestant Religion, but the Protestants must go to pot; as in France, Bohemia, and Hungary; and all by the instigation of the Clergy. What is a Parliament then? The Convention was not called by the king's writs legally, yet were declared a parliament; and you will not declare yourselves no parliament, unless you are out of your wits.

Mr. Eyre. The matter you are upon is of great consequence; therefore I hope you will pursue those counsels which tend most to peace. The way to those ends is full of difficulties. I shall not meddle with politic considerations (with Seymour) but the proper matter now before you. The objections against the lords Bill return upon them that made them. If we are not constituted a Parliament under these circumstances now, we may never have one in England more—13 Ch. 2, 'No Members are to sit till they have taken the oaths by the statute 5 Eliz.; and the oaths not taken voids the election:' then all those elections were void; unless those acts are repealed, how will you ever come by it? Must not the next parliament make themselves one by a law? But if a false step must be made, why should it not be by us, whilst our wounds yet bleed, and not leave it to another body of men to heal, six weeks hence, and the wound past remedy? Being to build as of old, with weapons in our hands, as the Jews did, I would not lay them down till we have built in security. We are in an infant government, if I may so style it; it must be preserved by the hand that brought it up. Are we sure our successors will be of our mind? Nay, the present ferment of the nation, which time may quiet, may be so hot as to give up their own security. The present necessity is great, as great as the support of our honour, religion, and country—necessity abrogates all laws. The precedents of this, that are demanded, are not to be expected: it is not in every king's reign that he abdicates the government. As to the precedents of Edw. 2, and Rd. 2, none of these come to our case immediately: necessity gave them a sanction; and where there is the same necessity, there is the same reason. We are as full a Representative as can be had; by the call of the Prince's Letters, we have the best Representative of the People that could be had. Is the difference of a writ and a letter put into the scale with the safety of the Protestant Religion? We may 'pay tythe of mint, anise and cummin, and neglect the greater matters of the law.' Tares may be sown whilst we are absent; which to prevent, and bring forth peace, so luckily brought to the birth, I would have the lords Bill read a second time.

VOL. V.

Sir Robert Sawyer. As to what Maynard said with reflection on the Clergy, I desire to take off that reflection. They have as great a submission to your Vote as can be. I speak of the clergy of Cambridge. I had a letter from Cambridge yesterday, (the place I serve for) which gives me notice, that they are very well satisfied with what you have done; and if they had time, they would have petitioned for a Parliament to be chosen; and I have authority from them to let you know they are to give Money to support the government; and I know how to give my vote. The oaths must be taken, or else all we have done is void; therefore whether you will do it now like those in authority.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I stand up with great trouble. As I am now advised, if this Convention be turned into a Parliament, it is the greatest disservice you can to the king. I would preserve both his honour and safety. If any thing be wanting in the Revenue, nothing can supply it but a parliament. You may have a parliament in 25 days; 1,200,000*l.* may be raised for Ireland and Holland, all the charge of the government, and for provision for the royal family. We may spare a million, if such a sum be requisite, to assist us for the present, and for other things they may keep cold for a month. If this be so, we are not in such danger as to fly out of the window. Some things necessity has drawn us into; those are of the least necessity; but to raise Money is the greatest thing. I hope it is that the king expects from us, and that we are not trusted to do by those that sent us. In the reign of Ch. 2, the parliament did settle a Revenue on the king's two brothers; the officers of the revenue told us, that it was not 200,000*l.* a year. A great man told a story, that a sum of money was paid, and wanted a crown; the party would have told their Money, but the other would not let him. They would not let the committee then examine it, for certainly they would have found it more. Where there is a necessity to give, I will give as plentifully as any body, but let us do it fairly, and by full authority. As we are, we shall have no credit upon it; when we come again we may be a lawful parliament; and I believe the people will send you again. A merry man said once in this house, 'Some can stop and turn managed horses.' As for the Clergy of London, they are as learned as any since the time of the Apostles. The Church of England brought us in Ch. 2, and stood constant in these last trials. I ever thought those laws too hard to press mens consciences. They stood like Apostles in Magdalen College case, which is remarkable. I hope the vacant bishoprick of Salisbury* will be filled with one of that College. Salus Populi is suprema lex, you are told, but if ever you break down the hedges of the government —And properly we cannot agree with the lords.

* Vacant by the death of bishop Ward. Dr. Burnet was advanced to it.

Serj. Maynard. There is only one question to be insisted on, whether we are a Parliament, and what we shall do when we are a Parliament? Clarges speaks honestly, as I believe he thinks. As for the Clergy, I have much honour for high and low of them, but I must say they are in a ferment, there are Pluralists among them, and when they should preach the Gospel, they preach against the Parliament, and the law of England. I did not speak against the clergy in general.

Col. Birch. I have heard a debate of this nature 40 years ago, and I stand amazed at it: I will not bring the precedents of Edw. 2, and Hen. 4, to justify our proceedings, but what I remember of my knowledge. I hope we shall not fall under this debate now, and not 40 years ago, when we were under much harder circumstances, when any little words dropt then, about the validity of that parliament, they were smiled at, and not worth an answer. When Oliver was proposed to be made a king here, that was laughed at then; and I believe this debate will be so now. I intreat a little of your patience; that parliament of 1660 was not so clearly called as this. Cavaliers were excluded by those that had power to do it, and they did it. It was called by writ from the keepers of the liberties of England, that brought us hither. Then all the learned gentlemen here, sir Matthew Hale and the rest, were of opinion, it was a Parliament to all intents and purposes, and nothing of a Convention was spoken of; and to work they went, and very vigorously, and not one question was made of the legality of that writ, and that parliament gave two assessments of 60,000*l.* per mensem, before that Act came in to declare it a Parliament; but there was a great deal more done before the king came in, all the acts that could be done that were necessary, and if one word was spoken against it, it was smiled at. That objection about the Oaths has some weight; but in that parliament of 1660 not an oath was taken: about six weeks after, the duke of Ormond gave the oaths to the members, which was far from any regularity; and at the opening that parliament, there were not above eight or nine lords in the house. There was a Fast ordered, and a Thanksgiving, and conferences with the lords, and not one word of questioning the validity of that parliament; and now that God has done this for us, to make difficulties when really there is none, I cannot see them, from what has been practised. Now, to show you the consequence; for Money should you stay for another parliament, if you get one in three weeks, a plot may be upon you, in the interim, and then you will have difficulties still, and perhaps more than are on you now. And will you, by throwing away this opportunity, void all the blessings God has given you? You have, by God's providence, a king that denies you nothing, and now we would be scrambling again for Religion. I see a wheel within a wheel in these things. I would look on the wheel within my eye. But suppose another parl. (it seems) must have the thanks for what has been done, and not you; they must be the white boys. You have it before you, go on, make your prince love you; but it seems you shall not do it, and a succeeding parliament must make a fine hand of this work for you. When once May comes, it will not be pleasant sitting here. Many worthy gentlemen formerly have lost their lives by it. Great revolutions may be in one year—and you are lost for your Allies, Religion, and all you have. This over-runs all; think on this seriously, and go forward with heart and hand: God has done it all; let us not throw it down again. From the best of precedents, that of 1660, you are a Parliament; you make not yourselves a parliament. Pray go on and read the lords bill.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think we are a much better parliament than that of 1660. I would know where the writ was then that called the lords? Parliaments are not the same things they were from the beginning; they have had variations. Was not the Prince of Orange invested with legal authority by you? And the returns of us hither recorded? If you are not a parliament, how can you represent the people in a parliamentary manner, and then what becomes of your Instrument of Government, and what else you have done? The laws against Popery, and the Test, were made when you had no prospect of king James's abdication; and where were the Oaths of Allegiance, &c. when these gentlemen went in to the Prince? I believe the people like you so well, they will either send you again or better. Clarges has told you, you cannot raise Money, and, at the same time, tells you, the Revenue may be raised for present use. We are told of relief of Ireland; and what next must be told? You are no Parliament, and you raise the king's Revenue. The king may search for his Revenue, and will find it no more legal than now, and no oaths taken—I say that you are and were a Parliament, from the beginning.

Sir Rd. Temple. I shall offer something not yet touched upon. Has any man said yet we are not a full and free Representative? Formalities are wanting, you are told, but they are such as could not be had; your elections were as free as ever. No precedent was ever of a freer. In the parliament of 1660, there were qualifications for the members, and the lords were not called by writ, and (a greater thing,) a Commonwealth called it, which was quite another government. There was a time when parliaments met without writs, and king John's was the first called by Letters, as now, and nobody having showed any thing against the authority that called you, I will not labour it. In Henry 4th's time, the same parliament was called again, and they raised Money. When the Assembly of Lords and Commons met, the prince said 'he would advise with them of the best manner to call a free Parliament;' and they advised him to send his Letters. Have not you done the greatest thing, and now stumble at the less? How you can justify all you have done, if you are not a Parliament called in as good a manner as could be, admits no answer.

Sir Wm. Williams. It is strange we should be here a month, and now question whether we are a Parliament. If we are called by all the power of England a Parliament, then certainly we are so. Taking it for granted that you could not have such a writ as is usual, can you be better called? I am sorry there should now be such a debate. If you say you are no parliament, you immediately pass judgment against yourselves; you make yourselves the greatest fools, and something else, and act like children; you have acted without call, and all you have done is void. It will be a strange question upon your books.

Sir Henry Capel. I would encourage and assist this king that desires to live with parliaments. Leave him not alone six weeks, but let it not be upon your books that there is any question upon this matter.

Mr. Pollerfen. I can say no more than what has been mentioned. That nothing may appear on your books on this occasion, put the question for the Speaker to take the chair.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think you cannot put the question for the chair. If you consult the order, it is about nothing of the Bill from the lords, but only 'to consider the king's Speech.' That is all I have to say at present.

Mr. Boscamen. I agree, we can take no notice of the lords Bill at the committee; you are only to consider the king's Speech, and I desire to-morrow you will go upon it. And when the Speaker is in the chair, you may call for the lords Bill.

Sir Tho. Lee. Many without doors discourse so much of difference in opinion here in this matter, that I would therefore have the question on the books.

Sir George Treby. I am fully satisfied that you are a Parliament. For the honour of the house, declare you are a parliament; though not for the honour of those that opposed it, yet for yours. If you consider the prince's advice, in his Letter, he described a parliament; whoever denies us to be a parliament, denies there is either king, or lords, and commons. Declare yourselves one, and you will do yourselves right, and defeat the designs of your enemies.

Mr. Godolphin. I am sorry to differ from several in this great assembly. I have heard it said, 'If this be not a parliament originally, we cannot make ourselves one.' I believe those who sent me hither, have given me no such authority. I believe we are well chosen, but only for a particular purpose; which purpose we have accomplished. I am afraid, if gentlemen look into the Returns by which they sit, they will find they have no such form as the old Returns, [and reads his own Return] which is thus, 'according to the annexed Order and Letter,' which is in order to call a free and legal parliament. If the gentlemen of the robe will give it under their hands that this is a Parliament, I will agree; (the crown, I believe, is worthily placed) but if I am not satisfied in my conscience and judgment that this is a parliament, I must be excused for my negative. To have every body well satisfied, your best way is to fasten the king by a legal parliament. Before you leave the chair, put a question to establish the Revenue; and that the king may have power to charge it for present emergency, sit and prepare matters for another parliament.

Sir George Treby. The main thing that sticks with this gentleman, Godolphin, is the authority of his borough, and Sawyer had his authority by last night's post. If Godolphin will let me read that part of his Return he has not, if it imports he is a member of parliament, he is one, though possibly, he was not so sensible of it before. [He reads the words in English, translated, in the Return.] Here is the plainest authority to chuse the member by the Letter, and all authority contained in the Return that can be, and I hope this gentleman will now concur.

Sir Robert Howard. One thing has been omitted; we are all for a Parliament, and yet speak against it. All would have us be doing with Money. And if Godolphin's borough sent him to treat about Money, and we are not a Parliament, he has the largest commission I ever heard of.

*The Convention voted a Parliament.] Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this com-

* "The commons agreeing to the Bill, it received the royal assent, and the Convention was from that time called the Parliament. This Act was to commence from the 13th of Feb. the day on which the royal dignity was accepted by the king and queen, and instead of the old Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, the new oaths were enjoined to be taken by all the members of each house, from, and after the 1st of March next ensuing. Accordingly, a day was set for the call of both houses, and for requiring the members to take the oaths. Upon the passing this Act, several members who had before protested, that they would neither submit to the decisions of such a parliament, nor sit in it, absented themselves, and retired into the country on frivolous pretences. And when the time came for the members to take the oaths, though they were refused by few or none of the commons, several lords, both spiritual and temporal, would not take them. As the duke of Newcastle, the earls of Clarendon, Lichfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford, and the lords Griffin, Stawel, and one or two more: these were all, at several times, summoned to attend the house, but most of them continued absent. The spiritual lords that absented themselves were Sancroft abp. of Canterbury, Turner bishop of Ely, Lake of Chichester, Ken of Bath and Wells, White of mittee, That the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, now sitting at Westminster, are the two houses of parliament." Which Resolution was agreed to by the house.

Debate on the King's Speech.] Feb. 25. The commons went into a Grand Committee on the king's Speech.

Sir Thomas Clarges. We have great obligation to Holland; but I believe in ten days time we shall have an Account. The condition

Peterborough, (these were five of the seven bishops sent to the Tower by king James) Lloyd of Norwich, Thomas of Worcester, and Frampton of Gloucester. Sancroft had been archbishop ever since the year 1676. He was a man of solemn deportment, and considerably learned. He lived abstracted from company, and was fixed in the old maxims of high loyalty. He was named in the Ecclesiastical Commission by king James, but would never go to that court, nor declare against it, though he thought it illegal. He joined in the Petition against reading king James's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience. He met the privy-counsellors at Guildhall, and invited the Prince of Orange to take the government upon him, but refused to go with the rest of the bishops to welcome him to St. James's, though he had once agreed to it. When the Convention met the 29th of January, he came not to take his place among them. He resolved neither to act for nor against king James's interest, which was thought very unbecoming in one of his high station. For since he believed, as afterwards appeared, that the nation was running into treason, rebellion and perjury, it was strange to see him, who was at the head of the Church, sit silent all the while, and not so much as declare his opinion by speaking, voting, or protesting. But he was a poor spirited and fearful man, and acted a mean part in the whole affair of the Revolution. He went on afterwards in the same unactive state, still refusing the Oaths, but neither acting nor speaking, except in great confidence, to any against their taking them. Thomas and Lake, who both died soon after, like the archbishop, never came to the house of lords. When the other five withdrew from the parliament, that they might recommend themselves by a show of moderation, some of them moved for a Bill of Toleration, and another of Comprehension, whereby all moderate Presbyterians might be reconciled to the Church of England, and admitted to ecclesiastical benefices. These bills were drawn and offered by the earl of Nottingham, for which he received the thanks of the house. From this time may be dated the rise of the Non-jurors, who, rejecting the notion of a king de jure and a king de facto, as well as all other distinctions, and limitations, strictly adhered to the principle of the divine right of kings, and were the authors of all the plots and conspiracies against the new settlement, which they refused to acknowledge." Tindal.

of Holland is, they are at war with the greatest power in the world. I would know the condition of our Alliance with them; perhaps we shall enlarge it. I would not be hood-winked. I would fully know it, and I hope we shall give sound and good advice. Though Holland has done great things for us, and though Holland is first in the king's Speech, I believe it an inadvertency. Ireland goes nearest us, and of the greatest consideration. I would know the condition of Ireland; which is not to be done without a clear representation of it exposed to us, and I care not how soon it may be. I fear to-morrow will be too soon, the king being at Hampton Court.

Mr. Hampden. I was not at the first part of the debate, but it seems to tend to the king's Speech, which declares his desire that you would consider of Alliances abroad, and of Ireland, which relates not only to our being, but our well being. It is said by Clarges, 'he would have an explanation of the king's Speech.' The king is not in town; but what use of it, if he were in town? You have his Speech, but if you would have particulars day after day, you will have no use of it; but whether will the state of affairs bear your particular consideration? I am not moving for Money, but whether you will have a long series of affairs, now every body expects its action. Your friends are afraid, and your enemies laugh at delay. But if any man moves for Aid, then, by order, you must appoint a day to consider of it. I wish with all my heart the house would consider of an Aid to the king, and I hope it will be for the honour of the king, and the nation, as much as can be, and I move you will consider it to-morrow.

Sir Tho. Clarges. There is nothing yet before you to answer that motion. I am as forward as any body to aid the king, but we are not proper for that till the State of the Revenue be brought in and exposed to you, which may do sufficiently. The long robe are of opinion, that the king is invested with it, and in possession of it, and holds it jure coronæ. I know in last king James's time, the first thing spoken of in parliament was Aids, though I know heretofore Aids used to be the last. I hope we shall not be told we want affections to the king, but I would go by the steps our ancestors have trod in. I would know what the Revenue is, and then the uses to put it to. Ireland will cost so much, and Holland so many men and ships; when the Charge is before you, we shall know our measures, and till it is clear to us that there is an use of Aid, it is not at all proper to consider it; therefore I move to adjourn this to Wednesday.

Mr. Pilkington. I move that, without delay, we may speedily fall on consideration of the king's Speech, suitable to what the parliament is called together for.

Mr. Howe. I am well pleased we should consider the relief of Ireland, but our affairs at home fright us more than those abroad; the old Army is rather grown worse than mended.

I have a letter from my corporation (Cirencester) that the soldiers quartered there, will not let the people make bonfires at proclaiming the king, and they are not checked by their officers. If you give pay to the officers, it is not convenient the soldiers should have pay to cut our throats. Let the Army be in the hands of those the king may trust, and then give Money. The letter acquaints me, with all the terror that can be expressed, that the soldiers are so insolent there, that, contrary to the interest of the king and queen, they proclaim king James. It is time to prevent these insolences. They drank king William's and queen Mary's Damnation. I believe the justices will not redress this. The Clergy are got into cabals, and they would not appear at the Proclamation. I believe the black coats, and the red coats, to be the grievances of the nation. I would willingly satisfy the poor people I represent.

Sir Wm. Williams. If you will consider the king's Speech, you have fair room to debate on Aids, and, what belongs to it, the quantity and consideration of the Revenue. War and peace we meddle not with; we are only to supply it. How far the Revenue was settled on the late king, whether all or part vested in him by law, is fit to be considered. If there be a defect, it may be supplied by act of parliament; it is not fit to leave these things in the dark. When that is done you may consider of Aids, without going upon it hastily. But to say, that time will not stay for it. I am as much for haste as any body, but to justify myself to my country, we cannot come at this matter without knowing whether you will continue the Revenue, or reverse all the last parliament did. I am for supporting the king, both at home and abroad, in what fairly may be done, and all these things come naturally out for the king and country.

Resolved, "That the house will to-morrow morning resolve itself into a Grand Committee to consider the king's Speech."

Debate on taking away the old Oaths of Allegiance, &c.] Leave was asked to bring in a Bill for taking away the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and to insert others, &c.

Mr. Sacheverell. I agree to the motion for this bill, to take away the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and in their stead to insert Oaths to this king and queen. And I would have the other Oaths in the Act for regulating Corporations taken away. You have the same power to alter those as you have these.

Sir Rob. Howard. I would not charge this bill with too many things; it will be long before you have the effect of it. The University, the Judges, and all other officers, require speedy dispatch, and in time that Act of Corporations may be taken away at one blow. That act had as much intrinsic iniquity as any act whatsoever. I would have an act to take away any obligation to take the Sacrament upon accepting any office; it is a profaning the Sacrament. When that act passed here, I remember it was moved by good Church of England men.

Sir Henry Capel. What belongs to the Oaths to the king and queen, &c. I would have in one act. I think it is well moved about the Corporation Oaths. I am glad to see men tender in oaths; the fewer in the government the better. The design formerly here was to bring the government into as few hands as they could, and to bring in Popery at the bottom of all. I would have no more oaths than are necessary to support the government. The Corporation Oath was to establish arbitrary power by law. The Revenue of corporations has been ill managed. I move that there may be leave to bring in such a bill. As for what relates to the Sacrament, every body knows my education has been for the Church of England, and I will live and die with it, but I would have the receiving the Sacrament, to qualify for those offices, cease. It was pressed at here by men of great abilities, and good churchmen were against it. Such use was made of it that people could not sell ale without it, and that holy thing was profaned. The Test will do very well without it, and I would have it removed.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If the Oath be taken away in the Corporation Act, 'that it is not lawful to resist the king,' it implies you may resist him. As for the Sacrament, &c. 'if you take away the whole act, take away that;' I think that unreasonable. The public profession of the Church of England enjoins, 'that the Sacrament be received at least once a year.' There is no example in the whole world where any are in office, and not of the public profession of the religion of that country. Men cannot be surprized, nor will there be any profaning the Sacrament, being obliged to receive it but once a year. I am not for taking away the whole Oath, but for having it explained.—Leave was given to bring in such a Bill.

Debate on the King's Revenue.] Feb. 26. The house went into a grand committee on the King's Speech.

Mr. Eyre. That we may be able to come to some resolution, I desire we may go on with the king's Speech, paragraph by paragraph.

Lord Falkland. We ought to take that first on which all the rest is founded. That upon settlements at home is the foundation of all the rest. Whatever is done in relation to Ireland, and abroad, Money must be thought of, and I propose that for consideration.

Sir Tho. Clarges. That is irregular, for it is not referred to you by the house to consider of, and therefore out of course, and Money is a tender matter. As I understand, the Speech points directly to the matter of Settlement, and the condition of Allies abroad and Holland [and so reads it], so the king here advises a good Settlement. And it seems to me this good Settlement is to change this Convention into a Parliament; so had not the wisdom of this house turned this Convention into a Parliament, you would have advised the king speedily to have called one; and as the king leaves it to your wisdom to consider what acts to propose, so now 'tis a proper time for a Settlement of your chief errand; therefore I would consider what foundation that may subsist upon; they are there but in the nature of projections. I shall not direct, but I think the purport of the king's Speech is to consider a Settlement most for the king's advantage and our good. And therefore I move it.

The Speaker resumed the Chair, upon occasion of some strangers being in the Gallery, and left it again *.

Mr. Garraway. We are invited by the king's Speech to make out a Settlement to secure ourselves, &c. We heard yesterday from the gentlemen of the long robe, that the revenue is not ceased by the demise of the king—If provision be not made against the disorder of the soldiers, 'tis not safe for us to sit here—How you will go about that I see not, till you know whether the Revenue be really settled in the crown; and then you will know what to trust to. If there be a doubt upon it, we must go some other way; but if you declare the Revenue settled, it may end all discourses.

Sir Wm. Williams. You are told of the long robe's discourses of the Revenue; if any doubt or question be put upon it, clear it. The measure of the matter before you must be the Revenue certain upon the crown, and you may measure by it. I take it from the acts of the last parliament, (made in great haste) which are very doubtful to me, and I would be cleared, and come speedily to a resolution, if it be a good Revenue, for the use of the prince: if not, declare it so.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I was with an honourable person discoursing of the Revenue, that I was not free to grant it for life. Learned men are of opinion, that all of the Revenue granted for life of the late king is to the benefit of this king jure coronæ. If it be so, I shall acquiesce in it, that the king may have it with honour for the support of the government.

Mr. Polluxfen. What opinion I was then of, I am now, and am ready to tell my reasons. If the Revenue goes not with the crown, where is it? Where the crown is gone, the Revenue is gone. It always goes where the public capacity goes: I never knew the contrary. 'But the Revenue' (it may be said) 'is granted to the king for life.' I would have the words of that Act read, [which was read] I will take it in the several parts of it: 'It does give and grant, &c.' and next, 'it shall be received by the king for life;' with reference to the former Acts. Now, whether this be in the king, &c. If I make a lease to the king for life, as long as he lives amongst men, 'tis a good lease, if a man enters into religion, or be attainted of treason—Suppose the king granted a Pension, or charged it, &c. for his life—If civilly dead, this never qualifies the first grant for natural life. Then next, whither must the Revenue go? Shall it go from the succession? Then this being granted to succession, it follows, the crown must have it, for maintenance of the state and government of the kingdom. This is the reason I give my opinion upon.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. Under favour, I think estates given to James 2 are expired and determined; he having abdicated the government, and thereby the throne become vacant. Whatever relates to James 2 is determined. I agree, if it be a lease for life of king James 2, it is not determined by his abdication, and that grant does not determine the grant over to another, if granted to a person for life, and he be attainted, or civiliter mortuus. But our case stands on another bottom, on a construction by act of parliament, which says, 'It shall be collected and paid, to the king during his life.' 'Tis our security, as well as support of the crown, to have the Revenue in our disposal; though I am not against granting it, yet I would have it from 3 years to 3 years, to secure us a parliament. At least it is a doubtful case. But king James has abdicated, and is no king, and there is an interregnum. How we can count this man alive, I know not. I am for settling it as you shall think fit.

Serjeant Holt. It is not the question concerning the expedience or convenience, but how this matter stands in point of law? Upon reading the Act, it carries a plain construction expressly; for king James 2 had it for life, and that king James is now living, which the house has declared, and that he has abdicated, &c. If that had not been, the Throne had not been vacant; and if king James be alive, the Revenue continues; and who must take it? The king takes it in his political capacity, which is not dead but remains. If king James be still alive, I see no reason that the Revenue is determined. If it be given to king James, 'tis a fee simple; if to his heirs and successors, 'tis otherwise; his natural and political capacity, his heirs and successors. Suppose tenant for life be attainted, the king has it for life of the person attainted, and his successor has it. Besides, not only his political capacity remains, but his trust for guarding the seas, and he is a person that can answer the end of the trust. I hope you will not say the king is dead as to the vacancy of the Throne, and alive as to the Revenue.

Mr. Peyton Ventris *. I should be loth the king's Revenue should depend upon doubt. Revenue given to the king is to his successors,

* "The house being informed, that there were in the Gallery, while the committee of the whole house was sitting, several persons that were not members of the house; Ordered, That the serjeant at arms, attending this house, do, from time to time, take into his custody any stranger, or strangers, that he shall see, or be informed to be in the house, or Gallery, while the house, or any committee of the whole house, is sitting." Journals.

* Soon after made a Judge.

where the act runs, 'The king shall be paid it;' and 'only to the present king devoted;' it belongs not to his successors.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. There are three sorts of Revenue, some for life, and some for successors, &c. The only question is that for life, and admitted in his political capacity; but with limitation for his natural life, 'tis not so long as he shall continue king, but for his natural life. 'Tis argued 'that any grant to the king in his political capacity is now determined, that carries a trust with it.' Other gentlemen say 'this is but in the nature of an ordinary conveyance.' Now, who shall have this estate? If a man enters into Religion, it does not determine the estate, but the heir shall enter. If it be granted to the king in his political capacity, it goes with the king in present. 'Tis most plain the trust is for the public. I take the law to be, that those grants are construed in the common course of law.

Sir John Guise. What is given to the king, I conceive, is not as he is king, but for support of the nation, to take care of it. If so given, then 'tis not the king's going away who was to receive it, 'tis not come to be nothing, but is fallen upon the lords and commons—And no more is conveyed than granted; therefore I would declare it in the king.

Lord Falkland. Being settled on king James for life, you cannot do it for king William, during king James's life. You have declared the Throne vacant, and after it was so for some days. If the Revenue did cease when the Throne was vacant, I know not how it can be revived but by act of parliament. I would not have the Revenue doubtful, but clear it by act of parliament.

Sir George Treby. The long robe were pointed at even now, and I will deliver my opinion freely. I think it is mighty plain that this Crown is an hereditary crown. Richard 2 abdicated, and there was a vacancy. When the king dies, volens volens, the crown descends to his successor; but when he abdicates the crown, the disposing of it comes to the lords and commons, and must be so accepted by the king. Lord Falkland is above the study of the law, but if he was conversant, he would know that if a Revenue is granted to John-a-Styles for life, though the king dies, if John-a-Styles is alive, that lease is not void. I have spoken of this variously, and was not determined in my thoughts till this morning, but now am of opinion that it rests in the life of king James 2. From the opinion of the last parliament, and this too, the Revenue is of inheritance of years and life. That upon which the question arises is that of the Customs, and half the Excise, given to the king, and limited to his life, in his corporeal capacity. What is meant by the king's Life? I think, not his reign, for it might have been as well expressed his reign, and as well now; but I think it is intended, during his natural life. If all the parliament were asked, when that grant passed, if they intended, that, as long as king James should live, it should return to the people,—they would say no. In those three sorts of Revenue it is expressed in the same words as this, for Life—'His majesty for life.' Is that for eight years determined? No. Which implies that it will go to his successor, notwithstanding his demise or abdication. It is as reasonable to construe this so too, and expound one part by another. Had it not been for this unfortunate change for James 2, (which I speak of with melancholy thoughts) you yourselves in effect have declared your mind as to this Revenue. When you desired the Prince of Orange to take upon him the administration of the government, you remember that gentleman who said, 'we were no Parliament,' said 'we wanted only a Declaration of it, but had not formality.' When the Prince of Orange was happily arrived, and the lords and commons were summoned, they advised the prince to take the administration of affairs upon him, civil and military, and the public Revenue. He put out a Declaration of the great disorder in collecting the Customs, and appointed Officers to receive and collect the same till the 22d of January, the time the Convention was to meet. Then you addressed him with Thanks for accepting the government, and desired him to continue the receiving the Revenue, &c. Which could have no other interpretation than what Revenue was then in being; and it is strange it should not be continued, and nothing of consent in parliament. Till king, lords, and commons are actually joined to the king, it is no parliament. If so, you declare William has done what James 2 did, and what you thought a Grievance. No man but concludes the uncertainty of the Revenue to the king for another man's life; and I need not labour the matter.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I do not labour this, but I offer only, that, if there be any doubt, you will put it past doubt.

Mr. Howe. One would have the Revenue during king James's life, and another during king William's; but I would make no such leases, but from time to time by parliament. I hope Westminster-Hall shall never decide our purses, what we are to give. I think king James did abdicate the Revenue; nay, that he did forfeit it to somebody's hands, and if we could give it, 'nemo dat quod non habet,' That the Crown is forfeited, and that the lords and commons offered it as a present to king William, and that they have a right to offer this Revenue as a present to him, is my opinion.

Mr. Godolphin. I am willing to divide with both opinions. I believe, that parliament that gave this Revenue, intended not to give it to king William; for there were no thoughts then of king James's abdication. If any doubt be in the house, it is in your power to put it out of doubt.

Sir Jonathan Jennings. It is highly necessary to come to an end of this debate. There have been many cases put, and I hope some come up to our case. We are told, 'some of the Revenue is for years, and some for life, and is in the present king as it was in king James.' If a patentee come and show you a grant for years, or life, before the Abdication, declared even before the king left the kingdom, shall not that stand good to the patentee? And then, where shall be the support of the Government? I hope this will be suddenly answered, as a weak suggestion, and that you will go on.

Sir Wm. Williams. What is given of this nature, is the gift of the commons only, and the crown is to take it as it is given. The people are the donors, the king is the donee. All agree it is in the crown as a trust. Be it either way, I propose 'that you will give it the king for three years.'

Sir Rd. Temple. You have had a long debate, and it is hard to know what to advise you in this case. You have heard the gentlemen of the long robe, who tell you 'the Revenue is still in being, and applicable to king William; but you must still declare it in king William by act of parliament;' meaning, should you do it by Vote alone, it will not be so satisfactory. The reasons offered do not take away all doubt. It is said, 'the Revenue is granted to the late king, but with limitations, for life:' I would know, whether his natural capacity, or political? His political capacity ceases, and you have impowered the Prince of Orange to reign; but where was it during the Vacancy, when one of the capacities is gone? I would have it explained. This being the case, king William will hold it upon mighty uncertainties, if during the life of king James: therefore, I would have a Bill brought in, to declare the Revenue as you shall think fit.

Col. Birch. It is very convenient that this matter be cleared. I perceive this is a doubt amongst learned gentlemen. I cannot think that this being given for king James's life, is intended longer than his reign, when he does not protect and defend you. Could it be intended, if you give it king William for life, if he cannot reign over us? No doubt it is a Revenue which fell into the same power and authority that the government fell into, which was lords and commons. Though king William be sufficiently indemnified by act of parliament, &c. and though you did think fit to give the kingship out of yourselves, you will bear me witness, I was one of the forwardest to part with it; and so I would do with the Revenue. But our greatest misery was, our giving it to king James for life, and not from three years to three years, and so you might have often kissed his hands here. I do not believe that king William would have it longer: perhaps persons would make it their interest to keep us asunder, but such a grant will keep us together.

Sir George Treby. This gentleman has commended us of the long robe for our learning. But as for his reason, 'that he has had kingship in him, and knows king William's mind;' he is too hard a match for me to deal with him. He says, 'the Revenue was to king James no longer than he should protect us, but given to king William because he does protect us.' But what if he subvert?—We should then give to one to redeem us.

Col. Birch. If king William should destroy the laws, foundations, and liberties, I doubt not but you will do with him as you did with king James. As to my knowing king William's mind, if it is his mind to have some for life, then, by chance, it is beyond the intention of this house.

Mr. Finch. The Revenue, without all manner of objection, is better for the nation than disputable, and that there should be a Revenue necessary to support the crown and you. The law allows no distinction of capacities in the king, as his political and natural capacity. It is an old mistake, as old as Edward 2's time; and you know what use the Spencers made of it: they ought not to be separated by law. It is said, in the act, 'during the king's life, which God long preserve;' as if to preserve his reign, and not his life. It is said, 'You have desired the king to collect the Revenue, till it shall be farther settled.' You will find, all along, the Revenue collected in the name of king James, collected and administered in his name: I think that no argument, to continue longer that political capacity. To give the king, for the safety and protection of the kingdom, in his political capacity, then you give to all the succession in political capacity. It is most proper to give such a Revenue; and I move, to give the king a Revenue to support the crown.

Mr. Somers. This case of the Revenue is of great consequence, and certainly it is manifestly a doubt. But I cannot agree that the natural and political capacity, &c. are not distinguished; because our laws do distinguish them. But I think an act of parliament much expounds them, when a Revenue is granted for the king's life. For increasing the king's Revenue, when you limit it, it is for life, and can be intended no longer than in the preamble of the act, which intends it for his reign; therefore settle it in the most solemn and perfect way. With a common person it ends with life; but a demise and abdication of the crown do extinguish his title to it. Settle it as you please.

Sir Rob. Howard. As it has been moved by the learned person, let us go upon certainty. You have said, that king James has abdicated the government, and you have disposed of the crown; I cannot apprehend how he abdicated the Crown, and not the Revenue. I deal freely with you; tallies are struck in king James's name, but I have prepared an instrument to the contrary. If you are not in a condition to dispose of the Revenue, how came it into your hands to dispose of the Crown? I think both are inseparable. Suppose he that has the crown retire into a monastery, and is incapable to govern, and a Revenue is given him for life, is his not the case of a private man? He is no longer a king. It is my opinion, that the Revenue of the crown is from the people, and the nation; as you have disposed of the one, you may dispose of the other; and so you may proceed to show how it shall be disposed of by act of parliament.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If this question be carried in the negative, where is your Revenue, and how shall the kingdom subsist? People are not apt to part with Money, and your vote will not make law, and it is no more law by your vote: it must be by act of parliament; and the greatest security to the crown is, not to put that question, but to bring in a Bill.

Sir Tho. Lee. If we bring in a Bill, it must be a bill to grant a Revenue; and it is not to begin here, but from the whole house. It is most proper and natural to put the question, Whether the Revenue be in the king? and then the house to go into a grand committee. I have heard the gentlemen of the long robe with great attention; but one thing sticks with me: there is a great difference betwixt what was anciently, and now; formerly the crown subsisted by lands of its own, but now by what arises out of the subject.

Mr. Pollerfen. There are no rules of law to distinguish one sort of inheritance of the crown, and another. King James had the right in him, and his heirs and successors had it, and no distinction in law of his political and natural capacity. If an estate be granted for life to king James, there is no distinction and limitation of estates betwixt grants to the king and a private inheritance.

Sir Henry Capel. The rule we go by here is justice and truth. I would know if we have done justice to fill the throne with king William and queen Mary? Is it a prudent thing for us to say, that king James 2 is no king, and yet James 2 has a Revenue? I remember, on debates on the Exclusion-Bill, gentlemen that argued against it, alleged 'that there was no danger in the duke of York's coming to the crown; for, when the king dies, the Revenue ceases; and the parliament will take care of Religion, before they grant it.' We have seen that has been otherwise. When the king has abdicated the government, it is inconsistent with reason to think otherwise. I think this matter relates to Money, therefore it is proper to be in a committee of the whole house.

Sir Rob. Howard. The question may have inconveniences; therefore resolve the house into a grand committee.

Resolved, "That this house will, to-morrow morning, resolve itself into a Grand Committee, to take into consideration the king's Revenue."

Feb. 27. The house resolved into a Grand Committee on the king's Revenue, Mr. Hampden in the chair.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would do my duty to my country, as well as to the king, and expect from the king what I do not from others. I would have the monarch and the people in mutual confidence, or else there is no safety to either. I think we ought to be cautious of the Revenue, which is the life of the government, and consider the two last reigns. It seems, by the king's Declaration, we are out of danger of falling into the misfortunes of the two last governments. If you give this Revenue for three years, you will be secure of a parliament. I doubt not the people of England, when they meet here, and have good execution of their laws, and are in security and safety; it is an unreasonable supposition, that the people will not aid him according to his occasions. And I move, 'that the Revenue may be settled for three years.'

Sir Rob. Sawyer. I believe sir Rob. Howard can give you an account of the yearly value of the Revenue.

Sir Tho. Clarges. When you have overcome this, I would have it determined, whether the temporary part of the Excise and the Customs are in being, before you proceed to any farther matters.

Mr. Love. I find there will be occasion of discourses, what the Revenue is? Therefore I move, that Howard may give you the Revenue. When all is before you, you may consent to such a Revenue as may make the king great to all the world.

Sir John Lowther. I shall be sorry, in the motion I shall make, to be an instrument to lose the good correspondence betwixt the king and you. We are not secure from danger; and I believe you will not lessen your reputation abroad, by having an entire confidence in him, and being perfectly united in interest and affection. The States of Holland are now engaged against the mighty power of France; and, I believe, you would not have the reputation of the king lessened in that court. The king of France has 200,000 men, has equipped many ships, is preparing to assist king James in Ireland, and has great correspondence in Scotland. The duke of Gordon is in possession of Edinburgh castle, and it is thought will make king James a passage into Scotland by Ireland. The French king is upon his march with 80,000 men into Flanders, with design upon Holland. I know not what can resist him, unless that little State, by the blessing of God, can do it. This is the state of affairs abroad: the Army is discontented at home. All this considered, I would have gentlemen consider, whether it is not necessary that there should be confidence in the king. I doubt not but the king will call parliaments often. If I had thought him a man of that temper as not to call parliaments, I should never have ventured my life and fortune for him; and if he would not have continued to support the Protestant Religion. If these considerations move with you, I shall be glad of it; if not, I shall comply with any other motion.

Sir Edw. Seymour. You have had a representation of the difficulties you are under. Arguments are not much altered from former times to make us unanimous in assisting the king; but now they serve for another turn.

What you settle on the crown, I would have so well done as to support the crown, and not carry it to excess. We may date our misery from our bounty here. If king Charles 2 had not had that bounty from you, he had never attempted what he had done. In his time, it was only, ask and have, carried on to that attempt as to hazard our ruin. Now we have a monarch, we must support him. I was sorry to hear what I did yesterday (from Birch), as if the king was like a single person, to call him to account when we will, and that we should so soon change our respect to him. If we settle the Revenue, I would enquire into it; if you know not the value of what is given, you cannot do it effectually. There is great need of Money, and when you know the particulars of the Revenue, you may better consider of it, and not go away with names, but do things. Before you make any settled resolutions, enquire into it; and, if possible, that the whole Revenue granted may be at one time certain, and not a part temporary. To enquire into the Revenue is your best method.

Sir Francis Drake. We are told of former excess of giving Money: I was never for it, because it was against the interest of the nation, to stab our Religion and Laws. I thank God, we are delivered from these men: now we are under a prince who has deserved well of the nation in delivering us, and I would give him the best acknowledgment we can, but not to prejudice the people. The same reasons for not giving formerly make me for it now, for our prince to support the honour of the nation. It is proposed, 'that you calculate what is necessary to support the honour and dignity of the crown.' I believe you will have an account given in a short time. I would appoint to-morrow for it.

Sir Robert Howard. I wish I could give the house satisfaction concerning the Revenue now. What was said is very true, that heat of loyalty was carried on formerly to excess, but there is not that argument to carry us on now. If the religion of the one and the other were the same, then be careful of excess; but coldness now will have more fatal effects. The question now is, Whether you will grant the Revenue for life, or years? I have heard the argument for granting it only for three years, but to secure Parliaments. I will lay little argument upon the stress of a Protestant king, and no danger of religion. I never will speak against a Triennial Parliament. When a Popish king has received such testimony of kindness from the parliament as to have the Revenue for life, if a prince, come in to save your Religion and Laws, should not have the same confidence, it will be thought a great coldness. It will be a matter of great rejoicing beyond sea, if we come up with more cheerfulness to that king who would have imposed upon you what this king has delivered you from. It may give encouragement to your enemies. Here are great dislikes, of a sad and cloudy nature; this may extend to cloud mens minds, and extend to Elections of Parliament-men, for the future. Perhaps arguments of so short a term as three years may give encouragement to your enemies, when it is said that all must depend on the condition of the Revenue: you yourselves, when you shall see the condition of the Revenue, may more easily settle your thoughts, what you will do for three years, or longer.

Mr. Eyre. I move, that the Debts of the Crown may be brought in, with the Charges upon the Revenue.

Sir Robert Clayton. I am afraid that will not do your business. I apprehend that there may be legal Charges on the Revenue, as the Bankers Debt, and other legal Charges; and if the Courts of Justice do well, they will recover it on the king.

Mr. Garroway. The Bankers Debt is named: I believe it is upon that part of the Excise which legally ought not to be charged: there are solicitors at the door in this business already.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Since the Bankers Debt is named, when you come to look into the Revenue, you will see whether the Bankers Debt be legally due, and which ought to be paid. The case will be, whether the Crown has power to sell all the Revenue, not settled by parliament. You must pay for what you buy, and yet come to the lord Treasurer for it. I was of that Jury, when 80,000*l.* a year was bought valuably, and the officers of the Exchequer robbed them of it.

Sir Henry Capel. For fear of the Bankers, I would not neglect the security of the kingdom: but if it be charged upon a branch of the Revenue, which it ought not to be, it is no Debt.

Sir Robert Howard. I had the honour to be one of the members appointed to examine Coleman, who said, 'that a considerable sum was to be given to secure the Bankers Debt; and if it was thought good then, what need of security?'

Sir Tho. Lee. I know not how this debate of the Bankers comes regularly before you. I am not versed in the rules of the Exchequer, and less in law; but I had it from lord Clifford, 'that, if the Bankers lent the king 100*l.* it was at 10 per cent.' They could not advance Money. Tickets cost 2*s.* 6*d.* a-piece, and so, upon reckonings, they made the king pay 50 per cent.

Mr. Boscawen. The Bankers agreed with Coleman for such a sum of money. A great deal of money was lent to king Ch. 2, on credit, in lord Clifford's time; and the shutting up the Exchequer was looked upon as the greatest invasion of property. It was to make war with Holland; and, without that illegal way, they could never have got Money to make war. I would have it brought in; if legal, it may be thought of; if illegal, made void.

Mr. Pollexfen. I am of the mind of the gentleman, to give the king that which may not deceive him, and in him, ourselves. I would have the whole Debt and Charge brought in.

Mr. Sacheverell. I have known this of the Bankers formerly. If you look upon it as a Debt from the beginning, and examine the accounts, it may probably last you till Midsummer. There was great solicitation in the house then, and some say foul. It was urged then, 'if you can prove a just Debt, will you come to account of the Money you lent; and will you be content to stand by it, and fall by that account? Then said I, 'what reason have you to expect more privilege than all the other subjects of England, and there is no reason to look into it.' Was it examined, it would be found, that the king was so far from being debtor to them, that they would be debtors to him.

Mr. Garroway. When the king, that now is, was here as prince of Orange, I walked with him; and, discoursing of the Bankers, I told him, they might have had all their Debt paid, would they have discounted at 7 per cent.

The rest of this day's debate was spent in several Proposals for raising Money. And it was agreed, "That 420,000*l.* should be given his majesty by a Monthly Assessment:" which was the next day agreed to by the house.*

* "The most salutary change in the constitution of England at the Revolution, was effected by the regulations which the commons adopted with respect to the state and management of the Public Revenue. The connexion between the Public Revenue and the temper of government, must appear an important and instructive fact, to every one who carefully peruses the history of England. Though, at an early period, the kings of England possessed a large independent Revenue, arising from patrimonial demesnes, taxations, and servitudes, yet these were far from being adequate to the extraordinary expences which occurred almost in every reign. The prodigality of a court, internal convulsions, and foreign war, had often compelled the prince to own his dependence, and solicit the bounty of his subjects. The solicitations of the prince reminded the people of their own importance. Their discontent, hitherto propagated in timid whispers, assumed the bold strain of Complaint and Remonstrance, and dared to approach the throne of the suppliant monarch. Hence the Redress of Grievances came to be the stated price of liberality to the prince, and the people wisely calculated, that any inconvenience, arising from the present diminution of their property, was abundantly compensated, by their obtaining such laws and regulations as contributed to its future security and increase.—Recent experience recommended the utmost caution in the disposal of the Revenue. The depression of their own influence, the open violation of the laws, an accumulation of Grievances, against which they had not an opportunity to remonstrate while parliaments were laid aside, were mortifying evidences of the pernicious effects of their rash and irrevocable generosity to the Resolution to stand by the King, &c.] This day, his majesty by Message acquainted the house, "That the late king James was sailed with French troops from Brest, in order to land in Ireland." Upon which it was resolved nem. con. "That the house will stand by, and assist the king with their Lives and Fortunes, in supporting his Alliances abroad, in reducing of Ireland, and in Defence of the Protestant Religion and Laws of the Kingdom." To which, the next day, they desired the concurrence of the Lords; and afterwards presented to his majesty in the form of an Address.

State of the Revenue delivered in by Sir R. Howard.] March 1. Sir Rob. Howard reported that, according to the Order of this house, for bringing in the yearly value of the several branches of the Revenue, he had prepared a Computation thereof, as follows:

A Computation of the several Branches of the Revenue.

The Old Customs made in the	£.	s.	d.
year 1685 - - - - -	532,143	9	6½
1686 - - - - -	595,688	7	10½
1687 - - - - -	630,700	15	0½
1688 - - - - -	551,497	18	11¼

late prince. 'We may date our misery to our bounty,' said a member of the house of commons. 'If king Charles had not had that bounty from you, he never would have attempted the things he has done.' 'I remember,' said another, 'when above 100,000*l.* was given for building of ships, and not one was built; and above 200,000*l.* granted to support the Triple League, was employed for breaking it.'—The reformation of the Revenue, from these considerations, appeared the capital point to which the attention of every true patriot ought to be directed; and which, if it was once compassed, would ensure the redress of every remaining Grievance, and the progressive improvement of the constitution. The most perfect political sagacity could not foresee what abuses or grievances might arise at any future period, but these could be only transient, if the Revenue was subjected to such periodical expirations, as must necessarily render the prince dependent upon the gratitude and generosity of his people. As the foundation of this system, it became expedient that the Convention should explain the precise extent of the generosity they had already exercised towards the king, by putting the crown upon his head. Some of his majesty's friends were of opinion, that the Act of Settlement conveyed the full possession and uncontrolled disposal of the Revenue annexed to the crown, at the period of king James's abdication; and it was natural to suppose, that the king himself listened with partiality to this opinion. When it was moved in the house of commons, that the Revenue had expired with the abdication of king James, great address was used to treat the question as a point of law, and to exclude those arguments of expediency, which could

The medium of the 4 years is	577,507	12	10½
The Duties, late in the Wood Farm, Coal Farm, and Salt Farm, and the Grant of the French Tonnage, all newly expired - - - -	19,500	0	0
The Four and half per Cent. Rent of the Logwood Farm, and Seizures of uncustomed and prohibited goods - - - - -	12,119	4	4
	£. 609,126	17	2½

The Excise made, in the year
1685 - - - - -	567,064	12	7½
1686 - - - - -	581,664	4	8½
1687 - - - - -	633,891	1	7½
1688 - - - - -	686,358	12	8½

The medium of the 4 yrs is	610,486	10	9
The Hearth-Money, per ann. about - - - - -	200,000	0	0
The Post-Office, per ann. about - - - - -	55,000	0	0
The Small Branches, per ann. about - - - - -	26,350	15	5½
Total -	£. 1,500,964	3	4½

not fail to incline many of the members to approve of the motion, if it had been fairly open to discussion. These persons contended, that the Revenue which had been conferred upon the late king, became the inherent right of the crown, and attached to his successor, without any new interference, or confirmation by parliament. Others, who professed an equal respect to the authority of law, advanced an opinion which rendered the royal income precarious, but not in the same degree dependent as if it had now expired, or been bestowed for a short or definite period. They maintained, that the Revenue was subjected to the same regulations with private property; that having been granted to James, for the purpose of governing during his life, it could not be alienated from that purpose, or follow him after he had deserted his public trust; but that, while he lived, it belonged to the person substituted in his official state. Upon the event of the death of James, they acknowledged that the Revenue would revert to the commons, and might then be regulated, both with respect to quantity and duration, as the circumstances and interests of the nation required.—The motives for dissenting from these opinions did not arise, merely, from the apprehension of distant or imaginary abuses of a Revenue exempted from the controul of the people. An inquiry, instituted by the commons into the state of the revenue, and abuses in the Expenditure of public money, led to discoveries which left it no longer doubtful, from what sources the former oppressions of the nation had flowed; and demonstrated the necessity of the most cautious and restricted modifications of the

The New Imposition granted in the late King James the Second's Time.

Wine and Vinegar for Eight Years produced, from Michaelmas 87,* to Michaelmas 88 - - - -	£.	s.	d.
	172,901	10	8½
Remained to come, 4 Years, Half, from Christmas last, ending June 24, 1693.
Tobacco and Sugar, for the same time, produced, in the same year - - - -	148,861	8	0
French Linen, Brandy, Silks, &c. for 5 Years, produced, in the said Year - - - -	93,710	8	1½ Remained to come, 1 Year, Half, the 1st of Jan. last.

Memorandum, These two last Branches are charged with the Loan of 84,888*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* with Interest; which is to be paid in the course of the Register, as it comes in.

King's Message relative to the Hearth-Money.] Mr. Comptroller Wharton acquainted the house, that he had a Message from his majesty, in writing, which was as follows:

“W. R. His majesty, having been informed, that the Revenue of the Hearth-Money is very grievous to the people, is therefore willing to agree, either to a regulation of it, or to the taking of it wholly away, as this house shall think most convenient: and, as, in this, his majesty doth consider the ease of the subject, so he doth not doubt, but you will be careful of the support of the crown.”

Supplies. Immense sums of the public money had been wasted in the prosecution of grievous suits, in behalf of the crown against the subject: 47,884*l.* had been paid by the privy seal to Burton and Graham, who had been employed as agents for the crown in these infamous suits: 100,000*l.* had been placed to the article of Secret Services, in the course of the last ten years, a period in which the nation had enjoyed uninterrupted peace. After various debates, the commons found that the revenue had expired; and afterwards agreed, that 420,000*l.* should be given to his majesty, by a Monthly Assessment, to supply the present exigencies of government.—The merit of this important Resolution, and the subsequent regulations of separating the Civil List from the extraordinary demands of government, of appropriating the Supplies, and of reviewing the application of them, are to be ascribed principally to the Whigs. The Tories boasted of their opposition to these Resolutions, in order to supplant their antagonists; and to insinuate themselves into the good graces of the king. William was deeply mortified with the dependence to which he was subjected, and his affections began to be estranged from a party, who appeared to have laid down a plan, to revoke or impair that dignity which their own hands had created.” Somerville.

* “Eighty-seven” should be “Eighty-five.”

Debate thereon.] Mr. Comptroller Wharton. I cannot but say, this is the greatest honour the king can do me, to make me a messenger of this. I have seen Messages for Money, but it is the first I ever heard of this kind, for the king to part with a Revenue. I am to acquaint you farther, a little more fully than in this Paper, viz. that the king was the first that moved this in Council. He did it for the ease of the people, and would always do so: he, and only he, is to have the honour of it.

Sir Rob. Howard. It was very late, when no body expected any such thing, that the king made this motion in council: the king said, 'It was much in his thoughts: I could wish the house had heard his discourse of all this business; and in all his discourse from Exeter hither, he expressed his inclination to do good to the people.'

Sir Tho. Clarges. I move, that both houses would join in an Address to the king, with their humble sense and Thanks; and I would have it the Declaration of the whole nation.

Sir Tho. Littleton. We cannot but have a great sense of this gracious condescension of his majesty; perhaps the most grateful and the greatest grace that has been done by any king formerly. And as this is a great favour from his majesty, so I hope we shall take care, in due time, that his majesty may be no loser.

Col. Birch. I stand up to second not only our hearty Thanks, with the concurrence of the lords, but this being such a Revenue that we were in no hopes ever to have an end of it, I would also signify this extraordinary favour to the nation, and give the king an extraordinary compensation.

Sir Tho. Lee. I move to have an addition to the Thanks, &c. 'That the king need not doubt of the affections of his people, to supply his occasions from time to time.'

Mr. Hampden. First resolve on Thanks, and then you may add as has been moved; but not to join the lords in any thing relating to Aid the king by way of compensation. You may appoint a committee to draw up the Address.—A Committee was appointed accordingly.

King's Message on committing several Persons.] Mr. Hampden, one of his majesty's privy council, acquainted the house, that he had a Message from his majesty, viz.

"That his majesty hath had credible information, that there are several persons in and about this town, that keep private Meetings and Cabals, to conspire against the Government, and for the assistance of the late king James: That his majesty has caused some of those persons to be already apprehended and secured, upon suspicion of High Treason; and that, he thinks, he may see cause to do so by others, within a little time: but that his majesty is between two great difficulties in this case; for that, if he should set those persons at liberty, that are apprehended, he would be wanting to his own safety, and the safety of his government and people: on the other hand, if he should detain them, he is unwilling to do any thing, but what shall be fully warranted by law, which he has so often declared he will preserve: and that therefore, if those persons should deliver themselves by the act of Habeas Corpus, there would be another difficulty. That his majesty is likewise unwilling; that excessive Bail should be taken in this case; his majesty remembering that to be one Article of the Grievances presented to him: that ordinary Bail will not be sufficient; for men who carry on such designs, in hopes of succeeding will not stick at forfeiting a small sum: and that, this falling out when the parliament is sitting, his majesty therefore thought fit to ask the Advice of this house therein; and intends to advise with the lords also."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Garraway. This Message requires your Advice. I conceive, the king is under some pressure by the law; he does consider your safety, without violating the law; our business is to take off all hardships from the king, and to take the burden upon ourselves. It is not unknown, at least some are suspected to be tampering, and the king has found out some, and by this he may proceed to the remainder. In this, we must consult the learned in the law, to offer their opinions upon the present sense of things, and to beseech the king that no present proceedings may be against these men, but to take some little time to consider of it.

Sir Thomas Littleton. It is of great consequence, what Advice the lords and commons shall give in this. In the mean time, I desire the king may make no proceeding against these men; and I would add Thanks to the king for asking your Advice; a thing not very usual in this place.

Col. Birch. I second that motion. These are new things; and the king having thus freely delivered us from that badge of slavery, the Chimney-money, (by which a Freeholder was not left in England) I second the motion, that such Thanks, and special Thanks, may be given him on this occasion.

Mr. Boscawen. We are not only to consider these persons secured at present, but such as may be upon the same occasion. It is not unknown, that many soldiers disbanded, or who have disbanded themselves, have arms in their hands. I have letters, that the soldiers in Cornwall are as bad as the rest; and when the magistrates rejoiced at the happy change, the soldiers killed a man. I would consider some regulation or discipline of the soldiers, and not to have them proceeded against in Westminster-hall, and to make some temporary provision for the safety of the Government. There is a kingdom near us, where these soldiers may go without ships (Scotland). I would take some effectual course. I have laid the thing before you.

. The matter before you requires no long time of consideration; the king has sent for your Advice, and he knows well enough how the law stands, which ought to be inviolable, and I am always for keeping it. Therefore I would make immediate application to the king, to take up such persons as he shall suspect to be obnoxious; likewise I would have a short Bill, for two or three months, to enable the king to commit such persons as he shall have cause to suspect, without the benefit of Habeas Corpus.

Sir Thomas Clarges. A thing of so extraordinary a nature as this, requires time to consider of it. I cannot consent to this Bill. It is said, 'these men may escape when bailed;' must we therefore intrench upon the Habeas Corpus act? I would rather advise, that great security may be taken of them to appear, than that that Bill should be intrenched upon; a thing so sacred! The other motion, about the disorders of the soldiers, seems to touch upon martial law. If they do any violences, the law is sufficient already; but if martial law be necessary, let it be by way of trial by juries. But I cannot abide martial law.

Sir Henry Capel. This matter is for the house, and not Advice proper for the privy council. It is the duty of every person about the king, to advise him to take the opinion of this house. Pray let there be no discouragement in the thing, the king asking your Advice so graciously. This thing is not slight; it is weighty, and a great deal is at the bottom. 'That the king would continue his care, and to thank the king for it,' was Clarges's motion, which I second.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. I take the act of Habeas Corpus to be the general security of all subjects. It is not to be understood, that that law will be shaken when you are gone, but to continue no longer than for the persons already taken, and at present in pursuit.

Sir Rd. Temple. It is happy we have such a king, that is tender of our laws and liberties, and that will advise with his Great Council. I fear, those things offered you tend to more violation of that law than a Bill. The taking extraordinary Bail was as much a violation of your liberties as any, in the late king's time; and there is no way but to provide a short law for it. If you advise the king to detain these persons, and no more, what needed the king to have had resort to you in this case? You can advise nothing else, but what will shake the Habeas Corpus act. If it be required, in three days time they are to have their Habeas Corpus. Since the king has had recourse to us for Advice, let us give him none against law. You may advise the king, that there be no proceedings, to deliver them, till you provide a law; and that, in the mean time, he may go on to apprehend them.

Mr. Hampden. Some of the persons apprehended are sent to the Tower; and the king does not think that a Habeas Corpus does not lie there, and therefore sends you this Message. Lord Arran (who is committed) had not been taken, but that he fled in the disguise of a footman's habit, and was stopped by a centry without order. I am of opinion, before you send up your Address, to have a vote for a Bill for the king to commit, without benefit of Habeas Corpus, for three months.

Mr. Sacheverell. The Message sent you is too weighty to determine on a sudden; but thus far you may go, to advise him to secure those he suspects. I cannot consent to go any farther, nor consent, on every great occasion, to dispense with that Act, and at last to take it quite away; but to secure those whom the king does suspect, or has cause to suspect at present.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. Suppose persons come to a judge for a Habeas Corpus, what shall the judge do in this case? To say, 'that the house of commons have advised the king otherwise,' shall that supersede the judge's proceedings? So that necessarily you must have recourse to the legislative power, and leave the matter stronger than before.

Mr. Finch. This is a matter of great consequence: it is of absolute necessity, that those persons be secured for tampering with the government, and of as absolute necessity, that the law be secured too. There is no danger that persons should be delivered by Habeas Corpus; for as there are no judges yet appointed, they can have no writs, and so no necessity of bailing them immediately. If they cannot be immediately delivered, and may be secured, the king can do that without your Advice. But the question is, What to do with the persons attached, seeing they cannot immediately be delivered? I think it fit to thank the king for his Message and to adjourn the debate.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I speak to the question, for the committee to draw up an Address of Thanks to his majesty, &c. I find gentlemen of various opinions. I am for Thanks, and would have that question single, else I know not how to give my Vote: I would have Thanks to the king for his gracious condescension in asking our Advice.

Resolved, "That the humble Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty for his most gracious Message, in desiring the Advice of this house."

Debate on the Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.] Lord Falkland. This Message from the king is of great consequence; and I am not for giving single Advice, but to give as much as we can. There is great cause to apprehend danger from caballing, and the old Army is discontented. Detaining these already apprehended, or that he shall have cause to suspect, I think we may advise without encroachment upon the law.

Sir Robert Clayton. When you have taken these people, how will you hold them in prison? Had it not been for the Habeas Corpus act, there had not been many of us here now; we had been dead and rotten in prison. I would have the debate deferred. When the legislative power and the executive are far asunder, it might be difficult, but they are together. I would have this a temporary Bill for a short time, and not to be drawn into example.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am for that motion for the king to apprehend suspected persons: till you give your Advice, the king may do it without you. I would have such advice given, as may consist with the gravity of this house. As for to-morrow, though the Tests, &c. are to be taken; there is no danger in taking them after to-morrow: I would have that understood that you have no restraint upon you that may put it off. As to this suspending the Habeas Corpus bill, at present I am under great restraints in judgment, therefore I would have it duly debated, and, it may be, I shall be for a temporary Act.

Sir John Lowther. I think you are told by the learned persons 'that it is no question, but the king may secure these suspected persons, and it is in his power, and supposed to be his duty, and the proper administration of the crown.' I am not against adjourning the debate till to-morrow, but I would not increase jealousies in people, that you will not take the Tests. Those who advised the king to desire a temporary Act seem rather to confirm the Habeas Corpus act, than to weaken it. When you exercise the legislative authority in this emergency, it is no invading your law, but very necessary at present.

Mr. Hampden. The difficulty the king is in, is not to apprehend these persons, but what to do with them. Your Advice is desired, and what he should do in this difficulty. I think the king may legally commit and do no man wrong. He asks your advice, and I think it is no encroachment on the Habeas Corpus act. No man took more pains in it, nor values it more than I do. These men will go on conspiring, and gentlemen say, to-morrow is appointed for taking the Oaths and Tests. Those gentlemen that refuse taking the Oaths and Tests, will sit very uneasily here. But if you gravely deliberate, and at the same time delay swearing Allegiance to the king, as though you intend no haste, consider what will be said abroad. Therefore I move for a temporary Act to dispense with the Habeas Corpus.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I stand up to vindicate myself: I am as free as any body to take these Oaths. I desire to justify myself.

Ordered, "That a committee be appointed to draw up a temporary Bill, for empowering his majesty to apprehend and detain all such persons, as he shall have just cause to suspect are conspiring against the Government."—The bill was brought in, read the first and second time, and ordered to be committed.

March 4. Sir Edw. Seymour. I apprehend, nothing but the last necessity will cause you to part with the Habeas Corpus Act; the same example for others may be for the future to do it. In what I say, I move for privilege of parliament; I would not have that suspicion extend to members of parliament. I think it reasonable, when you provide for the security of the public to provide for your own. I would have no members taken upon suspicion of practising against the government; but when they shall be first adjudged criminal here.

Sir Wm. Williams. Consider the quick flight this Bill has made here; it was voted, brought in, and committed all in one day. As you have overruled your own Order, so I must not wonder at irregularities, but I hope you will be tender in it for the future.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I spoke it now; if I am irregular, it is because I am going into the country with your leave, and shall not have opportunity to do it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think the motion not irregular, for many more Reasons, for re-commitment; for if the Bill be once brought in, in parchment, at the last reading it must be laid aside if it cannot be mended at the table. I know it is a thing of great consequence for members to be taken out of this house. But the ancient right, in the case of the five Members in 1640, was, that the cause of accusations must be showed in parliament, and ought to be so, as well in accusation of treason, as suspicion of treason.

Sir Wm. Williams. There is no privilege to any member in case of treason—that care may be taken in the ingrossment.

Sir Rd. Temple. No privilege to a member, &c. A member may be accused untruly, for the cause and matter ought to be true. For misdemeanor, or breach of the peace, a member is not to be tried in time of parliament. It was the case of lord Devonshire, and lord Lovelace. They pleaded they ought not to be tried in time of parliament though the misdemeanor was great, and done in the court.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The Charge of the five Members was undoubtedly treason, but to be taken out of the house was a breach of privilege, and afterwards owned and disclaimed by king Ch. 1, to be a rash attempt. A man may make a motion for a Bill, in a thing unforeseen, and if it cannot be well done at the table, you may re-commit the Bill. I move therefore, that some few gentlemen may draw a Clause. You run the utmost hazard by bringing in a rider, which cannot be mended at the table, and so the thing may be utterly lost.

Sir Rob. Howard. A thing of so ordinary and plain a nature as this may be brought in parchment, and pray put an end to this thing.

Sir Tho. Lee. If you think this Proviso necessary, three words do it, viz. 'Provided that it does not extend to privilege of parliament,' and I hope you intend it to those members that do not attend in parliament, and are absent, [reflecting upon Seymour who had leave to go into the country.]

An Amendment was proposed, That that present Act shall continue till the 17th of April, and no longer, and agreed to. But a second in these words, "and is never to be drawn into precedent or example hereafter," was rejected.—A Clause was then offered by way of Addition to the said Bill, which provided, That the Expences and Fees of all persons so committed, should be defrayed by the public: which was likewise over-ruled.—After which a Proviso being first inserted, That the said Act should not any way affect the privileges of parliament, or persons of the Members, till the matter of suspicion be first communicated to the house; the Bill was passed.

Report from the Committee of Grievances.]

March 5. Sir Joseph Tredenham reported from the Committee of Grievances, as follows: “Resolved, 1. That it is the opinion of this committee, That the Rights of the city of London, in the Election of Sheriffs in the year 1682, were invaded, and that such invasion was illegal, and a Grievance. 2. That the Judgment given upon the Quo Warranto, against the city of London, is a Grievance. 3. That the late Prosecutions of Quo Warranto’s against the other cities, two universities, the towns-corporate, boroughs, cinque-ports, and plantations, and the Judgments thereon, and the Surrender of Charters, to the violation of their antient Rights, are illegal, and Grievances. 4. That the Commissions and Instructions for regulating Corporations, and putting Tests in order to electing Members for Parliament, are illegal, and Grievances. 5. That the promising of Votes to take off the penal Laws, and Tests, is a violation of the Rights of Parliament, and a Grievance. 6. That the Collecting the Customs, and part of the Excise, between the death of king Ch. 2, when these Duties were determined; and the parliament that was called afterwards, was illegal, and a Grievance. 7. That the levying of Money, otherwise than the law allows, and the disarming of Protestants, and the quartering of Soldiers, the pressing of Horses and Carriages, contrary to law, are Grievances. 8. That the house be moved to appoint a particular Committee, to examine into the matters aforesaid, and who were the authors and advisers thereof.”—To all which the house agreed, and a Committee was appointed accordingly.

Debate on Grievances.] Sir Rob. Howard. You have received a Report from the Committee in general: I would have some use of it, though it is actum agere, to do it over again. We have a great example of the king; instead of those indirect means used formerly to get money, he has given you money. He has been so far from breaking your laws, that he has not so much as bowed them. I will wind all up in one motion, to incite every member to close with it. I find all the Answers from Burton and Graham, relating to the blood spilt by their Prosecution, that of the sheriffs of London, &c. ‘that they were but ministerial in them;’ they ought to be made an example, if they have a mind to gratify themselves by that, to make them originals, and a Bill of Attainder to be brought against them. Let us free ourselves from the guilt of that blood spilt, to all posterity, and not leave ill ministers, by these examples, to do the same again. It is impossible we should live, and not have blood upon us, if we pass this by unpunished. The next is the murdering our Civil Rights in Corporations, in taking away Charters, &c. If we do not punish these things, corruption still remains encouraged, and we shall cause this to descend to posterity. If the fault be in the Jury, and they will not tell us who gave the counsels, they must take it upon themselves. To proceed upon some actings in this, I would have a Select Committee. Let it go to what fountain it will, were my own father concerned. Not but that I would have a Committee of Grievances to sit, but you may have a Select Committee to sit upon Grievances, and you will find the parties and originals, or these men must make themselves murderers of these men, and murderers of our Liberties. ‘No calamity so great (says lord Coke) as what is done under colour of justice.’

Mr. Howe. These men are known to the boys in the streets. The delay of this may put the people upon great discontents. Suppose a tradesman dies, as a shoemaker, and another comes to take the house, and finds awls and lasts in the house, shall I believe a painter lived in the house? I would have these awls and lasts thrown out of the house. I would have a Select Committee, to enquire into this, and then I hope you will have a good account of this, and let the tools be thrown away.

Sir Tho. Clarges. There are a great many Grievances more than this, as the illegal Ecclesiastical Commission; dispensing with the Oaths, &c. to the overthrow of all our laws; money levied by a charter upon Hackney Coaches; if that be so, you will be tript out of all your rights quickly. I wish the Committee, after the discovery of all these Grievances, would have named the persons who had occasioned them. Had they brought you in the persons who had offended, you might then have done something. I could wish these Grievances might be re-committed, and so consider farther of them, and find out the persons who occasioned them.

Sir Rob. Clayton. I would not hunt too many hares at once. If you take too many things, you will finish none. All we could get from Burton and Graham was, ‘that they had their direction from the Attorney General,’ and there is the end of the thread. Pray enquire of the Attorney General.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I am of opinion with Clarges, that all the Grievances of this nation are not in the Committee’s Report. We have great obligation to the king, who has relieved us from the oppression of Chimney Money: but if I be not misinformed, we owe that to the lower end, and not to the higher end, of the council-table. If these men act again, who have countenanced these things, no body will be afraid to offend. When you have voted the Grievances, you may, by a private committee, find out the persons. Punishment of vice is as necessary as reward to virtue.

Mr. Love. I am of opinion, that finding out mischiefs will do no good, without remedying them. The two first Heads of the Bill relate to the City of London. If you refer this till you have done all, you will never be at an end; it will find you work for a great while.

Sir Tho. Lee. No ordinary treason is more dangerous than the practice of these men. I would have the Committee meet and examine their several practices, and then you may go to the lords for committing them, as a court, by the complaint of the commons; else that court cannot commit originally. A learned lawyer (Maynard) has declared, that you are to proceed so in common-law treasons.

Major Wildman. I would consider whether this be practicable immediately. Possibly they may demand Habeas Corpus before night. There are 30 in number committed, and most without any law, and committed by no authority in law. It is notorious that they have broken privileges of parliament, by taking away Corporation Charters, by engaging Subscriptions to elect such as the king shall nominate, to overthrow the very foundations of parliaments. The way proposed by Lee I think the best. But whether you will commit them for breach of privilege of parliament. You are told of a great sum of money that has gone through their hands. I would have them in your power, for they have been guilty of the greatest subversion of the laws that ever was.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I will agree that Burton and Graham are guilty of great offences, but whether you will determine this breach of privilege without hearing them? There is nothing expressed in the warrant of commitment of the cause of their commitment, and I think there is no danger from the lords commissioners, who have three days to consider of the Habeas Corpus, and by that time possibly you may have special matter against them; therefore we are not to infringe the laws, be the offenders ever so great. I know not whether the lords, primâ instantiâ, may commit commoners: I would rather go some expeditious way, by Impeachment.

Col. Birch. If any gentleman of this house will come and inform you of a breach of privilege upon him, you never deny commitment of the person that did it. Scarce a gentleman of this house that will not agree this to be a horrible breach of privilege. Let your serjeant take them into custody and examine them, and so you have them in custody according to usage of parliament.

Mr. Paul Foley. I understand, a great many are in the Tower. If the king's council, who hear us, will inform the king, some course may be taken with them. If this house talk of breach of privilege with men they intend to hang, it is a strange course. There is no way we can proceed, but by Impeachment, and go generally to the lords to accuse them, and appoint a committee to draw it up.

Sir Rd. Temple. It is strange that men who lie in the Tower for the greatest crimes, should be fetched out for so low a thing as breach of privilege, and if you impeach them for any thing under treason, they may be bailed. I would have a committee to draw up a charge against them. Any thing that tends to subvert the laws is treason. Parricide is as great a crime as is in the world, but it is not high treason. Before the statute 25 Edw. 3, the greatest treason was subverting the law, and even a judge to break his oath, was judged treason at the common law. You may provide your evidence against these men, after you have impeached them, and I hope you will bring them to justice.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. It is your proper way to refer it to a committee, to examine the matter, and then bring the accusation; let the committee report to the house how the matter stands, but bring in no accusation, leaving that to the house.

Resolved, "That a particular Committee be appointed to examine into the Matters aforesaid; and who were the Authors and Advisers thereof."

Protest on the Bill for regulating Trials.]

March 6. On the the 26th of Feb. a great debate occurred in the house of lords, on the Bill for the better regulating the Trials of the Peers of England; and this day the question being put, Whether this Bill shall pass? It was resolved in the affirmative.—Leave was given to any lords to enter their Dissents; and accordingly these lords following entered their Dissents in the Reasons following:—"1. Because nothing ever was or may be put into an Act of parliament, that can reflect so much upon the honour of the Peerage as this will. 2. Because this sets the Honour of the Peers and the Commons upon an equal foot. 3. Because such persons as may have Causes to be heard at the bar of this house will not be so confident of the justice of the Peers, and consequently be jealous of the Right that may be expected upon impeachments. 4. Because this strikes at the root of all the Privileges of the Peers, most of which they claim by reason of the great regard that the law has to the honour and integrity of the Peers above that of the Commons; the Statute de Scandalis Magnatum being enacted for that reason only. 5. Because it will be, in some sort, a mark of reproach upon every peer who shall be challenged, unless there be very great and apparent cause for it. 6. Because this will tend to maintain feuds and animosities amongst the Peers. 7. Because, at this time, it is unreasonable, considering the late Disputes and Divisions that have been in this house. 8. Because the Honour of every man, much more of a Peer, is, or ought to be more valuable than his life. (Signed) Delawarr, North and Grey, Kingston, Lindsey, G. C. Craven, Northampton, Delamer, Stamford, Pembroke, Lucas, H. London, Morley and Mounteagle, Winchester, Bedford, Manchester, Norfolk and Marshal, Berkeley, S."

The King's Answer to the Address of Lives and Fortunes.] March 8. The Speaker read the King's Answer to the Address of both houses declaring they would stand by him, &c. with their Lives and Fortunes, which was contained in these words :

"My lords and gentlemen ; If any thing could add to the esteem and affection I have for Parliaments, and particularly for this, they would be much encreased by the kindness you shew to me, and the zeal you express for the public good in the Address you have made, which in the matter, as well as the manner, hath every thing in it that ought to recommend it to me.—I assure you I will never abuse the confidence that you shall put in me ; being fully persuaded, that there is no sure foundation of a good agreement between a king and his people but a mutual trust : when that is once broken, a government is half dissolved : it shall, therefore, be my chief care never to give any parliament cause to distrust me ; and the best method I can use for that purpose is never to expect any thing from them, but that which shall be their own interest to grant.—I came hither for the good of the kingdom, and, since it is your desire that I am in this station, I shall pursue the same ends that brought me.—God hath been pleased to make me instrumental to redeem you from the ills you feared, and it is still my desire, as well as my duty, to preserve your Religion, Laws, and Liberties, which were the only inducements that brought me into England, and to these I ascribe the blessings that have attended this undertaking.—When I spoke last to you, I told you of the necessity of assisting our Allies, and more especially the States of Holland, whose readiness to relieve you, at their too great hazard and expence, from the extremities you lay under, needs no other argument to move you to the consideration of it.—As I was then a witness of their zeal and affection to promote the Expedition, and second my endeavours, even with a neglect of their own safety ; so I am now sensible of the inevitable ruin they have drawn upon themselves, by giving you this assistance, if you should not return it to them.—They have really exhausted themselves to such a degree both as to Men and Money, that it is not easily to be imagined, and I am confident your generosity will have as little bounds towards them, as theirs had towards you : and that you will not only enable me to make good the Treaty with them, and repay what they have actually laid out upon this occasion, of which an Account shall be given to you ; but that you will farther support them to the utmost of your ability against the power of their enemies, who must be yours too, by their interest and their religion, and do certainly design the ruin of Holland to be a step to your destruction.—I need not take pains to tell you the deplorable Condition of Ireland, which by the zeal and violence of the Popish Party there, and by the assistance and encouragement they have from France, is brought to that pass, that it is not adviseable to attempt the reducing it, otherwise than by a very considerable Force, which I think ought not to be less than 20,000 horse and foot ; which by the blessing of God, will make the work shorter, and in consequence, the Charge easier, though the first Expence must, of necessity, be great.—You are to consider that, towards the more speedy and effectual Success in relation to Ireland, as well as with a regard to France, there must be such a Fleet as may, in conjunction with that of the States, make us entirely Masters of the Sea that nothing can be sent from France either to Ireland, or any where else, that may give disturbances to us, or our allies.—I must also recommend the Consideration of the Revenue to you, that it may be so settled, as that it may be collected without dispute.—My Lords and Gentlemen ; These things will amount to a great sum, and must of consequence be a present weight upon the people ; but, considering that neither your Religion, nor your safety, can probably be secured without these means, I conclude you will think nothing can be too great a price for their preservation : and I will engage my solemn word to you, that whatever you shall give in order to these public ends shall be strictly applied to them ; and that as you so freely offer to hazard all that is dear to you, so I shall as freely expose myself for the Support of the Protestant Religion, and the safety and honour of the nation."

Debate on a Motion for printing the Votes.]
March 9. Sir Tho. Lee. In the Roll of the 9th Hen. 4, 'Nothing is to be taken notice of in Parliament, but what you shall communicate to the king.' I know not how the king may take notice of what you do, and if you print your Votes, the lords may do the same. It will only save the gentlemen the trouble of writing to their corporations.

Sir Henry Capel. You are told of the 9th Hen. 4. At that time, there were no Coffee-Houses, and no printing. If you could keep your Votes out of the Coffee-Houses, and suppress the licentiousness of printing, otherwise you make secrets here of what all the world knows. Treaties are made public amongst princes, and it is no good thing to make secrets of that which is known. The world ought to know your Votes, and there is no harm in it. As to what is said, 'that the king will concern himself in your votes ;' the lords Journals are open, and so are ours. I think we make more of this than it is worth. I would have them printed.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I cannot be persuaded that any thing now, or heretofore, has been for your service, by printing your Votes, but extremely to your disservice. I appeal how it is for your honour to make a Resolution in your Journal not to print your Votes, and now to make a contradiction in your Journal, to print them. Unless the cause of that contradiction do appear, it will make your counsels of little value abroad in the world. That you should alter your Resolutions weakly is not for your honour. What reason is there for most of your Orders, or for a Bill to be read three times, but for the more safety of your proceedings? Whether it is for the honour and credit of the house to vary Resolutions, I appeal to you. Those rules and measures our ancestors left us, are the safest way. The inconvenience every body is sensible of, in the ancient way of passing Bills by Item, where the king might reject and accept what he pleased. When the king shall come to take notice of what you do here, what becomes of your Liberty of Speech, and what becomes of your Freedom of Debates? It is contrary to the course of nature here, to make a general publication of what you do, before you make it in course of parliament. As for sending your Votes to Coffee-houses, it is a great crime; it is more for the service of the house that your clerks take not that liberty to publish them in Coffee-houses, and most for your honour not to print them.

Mr. Hampden. I see gentlemen ready to put the question, when they think a man is against it. The question is, Whether you print your Votes? I am sorry this question is stirred again. I remember it at the Oxford parliament—(I know the wheels that moved it then) I know that printing your Votes sounded well abroad, and it seems a popular thing, like sitting at Charing-cross, but the people had much rather hear our Reasons than our Votes, and no more. I have seen a Vote in a full house, at six or seven o'clock at night; the tide would not be stemmed, but there was a Vote passed; and when they thought better on it the next day, that Vote was unvoted again; whilst this is in your book only, there is no hurt. Is this all the argument, or does it look like one, that the people should know what you do? No ordinary council does it. The lords have not done it. Should you desire their concurrence to print their Votes, they will laugh at it, and their books are Records. One great reason for it is for the sake of the booksellers, or that younger gentlemen may be able, when the elder are in their graves, to know the Proceedings of Parliament; but they will see no reasons for them. Bills are not written in paragraphs, but all of a piece, and there is a reason in it; not that the clerks may read blank, but the reason is, that there may be no forging in it. If you print your Votes, consider what it is. There may be an inconvenience of intercourse; the lords against our privilege, and we against the judicature of the lords. The lords may tell you, you have voted something derogatory to the crown, and send you word, What have you to do with it? If you print it, will it not be a strange Message, that the crown should send you word of what you do? You must send the crown word, you intended not any thing against the crown; and of what strange consequences may this be? I have no end in this but regularity and decency. I have as great reverence as any man has for this house; and when you reverence yourselves, the world will have it for you. I hope you will not print your Votes.

Sir Rd. Temple. This matter is of more moment than at first it seemed to be; little benefit, and great inconvenience, may come from it. I dislike all innovations. In a great assembly, what is done must be with great reason: there ought to be no innovation. All that can be proved for printing it, is to rectify Coffee-houses, and for beyond sea. I saw, at Oxford Parliament, another thing gained, upon commissions that gentlemen had from their country about the Exclusion Bill. I hope we shall not imitate Holland, to go to our principals for Instructions; it may be of dangerous consequence to alter the government. I hear of balloting-boxes; they have had them in Scotland, but they are weary of them, as precluding all debates. This strikes at the essential privilege of parliament, when you have advanced in a Bill, and then reject it, and the people know not the reason of that. I would have sending the Votes to Coffee-houses redressed; but it is far less inconvenience than that your Resolutions should go about from yourselves with approbation: I never heard any good reason for it, nor any good success of it when done. It will prove a levity without doors, to alter your Vote already made, and your Reasons not known.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am for printing your Votes, and I see no inconvenience by it; it will be great if you do not print them. England has from the clerks all you do, but not the truth of what you do; and it is fit England should know both. In former parliaments, when they were invading and undermining the people, they were ashamed of it; but we are now under a king that preserves our liberties, and there is no reason but the people should know it. It is fit the people should know the good things transacted betwixt the king and this house. Such a union may have great influence both abroad and at home. I am for printing them.

Mr. Arnold. I would not have L'Estrange and Nevil Payne write false news beyond sea. I desire the truth may be known, and am for printing them.

Sir Rob. Howard. Methinks the debate is, Whether you will publish your Votes tacitly, or expressly? If they are published without the stamp of authority, it seems you will rather permit it by an unjustifiable way, than a justifiable. If you will keep your Books secret, perhaps I shall be for that; but if you suffer them to be published by other means, then is not printing the honestest and juster way? If the question be, Whether they be kept secret, or not, I have my opinion: I know not the methods of Holland, but now you have more justification for printing than you had formerly, when they were better not published at all, but kept secret. But this parliament has been chosen in better methods. Possibly some Votes are fit that the world should presently see; but whether they should be kept secret or not, I shall reserve my thoughts; but whether you will print them is much the more justifiable way.

Sir Wm. Williams. I am sorry this has been moved to-day. The legality of doing it is out of the question. Notwithstanding all I have suffered for printing, by your Order, yea I think it not politic to do it now. It seems, it was a weak think in me (when Speaker) to obey the house of commons, and I was turned out, the last parliament, and I believe that was the greatest reason for it. When you have vindicated the poor men who suffered for printing, then I shall be for it. As for precedents abroad, I shall not take my measures from methods abroad, but from our own constitution: they are a Commonwealth, and we under a monarchy. There every man has a share in the government, but here not. Your Reasons will not appear with your Votes; and the people will not apprehend the Reasons of your contradictions. You will arm your enemies by it, and they will provide against your counsels.

Mr. Paul Foley. Orders here are of several kinds; some are unfit to be published. You have criminals come before you; it is unfitting their accusation should be published, and unfitting the evidence, that they may be prepared to surprize you.

Mr. Hampden, jun. Some gentlemen argue, as if you should keep your debates as secret as you can; but I think, if you print your Votes, you lay a sort of restraint upon yourselves. As for what is said of other countries, resolutions in council in Holland are final decisions, and fit they should be known; but when they are not finished (as in your Votes) it precludes your liberty of debate, and is a disservice to the house.

Col. Birch. I humbly tell you, I am heartily sorry for this debate, since it is not easy to see the consequence; it will reflect every way; it will let the world see you are subject to change. One day, Money is to be raised on one thing, another day, you reject it, and the world sees not your reasons. I am one of those that are heartily sorry for Williams's great sufferings, when he took the employment of Speaker upon him, and was trusted with the printing the Votes; and he did take upon him the Solicitor General's place in king James's time, because he did not know any way to get his fine again, but by such an office. This I say, for satisfaction to myself: I would not have gentlemen take notice of it. When we debate here of projects to raise Money, perhaps the Book of Rates may save our lands, and this may argue to the world impotency and weakness. In the mean time, any gentleman may put out any thing in writing at his peril: it is an unseasonable time, and an unseasonable question.

Mr. Sacheverell. I was against printing your Votes formerly, and am so still. I think certainly, it will destroy all good correspondence betwixt the two houses. Consider how things stand: if gentlemen please to remember, the lords sent down a Bill for the speedy Conviction of the Popish Recusants. This house passed a Vote, that the Bill should be rejected. How will that stand in your books, that such a bill was rejected? You went an extraordinary way, to tack Reasons why you rejected it; and you send into the country to subject it to their judgments. It was ever held parliamentary, that the king and lords take no notice of what is done here, till communicated by the house; and you, by printing, go about to tell every body what you do. You put yourselves into an uncertain, unparliamentary condition, and I cannot agree to printing.

The question being proposed, That the Votes be printed accordingly; the previous question was put, that That question be now put: the house divided, Yeas 145; Noes 180. So it was resolved in the negative.

Debate on the King's Speech.] March 11. The house resolved into a grand committee on the king's Speech.

Sir John Guise. There are three points touched upon in the king's Speech, relating to Money. The first is in relation to the advantage we have had from Holland, and what they have done for us, which we ought to be mighty sensible of, and touched with: and gratitude becomes us. The danger for their fleet in winter, &c. and the hazard that may be brought upon them by it. The next is, the consideration of Ireland: I would willingly have seen the State of the Army, and the Expence. The next is the Revenue, of which I would have all the branches before you, that you may consider, whether it shall be settled for life, or years.

Mr. Papillon. The consideration of Ireland, the Fleet, and Holland, all depend upon the Revenue, of which some is for life, some for a term of years. Some, the other day, thought all the Revenue was vested in the king; others did doubt it; therefore we ought to put it past doubt. Therefore I move for an Act to give and grant the Revenue to the king, that it may be collected without dispute, and an indemnity for the collecting it since the vacancy; and if the State of the Revenue be ready, I would have it delivered in by sir Robert Howard.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would have the redundancy of the Crown Revenue, after the Government is supplied, applied to the uses desired in the king's Speech; I mean, take the Customs to be 600,000*l.* one year with another. The Excise is a Revenue by itself. See to have also the Addition upon Linen, Brandy, and Silk, and 400,000*l.* taken up upon them, and little to be depended on them—the Hereditary Revenue. The end of my proposition is, whether the Committee will take the Revenue as given in, or as I have reported it. I humbly propose, whether you will grant it for life, or years? I leave it to you.

Mr. Garroway. The Paper I have come by agrees with Clarges's account; but I think you are not ripe to come to that question, whether the Revenue be standing or not—Whether the Charges, for particular persons uses, upon the Revenue, shall continue? Begin, upon a fair clean paper, these Charges, whether they shall be continued, or taken away; and in that I shall serve you as well as I can.

Mr. Sacheverell. I take it, the Revenue ceases; it is rasa tabula; and I would have a short Bill to declare it so. Then you may declare such a part hereditary; but I shall be against a great Revenue, as in former time. If all may begin anew, I am ready to agree.

Sir Robert Cotton. If you declare all the Revenue fallen with king James, consider that all the Revenue has been wrongfully collected since the abdication.

Sir Tho. Lee. I hope you may have a shorter way. I remember, when the debate was the other day, some were of opinion, that the Revenue discontinued; the Hereditary Revenue was in another condition; but the house avoided that question, and referred it to a committee. The hereditary part of the Excise is not above 300,000*l.* per ann. granting it to be in the king and his successors from such a day from the time you have declared the abdication.

Col. Birch. I think the parliament were very prudent in 1661. The case was then directly as it is now. The Revenue was supposed to cease, and many, in London and elsewhere, hesitated the payment. You will not find it in your Journal, but in another place; and they declared, that it should be collected as legally as it was, for about six weeks, by reason that, in the mean time, they might settle it as now it is. Pass therefore a question, that the Revenue be collected as legally it might have been, &c. till farther consideration be had of it. In short, the country do generally hesitate, and keep all in their hands except 15*d.* the barrel. Therefore first put the question, that the Money may come in to the respective offices; and I would now order a Bill accordingly.

Mr. Garroway. I think you are not yet come so far. You say, it shall be collected; but you do not say to what end. Will you be tied up, by such a Vote, before you determine whether it be a standing Revenue, or an Aid? We know the burden of it, if you had, in Ch. 1's, Ch. 2's, and James 2's time declared it so: you will have a hard task to alter it, without declaring it now to alter it hereafter. Declare it, one part as Revenue, the other as an Aid and Supply; otherwise I shall be against the question.

Debate on the Bill for annulling lord Russel's Attainder.] A Bill, from the lords, for annulling and making void lord Russel's Attainder, interposed in the debate; and was read the first time.

Mr. Finch. I see many gentlemen's eyes are upon me; therefore I stand up to give an account of my reasons for the part I acted in that unfortunate business, that may more immediately concern me. [He was taken down to order, not speaking properly against the Bill] I am easily satisfied with the determination of this house. I am sure, my motion is for reading the Bill a second time. I stand up only for one Clause in the Bill. Every gentleman knows, as well as myself, that a conspiracy to levy war against the king, is treason, by the Statute 25 Edw. 3. [He was taken down again to order.] Give me leave to vindicate myself; what I shall offer will be very short; the reasons I had to urge that point of treason: if law-books have led me in the wrong, I am ready to rectify my opinion, whether to conspire without levying war be treason. It is to conspire the king's death, to keep him in custody till such things be done. It is to conspire, as in the case of Dr. Storey, to invite a foreign prince to invade the kingdom, though nothing followed upon it. It was treason in lord Cobham's case, upon debate of all the Judges, in the Report 'Conspiracy to levy war against the king' was, to conspire against the life of the king. To throw open all inclosures generally all over the kingdom, was the case of the Miller of Oxfordshire, who was actually executed. Upon this the difference stands in books. Any general design (though not immediately against the king's person) to keep him in custody, till he had confirmed any thing that the people would have, is treason; as in the case of Rea and Ramsey, in Rushworth's Collection—To raise war against the king, all the Judges declared it treason. Having said this, it is authority enough for any lawyer to do what I did. Whether the Judges were in the wrong, I shall not determine.—He was taken down again by Sir Henry Goodrick. It is strange to me to hear that learned gentleman vindicate himself, when nobody accuses him, and thereby to arraign the justice of the Bill for repealing the barbarity of this attainder by this murder. This is not to be suffered.

The Speaker. The learned gentleman, from his own vindication in the part he acted relating to this noble lord, has let himself into law-books, against the orders of the house.

Mr. Finch. I ask pardon of the house. What I said was not against order, since the house gave me leave to vindicate myself. I only showed you what I had read, and am far from arraigning this noble person; I did not intend it, and have as much respect for this noble family as any body. And now I have vindicated myself as to my proceedings in matter of law, I desire the Bill may be read a second time.

Sir Henry Capel. For respect to the family and the memory of this noble lord, I am sorry this gentleman did speak; and to vindicate the memory of this noble lord, read the Bill presently. He has cited Book-cases to justify his proceedings, &c. which is properly at a second reading. I am surprized at this gentleman's proceeding, and am sorry he has proceeded so far.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. I have as much honour for this person, and noble family, as any body; but I would keep up order. I would not have the Bill read a second time now, but to-morrow. This learned gentleman did make a vindication of himself. I will not undertake to answer him presently; I may have occasion to answer him to-morrow.

Sir Robert Howard. I cannot name lord Russel without disorder. I would neglect all things to read this Bill a second time. Perhaps the learned gentleman may tell us how large the law is then; it is a sufficient thing to name that noble lord. I am not able to say any more; but pray read the Bill.

Sir Tho. Lee. This Bill declares, 'that the Law-Books the learned gentleman has quoted were wrong;' and if he doubts it, the reading it a second time will set that part right.—The Bill was read a second time.

Mr. Boscawen. I have hearkened diligently to the learned person's Law-cases. By the 25th of Edw. 3, we are Judges here of the true intent of that statute; and I would have it read [which was done]. I observe, by that statute, the abridging treason certain, which was before uncertain, for favour of the subject. It seems to me strange, if compassing the death of the king should be treason, and levying war, in another place of the statute: if that be false, it must be taken out of the Bill. To me it seems to be a great wresting of the law. It seems to be a transcendent wresting of the law. Pray read the Bill a third time.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I think the Bill is carefully penned, and I think the most that lord Russel could be guilty of, was but misprision of treason; war being not actually levied.

Sir Tho. Lee. If there be no objection against the Bill, it need not be committed.

Sir Tho. Clarges. In one clause of the Bill there may be two or three words left out. It is said, 'It is at the request of the earl of Bedford and lady Russel only.' The justice of the nation is greater to you than any particular persons inducement. This Bill is not ex gratia, all the nation is concerned in it. When it is ex gratia, it ought to be signed by the king.—The Bill was ordered to be committed.

Farther Debate on the King's Revenue.]
Mr. Pollexfen. From doubting one part of the Revenue or another, we may come to think there is no revenue at all; and now settle it by Bill. You have brought in question the collecting of the Revenue, and given indemnity to those that gathered it, and, in the mean time, you give the revenue to nobody. This is so great a loss of time, that it is not serviceable to you, nor the present occasion of the nation, nor for the reputation of your affairs abroad. I thought it was taken for granted that it was a Revenue in the crown, &c. and when you have done, three months hence you will be in the same doubts. You will have as much to do in this, as to determine whether it shall be for life, or years. To talk of 'assisting the king with your Lives and Fortunes,' and not to enable the king! To give him power to take the Revenue, and now to declare it is no revenue! Settle it one way or other, without any thing of gathering it for three months upon uncertainty. This will lead you into such a course that you will not know the end of it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think this does not lose your time, if you will settle the Revenue. You saw, since Pollexfen declared his opinion, the people have been still more in doubt. The motion is made for all the Revenue, in the lump, and this may be passed in two or three days. Then you will consider Ships, the king's Family, Ambassadors, Judges, the Army, and a part for the king's necessary support. Then you will find what may be spared for the public, and how to supply it; till this be considered, what in time of peace is requisite, and what in war; if three months be too little, make it six. When the state of war is known, you will know how near this will go to the payment.

Sir John Lowther. I will speak plainly what every man's heart is full of. The king has expressed himself in all kindness. He has trusted you with all he has in the world, and given into your hands a considerable part of the Revenue; and if you have the same jealousy of him, after all he has done and may do, this will gratify the Jesuits and France more than 200,000*l.* distributed and well given in the house of commons, to bring about their interest—

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Seeing you have not taken notice, Mr. Hampden, of what has been said to the orders of the committee, I do take notice of it.

Sir John Lowther. What I said of Money, I meant to particular persons. There have been people who have received Money, and seeing the Jesuits and Papists have spread these reports abroad, and foreign ministers will make Alliances with the States of Holland, and then if that State cease their intercourse with the king, application will be made to the house of commons, who give the Money, and not to the king. The wise part of the house of commons will understand this, though the weak do not.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am sorry that, at this time, when all manner of duty has been expressed to the king from this house, there should be reflections of '200,000*l.* well given here.' I remember, persons in former parliaments had places, and were to receive the Money they gave, therefore were freer to give money than others, and we did fear to give money to others, and not to the king. Though we are not all upon one footing of honour and trust, we are upon one equal footing of trust for our country. I cannot make the Revenue be for longer time than has been proposed. Is it not fit that you should have three months to turn you in, that abuses may not be in the collection of the Revenue? Therefore it is fit that for this temporary Bill you give it for three months, or as long as you please.

Sir Wm. Williams. In the last parliament, he was the bravest man, and some said, fellow, that would give the king most Money. All were so much for giving, that the king said, he would have no more that session. We are not now a Parliament of Officers. We represent now all the people, the wise and the weak. And I represent the weak. It is not the work of weak men, to declare a present Provision for the Crown.

Sir John Lowther. I was mistaken in not giving the Revenue for three months, but only for collecting what Revenue king James had, and that question you have had ready for you—a safe, wise, and a sudden Resolve! The king did distinguish betwixt the Collection of the Revenue and the Settlement. I would declare it for three months.

Sir Rd. Temple. I would have all arguments forborne of distrust betwixt the king and us. I am very far from desiring the short Bill to be brought in for delay of Settlement of the Revenue. Can it be imagined that bills should be brought in for all the Revenue, on a sudden? I would make no distinction in the Bill of what is continued and what not. Not by way of grant.

Sir Rob. Howard. I speak not for the poor or the rich, the weak or the strong, of the house. I have an office, but in some offices I would not have been employed—[reflecting upon Williams]. By the way, I would show by a motion to continue the Grand Committee, and to proceed on the Settlement of the Revenue; though for the present we proceed only on the temporary Bill.

Mr. Boscawen. According to course of parliament, if you grant the king an Aid, and he accept it, the Answer is, 'Grandmercie ses bons sujets,' &c. If this be no Grant, what Answer shall the king give to this Bill? If as a Grant of Subsidy, the king thanks for it. There is not so much danger in the fault of collecting it as going this way. I am of opinion rather of a Vote of the lords and commons to strengthen it for the present. I shall agree to it, but it is an ill expedient, and you will be in this box, and not know how to get out of it.

Mr. Eyre. If this be determined, you arrive not at your end. I see, in this matter of the Revenue, we go on very heavily. In a matter of this moment to support the honour of the king, whatever you do in this Bill, if it goes as is proposed, you do less than nothing, to the joy of your enemies, and sorrow of your friends. Therefore I propose a Vote, that you grant the king a Revenue for Life of 1,200,000*l.* per ann. made up of such items as in the particular, &c. A great Revenue has been a great Grievance, but it was by no other method than we had put in their hands. Such a Revenue will be an evidence of affection to the king, and will support the necessary charge of the kingdom. And while this is the standard, it can have no oppression; and less than this proposed cannot be thought of. It will be in a Protestant hand, and you cannot doubt but the spareable part will be treasured up for the good of the subject.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It has been well moved a great while since, and I wonder at no conclusion upon it. To settle it for three months is the most acceptable and expeditious thing you can do. The king does not expect that you should settle the Revenue immediately, without great caution and consideration. Therefore that the king may be in no inconvenience, settle it for three months; which will be so far from a distrust, that it is kindly and gratefully done by the people, and the king will take it well from you.

Mr. Finch. You give the king double the Revenue, if you do it for three months. You give him the Revenue, and the hearts of the people. This you will do in two days, and perhaps the other way not in two months.

Mr. Pollexfen. If you say, 'I will not give the king this Revenue, but those that pay it not shall be under all the penalties as if it was given,' this will raise all the jealousy and shame upon us imaginable abroad.

Sir Henry Capel. It is not the intention of any man here to give the king the Revenue for three months, and Pollexfen mistakes the thing. We are beholden to those gentlemen who put us in this method at first. The Book of Rates, the Act for Excise, we do not yet know; there are complaints of the ill administration of them; now is the time to correct it. I speak it to the honour of the gentleman that made the motion, that you will have no delay in the thing. Then you will see the whole establishment and the expences, and what to give for an established Revenue. It is not a time to name the Revenue now; it is the doubt of some persons whether the Revenue is, or is not sunk; but continue the Revenue entire for three months, for support of the crown, and all will agree to it.

Sir John Holt. For time to consider the Revenue, I do not oppose it, but as to the hereditary part of the Revenue, if that be determined, there will be no need of such an Act. Some are of opinion that it is determined, but I have not heard one reason for it. If the king accepts this, the question is determined; and it is in being; the Revenue was given to the crown of England, and annexed to the office of king William and queen Mary; it continues, and stands in no need of a temporary act of parliament.

Mr. Wogan. It would be strange if the Revenue granted the crown, upon a valuable consideration, instead of the Court of Wards, should determine with the late king James. Was it granted on any other consideration?

Sir Tho. Lee. I am indifferent whether you put it on the hereditary, or temporary Revenue. If you had gone according to the opinion of the learned gentlemen, you had made no Act, but let them go on to collect the Revenue. The hereditary Revenue is so little, that, I believe, the house will supply it; the reason why it is asserted is, that part must go with the crown of England. But when the king must alien this to the Bankers, this must make such men as me scruple the matter.

Sir Wm. Williams. It is not the opinion of five or six men of the Robe that will guide, but what the law is.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that a Bill be brought in to collect the Revenue till the 24th of June 1689, with a Clause of Indemnity to all who have collected it since Nov. 5, 1688, and before the 13th of February next ensuing."—Agreed to by the house.

Debate on the Vote for indemnifying the Dutch.] March 14. The house went into a grand committee on the king's Speech. Mr. Hampden in the Chair.

Mr. Hampden, jun. You have made a Vote to stand by the king with your Lives and Fortunes, in defence of the laws, and the Protestant Religion, and the king has given you a gracious Answer to your Address, and in a great measure has opened the present affairs of the nation and his allies. The condition they are in, and their deliverance, is in great measure owing to the Dutch Army under his conduct, and they have brought a great Charge upon themselves. The French king threatens Holland, and they must have a great Army to stop this torrent. In North Holland there are more Papists than Protestants, and in other places, they have nothing to depend upon but your generosity. Ireland must be thought of; besides what the king informs you of, you have it from other gentlemen that 20,000 horse and foot are the least you can send to reduce it; which will require a great sum of Money; but the king promises you it shall be laid out for the use of the nation. It is a difficult matter what to propose; but I humbly offer what has been done on the like occasion in neighbouring countries to yours. The Dutch had formerly war with Spain, and lately with the French king. They did, at the beginning of the year, make their State of War, and computed the Expences for carrying it on. By this, they took their measures from the king of France, who can raise what money he pleases. He makes the State of War himself, charges the Provinces, and they levy it to his satisfaction. I move that we may address the king, that we may have a Scheme or short State of the War drawn, of the Expence we must be at. As for the payment of his Debt to the Dutch, that is in pretty good forwardness.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. It is absolutely necessary to support the government, and the Revenue is necessary to be settled for the support of the government. The methods proposed to you last time the Committee sat may be considered. We lie under the greatest obligation imaginable to the king, who has delivered us, and eased us from a Tax so burdensome to the people. You are not yet ready, I conceive, for Hampden's motion, but for the ordinary Expences, it is absolutely necessary to support the Government.

Sir Rd. Temple. You are upon a method to proceed upon the king's Speech; all that has been moved has been contributory to it. I would have all you are to do before you, and then you will know what to apply to the Civil Government, and the other matters; as the Expence of the Dutch; and next, to assist the Dutch according to the Alliance, and the charge of it by computation given in; then, the farther charge of the Navy, besides what you are to assist the Dutch with; and then, the computation of the Affairs of Ireland. The king tells us, for Ireland it will require 20,000 men; what horse, what foot, &c. with the charge of transportation.

Sir Tho. Lee. Consider first the Charge of this present year, and then know what will make up these extraordinary charges. For the Fleet, and other charges, we are not tied up to a computation brought in to us, but what we shall judge of it.

Sir Wm. Williams. I never knew the house get any thing by looking into Bills of Parcels. I am as willing as any man to give Aid as far as the kingdom can bear it. I would consider what we are able to do, and you shall see I am in earnest to come roundly to it. First, make a retribution to the States of Holland, and leave the king to dispose of it as he thinks good. It is their men, and money, that have done our work. I move for a sum not exceeding 500,000*l.* for that purpose.

Mr. Papillon. Our condition is not so secure as it is thought. There is a great enemy that has an intention to destroy both the Dutch and us. Here is yet no Settlement of the Revenue, and they will be hard put to it. I see not so hearty a union abroad, as I could wish, though I am glad to see it in this house; but I fear there is an intention to undermine us. Here is yet no Settlement of the Revenue, the Oaths, nor the Courts of Justice. We know the computation of the Charge pretty near, and I believe the whole about 6 or 700,000*l.* If you voluntarily give the Dutch such a sum, without casting it up to a penny or two pence. But it is to me of great consequence, that as we address the king on other occasions, we may do it on this, that if we do support Alliances, we may be fixed in them. You cannot avoid war with France, and you must support Alliances, and let the king know so much. As for the Charge of Ireland, it is easily known, 20,000 men being the number given in; if we go to particulars, we shall never have an end. And as for the Customs, though some of them have been irregular, yet gather them as they have been these 28 years. Therefore I would address the king for an Alliance with the Dutch, which will save us, and we will supply him to support them.

Mr. Harbord. The king, in his great prudence, caused the Dutch ambassador to make an Account in general; accordingly the Secretary of the Admiralty made a computation of the charge. I have it in my hand. The king likewise commanded the Charge of Ireland to be computed, besides our defence at home; but that will not be perfect till to-morrow.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would have something we understand. The Account is in guilders; we know not the value of them. I would have them computed to the value of our money. The debate runs upon Aid and Supply. It is not fit to state the Revenue, what it is for the maintenance of the Government? It is not reasonable we should bear all the charge.—Taken down to order by Mr. Harbord. It is said, 'it is not reasonable England should bear all the charge.' The prince took the ancient troops of the States, and agreed with the German princes to supply them; they had the money, and the prince has bought them for ever; and it is not reasonable that England should pay all that charge for six months expedition only. I told the king, it was impossible to supply all at once. 'Therefore (says the king) I desire 200,000*l.* down, and the rest of the payments betwixt this and next Spring;' but there will not be so much for Ireland as for Holland. If the king of France, by fair or foul means, makes peace with Holland, you may throw your caps at Ireland. If the French king spreads his money among the Dutch, and says, 'I have seized your ships, but will let them go, and will make peace with you and the emperor,' what impression will this make among the populace! Says the king, 'Let the world see you take Holland into your arms, their spirits will rise, and be able to defend themselves:' say they, 'Give us but this credit, if your fleet is not ready, ours shall be.' But as for the Revenue, it cannot be computed; the Customs, by reason of the French goods, &c. fall to nothing.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am ready to give the States of Holland all the returns of thanks for their great assistance in our extremity, and would have a union of coalition to support them, and ourselves; but I would consider what condition we are in. Says Harbord, 'they are ready to go into a war with France, and what becomes of your Revenue then?' But consider, if the Excise be certain, if the Customs do fall, we may aid the king from time to time for that defect. At the present, here is 500,000*l.* besides 1,200,000*l.* per ann. We have already given 400,000*l.*, and was it not upon part of the obligation to Holland? I do say, besides all the uncertainty, there is 500,000*l.* to supply all necessities. Take out the ordinary Revenue, and you have latitude upon the rest for taking money up upon security. The treasure of the nation is in your hands. I suppose you will dispose wisely of what is above the ordinary expence of the government.

Mr. Papillon. Eleven guilders is 10*s.* sterling, which, by ordinary computation, will come to 663,752*l.* sterling, for the Dutch charges.

Mr. Howe. There were reflections abroad on our proceedings yesterday. I would not believe ourselves like bullies, to eat and drink at a tavern, then quarrel with one another, go away, and leave the reckoning unpaid; and I fear we shall leave the Dutch so. As the gentleman said to his creditors, 'he will tell them to-morrow when they shall come again.' We are told of the French king and king James making preparations for Ireland; but he comes not thither as king James, but as the French king's minister. He has the French king's Intendant des Finances, and the French king has made regents over him, as some would have made him here. If you would have the Papists turn our churches into chapels, and make bonfires of the Protestants, then put this debate off till to-morrow. Therefore I move that Mr. Hampden may leave the chair, and that the house be moved for a Supply, &c. and give the people credit, that the delay may be no longer laid upon us; and name a sum of Money for the States of Holland, &c.

Mr. Harbord. You have had a good motion made. I would not have Mr. Hampden leave the chair till you resolve to move the house for a Supply for the Dutch, according to the computation given in.

Mr. Hampden. The committee never makes a motion for a sum: that is made in the house.

Mr. Godolphin. The gentleman over the way was upon a topic to induce the house to give Money, &c. which was from the French king's tampering in Holland, &c. I was in Holland when this house was zealous for an actual war with France, and then a peace was privately treated with France; which we ought to prevent now. If we cannot reduce Ireland, unless we secure Holland, that must be your first step. I move therefore, that the king be addressed to make a stricter Alliance with the States, and invite the emperor into it, for common security against France.

Mr. Pollerfen. Though we pay more for this Expedition than it has cost the Dutch, let us not enter into particulars; it will more heartily show our affection without examining them. The interest of the king puts us upon embracing the Dutch; if we show coldness, or delay, to aid and assist them, what will the world say? That we do not make returns for what they have done for us. I know no king, but the French king, that can hurt us, and considering what our ancestors have done, have we not by the prevalency of that king destroyed our neighbours? Let the world see we are returned to our senses, and that we are truly English.—The Speaker took the Chair.

Mr. Boscawen. The nature of the question, is, 'To give the king a Supply, to enable him to reimburse the Dutch, &c.' If the gentleman means to prove the charge, Harbord told you the king had examined it; and I believe if you will examine it farther, you will get nothing by that.

Sir Tho. Lee. I confess, I know not how to speak in this. It seems, by some gentlemen, if we come not to a sudden Resolution in this, we are undone; but possibly this nation and

Holland will not be lost for one night's consideration. I have seen money granted here suddenly, but by them that have had shares in it afterwards. If the importance of this be such that we must break order, as formerly in the Long Parliament—

Mr. Howe. When I heard Lee move, I looked to see what o'clock it was. I would leave dinners for once, and go on.

Sir Wm. Williams. I can fast as well as Howe, but I cannot pray so well.

Mr. Howe. If Williams had gone on in the way he was once in, we should have had all fasting and no praying.

Sir Wm. Williams. Howe has forgot that the Bishops were acquitted, and who had a hand in doing it.

Mr. Howe. I protest, I do not accuse Williams for acquitting them.

The debate was adjourned to the following day; when it was resolved, "That 600,000*l.* be given to his majesty, to enable him to defray the Charges laid out by the Dutch in the Expedition to England."

Debate on the Mutiny of lord Dumbarton's Regiment.] March 15. Mr. Harbord. Lord Dumbarton's regiment, which is now marshal Schomberg's, with the grenadiers and some officers, have deserted, and chosen two captains. They have seized the Artillery at Ipswich, and have made Proclamation for king James. The regiment of fusileers is at Harwich; they say, they will declare with them. They are 1500 men, with the train of artillery,* and how many will join them I do not know.

Sir Jonathan Jennings. In order to what has been reported, certainly I believe there is more than ordinary in these things. I have received a letter from the mayor of Rippon, of some Papists, to the same effect; that the Papists are very high, ride in numbers, and have cabals. Therefore I think it fit that you secure your sitting here, and that the Government may be preserved.

Mr. Harbord. I hear, by letters from Norwich, 'that a Papist was seen by several to go into a house, and immediately the house was on fire, and he got to a place to have the prospect of it.' The person is examined and secured.

Mr. Howe. When we look before us, and see these things, there is a fault somewhere. I would know how these officers remain in command; and would address the king that some of the Dutch troops may be sent after them. I know not which else to trust.

* These regiments had been ordered by his majesty (with some others) to repair to the sea side, under the command of lord Churchill. (See the Journal). They all took the road to Scotland. General Ginkle was ordered to pursue them with a sufficient force of horse and dragoons, who soon obliged them to submit to the king's mercy; and the only punishment he inflicted on them was to send them over to serve in Holland.

Sir Rd. Temple. You see the present condition you are in. I would revive the Committee for banishing the Papists out of town. I know not what to advise you, unless an Address to the king to take some speedy course with the Papists; and I would have a Bill, 'That, if any person shall write, speak, or declare for king James, he be speedily brought to trial.'

Col. Birch. This is no jesting business; this is the countenance of more men than those 600 that were quartered at Brentford, and went away with their arms; and I believed they would come to the rest. This is not done without conduct; and you will have an army in a few days. I would address the king, 'That some foot and horse of the king's own, and what may be trusted, may join together,' and I hope, without a Bill, to dispatch these men.

Mr. Hampden. For the nature of the thing, I shall state the case; you need not be long resolving. I believe this an actual levying war by 25 Edw. 3. You cannot have counsel here that will be difficult. Do you but resolve this to be treason, and if king William and queen Mary be king and queen, this is treason; and correspondence, upon levying war, is treason, I believe. I would apply to the king to take some course in this, and that you will assist him.

Sir Wm. Williams. No doubt this is an actual levying war. Since you have acknowledged king William and queen Mary to be king and queen, whoever does adhere to the king's enemies, in or out of the kingdom, it is treason; so you need not make a law for it ex post facto, but it is provided by your old law to be treason; for they are king and queen de facto; and that law is a safe foundation for you to go upon; and come to a speedy resolution of this house, that they have committed treason, and so bring them to a speedy judgment, and thus the people will go along with you.

Sir George Treby. In this, I observe one thing, that it is good we have a king, for if we had had no king, nor parliament sitting, since they are so insolent in the face of the king and parliament, what would they have done if the nation had wanted one of them? In this crisis, if we cannot defend ourselves by law and sword, it is time for us to dig our graves, and lie down in them. Can any man doubt that this is treason? Your declaring it to be treason will weaken it, as if it were a doubt. I confess, I am not capable of advising you what to do, and (with great respect) I think this house not proper for military men's advice. We must go to war and open force, and we must oppose force with force, and maintain in the field what we have done in our council and senate. Therefore I move that the lord lieutenancies and deputies may be in such hands as the kingdom may be, and we sit in safety. I think all the powers of our profession useless in such a case.

Sir Robert Clayton. The wonder of all this is, that we have not heard one word of the trumpeters of these disorders. They cannot forbear reflections upon persons the nation has an honour for. At Newcastle, some priests labour, all they can, to promote this work. I would have something done to stop these people's mouths.

Col. Mildmay. It is generally believed that these you are informed of are not barely alone, but that it is universal; and, as for those trumpeters, who have forborne praying for king William and queen Mary, and go not to church to hear it prayed, the question is, which is the best way to prevent this? It is said, 'What is done in so great an assembly will not be long a secret.' I think this proper in the king's council to whom you have given the government. The militia of England is a great body, 150,000 men, that serve you gratis; they bear their own charges, and you are safe in them. This being delayed (with some other things which have been too long) I cannot wonder now at the circumstances we are under: I rather wonder that we are so well, than so ill. I would recommend it to the king to settle the Militia, and especially that of London. As for the Money, I doubt not that you will lose any time. In the mean time, I would have letters to the sheriffs to stop them in their march.

Sir Henry Capel. I think you are ripe for a question. It is plain from what I have heard from the robe that this is treason. Corresponding with the late king is treason. I hope in time, that care will be taken that this impudence of preaching may be taken care of, and it will be mended. I would apply to the king for a Proclamation against these men.

Major Wildman. I have heard sad news, and many things have been well proposed; but the suppressing these men it is proper to leave to the king: but we ought to represent it to the king; and now we see so great a boil broke out, how many are like to break out? It is our duty to inform the king what we hear from all parts. I must inform the house that I have letters every day of the ill condition of the soldiers in their quarters; at Newbury, Abingdon, and other places, they would not suffer the cryer, or bell-man, to say, 'God bless king William and queen Mary!' There are papers cast about, to fright people with the change of the government, with millions; hundreds of these are dispersed; I have received some. The disease is so general, I know not what to propose; but it is proper for this house to give the king the best informations we can of the officers who connive at these things. I offer to the house to address the king to take a special care of the places where the late king's soldiers are quartered, and especially to have an eye that the officers prevent disorders, and to be fully assured of his officers, both civil and military.

Mr. Hampden. I offer it, notwithstanding the opinion of the learned gent., as I am not of opinion, 'that it is a vain thing to declare this Desertion of the Soldiers to be treason.' This at the first was taken only for soldiers mutinying, but what is there in declaring this to be within the 25th of Edw. 3? Soldiers deserting and corresponding with the king's enemies to be treason? You must speak out and say, this is high treason, and this will put an end to it, and men will be afraid to countenance it; and go to the lords, that, by your joint advice, the king may issue out his Proclamation to enforce the law, as your advice, as the only proper remedy, and that you will give the king your assistance in it.

Sir John Lowther. At the same time when you advise the Proclamation, consider the occasion, and then the proper remedies, that the cause may be taken away. In former reigns, criminals were so much the more enemies by how much they were in desperation, and therefore I would put men out of doubt, and make as many friends as we can. Therefore I move, that whether, as you made a strict enquiry into Grievances, there may not as well be an Act of Oblivion at the same time, and, at the same time, that you address the king to proclaim his pardon to such as shall surrender themselves, and return to their obedience and duty.

Sir Rob. Howard. The lords and commons addressing the king makes the Proclamation have greater force, and next to an act of parliament; but as for the Oblivion just moved to be put in, it looks as if you were afraid, and is a kind of seconding these men in their rebellion, and all this will look little less than an act of parliament.—An Address was voted accordingly.

Resolved, nem. con. "That an Address be presented to his majesty to desire him to take effectual care to suppress the Soldiers that are now in Rebellion, and to issue his Proclamation to declare them, and all that adhere to them, to be Rebels and Traitors." And the same day, the said Address being drawn and approved of, was, with the concurrence of the lords, presented to the king at Hampton-court; who was pleased to return the following Answer:

"That he should be very ready and careful to give such orders, as the lords and commons should desire; and that he had already appointed three regiments of dragoons, with orders to stop them and bring them to their duty; and, if they will not submit, to fall upon them: and that he would send immediate directions to his Attorney-General, to prepare a Proclamation, according to the desire of both houses, in the Address."

Debate on the Bill for disarming Papists.]
March 16. Serj. Maynard. We are so mealy-mouthed and soft-handed to the Papists, that it occasions their insolence. I think it is fitting that all Papists should resort to their own dwellings, and not depart without licences from the next justices; and another thing, that all those of that religion bring all their fire-arms in, unless for the necessary defence of their houses, to officers appointed. It is not our Votes, nor the Ordinances of lords and commons, nor our being hot here, that will do it. I would not imitate their cruelty; I am far from it. I would let them have their religion in their private houses, but no harbouring Priests and Jesuits. You will pardon my boldness, but I hope I have done my duty.

Col. Birch. I think Maynard's is an excellent motion, and in good time. If we make a new Bill, perhaps it will not do so well, but, upon this motion of Maynard's, I would refer it to the same committee for the lords Bill, and farther, that the informer may have half the arms for his discovery.

Mr. Wogan. If you find not a way to convict them, you cannot disarm them. I would have a clause for it in the Bill.

Serj. Maynard. If any Papist should have a hand in firing houses, he should be compelled to help to rebuild them. For the present, if they do not deliver their arms upon the king's Proclamation, they shall be subject to such penalties as the law shall direct; in the mean time, that they be admonished.

The Speaker. I would not have this without effect, which, I apprehend, it will be unless they are convicted, and being not convicted they will say they are not concerned, not being convicted, and not one man will go out of town, nor deliver their arms. Unless actually convicted, you cannot know a Papist, and you will have no effect of this Proclamation.

Serj. Maynard. What you say is true, but they know themselves to be Papists, and upon the Proclamation you may lay your hands upon them severely.

Mr. Hampden. The insolence of the Papists is grown great, I hear out of the country. Do not give them encouragement by a brutum fulmen. I will not contradict Maynard in point of law; I know not who are Papists. He must be a legal Papist, else he is not within the Proclamation. Proclamations are to enforce, not to make, laws. He will keep his house according to law, and not go out of town. What law have you to compel him to deliver his horses? There you make a law clearly. I would not have gentlemen think that I believe it not just; but will you advise the king to cause the Papists to deliver up all sorts of horses, that are fit for warlike service, either for baggage, or dragoons? We shall terrify people by this Proclamation, the parliament now sitting; and we are told we must make an Act to do it. I confess this is new; I never heard it in a Proclamation before. If you advise the king this, he will say, 'see you advise me according to law;' he will order his counsel learned to draw it up; but they will say, it is not according to law. It is a hard point; if these objections are not of weight, I am mistaken. But you may have a law to offer the Papists the Tests, and you may have it presently executed by justices of the peace, when they are named. Something must be done, and speedily done, but put not yourselves upon difficulties, nor the king, but if you will have a short law for convicting them, I am for it.

Mr. Howe. If these gentlemen, the Papists, want paper to stop their guns, they may do it with Proclamations. I would have the king take up such persons as he may have just cause to suspect.

Col. Birch. I would not have this morning's debate lost, but have some fruits of it. I humbly desire that a committee may sit, and, upon debate of the house, a Bill may be brought in to convict them.

Sir Rd. Temple. I doubt that Bill will not do your business that is calculated for London; you will so alter the frame of that bill, that it would be better to have it in another bill.

Resolved, "That a Bill be brought in for the more speedy convicting and disarming of Papists."

The King's Speech in favour of Dissenters.] March 16. The commons being commanded to attend the king in the house of peers, his majesty gave the royal assent to 'The Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act,' and that, 'to annul the Attainder of lord Russel;' and made the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; Now I have the occasion of coming hither to pass these Bills, I shall put you in mind of one thing, which will conduce much to our Settlement, as a Settlement will to the disappointment of our enemies.—I am with all the expedition I can, filling up the vacancies that are in Offices and Places of trust, by this Revolution. I know you are sensible there is a necessity of some law to settle the Oaths to be taken by all persons to be admitted to such Places. I recommend it to your care to make a speedy provision for it: and as I doubt not but you will sufficiently provide against Papists, so, I hope, you will leave room for the Admission of all Protestants that are willing and able to serve. This conjunction in my service, will tend to the better uniting you among yourselves, and the strengthening you against your common adversaries."

Debate on the Bill for the Regulation of Trials.] March 20. A Bill, from the lords, for the Regulation of Trials, was read the first time.

Sir Tho. Lee. If I had not once seen a Bill of this nature laid on the table, and passed in an afternoon, I should not be against letting it lie on the table. Lord Clarendon's Bill of Banishment was passed a month after the Impachment, when it was thought most convenient for him; which then I thought of dangerous consequence. It is my opinion that this Bill be thrown out; notwithstanding the good Clauses in it, it may be done for me and my family. When bills upon the first appearance are dangerous, they are usually thrown out upon the first reading. I would have all things in this parliament of a piece. You thought good for the present emergency to part with the Habeas Corpus act for a time, but is this the way to secure the government, to give liberty to the peers to conspire with James 2? I shall never think it for the peace of the government, if you pass this Bill, to let the peers do all they please with impunity. The end and design of the bill is, that the peers may have challenges, as the commons have. The bill is of no use to you. For here is a number of peers of the last parliament, or ought to be. Perhaps not above 80 temporal lords, and 60 summoned; some may be sick, or have business, or may be solicited to be absent: if 45 appear, and 20 are excepted against, there can be no trial. It was upon this argument before, when the lords sent down a Bill of this nature, 'that unless the lords were under the common safety of others, the king sitting in their house, and hearing their debates, they were in danger.' Is this a time to have that jealousy, now we are under this happy change? Were it for nothing else, pray let us not overturn the whole frame of government for the lord's sake. Every clause, in the Bill, relating to the commons, is equally beneficial to the lords. 'In Indictments for Treason, (the Bill tells us) we shall have counsel,' and it is for able Juries; is it not as well for the lords as us? For they must be tried in Appeals by common juries. The Bill is abundantly less beneficial to the commons than the lords. The crown you can oblige by intercourse of Aids, but there is none betwixt the lords and you. Great purchases were made of these Honours. Notwithstanding the dangers the lords apprehend, the bill is of dangerous consequence to the commons, and for the honour of the house I would reject it.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. No man can deny but that the lords ought to have fair Trials. Whenever the crown has a displeasure to a noble peer, by practices he may be drawn into treason, and a high steward may be appointed, and seven of the summoned lords to try him may take away his life. Will you at this time differ with the lords? This is a time, when you have a good king, to get good laws. The peers were very instrumental in bringing about this good change, and they desire only that their posterity may be in good condition, and out of danger. Some clauses relating to the commons are inestimable, as 'that a Juryman shall have 20*l.* per ann. of freehold to try a commoner;' and, 'that counsel shall be allowed in treason, &c.' Col. Sidney had not lost his life, if he had had counsel allowed him. Had that been four years ago, it might have saved the life of many a person. I hope you will take care for the future against the same danger. A commoner may exempt peremptorily against 35 jurors. I would have a good correspondence with the lords.

Sir Wm. Williams. I have a great honour for the peers, and as far as with justice I will do it. This Bill is not only dangerous to the commons, but to the crown too. There is a little sprinkling of Holy Water in this bill. It provides (as the Bill is penned) 'that all manner of crimes may be tried by the peers.' Though the preamble of the Bill tells you of Trials of 'capital crimes,' yet the body of the bill is 'all Trials.'—All peers are on their Honour; and you alter the very constitution of the kingdom. It may so fall out that the number of peers cannot be had, that this law requires, and so there may be a failure of justice. The whole design of the Bill is, that there may be a number of peers, that may judge against law and right. But can you give any one instance, that any peer, in our memory, ever miscarried upon the ancient way of Trial? if we had found any lamentable experience and example of this ancient way of Trial—but there being none, why should you alter the law for a bare suspicion only? In James 2's time, lord Brandon was found guilty by his fellow commoners, and condemned: * lord Delamere† by his peers was acquitted. What advantage do we get by this bill? We would have fair and equal Trial, and shall we, in prejudice of the commons, give this challenge away? It is almost impossible to have just trial this way. The peers are most of a blood, (the ancient peers) and so a commoner can have no fair trial against a peer, and they have already more privileges than the commons. You, by this, advance the peerage against the common right of the commons, and make it neither in the power of the king, nor the commons, to bring a peer to justice. The commons are straitened, and the crown is straitened. How many men have been undone by Scandalum magnatum! Commoners have had 20,000*l.* verdict against them; and a peer thinks himself dishonoured unless the jury gives what he demands. I would rather provide against these things. If the lords will set a limitation to Scandalum magnatum; (it may lie 20 years, and they may bring it about) if the lords will agree that no words shall be scandal, but where an action may be brought by a commoner against a commoner—Suppose a commoner say, 'He cares for a peer no more than a dog,' though a peer call me rogue and rascal—Let the lords frame a fair Bill, and we will pass it. If they will have ceremony, we will compliment them, and stand bare in their lobby, and the Painted Chamber, at conference; but matter of right we shall dispute.

* "In 1685, 'for conspiring with other false traitors (Monmouth, &c.) to raise a Rebellion, depose and put to death the late king, &c.' of which being found guilty by the prostitute juries of these times, he received sentence of death; but by applying properly made a shift to obtain a pardon; which sir John Reresby celebrates as a signal act of grace, because that lord had formerly been condemned for breaking a boy's neck in his cups, and had been admitted to mercy." Ralph.

† Lord Delamere's charge was 'for being an accomplice with Monmouth, in his late Rebellion.'

Pray lay aside the Bill. What relates to the commons that are Grievances already, your Bill may do; and they are put into this Bill for a handle.

Sir Rob. Howard. By the consequence of Williams's discourse, he is for the Bill and against it. I think the Bill is rather descending to us than taking from us. That of Scandalum magnatum added to the bill may be of use. The bill does us no hurt. Methinks Juries of finding the Scandalum magnatum at excessive damage, and fines with salvo contentemento, may be remedied, and I am for the Bill.

Mr. Hampden. I am not for throwing out the Bill, nor for a second reading of it. Let it lie upon the table. I hear an instance of passing lord Clarendon's Bill of Banishment, &c. The house was then very thin. All Clarendon's friends were for passing it. A relation of Clarendon's for not passing it was at a distance—I am not for throwing it out, nor for a second reading, for I do not know the parts of it. Let it be well considered. If you cast out the bill, you can receive no bill of this matter this session. I would read it a second time in a full house.

Mr. Finch. I am for letting the Bill lie upon the table, and so be read in a full house. The objection for throwing it out is, because the peers have an equal benefit with the commons, which is no objection. The number objected of the peers, 'that they may be solicited to stay away, &c.' they may be so to appear too.

The Speaker. To let the Bill lie upon the table, and order it no second reading, I never saw. The proper question is, 'Whether you will read it a second time.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The natural question is, 'Whether you will read it a second time.' The reason why you let the Bill lie upon the table, after you have read it, is, you are masters of the parts of it. In former parliaments, we were well acquainted with this Bill. I would have a question that every body may be gratified in. I would adjourn the debate.—The debate was adjourned till Monday fortnight.

Account of the Produce of the Excise.] Col. Birch, according to order, delivered in An ABSTRACT of the gross and neat Produce of the EXCISE of England and Wales, in four years, ending 24th June 1688, viz.

Year ended 24th June, 1685.

Gross Excise of Beer, Ale, Cyder, Metheglin, Strong-waters, Coffee, &c. - -	£.	s.	d.
Gross Excise of Brandy, Mum and Cyder, imported - -	627,523	18	8½
	48,491	3	8½
	676,015	2	4½

Per Contra.

Charges of Management -	86,263	11	0½
Exported Beer, &c. - - -	1,138	11	5½
Arrears - - - - -	3,721	5	4½
Neat Produce - - - - -	584,891	14	6
	676,015	2	4½

Year ended 24 June, 1686.

Gross Excise of Beer, Ale, Cyder, Metheglin, Strong-waters, Coffee, &c. - -	£.	s.	d.
Gross Excise of Brandy, Mum and Cyder, imported - -	638,993	11	9½
	33,741	3	10½
	672,734	15	8½

Per Contra.

Charges of Management -	85,852	14	6
Exported Beer, &c. - - -	620	16	0½
Arrears - - - - -	2,128	2	3½
Neat Produce - - - - -	584,133	2	10½
	672,734	15	8½

Year ended 24 June, 1687.

Gross Excise of Beer, Ale, Cyder, Metheglin, Strong-water, Coffee, &c. - - -	£.	s.	d.
Gross Excise of Brandy, Mum and Cyder, imported - -	676,866	10	7½
	41,385	10	2
	718,252	0	9½

Per Contra.

Charges of Management -	87,139	2	11½
Allowance for Overcharge -	5	4	2½
Arrears - - - - -	5,216	11	11½
Neat Produce - - - - -	625,891	1	7½
	718,252	0	9½

Year ended 24 June, 1688.

Gross Excise of Beer, Ale, Cyder, Metheglin, Strong-waters, Coffee, &c. - -	£.	s.	d.
Gross Excise of Brandy, Mum and Cyder, imported - -	682,172	9	3½
	50,146	9	1
	732,318	18	4½

Per Contra.

Charges of Management -	88,639	15	9½
Allowance for Overcharge -	30	4	10½
Arrears - - - - -	7,290	4	11½
Neat Produce - - - - -	636,358	12	8½
	732,318	18	4½

Memorandum. The additional Duty upon Brandy and Strong-waters, which began the 1st of July, 1685, is not included in these Accounts; which doth amount to 45,000*l.* per ann.

The gross and neat PRODUCE of the additional EXCISE upon Brandy imported, and inland Strong-waters, from the 1st of July, 1685, at which time it first began, to the 24th of June, 1688; viz.

From 1st July, 1685; to 24th June, 1686.

The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon Brandy imported - - - - -	£.	s.	d.
The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon inland Strong-waters - - - - -	27,949	13	11
	7,583	7	7½
	35,533	1	6½

Per Contra.
By Poundage allowed to the Collectors of Brandy in the Out-Ports, at 2s. per Pound	£.	s.	d.
	946	16	7
By incident Charges in the Port of London, and the Out-Ports - - - - -	261	7	8½
By neat Produce - - - - -	34,324	17	3
	35,533	1	6½

From the 24th June, 1686; to the 24th June, 1687,
The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon Brandy imported - - - - -	37,365	2	0
The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon inland Strong-waters - - - - -	8,614	9	11
	45,979	11	11

Per Contra.
By Poundage allowed to the Collectors of Brandy in the Out-Ports, at 2s. per Pound	998	10	1½
By incident Charges in the Port of London, and in the Out-Ports - - - - -	348	17	6¼
By neat Produce - - - - -	44,632	4	3¼
	45,979	11	11

From 24th June, 1687; to the 24th June, 1688.
The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon Brandy imported - - - - -	45,224	6	2½
The gross Produce of the additional Excise upon inland Strong-waters - - - - -	9,292	13	5
	54,516	19	7½

Per Contra.
By Poundage allowed to the Collectors of Brandy in the Out-Ports, at 2s. per Pound	968	0	1¼
By incident Charges in the Port of London, and in the Out-Ports - - - - -	322	7	7
By neat Produce - - - - -	53,226	11	11¼
	54,516	19	7½

Estimate of the Charge of Government.] Sir Rob. Howard, according to order, delivered in the following Accounts and Estimates:

An ABSTRACT of the Medium Expences of the late king James II. by actual Payments in Money, for Three Years, from Lady-day 1685, to Lady-day 1688; viz.

To the Navy - - - - -	417,462	12	10
Ordnance - - - - -	83,493	9	3
Forces - - - - -	610,883	1	5
Household - - - - -	66,006	2	2
Treasurer of the Chamber - - - - -	28,443	5	2
Wardrobe - - - - -	15,125	3	11
Robes - - - - -	2,676	14	9
Works - - - - -	24,663	19	3

Foreign Ministers - - - - -	32,657	9	7
Stables - - - - -	11,045	13	0
Sundry Fees and Salaries paid at the Exchequer, and alibi	56,495	12	7
Pensions and Annuities - - - - -	146,703	17	3
Band of Pensioners - - - - -	6,000	0	0
Bounties, in gross Sums, paid at the Exchequer - - - - -	27,680	10	8
Secret Services per Mr. Guy - - - - -	89,968	8	2
Per Secretary of State - - - - -	6,066	13	4
Sir Stephen Fox - - - - -	9,333	6	8
Privy-Purse - - - - -	26,416	13	4
Mint paid out of Coinage - - - - -	-	-	-
Jewels and Plate - - - - -	15,740	6	0
Impost-Bills - - - - -	96	12	0
Contingencies, not reducible to the foregoing Heads - - - - -	22,403	6	3

£. 1,699,363 2 9

Memorandum. The Principal and Interest to the Bankers and their Assigns, and the Interest of Monies borrowed.

NOTES referring to the Estimate of the Expence of the Crown.

Navy.—In the last four years of Ch. 2. the Charge of the Navy was never less than 400,000*l.* per ann.

Household.—In Ch. 2's time computed at 107,000*l.*

Ordnance.—The Ordnance was always paid 1000*l.* the week, and 2000*l.* the quarter, which is per ann. 60,000*l.* And this Ordinary was never less; what was more, as in the Medium, was paid by peculiar Warrants.

Forces.—In the last six years of king Ch. 2. the Expence of the Force amounted to about 300,000*l.* per ann.

Treasurer of the Chamber.—The annual Expence, in Ch. 2's time, was computed at 30,000*l.*

Robes.—King Ch. 2. when all Heads were retrenched, continued the Robes at the Expence of 5000*l.* per ann.

Pensions and Annuities.—By the medium, it appears, one year's payment 146,703*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*

In these years 50,000*l.* paid to the Queen Consort every year. To the queen dowager 18,200*l.* yearly. To the prince and princess of Denmark yearly 32,000*l.*: but their Expences have exceeded this about 8000*l.* a year; which has been paid out of Bounty, in gross.

Privy-Purse.—In Ch. 2's time the Privy-Purse was computed at 30,000*l.* per ann.

Impost Bills.—In Ch. 2's time, was 3,600*l.* per ann.

Contingencies, &c. As Clerkships, Repairing the Highways, Law-suits, Liberates in the Exchequer, and other Casualties.

The Charge of the Crown, by the Medium presented, is	£.	s.	d.
yearly - - - - -	1,699,363	2	9
In Ch. 2's time, the Charge of the Forces was about 300,000 l. per ann. - - -	300,000	0	0

1,399,363 2 9

Charges upon the Revenue.

Mr. Tho. Fox, for the Security of his Place of Receiver of the Customs, by Tally - - - - -	£	s.	d.
Mr. Duncombe, for the same, on the Excise - - - - -	20,000	0	0
The City, on the Excise - - - - -	20,000	0	0
To Mr. Hornby, on the Excise - - - - -	185,525	0	0
To Mr. Hall, on the Hearth Money - - - - -	5,000	0	0
	47,000	0	0
	277,525	0	0

There is in Arrear to the Army and Navy, about -	300,000	0	0
There is also a yearly Charge of 79,566 l. 14 s. 2 d. for perpetual Interest to the Goldsmiths and their Assigns; which is now in Arrear, at Lady-day next, for six years - - - - -	477,400	5	0

Resolved, "That the said Accounts be referred to the Committee of the whole house, who are to take into consideration the Revenue, and the constant and necessary Charge of supporting the Crown."

Farther Debate on the King's Revenue.
The house then resolved into a Committee of the whole house to take into consideration the Revenue.

Sir Wm. Williams. I take the Revenue to be 1,580,000*l.* out of this certainty I deduct the Hearth Money, 200,000*l.* Your immediate Charge then is the constant Charge of the crown. If you give the crown too little, you may add at any time; if once you give too much, you will never have it back again. Therefore I would declare the constant Charge of the crown.

Mr. Sacheverell. I agree, that it is necessary to consider the constant Charge of the crown in time of peace. By the Charge of the Navy and Army, in king James's time, we cannot make computation, nor from the calculation made from king Charles's, when the Expence was extravagant. Rather then compute the moderate Charge in king Charles's time. I would know whether, in the years 1673, 4, 5, 6, the Customs did not arise to as much as in all the severe way of management? 'Tis necessary that you agree what the common Expence of the Government is, under Heads, as it was drawn up in the time of sir Wm. Coventry; the Pensions were never heard of till Mr. Guy's time. Expences are much lessened, and the Revenue advanced. Bating the Navy and the Army, I would see if the constant Charge is not above 400,000*l.* per ann. As if 600,000*l.* for an Army for ever—To find all the Navy out of repair, and cost as much as when in-service, I cannot agree. Because the Army and Navy cannot but be maintained, therefore I am of opinion, that the Navy and Army are not to be considered in the constant Charge. I doubt not but we shall give what is necessary; but I would consider the Navy and Army as an extraordinary Charge.

Mr. Guy. I hear my name mentioned upon the head of great Sums, though under the denomination of Secret Service. The reason was, to ease the charge of the great seal: But, be it what it will, I am ready to give account, to a penny, of what I received.

Mr. Garroway. I am ready to serve you to come to an end. I agree not to the Medium; but if you will come to make a Revenue for the king, we cannot say the Revenue will stand to 1000, or 10,000*l.* there being several variations of the Customs in several years. We are now providing for a War, and something of the Revenue may be applicable to it. I except not against the accounts of the several particulars of the small branches of the Revenue, but I hope the king will contribute to the War as well as we; it is for his safety. Shall we be worse husbands now, than in the late kings reigns, in all the extravagancies of expences? Compute the necessary Charge of the Crown, and let the remainder be applied to the Charge of the War.

Col. Birch. I would refer all the Charge of the Government, and that of the Houshold, to the privy council, except that of the Navy, the family that rises and falls upon occasion. This being presented to the house, you will immediately see the Charge; else you will be long in your Resolutions.

Mr. Harbord. Here have been several motions. You may be sure, that the money you give will not be spent in debauchery and lewdness, but employed as you would have it. Either to make particular provision, &c. or in gross, I am indifferent. In another thing, you must give the king your helping hand, or else you do nothing: There is a farm given out of the Customs to the dutchess of Portsmouth's children, which is the farmage of coals, and that is in papists hands.

Sir Henry Capel. You are pretty near a question. The establishment of the Government is agreed on all hands: there remains nothing but provision for the Ordnance, Army, and Fleet. Though in peace you'll allow for a summer-guard, and in winter for the safety of trade: the Plantations, Indies, (and they had more men of war there than we here) these are to be considered, in time of peace, as part of the Government in peace. I do not understand, that what is established for the Fleet and Ordnance is for the sum total of the extraordinary Charge. The question is only now, of having an account brought you. You will have no head of it of Secret Service to trouble you. There must be an Establishment for the Queen, and princess Anne, who has deserved very well of the nation.

Sir Tho. Clarges. What Charge is for the Fleet in time of peace, must go into that in time of war. There is a Charge of the Ordnance of 80,000*l.* per ann. for yatches, and ketches, &c. The fairest way will be, to agree a certain sum for the Revenue, and not meddle with the distribution of it, and so refer it to the king; who, if it be too little, will inform you by his ministers, and if it be wanting, you may supply it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I know not how the condition of the War may leave you. I love not to please myself with the names of a Navy and Army. But not so properly till we see how things stand abroad; how Alliances are concluded: but I think the debate leads you to consider of Ireland, and to support the Charge of this year's War, and to know what of the Revenue will do. What the constancy of the Revenue must be, men are tender, but will be willing to supply the present emergency.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. 'Tis absolutely necessary, when you consider the Revenue, that you consider the summer and winter-guard, and likewise the Ordnance and Garrisons; and all these must be in your eye. As for the Expences of the Civil Government, you have as much before you as is desired. You must likewise consider the queen, and the princess of Denmark; and when that is done, I would not be pinching to support the government at ease. I know we are under great necessities for raising Money, and for the Charge of the Ordnance, I can do it to a farthing. I believe England can never be without some standing force. I deal plainly with you.

Mr. Sacheverell. I would gladly settle the Revenue; but I would know, when you have voted the sum for the Revenue, how you can deduct any thing. Therefore I would have had particulars.

Col. Birch. I never was so puzzled in a question, in my life as in this. We are establishing a Revenue, as in time of peace; pray God we may see it! I understand the debate to be this; they that know the Revenue, to bring in what particulars there are for the Government. I really would vote 1,200,000*l.*; and I would have the world know that the king has such a Revenue; and the privy council will tell you what is for the Civil Government; else it is in effect to settle a Revenue of 400,000*l.* per ann. only.

1,200,000*l.* voted for the Annual Revenue.] Resolved, nem. con. "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that there be a Revenue of 1,200,000*l.* per ann. settled upon their majesties, for the constant necessary Charge of supporting the Crown in time of peace." Which was agreed to by the house.

Debate on the Supply for Ireland.] March 22. The house resolved into a grand committee on the Supply for Ireland; Mr. Hampden in the Chair.

Sir Wm. Williams. All are agreed for a Supply; 'tis before you, the sum and the time. You have had computations; and you may conjecture, probably, what will do. 'Tis your present consideration, whether you will give an Aid for 6 months or 12; which I see is no great difference. All of us have confidence in the king, as a good husband. I would vote the sum for 12 months. If the king can spare any of the money, in reducing it, or scattering it amongst them, he will. But I would have it from 3 months to 3 months, not exceeding 600,000*l.* We may add when we please.

Mr. Hampden. The sum computed is 640,000*l.*

Sir Rob. Howard. I would not have you make good husbandry, at the expence of our own hazard. 'Tis said, 'You may raise it at so much a quarter.' You must consider, you cannot raise this but by annual things. There is 600,000*l.* for the Dutch. The next you are to raise, must be so much a year for so many years. Ireland is not able, in the least manner, to afford subsistence. Those who are up, and assist you, must have pay from you. He that has done so much for us, will not turn upon us, to take any thing from us unreasonably.

Mr. Garraway. I would know upon what we are to lay the Money, before we think of the way of raising it, lest we should have recourse to land-tax at last. I move, to raise 310,000*l.* for six months, and so from six months to six months.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Not one point of the Estimation is disputed; but some part of the Charge cannot come in the rest of the six months; all the rest to be deducted from the rest of the six months. But I am for the question of the whole sum.

Mr. Harbord. This 300,000*l.* will not carry your forces into Ireland. Persons have been sent into the north of Ireland, and there are not oats for your horses, only grass; they must be had out of Cheshire, Wales, and Lancashire. Money must be spent in bread, barley, and beef. What with the levy-money and arms, you will not have one shilling to keep them the rest of the time. They have commissions in Ireland for 30,000 men; and as soon as the king shall land these men, all must be supported at the king's charge. This way will be fatal to the king and yourselves.

Mr. Hampden, jun. The charge of one year is partly agreed upon; and I think it must be for a year, for this reason: 'Tis more than an Irish war; I think 'tis a French war. The French king has carried king James into Ireland; and there is no way possible to bear that great force, but by securing Ireland. You must give the king such a fund of credit, as that foreign protestants may come into alliance with him. Always, the computation of Germany is for a year; if for half a year only, no body will ever join with you. If for common defence, do it for a year, that they may join with you. Therefore I move for 700,000*l.*

Sir Joseph Tredenham. If you had a prospect to end the war in a year, I would give it for a year. I fear it will be a longer time; and, let it cost what it will cost, and for as long a time as it will, it must be maintained.

You are told of 'oats, and other things;' but the allowance to the soldiers is what they subsist upon, and their pay discharges that. To vote, 'That you will supply the war from time to time,' gives it the greatest reputation imaginable. And I would maintain this war with the greatest ease to the people, that you may have their hands and their hearts to assist you. I speak not this to stop your forces. But there were formerly reimbursements out of confiscated estates, upon money lent here, upon those that have brought us into this necessity. For six months I would give fully; but, I hope, that nation may maintain the war after that time.

Sir Rob. Howard. What Garroway said is rational. We are all of a mind for the whole, but the difference is the provision for 6 months, &c. We are, in effect, paying a land-tax to our advantage in the sale of corn. 'Tis true, a great deal of Money is to be raised. The motion of not exceeding 700,000*l.* does not hinder you from the manner of raising it. The next thing will be the way of raising it.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I fear the war will not be thoroughly begun in six months. Do you think the French king will lay aside his fundamental policy, to keep you in continual work, as he does in all other places?

Col. Birch. What sum soever you put, is alike to me. We are to confederate; and will that give your Alliance any encouragement? Will this be an encouragement to your friends, (I know not how many they are) to tell them but of six months provision for the war? The business cannot be well begun in six months. I am far from thinking that six months will make an end. You have Ireland, and the French, upon you. This will be an encouragement to your enemies.

Mr. Garroway. You have now a Land-tax, and you have not appropriated one penny to the use you intended it yet; and if you take not up Money upon interest, I know not where you will have it. This is not all the Charge; it will cost you more.

Mr. Sacheverell. I have attended the debate as well as I could. I take it, that the gentleman that moved for six months, would raise men, and send them into Ireland; and, if there is farther occasion, would comply with the same sum to go on, because he thinks that necessary at the first beginning of the war, but not afterwards. Those who stand up for a previous question, I would know whether they are not against the Supply. I think these men cannot be sent over till the latter end of the year, and keep the sea in the mean time. I would, therefore, vote the six months Supply, and the rest I shall do as I think fit.

Resolved, 1. "That a Supply be given to his majesty, of 302,361*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* for the maintaining 22,330 Men, and Officers, and the Contingencies belonging to the same, for six months, towards the reducing of Ireland. 2. That a further Supply be given to his majesty, of 27,451*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* for the Levy-Money, and Transportation of the Forces aforesaid. 3. That a further Supply be given to his majesty, of 81,935*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* for providing Artillery, and other Necessaries, by the Office of the Ordnance, for the use of the Forces before-mentioned. 4. That it will be necessary, that the like Supply of 302,361*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* be hereafter granted, for paying the Forces aforesaid, and for Contingencies for other six months, if the War in Ireland shall so long continue."

Bill brought into the H. of Lords to abrogate the former Oaths.] According to the king's desire, signified in council, a Bill was presented in the house of lords this month, for abrogating the former Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and appointing other Oaths in their stead, which being read a second time, a select Committee was ordered to draw two Clauses; the one to explain the abrogating the said Oaths, and the other to take away the necessity of receiving the Sacrament, to make a man capable of having an Office.

Protest thereon.] This last Clause being drawn up accordingly, and reported to the house, was rejected by a great majority, on which occasion the following Protest was entered:

1. "Because a hearty Union among Protestants is a greater Security to the Church and State than any Test that can be invented. 2. Because this Obligation to receive the Sacrament is a Test on Protestants rather than on the Papists. 3. Because so long as it is continued, there cannot be that hearty and thorough Union amongst Protestants as has always been wished, and is at this time indispensably necessary. 4. Because a great caution ought not to be required from such as are admitted into Offices than from the members of the two houses of parliament, who are not obliged to receive the Sacrament to enable them to sit in either house. (Signed). North and Grey, Chesterfield, J. Lovelace, Delamer, Grey, Vaughan, Stamford, P. Wharton."

The court party having lost this point, they made another attempt in favour of the Dissenters, which was by inserting a Clause in the said Bill, to prevent the receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, upon any other account than in obedience to the holy Institution thereof, and by freeing persons to be admitted into any Office, or Employment, from the necessity of receiving the said Sacrament, in such a manner as is appointed by an Act made the 25th Ch. 2, that is, according to the Church of England; provided a Certificate were delivered of the said persons having received the Sacrament, under the hands of a minister, and two other credible persons: but this Clause being likewise rejected, leave was given to such lords as will, to enter their Dissents, and these lords do enter their Dissents in the Reasons following:

1. "Because it gives great part of the Protestant Free Men of England reason to complain of inequality and hard usage, when they are excluded from public Employments by a law, and also, because it deprives the king and kingdom of divers men fit and capable to serve the public in several stations, and that for a mere scruple of conscience, which can by no means render them suspected, much less disaffected, to the government. 2. Because his majesty, as the common and indulgent Father of his People, having expressed an earnest desire of Liberty for tender Consciences to his Protestant subjects; and my Lords the Bishops having, divers of them, on several occasions, professed an inclination, and owned the reasonableness of such a Christian temper; we apprehend, it will raise suspicions in mens minds of something different from the case of religion or the public, or a design to heal our breaches, when they find, that, by confining secular employments to ecclesiastical conformity, those are shut out from civil affairs whose doctrine and worship may be tolerated by authority of parliament, there being a Bill before us, by order of the house, to that purpose; especially when, without this exclusive rigour, the Church is secured in all her privileges and preferments, nobody being hereby let into them who is not strictly conformable. 3. Because to set Marks of Distinction and Humiliation on any sort of men, who have not rendered themselves justly suspected to the government, as it is at all times to be avoided by the makers of just and equitable laws, so may it be particularly of ill effect to the reformed interest at home and abroad, in this present conjuncture, which stands in need of the united hands and hearts of all Protestants against the open attempts and secret endeavours of a restless party, and a potent neighbour, who is more zealous than Rome itself to plant Popery in these kingdoms, and labours, with his utmost force, to settle his tyranny upon the ruins of the Reformation all through Europe. 4. Because it turns the edge of a law (we know not by what fate) upon Protestants and friends to the government, which was intended against Papists, to exclude them from places of trust, as men avowedly dangerous to our religion and government; and thus the taking the Sacrament, which was enjoined only as a means to discover Papists, is now made a distinguishing duty amongst Protestants, to weaken the whole by casting off a part of them. 5. Because Mysteries of Religion and Divine Worship are of divine original, and of a nature so wholly distant from the secular affairs of public society, that they cannot be applied to those ends; and therefore the Church, by the law of the Gospel, as well as common prudence, ought to take care not to offend either tender consciences within itself, or give offence to those without, by mixing their sacred mysteries with secular interests. 6. Because we cannot see how it can consist with the law of God, common equity, or the right of any free-born subject, that any one be punished without a crime: if it be a crime not to take the Sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, every one ought to be punished for it, which nobody affirms; if it be no crime, those who are capable, and judged fit for Employments by the king, ought to be punished with a law of exclusion, for not doing that which it is no crime to forbear.—If it be urged still as an effectual Test to discover and keep out Papists, the taking the Sacrament in those Protestant Congregations where they are members and known will be at least as effectual to that purpose. (Signed) Oxford, Mordaunt, J. Lovelace, R. Montagu, P. Wharton, Paget."

King's Message recommending a Bill of Indemnity.] March 25. Mr. Hampden delivered the following Message from his majesty:

"W. R. His majesty, out of an earnest desire to deliver his people from the guilt, reproach, and penalties, which many of them may be liable to; and to put an end to all controversies arising between his subjects, by reason of any disorders in the late times; and to take away all distinctions and occasions of discord among them, to the end that they, having an entire confidence in his majesty, and perfect union amongst themselves, may be encouraged in their duty to his government, and more fully and securely enjoy the benefit of it; and his maj. judging, that the best way to render this his gracious purpose most extensive and effectual, is to pass an Act of Free and General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion: His maj. doth earnestly recommend the consideration thereof to both houses of parliament, that, with all the expedition a matter of that kind will admit, they may prepare a Bill for that purpose, for the royal assent; with such Exceptions only, as to them shall seem necessary for the vindication of public justice, the safety of their majesties, and the settlement and welfare of the nation for the future."

Debate thereon.] Sir Christ. Musgrave. This Message from the king is very gracious, and I think the house should consider it as soon as possible; and we ought to return his majesty Thanks for his gracious favour.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I would express that gratitude to the king with all the solemnity imaginable.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I would have your Thanks returned in the most solemn manner, in writing, and the Speaker to present it.

Mr. Harbord. You have received a Message from the king, &c. and it is necessary there should be an Act of Oblivion; but I hope you will take care that posterity shall not fall under the same calamities we have done, for the future. If there be not some examples made of persons who have overturned your laws, you will never want those to overturn your government. Therefore, to prevent for the future, make some examples of the great offenders.

Mr. Howe. This does not surprise me, if I look upon the king's carriage; a king so gracious as to admit such persons into his presence, that have been against him. I hope their crimes are forgotten, and that we shall forget them.

Sir Henry Capel. You are upon a method of returning the king Thanks, and you are told of a precedent of the Convention. It is said, 'you need not look into books for it, because that was an irregular time.' But, in that parliament, were men of great understanding and worth, and you cannot do better than search those precedents out of the Journals. As to what has been moved, of a committee of the whole house, to take the Message, paragraph by paragraph, and debate it, when will there be an end? The king desires dispatch, and where will be the end of a committee of the whole house? A Grand Committee will be dilatory; therefore I move for a special Committee to draw up the Thanks, &c.

Mr. Howe. We owe much of our misfortunes to that Convention; therefore I would not have that made a precedent.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I am of opinion, that was a happy parliament. I remember the perplexity the nation was in, and the settlement they made. I would proceed according to that method, and you may rectify any errors of that parliament by viewing the Journal. I would go into a committee of the whole house now, and accelerate the Answer. The afternoon is not so happy in our proceedings as when done sedately in the morning.

Mr. Garroway. I would have some good effect of this debate, which may be easily obtained, if you will appoint a Committee to search the Journals, and they make you a Report of what they find, and then you may go into a Grand Committee.

The Thanks of the house were voted to his majesty, and a Committee was appointed to draw up an Address.

Debate on the Coronation Oath.] The house being informed, That the Committee, to whom it was referred to inspect the Coronation-Oath, and consider what Alterations or Amendments are fit to make therein; and to report the same to the house; had sat several times, but could not come to a determination of what was so referred to them; resolved, "That the house do now resolve itself into a Committee of the whole house, to take the same matter into their consideration."—Mr. Dalben took the Chair of the Committee.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I know not what gentlemen may mean by the old Coronation Oath. Some may mean the last Coronation Oath, as formerly. The Oath stands thus: the committee looked into the old precedents for the original of this Oath. They looked into the Statute Book, and other law books, but it is in none but the Roman Pontifical. Every body knows how the Clergy have usurped to themselves authorities, as of marriages, divorces, adulteries, probate of wills, &c. We find by the ceremonial and ritual in other courts, as well as in England, they are not found, but in the ceremonials and rituals of the Roman Church. In Brackton only I find it, who informs, 'that the king did swear in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to maintain, &c.' [and reads the rest at large.] It was Canutus the Dane, &c. The Oaths of E. 3. H. 4. E. 6. as if a woman should be married, and the man make no promise. There is an allegiance sworn by the subject, and, by law, no Oath by the king.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I move for an addition to the Oath, 'that to the utmost of his power he will maintain, &c. the Protestant Religion, established by law.'

Mr. Howe. If there was any doubt that our Religion was not established by law, I would be for it. I think this is in opposition to Popery, but not that the king shall defend no part of the Protestant Religion, but what is established by law.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I can add something more, than what I have said in matter of fact. In the ancient Oaths were the Laws of Edward the Confessor. They were Capitularies, of which some are expired. It is not said, 'according to the laws in being.' By this, every casuist will tell the king, he is obliged, in the strictest sense, never to alter them. That is always left to the legislators to alter them. As to trials and judgments not according to the laws in being, this is an Oath in time to make it perjury. You mean, 'according to laws that shall be made.' As to Religion, in some things, the king swears positively to the true profession of the Gospel, that is, the Christian Religion, no latitude in that, and then comes to the Christian Religion as it is against Popery; and this is the stress of all your Oath. Protestant is looked upon as a word honourable; and, not only the word, but the thing, to the last drop of blood. It is every body's endeavour to keep up the Reformation, and avoid returning into Popery. As to the Doctrine; it is suitable to God's word, and therefore in that matter to leave the king no sort of latitude. But, as to Discipline, many Acts have been made to alter it: I say nothing to oppose it, but I speak to that which makes the thing unsafe—That the king maintain the Church, as they may have all protection from the king, he governing according to law, and they doing according to law; both the higher and lower degree of the Clergy, demeaning themselves as they ought, may be protected.

Mr. Garroway. You have a great work upon your hands, upon which our future happiness must depend. You must consider what it is the king can, and what is fit for him to take. I am for 'the National Church;' if you tie it up strictly 'according to law,' you do not know whether the king be free to grant you what you require. I would have the Church-doors made wider, and I think it might easily be done. In order to that, I move, 'That the king, in the Oath, swear to maintain the Protestant Religion, as it is, or shall be, established by law.'

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Whenever a Bill of Comprehension shall be brought in for all our safeties, I shall be for it. To put into the Oath 'by law established,' is a tautology, and hardly good sense, being already done. You are told, 'all sorts of opinions are to be governed by the law of God;' are not all sorts that ever have been, or are like to be, pretenders to it? Look on the Protestation of Augsbourg; there is not such a correspondence as people may imagine. As to the word 'reformed,' all the sects pretend to be so. Then 'as by law established,' it is said, relates to Religion. Can there be any thing altered relating to Religion? The body of Religion is the Doctrine, and I shall never vary from it, and I hope no body here ever will. What do you call 'law?' It is whatever shall be done by act of parliament. If you can alter the Civil Government, you have the same power relating to the Discipline of the Church. Though this Oath is only of king Ch. I. yet compare that Oath with all from Magna Charta, and they differ in few circumstances. Under the general word, all sects may shelter themselves. They may tell you of some points they embrace, and are erroneous in the rest, and say, 'you are to maintain us, and all that call themselves Christians.'

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am as much for the Religion by law established, as any man. I have not heard any reason yet, why the words, 'as shall be established by law,' may not be in the Oath. The Religion of the Church of England, possibly, is established as no other religion is, by law, and we have found it changed since the Reformation. Every minute ceremony is established by act of parliament, because they would not leave it to the Church to return us to our former errors again. You have added, nor any other, 'but by act of parliament.' The king has an inclination to open the doors of the Church; what harm then is there in those words 'as shall be established by law?' Formerly, it was no great matter what Coronation Oath you had; but this king may say, 'I do not understand what is 'by law.' And if we say, 'by act of parliament shall be,' he may say, 'he never intended to bind you up.' Therefore, I would have it, 'as shall be established by law.'

Mr. Ettrick. If I thought this would bind up the legislative power, I should be against it. I would not have it extend to the essential part of Religion, but to ceremonies only. As to the word 'shall be,' I doubt there is something more in the question; several persons call themselves of the reformed Religion, as Quakers, Anabaptists, &c.

Mr. Coningsby.* I offer you these words, 'the Doctrine of the Protestant Religion established by law.'

Mr. Hampden, jun. The Protestants on all sides are like to have war; but this Coronation Oath is the very touch-stone and symbol of your government. It is moved, that the words to be put in be 'established, or shall be established, by law.' If the Doctrine be established by law, it may be overthrown by law again. I hope it is on a better foundation than men can make by law. It is by the law of God, but as for the ceremonies, undoubtedly they are by the law of England. Parliaments have changed many things in the Discipline of the Church. It is the intention of every body, I believe, to keep up the Church and the Hierarchy of England, and I would distinguish betwixt the Doctrine and Discipline. I move, that 'according to the laws for the time being' may be inserted in the Oath, &c.

Major Wildman. I am as ready to submit to the Church, as any man. I second the motion, that you will add words that may be restrained to the Doctrine established by God, and Jesus Christ, that the profession of it may be by the laws of the land, and when the king is to swear to the Doctrine established by law, he swears to his power only, and no danger of perjury in it; but whether he swears to all as it is now established, consider whether it is seasonable, some Comprehension or Toleration being intended, and before these Acts are made, to swear so generally. Consider, the next day after the king has taken this Oath, who shall excuse him from his oath, before the house has agreed any alteration? Suppose the parliament be dissolved by the hand of God, or any other act, shall the king, by his Oath, be bound to press all the ceremonies?

Sir Tho. Lee. I think a Declaration of our Right is sufficient, and a seasonable time to take any laws away, but not to let the king dispense with them, and they must be observed whilst the laws are in being. I think no man has spoken against the addition, but some for that addition of 'such as are, or shall be, &c.' Many will be for the first with the addition, but against is without the addition. If it be meant no alteration, 'as by law established, &c.' nobody will be for that; but if it be, 'what is, &c. or shall be by law established,' every body will be for it.

Mr. Finch. I have attended the debate, and the words moved for, viz. 'established by law, or that shall be, &c.' I have observed, that the reasons do not well agree. It is needless, because, the words being implied, you need not add them. But I think it necessary, that the world may know we mean the established Protestant Religion. You were told, it was implied, and may be sworn to laws not fit to be put in execution. To show that, by these words, we understand the reformed Protestant Religion established by law, I am against the treasurer, and paymaster of the forces here. In 1716, he was created by George I. a baron, and in 1719, an earl of Great Britain. He died in 1729.

* Paymaster-General of the Army, in conjunction with Mr. Fox. He attended king William in Ireland in the campaign of 1690, who, on leaving the kingdom, appointed him, and lord Sidney, lord justices. In 1691, he was created lord Coningsby, of Ireland, and in 1704, was appointed, by queen Anne, vice-words 'shall be established, &c.' No man can have any colour but that still a liberty is to consent to any other laws to preserve Religion, and those are, according to his Oath, established by law. They signify no more than to be established, but I am against the words of 'Doctrine that shall be established, &c.' Those words, I believe, will not be received here. The corruptions of the Church of Rome were abolished by law. The Protestant Religion, is a large word of great comprehension, because it looks as if some other Protestant Religion were fit to be established, instead of that we have; I suppose the Doctrine is never to be shaken, and the truth of the Christian Religion. No man of the Church of England but will be ready to comply with the weak conscience of any professor of the Protestant Religion. And no man, from the bishop downwards, is against any comprehension or ease to tender consciences; but this is as if there were another Protestant Religion to be established by law; as if there was intended a new Doctrine, as well as a new Discipline. I would have you retain the first, and leave the latter.

Col. Birch. In what the learned gent. has said, I go a great way with him, and when I do not, I shall show the difference. There has been no new Doctrine named, and then most part of his objections are over. When I sat in that chair, in a former parliament, to show you how far the Dissenters were for the Church of England, all, except the Quakers, did generally agree to the Church of England; and if that house had sat, they would have been comprehended. You are told, 'it will as well relate to Discipline as Doctrine,' and I think it does. When people are full of expectation, that we should shut the doors of the Church to all kind of relaxation to such as hope for some! It is said by an hon. person, he would not have the Church troubled.—St. Paul says, 'he knows but in part,' and we are about to make ourselves infallible. Let me remind you what ill success we have had with the Scots, (which put them in Rebellion) when abp. Laud would not have a hair bated of the Discipline of the Church; and what followed upon it? That brought on the war in England, and was mostly the cause of it. But what success have we had these 20 years, since the severe Act of Uniformity and prosecution of Dissenters? None but abatement of rents, and loss of trade; and this is such a stumbling block as we cannot avoid. I would make the Doctrine of the Church firm, and leave the Discipline at large.

Mr. Finch. Birch told me, 'he would go a great way along with me,' but he does not one step. I said, 'the Doctrine was the true profession of Christianity,' and he takes offence, as if I made an infallibility. He tells you, 'all sects agreed to the Doctrine, but the Quakers,' and yet danger of altering. All his topics are out of doors, for all agree, that all Protestants ought to be united.

Col. Birch. I know my disadvantage. The strength of Finch's arguments, and the smoothness of his discourse, have been known here before.

Mr. Somers. The question is, to add the words 'shall be established by law.' I desire the addition, for great regard to the legislature. In the former paragraph, it is 'Statutes, and Laws, and Customs in being,' in the other establishment. He that gives his consent to take away, does not maintain them. Put in 'is, or shall be,' and that takes in every man's consent. It is said, 'that by this, we are going about to alter the government of the Church.' Though the constitution be as good as possible for the present time, none can be good at all times. Therefore, I am for the word 'may,' and that will be a remedy at all times.

Mr. Pollexfen. We are all agreed, and I hope ever shall be, to the protestant religion 'established by law.' We desire to consider, whether the latter words shall be added, or not? I see no manner of reason against it. We all agree in substance, but if by the wisdom of the nation it shall be thought fit to alter, we are at liberty to do it. No man that maintains the law, but maintains the whole legislature, which alters and redresses the law from time to time, as there is occasion. We frame an oath, not for ourselves, but for the king, and he ought to be satisfied. The king is tender of what he promises; much more of his oath. As on the one side it will seem broad, as if there was an intention to alter religion, and I am sure they will look much a-squint at us, the greatest reason is, not to dishearten the king, and to put upon him a jealousy, for it must then return from him again.

Sir Henry Capel. What makes me rise up is this; of what will be said abroad of making another Church than this of England. It is a tender thing to make a law, but in an oath for another person to take, it is always a rule to express the thing plain. I would know what harm there is in the words, to take in every man's apprehensions? If these words pass in the negative, may not that startle the king, to see it upon our Books as a doubt? I have seen alterations, in this place, of the Church of England, in Ch. 2's time, and shall we bind up ourselves? It is argued, 'this may bring in another church,' but consider how the protestant religion has been invaded, and how this prince is assisted by protestants. But should you put these words narrowly, they may say 'your parliament has limited you to a church unalterable, and will let in nobody.' In this addition, there is no intent of any hurt to the church. If we do not comprehend, and make our entrance broad, at this time, you may create jealousies at home and abroad. I have seen, by court-practices here, one party set up against another, and all done by the popish party. I heard here, upon the Declaration for Liberty, promoted by lord Clifford, both bishops and dissenters against it, and we threw it out. I remember col. Strangways's story of two deer that were always fighting, and a rascal deer behind a tree came upon them when weary, and beat them both. Seeing we all agree that the king shall have no hardship put upon him, certainly it will be more explanatory to him, and satisfactory to us, to add the words.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I think those words will make the world think we are about to alter the whole religion, the true protestant religion established by law. Perhaps the words may be plainer, but seeing so much weight laid upon them, makes me apprehend that something lies hid, that the presbyterian party, the lean deer, will take it from us both. Whilst a sort of men, that profess the protestant religion, joined with Popery lately in the Declaration, and write, and profess that the penal laws ought to be taken away, now you are making an Oath honestly and plainly, to explain it to the world.

Mr. Ettrick. I doubt not but the opinion of the house will have great weight with the king. It would be of great consequence to represent to the king, that a majority of the house is inclinable to alter Religion; as will be implied by this Vote.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Let us not impose such a hardship upon the king, especially when we all do intend a comprehension. But how will you tie up the king? This is for the protection of the whole Protestant cause, and no particular party or class. If you put scruples into the king's mind at the first step, this will be a discouragement to him: I move therefore for the words 'are, or shall be established, &c.'

Mr. Howe. Has not this deer lain long enough lean in jails? Did not you promise, in the Bishops Declaration, a tenderness to the Dissenters who prayed for the Bishops in their afflictions, as their Martyrs? Shall we disoblige these people? Though I think they will never go over to king James, I hope we shall keep the king's word, and the Bishops. What can be the meaning of this scruple, and to put it into the king, and make these people desperate? Let them help to protect us; indeed we shall have need of them. If you do not add these words moved, it will be thought the king has taken an Oath, without any consideration of what these men have suffered.

Mr. Godolphin. All our securities rest upon the king's conscientiousness. I would not put in the words, because I would not leave a doubt, if it is not in the intention of the house to alter the Religion established by law. I would have tender consciences come in at the door, and not pull down the rafters of the house to come in at the roof. Those who stood to the Protestant Religion were the Bishops; those who were against it were those who managed Brent's regulation of Corporations; and I would have no countenance given to them.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Let us not take out two words of the Oath, to blast the king, if he will deal candidly with the Declaration, with due regard to the Church of England. He tells you not who put these men upon doing what they did. It is necessary for the king's honour, and the union of all Protestants, to put in these words.

The question being put, Whether the words shall remain in the Oath, 'to preserve the Church, &c. as it is now established by law,' it passed in the affirmative, 188 to 149.

Estimate for the Fleet, and Extract of the Treaty with Holland.] March 26. Mr. Hampden acquainted the house, That he had received from his majesty, according to the desires of the house, in a Letter from the earl of Nottingham, one of the secretaries of state, An Account what Fleet will be necessary for this Summer's Service; also, an Extract of the Treaty between this Crown and the States of Holland, in respect to the obligations of mutual assistance: which were as followeth:

Navy-Office, 23 March, 1688-9.

An Estimate of the Charges of the wages, victuals, and wear and tear, for one year, of 50 ships of war, of the second, third, fourth rates; 15 small ships, and 8 fire-ships (as by a List thereof apart), to be employed in the narrow Seas, and Mediterranean; and also, of one third, 19 fourth, two fifth Rates, and two fire-ships, for the plantations and convoys; according to a Project thereof herewith presented.

For the Charge of 17,155 men serving in the said 65 Ships of War, and 8 fire-ships, computed at 4 l. each man a month, is, for one month, 68,620 l. ; and, for 13 months, amount to	£. 892,060
---	------------

For the Charge of 4540 men serving in the said 22 ships of war, and 2 fire-ships, at 4 l. each man a month, is, for one month, 18,160 l. and, for 15 months, amounts to	236,080
	£. 1,128,140

EXTRACT of the TREATY between England and Holland, concluded at Westminster the 3rd day of March, 1677-8.

"Article IV.—If his majesty, or the said States General, shall hereafter happen to be attacked, or in any sort whatsoever to be molested, in the possession and enjoyment of the states, lands, towns, places, rights, immunities, and liberty of commerce, navigation, or in any other whatsoever, which his said majesty, or the said States General do or shall have right to enjoy, either by the law of nations, or by Treaties already made, or that shall be concluded; his majesty, and the said States General, upon notice and demand of each other, shall jointly use their utmost endeavours, that such molestation and hostility may cease, and reparations be given for the wrongs or injuries that shall be done to either of the Allies.

"Article V.—And, in case that the said attack or molestation shall be followed with an open rupture, the ally who shall not be attacked shall be obliged to come to a rupture two months after the first demand made by the ally already engaged in a rupture; during which time he shall use all his endeavours, by his ambassadors or other ministers, to mediate an equitable accommodation, between the aggressor or disturber, and the party attacked or molested: notwithstanding which, he shall, during that time, give a powerful succour to his ally, according to what shall be agreed upon, by separate Articles, between his said majesty and the said States General: which Articles, although not mentioned in the present Article, shall be kept and observed as if they were here inserted or written. And after the expiration of which term of two months it shall however remain in the choice of the ally engaged in a rupture, whether he will continue to enjoy the benefit of that succour, in case the conjuncture of time and the state of his affairs shall make him prefer it before an open rupture of his ally."

Separate Articles.—I. "The case mentioned in the 5th Article happening, the said king and his successors, and the said States General, shall be obliged to assist each other, as often as they shall be attacked or molested, as is more at large expressed in the said Article, in manner following; that is to say, his majesty of Great-Britain shall assist the States General with 10,000 foot, and the States General shall assist his majesty with 6,000 foot, well armed, under such regiments, companies, colonels, and other officers, as his said majesty, and the said States General, shall think fit, and conceive most proper for such an assistance; and likewise with 20 ships of war well equipped and provided: which succours shall be supplied and maintained at his charge who sends it to the aid of the party attacked. II. When the necessity of affairs shall make it appear, that the succours promised and settled ought to be augmented, the said king and the said States General shall endeavour to come to an agreement about it."

Debate on settling a Revenue on the Princess Anne.] Sir Tho. Clarges. You cannot settle a Revenue upon any body. I remember at Oxford there was a Bill to enable the king to settle a Revenue upon the duke of York. I would have the king's Revenue inspected.

Sir Wm. Williams. There was a Revenue of 60,000*l.* for the duke of York settled, and the Post-Office. He had power to appoint a Post-Master General by patent; and that is a certain Revenue worth 100,000*l.* per ann. and the Wine Licenses. These were vested in the duke of York. There was care then taken for the maintenance of his dignity. It is fit to consider the Princess, who did more than women in their ordinary course. She forsook her father for the sake of the Protestant Religion, and ought to be made exemplary by us, and a monument for her for ever. I would refer it to a committee.

Mr. Hampden. I move very tenderly. In motions of this nature, that are acceptable, we are most subject to errors in the management of it. She may be in want of money, but you cannot refer money to a private committee. But if there be any way to propose, I would hear it. When the way of raising the money is found out, that is the proper time to have it moved. I remember at Oxford, when the money was granted for the duke of York, there was grumbling.

Mr. Harbord. Something has been said that reflects upon the king, as if the Princess was in want. When the king was at the Treasury, he said, 'he would have the Money all go for public uses.' For the Fleet, the queen Dowager, and the Princess Anne, these were the uses, and they are taken care for.

Sir Henry Capel. You do two great things in taking care for this Princess, of great honour, and virtue, and support to the Protestant Religion. Though there be no precedent for a private committee to consider of Money, I would not have this debate go off without some words in your question, viz. 'That when the Revenue is stated, the Princess may be considered.'

Mr. Boscawen. I would have the Princess have the Revenue of the Post-Office, but not the Office; that ought to be in the crown, for the inspection and management of letters.

Resolved, "That, when the matter of the Revenue shall come under consideration, the house will then consider of settling a Revenue upon the Princess Anne of Denmark."

Debate on the Coronation Oath.] March 28. The Bill for establishing the Coronation Oath was read the third time.

Mr. Pelham offered a Proviso to the Bill by way of Rider.—I am sorry for the heats the other day. What I offered then was, I thought, a service to the king and the Church of England, in which religion I was bred up. If this Proviso I shall now offer, shall meet with a general acceptance, I shall be happy. If not, I shall sit still contented. The Proviso shows, 'that you do not intend to prevent the king to give his consent to change any form, or ceremony, now established, so as the doctrine and discipline, &c.'

The Proviso was as follows: "Provided always, and be it hereby declared, That no Clause in this Act shall be understood so, to bind the kings or queens of this realm, as to prevent their giving their royal assent to any Bill, which shall be at any time offered by the lords and commons, assembled in parliament, for the taking away or altering any Form or Ceremony in the established Church, so as the Doctrines of the said Church, a public Liturgy, and the Episcopal Government of it, be preserved."

Sir Christ. Musgrave. There is no occasion for this Proviso. It cannot be imagined, that any Bill from hence will ever destroy the legislative power. Therefore, there being no need of this proviso, pray lay it aside.

Mr. Garroway. The other day, you accepted not of an Amendment offered, because it was said, 'what was offered was implied.' Others thought not, because not expressed. The exception against this Proviso seems as if you had not power without it, by the legislative authority, to alter any thing in the Church. This Proviso puts people in hopes of grace and favour, and I would have it pass.

Sir Henry Goodrick. This Proviso is brought in with a good and sincere intention; it carries an aspect of healing our divisions. Was here any thing to invalidate any particular thing, whereby the legislative power might be restrained, I should not concern myself. We are all of a mind, and as this is for composing and healing, and does so fully preserve the Church Doctrine, it relating to Discipline, and being only a Declaration as to Discipline, I would give it a second reading, and make it part of the Bill.

Mr. Finch. I am against this Proviso, when I consider it will not have the effect proposed, but quite the contrary. The Proviso comes in to help the Clause in the Oath, 'to maintain the Religion established by law.' Now, these words 'established by law' hinder not the king from passing any Bill for ease of Dissenters, and when this is passed, the Oath remains. The words now are not established by law indefinitely. This Proviso makes the scruple, and gives the occasion for it. What says the Proviso? Unless it were in the king, 'not bound to give any consent to alter the laws, &c.' When the scruple is raised, the Proviso does not clear it. When the king has taken the Oath to maintain the Protestant Religion, 'as established by law,' and not 'as shall be established,' this Proviso does not at all cure the Oath, when he has sworn to establish it, &c. That gives occasion to the scruple; and I am against the Proviso.

Sir Wm. Williams. If this Proviso improves a scruple in the king rather than removes it, I am against it; but if it clears the doubt, I am for it. When the king swears to govern according to law, if a relaxation to Dissenters, the king may do it by law. Says the king, 'I make a doubt, whether I do not swear to keep all the laws unrepealable;' therefore, say we, though the law be so by implication, the lawyer cannot remove any scruple; therefore is there any hurt to speak plainly? This is argumentum ad hominem, not quod hoc or hunc. We are to make the Oath explicit, without scruple. I see no manner of danger in the Proviso; it shows special regard to the Church of England. The Doctrine is not to be altered: all the Bishops in the world cannot do it. Though they differ in circumstances, men will differ; it is lawful and necessary sometimes, that the truth may appear. I take it to be for the honour of the Church of England, to comply with any ceremony, or none. I am for the Proviso.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. This is the first Proviso of this nature that ever was in any bill. It seems to strike at the legislative power. The king has both divines and lawyers about him, who will clear him the scruple. It will create such a doubt: whatever the pretence is, it cannot satisfy the king, only those without doors. Therefore to show a thing at this time of day, to make a question of that consequence—I would lay it aside.

Sir Rob. Cotton, of Cambridgeshire. Though the Proviso looks well and healing, yet it seems to imply a defect, not able to alter laws, as occasion requires. This, instead of one scruple raises more; as if you were so bound up to the ecclesiastical government, that you cannot make any new laws without such a Proviso.

Sir George Treby. Since this Proviso is tendered, I am for retaining it. Perhaps now it is brought in, it is more necessary to retain it, than to have brought it in at first. It is agreed to be the sense of the house, that these words, &c. do not bar the king from making any alteration, &c. When you say 'the Protestant Religion, &c.' it must be with these ceremonies, and government, by law established. Therefore that you mean the manner and form of the government is alterable, is agreed by all. You will find, in the Preface to the Common Prayer-Book, 'that all Ceremonies are indifferent and alterable,' and this Proviso is, that alterable things may be altered; and no hurt done, if both houses agree. To bind up your freedom in any thing here, you yourselves would call closeting. The late king James had made me more offers than I will speak, of preferment, if I would consent to dispense with the penal laws and Test. I used all the arguments I could to dissuade him against it. He said, 'I was very stiff.' I told him 'I would not engage to take away laws nor to keep them, but I desired to come into the parliament with my freedom.' No man ever doubted that the king was bound by any Oath not to alter the Church Government. King Ch. 1. thought himself bound by his Coronation Oath not to alter Episcopacy, the government being in Episcopacy; and therefore this is no novelty, to raise such a scruple, which this Proviso may fully quiet, and satisfy the scruples of tender consciences, and such as know not our laws. You yourselves made an Act for declaring this a Parliament, when you were satisfied, and excepted privilege of parliament in the Habeas Corpus, &c. It is said, 'This Proviso is useless, and you will not have your ends.' This Proviso does not absolve the king from his Oath: but the Oath is part of the Act, and you explain that Oath. It is said, 'It shall not be understood to alter Episcopacy in the Church Government;' those who love it, would be glad to see it a monarchical government of episcopacy. This will amount to no more than such alteration as the parliament has always done, and the Church has been preserved in so doing. When we are dead and gone, all these debates will be in the air, and a greater scruple remain. We have the use of words and writing, to explain our meaning; and it being agreeable to your own meaning, pray pass it.

Mr. Sacheverell. I have attended the debate, and I think it does not agree with that the other day, when every body did leave the ceremonial part of Religion to the law, so the doctrinal part were preserved. It was for the words 'are, or shall be, by law established.' I did apprehend, and yet do, that point is a scrupulous matter, and may be a doubt to the king. I was one that did not see so clear as others. I cannot see why they should deny us an explication of our Oath. Learned gentlemen do doubt: I am not so learned as they, and therefore must doubt. Certainly they have some other reason than what they tell us, or else some latent sense that hereafter they may explain. The Proviso is no more than what we said, we mean by it, and they said, they meant by it, the other day. I am for it.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I am of opinion, that all ease and favour should be shown to tender consciences, consistent with the safety of the nation, but I know not how this Proviso will answer all expectations. I cannot imagine any scruple in the king to pass this law. It is granted by all, that by 'law,' is meant what is in the legislative power. When the king sees this Proviso in the Act, for the Coronation Oath to bind him up without it, will it not make alterations in the government which may affect all laws?

Sir Tho. Lee. I was the other day of opinion, that the Oath might have been plainer by the other words offered; and now here is a Proviso to explain it. I am afraid the words, as penned in the Oath, do too much bind up the legislature. The Oath obliges the king to maintain the Religion established by law. The Proviso says, 'The king shall be always at liberty, and, by act of parliament, Ceremonies may be altered at any time.' All Oaths are taken in the sense of the imposer, which restriction is not to be exercised but in certain cases. It will, I fear, creep in, that other laws cannot be made without such a Proviso. Therefore I would lay it aside.—The Proviso was withdrawn, and the Bill passed.*

* The form of the Coronation Oath is thus:
Q. 'Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same?' A. 'I solemnly promise so to do.'—Q. 'Will you, to your power, cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?' A. 'I will.'—Q. 'Will you, to the utmost of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion, as by law established?' And will you preserve unto the Bishops and Clergy of this Realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all such rights and privileges, as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them?' A. 'All this I promise to do.'—Then the King or Queen, laying his or her hand upon the Gospels, shall say, 'The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep.
' So help me God.'

This day, the commons passed a Bill for naturalizing Prince George of Denmark.

April 1. The commons resolved nem. con. That a Committee be appointed to bring in a Bill of Comprehension.

The Address of Thanks for the king's Message relating to the Bill of Indemnity, having been presented to his majesty, sir Wm. Williams acquainted the house that his majesty was pleased to give a most gracious Answer, to the effect following: "Gentlemen, I am pleased with doing what you like; and do expect you will farther proceed to expedite the Indemnity and Oblivion which tends so much to an Union; I shall be always forward to do my part in this, and all things, that may unite my people."

Bill of Comprehension.] April 4. The house of lords entered into a Consideration of the Report of the Amendment in the Bill for uniting their majesties Protestant Subjects;* and

* "Nothing more strongly evinces the desire of William to abolish religious and political distinctions, than the variety of measures he devised, in order to accomplish that end, and his perseverance in prosecution of them, notwithstanding the frequent repulses and defeats he experienced. Disappointed in his plan of raising Protestant Dissenters to a capacity of civil employment, his only hope was to enlarge the pale of the Church, and to obtain such moderate and rational concessions from her, as might subdue the scruples of the Dissenters, and allure them into her bosom. For this purpose a Bill of Union and Comprehension was introduced in the house of lords, formed upon the model of that which had been proposed to allay the heats of parties during the dependence of the Bill of Exclusion. The principle of this measure was so rational and liberal, that its enemies durst not hazard any attack or objection against it, upon the foot of argument. A preliminary question however existed, before any progress could be made in this Bill, and involved difficulties, which afforded but unpromising hopes of its success: who were the judges competent to specify those concessions, which might prudently and safely be offered upon the part of the Established Church, for the purpose of reconciling and uniting the Dissenters? An exclusion of the laity was invidious, and not only deviated from the precedents established by the Reformation, but struck at the foundation of the Protestant Religion, which appealed to the understanding of mankind at large, as qualified to decide concerning the doctrines of faith. Nor were the Clergy, if the business was committed solely to them, wedded to the faith and ceremonies of the Established Church, likely to consent to any liberal and effectual plan of union, jealous of the favour of the king, many of them waited the result of this Bill with a suspicious vigilance; and it was believed, that they would not have been dissatisfied, if any innovation upon forms, or any encroachment upon their upon debate the question was put, Whether to agree with the Committee in leaving out the Clause about the Indifferency of the posture at receiving the Sacrament? The Votes were equal,* and therefore, according to the antient rule in the like case, it was carried in the Negative. The next day the lords resumed the debate of the Report of the said Amendments, particularly of the Clause concerning a Commission to be given out by the king, to Bishops and others of the Clergy: and it being proposed whether the Laity should be added, the Votes were equal on both sides, so it was likewise carried in the Negative.

Protest thereon.] On this occasion leave was given for any lords to enter Dissents; accordingly, these lords following do enter their Dissents in the Reasons ensuing:—1. “Because the Act itself being, as the preamble sets forth, designed for the peace of the state, the putting the Clergy into the commission, with a total exclusion of the Laity, lays this humiliation on the Laity, as if the Clergy of the Church of England were alone friends to the peace of the state, and the Laity less able, or less concerned to provide for it. 2. Because the matters to be considered being barely of human constitution, viz. the Liturgy and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which had their establishment from the king, lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled in parliament, there can be no reason why the commissioners for altering any thing in the civil constitution should consist only of men of one sort of them, unless it be supposed that human reason is to be quitted in this affair, and the inspiration of spiritual men to be alone depended on. 3. Because, though, upon Romish principles, the Clergymen have a title alone to meddle in matters of Religion, yet with us they cannot, where the Church is acknowledged and defined to consist of Clergy and Laity; and so those matters of religion which fall under human determination, being properly the business of the Church, belong equally to both; for in what is of divine institution, neither Clergy nor Laity can make any alteration at all. 4. Because the pretending that differences and delays may arise by mixing Lay men with Ecclesiastics, to the frustrating the design of the Commission, is vain and out of doors; unless those that make use of this pretence suppose the Clergy-part of the Church have distinct authority, had furnished a pretext for making a schism in the Church. Indulgent to their prejudices, the lords agree, that the Clergy alone should judge of those articles which were to be proposed as a basis of union with Dissenters. The very day the Bill was sent to the commons, they resolved upon an Address to the king, to be drawn up in terms which anticipated the discussion of its merits, and spread an alarm of the danger of the Church.” Somerville, p. 275.

* Content 28, Proxy 1, in all 29. Not Content 27, Proxies 2, in all 29.

interests or designs from the lay-part of the same Church; and this will be a reason, if good, why one or other of them should quit the house for fear of obstructing the business of it. 5. Because the Commission being intended for the satisfaction of Dissenters, it would be convenient that Lay-men of different ranks, nay, perhaps of different opinions too, should be mixed in it, the better to find expedients for that end, rather than Clergymen alone of our Church, who are generally observed to have very much the same way of reasoning and thinking.—6. Because it is the most ready way to facilitate the passing the Alterations into a law, that lay-lords and commons should be joined in the commission, who may be able to satisfy both houses of the reasons upon which they were made, and thereby remove all fears and jealousies ill men may raise against the Clergy, of their endeavouring to keep up, without grounds, a distinct interest from that of the Laity, whom they so carefully exclude from being joined with them in consultations of common concernment, that they will not have those have any part in the deliberation, who must have the greatest in determining.—7. Because such a restrained Commission lies liable to this great objection, that it might be made use of to elude repeated promises and the present general expectation of compliance with tender consciences, when the providing for it is taken out of the ordinary course of parliament, to be put into the hands of those alone who were latest in admitting any need of it, and who may be thought the more unfit to be the sole composers of our differences, when they are looked upon by some as parties.—Lastly, Because, after all, this carries a dangerous supposition with it, as if the Laity were not a part of the Church, nor had any power to meddle in matters of Religion; a supposition directly opposite to the Constitution both of Church and State, which will make all alterations utterly impossible, unless the Clergy alone be allowed to have power to make laws in matters of Religion, since what is established by law cannot be taken away or changed, but by consent of laymen in parliament, the Clergy themselves having no authority to meddle in this very case, in which the Laity are excluded by this Vote, but what they derive from Lay-hands. (Signed) Winchester, Mordaunt, J. Lovelace.”

“I dissent for this and other Reasons: Because it is contrary to three Statutes made in the reign of Hen. 8 and one in Edw. 6, which empowers 32 Commissioners to alter the Canon and Ecclesiastical Laws, &c. whereof 16 to be of the Laity and 16 of the Clergy.

(Signed) Stamford.”

April 9. The king went to the house of peers, and gave his royal assent to an Act for establishing the Coronation Oath.*

* The day appointed for their majesties Coronation drawing near, his royal highness Prince George of Denmark was created baron

The King and Queen crowned.] April 11. The Ceremony of the Coronation was performed in the Abbey after the usual forms; the far greater number of the disaffected peers, and among the rest Dr. Lamplugh, who had been made abp. of York by king James, for running away from Exeter, on the Prince of Orange's approach, waving their scruples, for the sake of seeing the shew. By a Clause in the Coronation-Act, it was left in the king's breast to be crowned either by an archbishop or bishop; and Sancroft persevering in his resolution not to acknowledge a Settlement which he had no hand in making, his majesty chose the bishop of London to officiate in his room. It is remarkable, that the commons, who had given his majesty the Crown, were not permitted to assist in putting it on; the Speaker on the fifth giving the house to understand, 'That his majesty had appointed a Gallery for their reception in the Abbey, and another in Westminster-hall, and a dinner to be provided for them in the Court of Exchequer; but that his majesty did not think it altogether convenient for the house to bear any part in the procession.' On the next day after the Coronation, they had however a procession of their own; for the whole house, in a full body, walked from Westminster-hall to the Banqueting-house, to congratulate their majesties on that happy occasion, and were most graciously received.*

The Speaker's Congratulatory Speech to their Majesties upon the Coronation.] April 13. The Speaker of the house of commons acquainted the house, That, upon their attendance on their majesties yesterday, to congratulate them upon their Coronation, he spoke to them as followeth; viz.

"Your most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons of England, assembled in this present parliament, having, to their unspeakable joy, seen your majesties placed upon the imperial throne of this kingdom, they have desired of Ockingham, earl of Kendal, and duke of Cumberland: the marquis of Winchester was made duke of Bolton; the earl of Danby, marquis of Carmarthen; Monsieur Bentinck, baron Cirencester, visc. Woodstock, and earl of Portland; visc. Fauconberg, earl of Falconberg; visc. Mordant, earl of Monmouth; the lord Montagu, viscount Mount-Hermer, and earl of Montagu; the lord Churchill, earl of Marlborough; Henry Sidney, esq. baron of Milton, and viscount Sidney of Shepney in the county of Kent; viscount Lumley of Waterford in Ireland, viscount Lumley of Lumley Castle in the County Palatine of Durham, and earl of Scarborough; the viscount Cholmondley of Kellis in Ireland, baron Cholmondley of Witchmalbanck, alias Namptwitch in Cheshire. Mareschal de Schomberg (who, with the earl of Devonshire, had already been elected Knight Companion of the most noble Order of the Garter) was naturalized by act of parliament, and soon after created a duke. * Ralph.

access at this time to your royal presence, humbly to congratulate your majesties upon this occasion, and to wish your majesties a long and prosperous reign, with all the blessings that ever did attend a crown.—We are all sensible, that your majesty's greatness is the security of your subjects: it is from your power that we derive to ourselves an assurance of being defended from our enemies; and from your justice, that we expect a full enjoyment of our Laws and Liberties: but that which completes our happiness, is, the experience we have of your majesties continual care to maintain the Protestant Religion; so that we can no longer apprehend any danger of being deprived of that inestimable blessing, either by secret practices, or by open violence."—To the King. "May the same Divine Providence, which hath hitherto preserved your maj. in the greatest dangers, and so often given you victory over your enemies, still crown your undertakings with success."—To the Queen. "And may those unparalleled virtues, which adorn your majesty's royal person, be the admiration of the present age, and an example to the future.—And may the lustre of both your names so far outshine the glory of your predecessors, that the memory of their greatest actions may be forgotten, and your people no longer date the establishment of their Laws and Liberties from St. Edward's days, but from the most auspicious reign of king William and queen Mary."

The King's Answer.] His majesty was pleased to answer to the effect following; viz.

"Gentlemen; We return you our hearty thanks for the kindness and respects that you have, upon all occasions, shewed to both of us: we shall take care, to the best of our power, of all things that conduce to the good of the kingdom; and I doubt not, but by God's assistance and yours, we shall be able, in a short time, to make you a flourishing people."

Address of both Houses to the King, thanking him for his Care of the Protestant Religion, and desiring him to call a Convocation.] April 19. Both houses presented the following Address*, to the king:

* "By this Address it appears, that a party was now beginning to be formed, that pretended great zeal for the Church, and expressed their apprehensions, that it was in danger. This they plainly insinuated, by their praying the king to continue his care for the preservation of the Church, hinting at the same time, how dangerous it would be for him to do otherwise. These men, as they went heavily into the Toleration, which was the ease they here promised to give the Dissenters, so they were much offended with the Bill of Comprehension, as containing matters relating to the Church, in which the representative body of the Clergy had not been so much as advised with; and therefore it was, that they so hastily petitioned for a Convocation, under a notion that the business would be accomplished with-

"May it please your majesty; Your majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, do, with utmost duty and affection, render to your maj. our most humble and hearty thanks, for your gracious Declaration, and repeated assurances, that you will maintain the Church of England established by law, which your maj. hath been pleased to rescue from that dangerous conspiracy that was laid for her destruction, with the hazard of your royal person.—And her zeal against Popery having appeared at all times, and more especially of late, beyond the contradiction of her most malicious enemies; it being likewise evident that her loyalty hath always been unquestionable, and that the misfortunes of the last reign can be attributed to nothing more than the endeavours that were used to subvert it:—We therefore humbly pray, your maj. will be graciously pleased to continue your care for the preservation of the same, whereby you will effectually establish your throne, by securing the hearts of your majesty's subjects within these your realms, who can no way better shew their zeal for your service, than by a firm adherence to that Church, whose constitution is best suited to the support of this monarchy. We likewise humbly pray, that, according to the ancient practice and usage of this kingdom in time of parliament, your maj. will be graciously pleased out one. The king, who was not pleased with this Address as perceiving the tendency of it, did not forbear intimating in his Answer, that he thought he had already given them sufficient assurances of his intentions to support the Church. The answer was not returned immediately, but sent the next day by the earl of Nottingham. Notwithstanding this Answer, no farther progress was made in the Bill. Those who had moved for this Bill, and afterwards brought it into the house, acted a very disingenuous part. For while they studied to recommend themselves by this shew of moderation, they set on their friends to oppose it; and such as were very sincerely and cordially for it, were represented as the enemies of the Church, who intended to subvert it. Nor was this bill supported by those who seemed most favourable to the Dissenters. They advanced it as a maxim, that it was fit to keep up a strong faction both in Church and State; and they thought it was not agreeable to that, to suffer so great a body as the Presbyterians to be made more easy, and more inclinable to unite to the Church. They also thought, that the Toleration would be best maintained, when great numbers should need it, and be concerned to preserve it. So the design of a Comprehension being zealously opposed and but faintly promoted, fell to the ground. However, the king was so desirous this affair should succeed, that it was brought on again the next session in a more formal manner, though with no better success." Tindal.

to issue forth your writs, as soon as conveniently may be, for calling a Convocation of the Clergy of this kingdom, to be advised with in ecclesiastical matters; assuring your majesty, it is our intention forthwith to proceed to the consideration of giving Ease to Protestant Dissenters."

The King's Answer.] April 20. The following Message from the King was delivered to both houses:

"W. R. Though I have had many occasions of assuring you, that I will maintain the Church of England as by law established; yet I am well pleased with every opportunity of repeating those promises; which I am resolved to perform, by supporting this Church, whose loyalty, I doubt not, will enable me to answer your just expectations.—And as my design in coming hither was to rescue you from the miseries you laboured under; so it is a great satisfaction to me, that, by the success God has given me, I am in a station of defending this Church, which has effectually shewn her zeal against Popery, and shall always be my peculiar care; and I do hope the ease you design to Dissenters will contribute very much to the Establishment of this Church; which therefore I do earnestly recommend to you, that the occasions of differences and mutual animosities may be removed; and, as soon as conveniently may be, I will summon a Convocation."

Ordered, That the Address of both houses, with this his majesty's Answer, shall be printed and published.

Debate on the Lords' Amendments of the Bill for abrogating the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.] April 19. The commons went into a debate on the Lords' Amendments to the Bill for abrogating the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance. On the Clause for exempting the Bishops, &c.

Sir John Thompson said, This Amendment, of the king's tendering the Bishops the Oaths, &c. brings all the odium upon the king, as if the king suspected their loyalty to whom he causes it to be tendered.

Sir Tho. Dyke. The odium will be on the Council, and not on the king. All acts of grace are from the king, and he must be advised by his Council; and they must suspect the persons, and not the king.

Mr. Ettrick. If the king see them dangerous, he may immediately offer the Oath, &c. to them; and that is the effect of the lords Amendment.

Sir Tho. Lee. Pray make us well understand this Amendment. The consequence does not differ from the lords, 'That it may be tendered before the 1st of August.' But I would know how these stand together; whether agreeing with one Amendment does not draw the consequence of asserting the future Clauses?

The Speaker. If the king issues out a special order, before the 1st of August, for taking the Oath, &c. they are obliged to take it before that time.

Mr. Sacheverell. This seems to me to be a snare. If any sort of gentlemen, be they who they will, may pay no allegiance to the king, I am against it. Your Bill, as it is penned, is to enjoin all persons to take the Oaths; and this Amendment provides, 'That if an order of the council, by commission from the king, &c.' This cannot be a riding commission, all England over, to give the Oaths; then, if it be not a separate commission, which must have time of return—and then these persons go out of the country, and so are free from taking the Oaths for ever—'By Order of Council'—They will have time to shelter themselves, under the king's name, which ought not to be countenanced. No person shall be concerned in it, but so far as the council shall advise; and then it is in their power, whether to execute your act, or not. So, unless some reason be assigned, why the king should suspect, all cannot be thought so; and if for particular persons only, your act is illusory.

Mr. Carter. All the subjects of England are under one king; and there is but one allegiance, according to our law. It was suggested here, 'That the Bishops had taken an oath to king James, and therefore their consciences would not bear it to swear it to king William;' and I think that the strongest reason why it should be tendered them. We must not set two heads on one Church, and divide the Bishops. Some have taken it, and some not; and as to the Government, we have taken it; how can we be true to the king, if all do not? We have done it, and they ought to do it. Some are to leave their offices on refusal. These men have six months time given them by the lords Amendments. The consequence will be, we throw dirt in our own faces, by doing it; as we are obliged to it, so I hope all else shall be obliged. A Popish head was thought not safe for the Government; it will be a greater monster to set up two heads of the government. Consider how unkind this will be to the king. He swears to us, in his Coronation-Oath; and shall they not pay their allegiance to the king? I would retain what we did before in the Bill.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Carter is much mistaken in the question; it not being, whether the Clergy shall take the Oath or not? if it were so, I should be of Carter's opinion; it is only, whether you will agree with the lords Amendments? It is only, whether there shall be a trust in the royal dignity, or no? And a question only, that the king shall have power to require the Clergy to give a testimony of their loyalty. If any of the clergy own any other power, that it may be in the king's power to make trial of them. You are told, 'This will put a hardship upon the king.' If trust be a hardship, the crown is a hardship. The severity is not in the crown, but in you. Perhaps, in another reign, it may not be safe to lodge this power in the crown; it is safe now: and I would agree to the lords Amendment.

Mr. Howe. By what I find, by his motion, the stress lies in the commission: that Clause is not to impower the king to dispense totally with the Oath, but to tender it before the time. The bait seems to be, putting power into the king; but I am not for either giving the king new power, or taking any from him. I cannot think but all should take the Oath; and how can they offer oaths to others, which they will not take themselves! And they so tender, that none but themselves shall be dispensed with. It is no hardship for a man to be put out of an office, if he be not capable of it. If they will not swear allegiance to this king, they owe it to another; therefore I would have no power left to bring in king James.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I differ from Tredenham: it is not such a great trust. It might, by his argument, have as well been inferred, that the king should give it to all his subjects, if the Bishops, in this case, were not tenderly used. In nine months, king James will either be here, or never; and therefore I am against the Amendment.

Mr. Finch. Notwithstanding the reasons I have heard against the Amendment, some of them ought not to have regard here. Now you make a new law, the question is, how you will extend that new law? All persons in office must take these Oaths; the Amendment is not to excuse them from the oaths, but a commission from the king to give these oaths sooner, if he please. Disagreeing with the lords is to oblige all men, within that time, without distinction, to take them. In the year 1649, when the Engagement was enacted, none were obliged to take it but those of the clergy, who were hereafter to come into livings. You are told, 'In that time, king James will be here, or not expected.' I hope you will not imagine, that these persons have any expectation of king James, or that they have any worldly consideration; they are not fond of it, and have sufficiently suffered for it. If you are not secure without this, consider whether the punishment's falling upon some persons will make you more secure.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am surprized that gentlemen are so much for the prerogative of the king. You are making a new law; and it is but compounding for a new one; and before this change, I know, no subject was exempted from the Oath of Allegiance. This instance given you (by Finch) was of the Engagement in 1649. I remember the dean of Christ-Church was in it, and was turned out for refusal of the Engagement; and those times did not think themselves secure. And now, if you think the laity are only obliged to allegiance, it is strange. I am sorry that subjects should have more consideration for their fellow-subjects than for the king. It is not so long since some would have king William's name only in the Regency, and king James to stand king. The Bishops may say, this is for the good of the Church, that they should have liberty to sit in the lords house, but not take the Oaths, thinking themselves obliged, by their oath, to king James. Therefore I would not agree to the Amendments.

Sir Wm. Williams. How can you make this law equal? You put it in the power of the king; if he order it not, they shall not take it; and if all persons may be under the same qualifications, your law then is equal. The consequence must proceed from principle, or humour; if from principle, it must proceed from other oaths that they have taken; and it is part of your security, that the old oaths be abolished; and what can resist an act of parliament? Shadows follow bodies; can you absolve me of my Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy? The same power that created those, has abolished them. But the Bishops say otherwise; they are so strait-laced, and straitly bound, by their Allegiance to king James, that this Act cannot absolve them. By this dispensation of the Clergy, instead of uniting the people, you separate them. I am for all persons to take the Oaths, and no encouragement given to any to separate from the rest of the nation.

Sir Robert Cotton. The question is now, in a new government, whether we shall make distinctions? I could wish all sorts of clergy would take the Oaths. By this Commission, &c. the king may have such effectual security as may prevent any mischief that may ensue. I hear talked of a regency, in king William, mentioned in favour of king James; but I cannot think that, when you have done all things that have made you irreconcilable to king James, you will think of calling him back again. But, at this time, to have any disagreement with the lords would be fatal in the consequence. Therefore I would agree to the Amendments.

Mr. Godolphin. The question is not, Whether the Oaths shall be taken, or no; but, Whether the king shall have power, by commission, to tender them, &c.? We are running into divisions here, to prevent divisions in the Clergy. In Henry 8th's time, there were several limitations of the crown, and the oaths were forward and backward. I would agree.

Mr. Paul Foley. The lords have not only differed from us, but from themselves. This point has been twice settled in the house already; and I hope the nobility of the kingdom deserve favour and consideration, who have been turned out of their places, as well as the Bishops. We ought to take care, that there be no persons in the kingdom, but such as will submit to the government.

Mr. Boscawen. I am suspecting my own understanding in law, when Sawyer asserts a thing. I desire that the statute of the Oath of Allegiance may be read.

Col. Birch. The statute ought to be read, when a gentleman desires it; and it must, for it is part of his speech. [It was read.]

Mr. Boscawen. It is apparent, by this law, that there is no distinction betwixt ecclesiastical persons and others. King James 1. came new from Scotland, and this law was to make a recognition of his government. It is certain that some scruples they make, either that they are obliged to the former king, or that this person is an usurper; and, by consequence, you are no parliament, he is no king. These are the plain consequences; and then, whether you will give this indulgence, or not? The leaven will run through the whole Clergy. Upon consideration of the whole, I make this to be tripping up the heels of the whole government. If the Clergy have obligation to king James, they are bound to assist him when opportunity shall serve; and when no opportunity, they are content to sit still, and when there is, they will tell you more. This is the effect of the lords' Amendment; and I would not agree.

A Committee was then appointed to draw up Reasons to be offered at a Conference.

Conference on the Bill for abrogating the Oaths, &c.] April 20. Sir George Treby reports, from the committee, the Reasons for the commons not agreeing with the Lords' Amendments; which were agreed to by the house, and are as follows:—"1. Because it has been the policy of the common law, and statute law, to oblige men to swear to the king. 2. Allegiance is the common and necessary duty of all subjects, and is most strictly to be required of archbishops, bishops, and those who have ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or promotions, in regard they are highly intrusted in the administration of the government, draw great dependencies, and are exemplary to the rest of the people; and several of them are, by law, to administer the Oaths of Allegiance to other persons. Allegiance is also strictly to be required of all governors, professors, and fellows in universities, and school-masters, because to them the education of the youth of the kingdom is committed; and therefore they ought to be persons of known loyalty and affection to the government. 3. The taking the Oaths publicly, in open court, will better manifest Allegiance, than the taking them privately, before persons appointed by Order in Council; and will be much more safe for the persons who are obliged to take the Oaths. 4. The best and most certain means to have the Oaths taken, is to impose it upon the persons concerned to tender themselves to take the said Oaths under penalties; but if the Oaths are not to be required, unless tendered, the said persons might by absence, and otherwise, avoid the taking them with impunity. 5. The Clause which the commons sent to your lordships, allows more favour to the archbishops, or bishops, and those that have ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or promotions, than to any lay peers, or other persons having offices and employments; and is more gentle in the penalty than the statutes heretofore made in like case. 6. It is unreasonable and unsafe to distinguish the archbishops, bishops, and persons having ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or promotions, and such as are intrusted with the education of youth, from the rest of the subjects, in the declaration of their allegiance; and may tend to make a division in the kingdom; and may raise and countenance faction, both in Church and State. 7. It may tend to expose the king's person and government to hatred and danger, and occasion a general discontent."

A Conference was desired, where the above Reasons were delivered.

Protest against not agreeing with the House of Commons.] After this, the house of lords was adjourned into a committee, to debate and consider of the Reasons of the house of commons. The house being resumed; the earl of Bridgewater reported, That after a long debate in the committee, it came to this question, "Whether to agree with the house of commons?" It was carried in the negative. Then the question was put, "Whether this house should agree with the committee?" It was resolved in the affirmative.—Leave was given to such lords as would, to enter their Dissents; and accordingly these lords following do enter their dissents, in these Reasons ensuing:

"The Bishops and Clergy not to be excused from taking the Oaths of Allegiance: 1. Because, by the same reason that any part of the subjects may be excused from giving assurance of their allegiance and fidelity to the government, all may; and the government will be left perfectly precarious. 2. Because the Clergy, and especially the Bishops, receiving their benefices, dignities, and preferments, from the public, ought to be the first and forwardest, both by their doctrine and example, to teach others their obligations to be zealous in preserving the government as well as religion established by law. 3. Because the presence of scruple and tenderness of conscience can have no other foundation in the present case, but the supposition of some former obligation; no one ever scrupling to give all manner of pledges of his allegiance, where he thought it due: those therefore that scruple, ought the more to be pressed, and the sooner brought to the Test; unless any one can think it reasonable the government should favour, encourage, and indulge, those who will not give the usual security that they are not enemies to it. 4. Because, however the king may, that part of the people who have sworn allegiance to him cannot have reason to be satisfied when they see another part of the nation under looser obligations to the government than they; nothing being so apt to raise fears, jealousies, and disorders, in a state, as unnecessary distinctions, or any cause of suspicion of want of unanimity or fidelity amongst themselves in the great concerns of the kingdom, especially in the titles of crowns, and at such time as this, when we are entering into war with a potent enemy, who openly owns and supports a contrary title. 5. Because it will discourage our Allies, and give them a lower opinion of our king's interest in his people, or authority over them, than was for the advantage of this kingdom in particular, or the Protestant Religion through Europe; when they should understand that those who were looked on to be the directors of other men's consciences, could not bring their own to acknowledge him in the first and fundamental act of obedience; and what must they conclude, when they heard the parliament had dispensed with such an exemplary part of the nation in a business of such moment? 6. Because it might be of ill consequence, if the parliament should set any thing like a mark of disaffection on that sacred order, by allowing them now a dispensation from taking a very moderate Oath of Allegiance, who, in a late reign, were too forward and zealous by Addresses, preaching and promoting new Oaths to carry loyalty and obedience to monarchy, to a pitch unknown to our antient laws, or former ages. 7. Because there being no other assurance of any one owning himself subject to any government, but either acting under it, or swearing to it, it was very necessary, that those who forbear to act, should, of all others, be most strictly required to take the Oaths, that the public might have that security of their Allegiance from those that refuse the Oaths. 8. Because it was unreasonable, that for a part of the Clergy, the nation should be exposed to the inconveniencies of the want of justice, and the danger of disorders for want of settling the Militia; the renewing of all Commissions being delayed, to the great prejudice of the government and the people, till this Act were past, and therefore they did not see why that house should not comply with the commons in the present necessity, though their Vote should be hard on a part of the subjects, whereas the utmost could be pretended in this case, was only contending for an extraordinary favour, and an unheard-of allowance to some scrupulous men. 9. Because it was neither what history could parallel, nor any policy justify, to allow any part of the people, who claim protection from the government, to be excused from giving the common and necessary assurance of allegiance and fidelity to it; and it was hard to think how any one that intended to be faithful to it, should come so near renouncing the government, as to desire to be dispensed with from being under the same ties, with other of their fellow-subjects.

(Signed) Macclesfield, Monmouth."

The Lords Reply to the Commons' Reasons.] April 22. A Conference was desired by the lords. Sir Tho. Lee reported from the Conference, the lords Answer to the Commons Reasons; as follows:—"In answer to the first and second Reasons alledged to the house of commons, it is agreed, that the policy of the law requires men to swear allegiance, and that it is the common and necessary duty of all subjects, and especially of the Clergy; but the lords do not exempt them from taking these Oaths, but only differ with the house of commons about the method by which they should be tendered.—To the third reason: If the lords should agree, that it is better to tender the Oaths in open court than privately, yet that is not a sufficient reason against the tendering them by persons appointed by the king in council; because the officers and judges of the court may be so appointed, by virtue of the clause offered by the lords; or if it be not clearly enough expressed, it may be inserted more explicitly.—To the fourth: the Clergy will be required to take the Oaths by such Order in Council as is proposed by the lords, and their not appearing, when so summoned, will amount to a refusal; or if it should not, the lords would agree to any such addition as would make it so.—To the other Reasons: the Clergy and the members of the University were not distinguished from the Laity, because, upon all promotions to any degree or preferment, they will be, equally with others, obliged to take the Oaths; and even those that are already in such stations, will be obliged to take the Oaths when required by order in council: and it seems to conduce more to the settlement and safety of the government, that the king should be impowered to put the fidelity of the Clergy to a trial immediately, than to leave any who are ill-affected to the government so much time as to the 1st of August, to be all that while undermining it.—The Clergy are obliged, by the Prayers which they must read, in the daily service, to make such express and solemn declarations of their fidelity to the king and queen by name, that the putting them to take the Oaths is not so necessary to the public safety as in other persons, who are not bound to make such frequent declarations of their fidelity.—In so critical a time as the present is, it is not to be doubted, but upon any case of apprehending their ill-affections to the government, the tendering the Oaths, by order of council, will not only take off all imputation of hardship from his majesty, but justify, and even require a more rigorous way of proceeding against those that shall give any cause of offence:—Since, during queen Elizabeth's long and glorious reign, in which she had both the pretended title of the queen of Scots, and the deposing power assumed by the Pope, to apprehend, this was found to be the safest way for the public quiet; and the ill-effects of leaving the tendering the Oaths to the queen's discretion not having appeared in all that time of so much danger, and so many conspiracies against her person, the following a pattern taken from the best part of our history seems more suitable to the present times, than the falling on other methods; which the lords think a sufficient Answer to the last Reason given by the house of commons."

Debate on the above Answer.] Sir Henry Goodrick. I see it evidently here, by the lords Paper, that a Dispensing power is asserted; a power in the king and council to exempt a part of the people from their allegiance; no doubt, any thing shall be granted, if you will give this power of dispensing with this law. What have these men done to merit this exemption? If your Clergy had not curates, and if there were no pluralities; if obliged to keep conformable curate, the curate will pray for king William, but the parson is gone, and you cannot punish him; and there is your dispensing power. Consider the difference of times; in queen Elizabeth's time, there was but just a new settlement of the Protestant Religion; half her kingdom then were Papists; things (God be thanked!) are now so changed that we are entirely Protestants, if we can keep ourselves so. All this is no more than granting a power to the king and council, to dispense with all the statutes.

Mr. Howe. I have heard nothing to the contrary from the lords Answer; and I think that all are obliged to take the Oaths. I believe this power is asked by the lords, without consent of the king. The council is not infallible, nor, I believe, ever will, unless you put a penalty upon the council for not executing this law. They agree to the necessity of the Oaths; yet, it seems, they give a Reason why not; as if prayers for the king and queen, in the Litany, was as much as taking the Oath of Allegiance. They pray 'for all Christian kings and queens.' I cannot, with a safe conscience, pray for king James; and if they will pray for them that they owe no allegiance to, I desire not their prayers. That of a shorter day, I believe, is a Reason out of the strong box. The precedent of queen Eliz. is not for us to follow. They who will side with those who will not pay Allegiance to king William, will not stick to promote the title of king James. We have reports of conspiracies, and they are from those that are enemies; and those that will not swear, will help to bring in king James.

Sir Rob. Howard. The lords sent a Bill first. Be pleased to observe one thing; the lords sent down great instructions in it, and one thing of extraordinary use. Those that take not these Oaths, are underminers of the government; and then, by their Amendments of our Bill, to countenance the not taking them, is to me a contradiction. A penalty on the king, for not tendering the Oaths, would be too high a thing for us to impose; but to put the king to believe he has some that are not good subjects, (as the lords put the king upon that opinion) and that, upon their leaders scruple, they are not free to the allegiance, is a kind of sermon from them against the allegiance, and a doctrine practised by us. They are underminers of the Allegiance, that make it less sure to oblige them. An Oath (which they scruple) is an end of all controversy; this is as if some would be in that controversy, and not take the oath. The instance the lords give of queen Eliz. is a very wild precedent. The lords have given you no manner of Reason why you should comply with their Amendments.

Col. Birch. I believe there is more in these reasons, that we see not, than we see. If we are not exceedingly well armed for a Conference, which will go about the nation, we shall be injured.

The Lords' Answer was disagreed to, and a free Conference was desired.

Debate thereon at a second Free Conference.]
At the free Conference : The earl of Nottingham managed for the lords.

Sir George Treby. The difference of the house of commons, &c. is great ; but not so great, when the matter is understood. The commons tender an Amendment, requiring the Bishops to take the Oaths, &c. Your lordships, instead of that Clause, appoint the Oaths to be taken before persons, by order of the council ; to which the commons cannot agree, and have sent to your lordships for this Conference, to make their Reasons more intelligible. Your lordships admit the Oaths to be taken, &c. and sooner than the time, &c. No question is, or can be, but our allegiance is due to the king and queen. At the last great free Conference, your lordships alleged, the throne was filled, and no Allegiance. But the throne being now filled, we have now to think how to oblige those persons, by sacred ties, to the king and queen. It falls out, that the persons chiefly concerned in this are the Clergy. The strength of all government is unity and uniformity in Allegiance ; and he is no farther a subject but as he owes allegiance to his prince. The wisdom of the common law requires early allegiance in court-leets. Afterwards, when affections were alienated from the prince to foreign powers, there was something to strengthen that by a statute. This allegiance has been op-pugned by some persons, and we hope it will be confirmed by your lordships concurrence. We follow all the methods of that statute. Your lordships answer, 'It is better the Oaths be tendered openly than privately.' To which we answer, That the Judges cannot, by order of council, authorise giving the oaths by authority of Council judicially. Your lordships say, 'the not taking them, within the time limited, shall amount to a refusal.' Whether a man have reasonable cause to be absent, is a matter of contest. To the other Amendments : the commons desire present Security for the government ; a present security is necessary against undermining the government ; and if the Oaths are to be administered by order of council, persons may conceal themselves. If the time limited be too short, the commons will close with your lordships for longer. Your lordships say, 'If the person be thought ill-affected, the Oath may be tendered sooner ;' but those ill-affected persons may be infecting the rest : and the council ought to secure all men from malevolence of the crown. We answer to that of the statute of queen Eliz. ; what your lordships refer to is the Oath of Supremacy. There was a distinction between those that owned the Supremacy, and those that did not ; and that can be no parallel to our case. To live religiously and happily, is well ; but we must first live. This Oath is our being.

Earl of Nottingham. We agree the necessity of all duty and allegiance, by all persons, to be paid to the king, the difference is in a very narrow compass ; we only differ in the method. I shall not repeat the lords Reasons, only in answer to Treby, there is no other method left to oblige them to take the Oaths sooner than this proposed by the lords, before the 1st of August. I differ from Treby about the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy ; they that would deny queen Elizabeth's supremacy, did assert the powers of deposing and excommunicating her to be exercised as much as the Pope could do ; and the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy were as necessary to be taken then, as this is now. And therefore the lords take so good a pattern now, as that, which was so successful and happy then.

Sir George Treby. The comparison was made only in respect of the places they should forfeit. I did say, 'yet the judges could not do it judicially,' which makes it part of the authority of the judges ; they must give the Oath privately ; not as judges, but as persons nominated, by the king in an afternoon, or in any other place than the Court.

Sir Wm. Williams. The Question will be no more than, whether the Oaths shall be administered in public, or in private. In Court it will be a Record ; it rests from whence this distinction must proceed. The conscientious men, in this case, are the dangerous men ; these hands are but the tools which are set on work, and there are no means to discover these but by oaths. There is more reason to impose them on the Clergy than on other men, because they have a greater tenderness in taking them, from some secret reason. The Oaths, in queen Elizabeth's time, were more to distinguish Protestant from Papist ; that law was made for the illness of those times. If in king James's time there had been one method for the commons, and another for the Clergy, there were some ground for this now ; but there was one method for both then ; one form both for Allegiance and Supremacy, of the same nature. I agree, your lordships method is the soonest way, but it is more certain and plain when it is known. It looks to us, as if there was a little tenderness to the bishops, and as if a power in the king to order the taking or not taking the Oaths. I deny not but a parliament may do any thing ; but this looks like a case of binding the Laity one way, and the Clergy another.

Bishop of Salisbury,* (Dr. Burnet.) The

* "I was the chief Manager of the Debate in favour of the Clergy, both in the house of lords, and at the Conferences with the commons, But seeing it could not be carried, I acquiesced the more easily ; because, though in the beginning of these debates I was assured, that those who seemed resolved not to take the Oaths, yet prayed for the king in their chapels ; yet I found afterward this was not true, for they named no king nor queen, and so it was easy to guess whom they meant by such an indefinite designation. I also heard many things that made me conclude they were endeavouring to raise all the opposition to the government possible." Burnet.

whole danger of the government may lie upon this. If some say the king is an usurper, he is within the Statute of Treason. All the Clergy, in the Common Prayer, pray for king Wm. and queen Mary. In the Communion service there is a protestation of fidelity; if they omit that prayer, they are punishable; by the Act of Uniformity they are tied to it. Can it be imagined, that the clergy will so solemnly pray thus, and not obey the king and queen? This is more than an Oath, which is but one single act; this is done every day; they themselves pronounce the words in the Sacrament service. As for the objection of taking it in open court, a few words may provide against that. The Act of Supremacy was in Hen. 8th's time. The first invention of it was not in queen Elizabeth's, but qualifying it for sir Tho. More, and bishop Fisher. Then they fell under that Oath upon refusal. Though some of the Church of Rome have renounced the conspiracy of Mary queen of Scots against queen Eliz. We never should extend that power, when we consider, that men have speculations they cannot be rid of. This proceeds from such a supposition that may be speedily punished in attempting to overthrow the government. Now, whether you will not leave this to the king? And there is no reason to suspect the crown in its own safety. The eyes of all England are upon this matter. The lords are of opinion they have made so much a better security to the government than what you have made, that they hope you will agree with them.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Since this makes a distinction to a few, it will be so much discouragement to this law that it may weaken it. There are a sort of men that either will not pray for king Wm. and queen Mary, or talk so in common conversation, that their parishes apprehend something ill for the government lies hid in it. Discrimination in our Church is highly pernicious. Now when we comprehend Dissenters, and we leave so great latitude to the great lights, the bishops, it may prove fatal. It is said, 'the Clergy acknowledge the king and queen, &c. in the Common Prayer.' I answer, if it was not already scrupled—so few Dissenters from us—Therefore I hope you will not encourage them against the lords and commons of England. In queen Eliz.'s time, the nation was half Protestants and half Papists, and a prospect of a Popish Successor in Mary queen of Scots. This will do no good unless to contribute to farther difference. Your lordships may well accept this difference the commons have made—Papists, for the most part, will take the Oaths of Allegiance, but not of Supremacy. Shall it be said that any of our great bishops make use of arguments of the Papists? In ancient times, there were such accounts of the bishops foreign allegiance, that there is a vast apprehension of such a precedent tie to king James, as the court of Rome had formerly on the bishops. I hope you will make this refusal præmunire in the Clergy.

Sir Tho. Lee. If your lordships had so mended the Bill as to the case of Offices, as you have done in that of the Clergy, the commons might have less objected. The great thing insisted on is queen Eliz.'s time—The Clergy upon refusal of the Oaths, &c. were deprived immediately. The commons have rather followed the precedent of king James's time. It may fall out, that persons may be surprized, and it will be a great hardship that the Oath should be tendered to some, and not all, and no suspicion on particular persons. Were more noble prelates in here with your lordships, we should have less suspicion of any apprehending allegiance to king James. The height of danger to the kingdom is in the highest station to the kingdom.

Earl of Pembroke.* The sense of the giver is no more than obedience according to law. Why may it not be expected, 'obedience according to law?' And they take it in the giver's sense, and leave it to the king.

Mr. Somers. Since all loyalty ought to be without distinction, if you will make that law effectual, those who execute it themselves are the most effectual; they are obliged in interest to take it, or forfeit all. But if left to others to tender it, many ways may be found to evade it, instead of having this law take its full effect. It concerns the government to know who the persons are, that doubt the owning the government. This Oath was so framed by your lordships with that great moderation, wherein there is nothing but plain promise of obedience.

Bishop of London, (Dr. Compton.†) The

* Soon after sent Ambassador to the States-General, colonel of marines, first lord of the admiralty, and in 1691 appointed lord privy seal: he was first plenipotentiary at the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697, in 1700, lord president of the council, and in 1701, lord high admiral. By queen Anne he was continued at the head of the privy council, and was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland in 1707, and lord high admiral in 1708, which he resigned two years after. This noble earl made that admirable collection of ancient Marbles, &c. now preserved at Wilton, and died in 1732.

† Uncle to the then earl of Northampton, and first a cornet in the horse-guards, but afterwards taking orders, was successively master of St. Cross, canon of Christ-Church, bishop of Oxford in 1674, and of London in 1675: on king James's accession he was dismissed from the Council-Board for having opposed his measures, and in 1686, he was suspended from his episcopal function for not suspending Dr. Sharp. On the prince of Orange's landing, he escorted the princess Anne to Nottingham, and afterwards voted for the Vacancy of the Throne, &c. In 1691, he attended king William to the Congress at the Hague, and died in 1713, aged 81. As to his character, he was peculiarly styled 'the Protestant Bishop,' for the stand he made against Popery both in the reign of Ch. 2 and James 2.

question seems, why it should not be in the power of the king, for the quiet of the government, to tender these Oaths, &c. Forcing these Oaths will rather disturb men's passions, and make men's minds more uneasy.

Sir H. Goodrick. We find this is only a promissory Oath, and in the same form as that of Allegiance was formerly.

Bishop of Salisbury. This makes no discrimination of persons designed. It is a notion in the world, that there is a great difference betwixt subjecting to a government, and solemnly recognizing a government, the design being only to secure the government from danger.

Earl of Pembroke. Nothing is so hard to judge of as conscience, why he can do it, or not do it. The clergy are men of conscience, and have suffered, and persons may follow their example; and you would not willingly see them starve. They are put under the power and care of the king, and do not turn them begging, for their consciences, by deprivation.

Sir Tho. Lee. The king has opportunity to take care of the clergy; but exempting them will be an encouragement to the lay-men. There is no way to bring all England of a mind, but this.

Sir Hen. Goodrick. The commons propose nothing but what was in the 7th of king James. Seeing your lordships will exempt the clergy from the laity, it deserves farther consideration in the house of commons.

Earl of Nottingham. It is not now, that the lords make distinction of persons. The lords, in queen Eliz.'s time, were exempted, &c. so considerable it was, for the quiet of the nation, from the formality of the Oath they scrupled. If it be left to the king, the danger is not so great as represented.

Debate on rewarding the Duke of Schomberg.] April 24. Sir Rob. Howard. The duke of Schomberg, one of the greatest captains in the world, under his majesty, the then prince of Orange, has had his estate and pensions all seized in France, and he has waved all things in this world to serve you and his religion. He has been solicited by the duke of Brandenburg, and the emperor, to be their general. He has quitted all, to serve this king and kingdom; hither he comes, and the king is not in a condition to reward him, otherwise than with the honour of Knight of the Garter. The king's condition is not equal to his desires to reward him. There cannot be a greater misfortune than to lose so great a captain. I hope the house will do something for his fortune, as the king has done for his honour.

Mr. Hampden. I think this motion is of consequence, and no good Englishman can let it fall. The merits of this great person in the world are well known by the respect of princes to him. If there be occasion, his service may be of great use, being the greatest captain in Europe. Therefore I wish you would propose something the king may do for him. You cannot give it to him, but you may present the king with it, and desire his majesty to dispose of it to him.

Mr. Garraway. I have as high esteem for marshal Schomberg, as any body. Though we have no present use of him, yet we may have. But how to raise Money upon the people, and have that immediately given to marshal Schomberg, I know not that precedent. When we raise Money for the Navy we may represent his merits to the king in that Bill, and make him such a present as may encourage him to be farther serviceable to the nation.

Sir John Guise. I doubt not but if you declare those who assist king James, rebels and traitors, that the king, out of their estates, will give a reward to marshal Schomberg for his service.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I have as great a sense of this man's service to the nation as any in the house, or any where else. I hope we shall not intend to present this man to the king to be considered by him, but what shall be thought of or advised to enable the king to gratify this honourable person. No man is against it, but, as you have been told, there will be forfeitures of such as have violated the rights of the people, and are in actual rebellion. When you take the Indemnity into consideration, you will do it. The king's brother, the duke of York, had an estate given him out of the confiscations of the miscreants who were attainted; and I hope the king will give him some reward out of the estates of those who are in rebellion against the government.

Mr. Harbord. The king told me, 'That he had told marshal Schomberg, that he being not in ability to gratify him, he would recommend him to the consideration of this house;' and I doubt not, on Monday, you will find out some way to do it. It is not fit the nation should bear the burden, when these men have been the occasion of your misfortunes. We shall not be welcome into the country, if we raise no money upon these estates.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would not trouble you now, were I not afraid of precedents. You are told by Harbord, 'that the king has had marshal Schomberg under his consideration.' I am surprized that the motion was not earlier. I remember, when there were great commendations of general Monk here, for what he had done, then the methods were, the king gave him rewards and lands, and the parliament confirmed them afterwards. I would have it from the hand it ought, and I hope the crown will be maintained always in that plenty as to be able to do it. It will be best for the marshal, and best for you.

Mr. Garraway. It has been moved that this acknowledgment may be given marshal Schomberg out of the estates of offenders, &c. I move you, that the king may be addressed to issue out his proclamation, that they appear by a day, or else they shall stand outlawed; and their estates seized as confiscate to the king.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. When gentlemen seem to be of opinion that no question should be stated till gentlemen have an inclination to state it, it ought not to be. I have a great honour for marshal Schomberg, but you are out of the way, if you put a question, that we shall take upon us to recompence him for his service; that is a prerogative only of the king. We are only to enable the king to gratify such persons, and I move you for the order of the day.

Sir Henry Goodrick. This house is possessed of the great merit of this gentleman, as all the Protestants of Europe are; but to lay this debate aside now, I am against it. They did give great gratuities to generals in former times, when we had no king in Israel; but we cannot usurp that prerogative: therefore for the present I would have it on your books to acknowledge this gentleman's great service to the king, and to enable the king to settle a grateful acknowledgment on this great man.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I hope you will not go off from this motion without leaving something on your books. Ireland is not to be reduced without a general; and this is the greatest general in Europe: he is used to conquer kingdoms. Portugal by him was restored to the right owner.* You will use him for Ireland. Pray put not this debate off without having something upon your books.

Sir Rd. Temple. I find, all resolve to return him thanks for the great services he has done the king and the nation, and that you will recommend him to the king. Therefore pray put the question.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I fear, this may be of dangerous consequence, to put ourselves in competition with the king in giving rewards to persons. I remember but one precedent, and that was in the brother of a king, the duke of York. It is dangerous to be on your books.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Now this has been a debate, to let it fall may be of dangerous consequence. If we recommend him to the king, we may enable the king to gratify him. If we let it fall now, it will be very scandalous upon us.

Sir Henry Capel. It will be of dangerous consequence for this house to gratify particular persons. Sir George Booth had a vote of 10,000*l.* given him. The times indeed were different. This person is so eminent, that you can have no ill consequence of it.*

The debate was adjourned to the 13th.

Address of the Commons for a War with France.] April 24. The following Address was agreed to by the commons, and ordered to be presented to his majesty by the whole house:

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the commons, &c. most humbly lay before your maj. our earnest desire, that your maj. will be pleased to take into your serious consideration the destructive methods taken of late years by the French king, against the trade, quiet, and interest of this your kingdom, and particularly the present invasion of the kingdom of Ireland, and supporting your majesty's rebellious subjects there; not doubting in the least, but that through your majesty's wisdom, the alliances already made, with such as may hereafter be concluded on this occasion by your majesty, may be effectual to reduce the French king to such a condition, that it may not be in his power hereafter to violate the peace of Christendom, nor prejudice the trade and prosperity of this your majesty's kingdom. To this end we most humbly beseech your majesty to rest assured upon this our solemn and hearty promise and engagement, That when your maj. shall think fit to enter into a War against the French king, we will give your maj. such assistance in a parliamentary way, as may enable your majesty (under the protection and blessing God Almighty has ever afforded you) to support and go through the same."†

The same day, the lords by message signified they had several treasonable Letters under consideration, which had been transmitted by

* This great general, soon after this debate, went over to Ireland, at the head of an army of 10,000 men, and the next year fell triumphantly at the Battle of the Boyne. "It was his peculiar merit," says an excellent writer, "to have been more than once employed in the defence of nations in danger of losing those liberties they had with difficulty retrieved; and to have completed that character by dying at last, full of years and multiplied honours, in the same employment, on behalf of these Protestant kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland." Hughes's Preface to the Translation of Vertot's Revolutions of Portugal. Burnet says, "That the parliament gave the duke 100,000*l.* for his services." This, however, was never paid, but in lieu of it 5000*l.* a year was settled on him and his heirs.

† Oldmixon says, "That sir Tho. Clarges seconded this motion;" and another member spoke thus; "Mr. Speaker; I bear all the respect that I owe to crowned Heads, but I cannot help saying, that it is of absolute necessity to declare War with the most Christian Turk, who ravages all Christendom, and makes war more barbarously than the Turks themselves."

* "The king of Portugal sent count Schomberg to oppose the Spaniards; and though the count de Villa Flor had the title of general, he owed the preservation of his crown entirely to the former. This great captain obtained several victories over the Castilians; and it may be said, that he had less difficulty to conquer them than to overcome the obstinacy of the Portuguese general, who, being envious of his glory, traversed every design which he thought would augment it. But Schomberg had the confidence of the court, and of the troops, who followed cheerfully a commander always attended by victory." Vertot's Revolutions of Portugal.

duke Hamilton from Scotland: in consequence of which, both houses passed a Bill to enable his majesty to apprehend and detain suspected persons.

Bill of Oaths passed by the Lords, with a Proviso.] After which, sir George Treby reported from a free Conference with the lords, That their lordships had departed from their disagreement, with respect to the Bill of Oaths, and did agree to the Amendments made by the commons, with the Proviso following, (which they nevertheless acknowledged was contrary to all course and practice of parliaments.)—"Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it be left to the king to allow such of the Clergy, as shall refuse the Oaths prescribed by this Act, as he shall think fit, not exceeding the number of 12, an allowance out of their ecclesiastical benefices, for their subsistence, not exceeding a third part; and to continue during his majesty's pleasure, and no longer."

£. 600,000 per Ann. granted for the Civil List; and 700,000*l.* for the Navy.] April 25. Resolved, "That, out of the Public Revenue, for the Charge of the Civil Government, (including therein what is to be allowed her royal majesty the queen-regent, the queen-dowager, the prince and princess of Denmark, and the mareschal Schomberg) there be allowed the sum of 600,000*l.* per ann. And, that 700,000*l.* be given towards the occasions and Charge of the Navy."

The King's Answer to the Address for a War.] April 26. The Speaker reported his majesty's Answer to the Address for a War with France, which was as follows:

"W. R. I receive this Address, as a mark of the confidence you have in me. Which I take very kindly, and shall endeavour by all my actions to confirm you in it; I assure you that my ambition shall never be any argument to incline me to engage in a war, that may expose the nation either to danger or expence. But, in the present case, I look upon the War to be so much already declared by France against England, that it is not so properly an act of choice, as an inevitable necessity, in our defence.—I shall only tell you, that, as I have ventured myself, and all that is dear to me, to secure this nation from what it suffered, I am ready still to do the same, in order to the preserving it from all its enemies; and, as I cannot doubt of such assistance from you, as shall be suitable to your advice to me to declare War against a powerful enemy, so you may rely upon me, that no part of that which you shall give for the carrying it on with success, shall be diverted by me, to any other use."

Articles voted to belong to the Civil List.] April 27. The house agreed with the Committee on the Supply: That the following Articles are part of the Charges of the Civil Government: 1. The Perpetuities, amounting to 1431*l.* 12*s.* per ann. 2. The sum of 18,209*l.* 15*s.* 4½*d.* per ann. to the Queen Dowager. 3. The sum of 13,800*l.* per ann. for the Judges, Masters in Chancery, and Judges of Wales. 4. The Perpetuities out of the Customs, &c. (except the 100*l.* per ann. to the heirs of col. Fairfax) amounting to 338*l.* per ann. 5. The Provision for the prince and princess of Denmark.

Pension List, &c.] Mr. Hampden acquainted the house, That he was directed by the Committee to move, that the Papers delivered in by sir Robert Howard to the house, containing several Charges upon the Revenue, may be entered in the Journals. Which was ordered accordingly; and are as followeth:

A LIST of the several PERPETUITIES and PENSIONS, during Life or Lives, and for Term of Years; which are payable at the Exchequer, Custom-House, Excise-Office, Post-Office, &c. - - - per Ann.

Perpetuities paid at the Exchequer.

Dean and Chapter of Litchfield	£. 10	0	0
Vicars of Litchfield	-	15	0
For the Poor of St. Buttolph's, Aldersgate	-	7	0
For the Poor of St. Magnus, London	21	4	8
For the Poor of St. Michael's, Cornhill	-	12	4
For the Poor of St. John Baptist, Walbrooke	-	7	13
Winchester College	-	2	0
Master of St. Katherines	-	3	13
Eaton College	-	42	0
Schoolmaster of Southwell	-	10	0
To the Vicar of St. Peters, in the Tower	-	6	13
Sir Edw. Tyrrell, and his Heirs	-	6	0
Emanuel College, in Cambridge, for Maintenance of Five poor Scholars	-	16	13
Cambridge University, for a Divinity Lecture	-	13	6
Ditto, for a Preacher	-	10	0
Ditto	-	10	0
Professor of Civil Law there	-	40	0
Physick Reader there	-	40	0
Oxford University	-	10	0
Ditto, for a Divinity Lecture	-	13	6
Professor of the Civil Law there	-	40	0
Physick Reader there	-	40	0
The Heirs of Sir Rob. Long	-	5	0
Master of the Temple	-	37	6
Students of Grey's-Inn, for a Chaplain	-	6	13
The Heirs of Sir John Cotton, for the Maintenance of a Minister	-	5	6
The Heirs of the Lord Darcy	-	10	0
Ditto	-	10	0
Dean and Chapter of Westminster, for the Minister of the French Church in the Savoy	-	60	0
Governors of Christ's Hospital, for the Maintenance of Thirty Boys	370	10	0
Poor of St. Martins in the Fields	100	0	0
Poor of St. Margaret's, Westminster	50	0	0
Hospital of King Charles the First, in Westminster	50	0	0
Poor of St. James's Parish, in Westminster	50	0	0

Earl of Derby and others, and their Heirs, towards the Maintenance of poor Ministers in the Isle of Man - - - - -	100	0	0	Earl of Bath and Lord Hawley, for 99 Years, if Frances Du- chess of Richmond so long live	1,000	0	0
Bishop of Chester, for the Four Lancashire Preachers - - - - -	200	0	0	Earl of Strafford, during Life -	2,000	0	0
Perpetuities -	1,431	12	0	Bed-Chamber Men.
Pensions paid at the Exchequer.				Earl of Bath, during Life -	5,000	0	0
Late Queen Consort's Jointure, out of Excise - - - - -	18,000	0	0	Earl of Mulgrave, the like -	1,000	0	0
Post-Office - - - - -	19,328	13	7	Duke of Newcastle, the like -	1,000	0	0
Ditto, more by Letters Patents, during her Life, out of Ex- chequer in general - - - - -	10,000	0	0	Earl of Oxford, the like -	1,000	0	0
	47,328	13	7	Earl of Lindsey, the like -	1,000	0	0
Queen Dowager, out of Excise, for Life - - - - -	10,972	19	3	Earl of Dorset, the like -	1,000	0	0
Ditto, more - - - - -	1,236	16	1	Earl of Macclesfield, the like -	1,000	0	0
Ditto, more out of the Revenue in general - - - - -	6,000	0	0	Ditto more, the like -	1,000	0	0
	£. 18,209	15	4	Lord Latimore, the like -	1,000	0	0
Duke of Grafton, out of Excise, for Life - - - - -	3,000	0	0	Earl of Sussex, the like -	1,000	0	0
Duke of Northumberland, out of Excise, the like - - - - -	3,000	0	0	Grooms of the Bedchamber.
Duke of Southampton, the like	3,000	0	0	Lord Godolphin, during Life -	500	0	0
Earl of Oxford, and his Countess, during the Life of the longer liver - - - - -	2,000	0	0	Bernard Greenvile, the like -	500	0	0
Executors of the Duke of Bucks, for 21 Years from Lady-day 1674 - - - - -	2,500	0	0	Edw. Progers, the like -	500	0	0
Earl of Ranelagh, for 21 Years from Midsummer 1674 - - - - -	1,500	0	0	Rob. Philipps, the like -	500	0	0
Christopher Lord Hatton, for the same time - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Thomas Felton, the like -	500	0	0
Lord Grandison and Colonel Vil- liers, for Ninety-nine Years, if the Duchess of Cleveland so long live - - - - -	6,000	0	0	George Bridges, the like -	500	0	0
Duchess of Portsmouth, from Christmas 1680, for 31 Years, out of First Fruits and Tenths	1,000	0	0	Thomas Neale, the like -	500	0	0
William Earl of Bedford, and others, in trust for the Count- ess of Bristol, during her Life, out of Tenths - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Thomas Lee, the like -	500	0	0
Countess of Bristol, for her own Life - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Tho. Windham, the like -	500	0	0
Countess of Portland during Life	1,000	0	0	Pages of Honour.
Peregrine Bertie, & alia, in Trust for the Countess of Plymouth, during her Life, viz.				Aubery Porter, during Life -	120	0	0
Out of Alienation-Money 1000 l.				John Prideaux, the like -	120	0	0
First Fruits, or Tenths - 2000 l.	3,000	0	0	Adolphus Sayer, the like -	120	0	0
Earl of Peterborough, for Service at Tangier, during Life - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Robert Killegrew, the like -	120	0	0
Charles Toll, for the Remainder of 21 Years from Lady-day 1680, out of Tenths - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Thomas Poultney, the like -	120	0	0
Earl and Countess of Litchfield, until 14,000 l. be paid at one intire Payment - - - - -	1,000	0	0	Thomas Felton, the like -	120	0	0
				Sidney Godolphin, the like -	120	0	0
				Women of the Bed-Chamber.
				Lelia Craniner, during Life -	300	0	0
				Mary Crane, the like -	300	0	0
				Lady Frazier, the like -	300	0	0
				Mary Tuke, the like -	300	0	0
				Ann Sheldon, the like -	300	0	0
				Winifred Windham, the like -	300	0	0
				Henrietta de Borde, the like -	300	0	0
				Joanna Thornhill, the like -	300	0	0
				Mary Carter, the like -	200	0	0
				Instrumentals in King Charles the Second's Escape.
				Mrs. Jane Lane (now Lady Fisher)
				during Life - - - - -	1,000	0	0
				Thomas Lane, the like -	500	0	0
				Charles Gifford, the like -	300	0	0
				Mrs. Rachel and Mrs. Frances
				Windham, the like - - - - -	400	0	0
				Nicholas Yates, and the Heirs of his Body - - - - -	100	0	0
				Francis Mansells, Executors for two Lives in Being - - - - -	200	0	0
				Francis Reinolds, during Life -	200	0	0
				Tho. Whitgrave, the like -	200	0	0
				Sir Thomas Windham, the like	600	0	0
				John Rogers, and Ann his Wife, and their Heirs Male - - - - -	100	0	0
				Rob. Swan - - - - -	80	0	0
				Kath. Gunter's Executors, for 21
				Years from Lady ... 1668 -	200	0	0
				Nic. Estall, during Life - - -	50	0	0
				Nic. Tittersell's Executors, for the Residue of a Term of 99
				Years, which commenced at

Lady-day 1663; if Nic. Titer- sell, Son of the said Nic. and Susan the Daughter, should so long live - - - - -	100	0	0	Five several Pensions, mentioned under the Head of Non-Pay- ments of the Exchequer -	1,252	0	0
Amias and Juliana Hext, during Life - - - - -	200	0	0		£. 144,330	9	1
Sir Wm. Killegrew, during Life	500	0	0	To the Twelve Judges -	12,000	0	0
Mrs. Mary Boynton, the like -	120	0	0	To the Masters in Chancery -	1,100	0	0
Somerset Fox, the like -	300	0	0	To the Judges of Wales -	700	0	0
Earl of Berks, the like -	300	0	0	Pensions - - -	158,130	9	1
Mrs. Ann Lawson, the like -	250	0	0	Perpetuities - - -	1,431	12	0
Mrs. Ann Goulding, the like -	120	0	0
Ann Bird, the like -	30	0	0	Paid at the Exchequer	£. 159,562	1	1
Mrs. Mary and Sophia Nevill, each 50 l. the like -	100	0	0	There are other Salaries to several of the King's Officers.
Lady Stepney, during Life -	200	0	0	Perpetuities paid out of the Customs, &c.
Lady Joan Howard, during Life	500	0	0	To the Mayor and Aldermen of Hull, for maintaining the Banks and Gates there, paid out of the Customs - - -	18	0	0
Dr. Gibbon, for 99 Years from Michaelmas 1674 -	100	0	0	Mayor and Burgesses of Ber- wick, for maintaining the Bridge there, out of Customs	100	0	0
Lord Dunblaine, till his Grant of the Office of Auditor of the Receipt of the Exchequer take effect - - - -	500	0	0	Corporation of Lyme, for Main- tenance of the Cobb there -	100	0	0
Wm. Levett, during Life -	200	0	0	Bishop of Exeter, for the Mi- nister of Lostwithiell, out of the Revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall - - -	30	0	0
Lady Sophia Stuart, the like -	300	0	0	Lostwithiell Gaol, out of the same	50	0	0
Lady Goditha Price, the like -	400	0	0	Corporation of Dartmouth, out of Customs - - -	40	0	0
Mrs. Eliz. Hamilton, the like -	500	0	0	To the Heirs of Colonel Fairfax for ever, out of Customs -	100	0	0
Ditto, for 99 Years; if James, George, or William, her Sons, should so long live -	850	0	0	Perpetuities -	438	0	0
Lady Fanshawe's Executors, for 31 Years, from Lady-day 1665	600	0	0	Pensions not paid at the Exchequer.
Sir Sam. Moreland, during Life	600	0	0	Prince and Princess of Denmark, for Life: viz.
Ditto more, for his Son's Life -	200	0	0	Out of the Excise - 15,000 l.	32,000	0	0
Eliz. Elliott, during Life -	500	0	0	Letter-Money - 15,000 l.
Kath. Elliott, the like -	200	0	0	Ditto, by Privy-Seal, during Pleasure - 2,000 l.
Lady Wentworth, the like -	600	0	0	Duke of Grafton, out of the Ex- cise, with Remainder over to his Brothers - - -	2,000	0	0
The Seven Auditors of the Re- venue, besides their old Salary, each 200 l. - - - -	1,400	0	0	Lawrence Hide, now Earl of Ro- chester, for 13 Years, from Michaelmas 1676 - -	500	0	0
Mrs. Winifred Windham, during Life - - - - -	200	0	0	Ditto, out of the Post-Office Mo- ney for 99 Years; if he, the said Earl, or his eldest Son, the Lord Visc. Hyde, should so long live - - -	4,000	0	0
Barbara Strickland, the like -	200	0	0	Duchess of Cleveland, out of Letter-Money - - -	4,700	0	0
Margaret Price, the like -	200	0	0	Earl of Bath, out of the Revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall -	3,000	0	0
Robert Bertie, during the Life of Mary Cock - - - -	40	0	0	Earl of Mulgrave, out of the Alum-Farm, during Life -	1,000	0	0
Lodowick Bray, during Life -	40	0	0	£. 1252 in the Exchequer.
Mrs. Sophia Bulkly, the like -	300	0	0	Jane Berkley, during Life -	200	0	0
Nath. Castleton, the like -	20	0	0	Lord Trenchville, during Queen Dowager's Life - - -	152	0	0
Wm. Chiffinch, during Life -	200	0	0
Madam Charlotte Howard, the like - - - - -	500	0	0
Edward and Fran. Russell, for Ten Years, from Midsummer 1687 - - - - -	600	0	0
Lady Fairbourne, Residue of 500 l. per Ann. unsundered	200	0	0
Duke of Albemarle, until 7000 l. be paid at one intire Payment, for the Purchase of Moute- Park - - - - -	300	0	0
To the Duchess of Monmouth, her Jointure - - - -	4,000	0	0
There is due upon this, since the Duke's Death, for Three Years Three Quarters, 15,000 l.

Sir Rob. Holmes, during Life -	500	0	0
Lady Mary Howard, for 19 years from Midsummer 1672 -	200	0	0
Edw. Progers, during the Life of the Lady Lucy Sandys -	200	0	0
Sir Wm. Morrice, out of the Alienation Office, during Life	300	0	0
Chancellor of the Garter for the Poor Knights of Windsor -	570	5	0

Instrumentals in Charles the Second's Escape.

Joan Ellesden, out of Customs, for Life -	100	0	0
Antho. and Charles Ellesden, for the Life of the longer Liver, out of Customs -	100	0	0
Ann and Mary Ellesden, the like -	100	0	0
Julian Conningsby, during Life, out of Land Revenue -	200	0	0
Eliau. Withers and Joan Hats- worth, the like -	100	0	0
Richard Grahme, for the Life of Sir Samuel Moreland; or, if he die sooner, to Midsummer 1692, out of Letter Money -	250	0	0
Sir Rich. Allibon, for the Life of James Corker of the Savoy; and, if he die sooner to Mid- summer 1692; out of Letter- Money -	250	0	0
Tho. Doyley, in lieu of his Place of Engineer of the Mint, out of Customs -	100	0	0
Sir Peter Killegrew, out of the Duchy of Cornwall -	300	0	0
Major Fincher, a Coldstreamer, out of Ditto, during Life -	80	0	0
Major Johnson, a Coldstreamer, out of the same, during Life -	60	0	0
Allowed to the Adventurers and Fishermen of Great Yarmouth, upon the Duty of Excise, pay- able by them for the Provision of Beer for the North Sea, and Herring-Fishery, under the Proviso of due Payment of the said Duty by them out of Excise -	160	0	0
Sir Tho. Clargis, out of the 12d. per Chaldron on Coals, in Fee	500	0	0
Earl of Kinoul, during Life, out of the Four and Half per Cent.	1000	0	0
Edw. Progers, out of unwrought Wood, for 21 Years, from Christmas 1674 -	800	0	0
Lady Villier's Executors, out of a Coinage-Duty, for Ten Years, from the Ninth Day of August 1681 -	600	0	0
More out of Post-Fines, for Ten Years, from Michaelmas 1683	500	0	0

Total of the Pensions not paid at the Exchequer - 53,270 5 0

VOL. V.

Paid at the Exchequer.

In Perpetuities 1,431 12 0	}	159,562 1 1
In Pensions 158,130 9 1

Payments not made in the Exchequer.

In Perpetuities - 438 0 0	}	53,708 5 0
In Pensions - 53,270 5 0

Total of both - 213,270 6 1

Petty Farms, and other particular Estates, granted of certain parts of the revenue.

Prizage and Butlerage.

The Prizage is an hereditary duty taken of Wines, (to wit) one ton, if there be ten in a ship; and two, if there be above twenty; imported by strangers, or English, not exempted by charter, or special prescription.—The butlerage is 2s. per ton, imported by strangers: these duties were demised by James 1, to sir Thomas Waller, for a term of 40 years, which commenced after lives which were then in being, (in which term of years there are now to come by estimation, about 11 years) at the rent of 500*l.* per ann.: and Charles 2, 1673, granted the reversion of the said duties, with the said rent thereunto incident, to Trustees, for George Fitzroy, now duke of Northumberland, and the heirs male of his body; with remainder over to Henry Fitzroy, earl of Ewston, now duke of Grafton, and the heirs male of his body.

Twelve-pence per Chaldron on Coals.

Charles 2, demised to John lord viscount Mordant, sir Robert Peyton, and Jeremy Whitchcott, the 12*d.* per chaldron which was formerly granted to the crown for ever by the host-men of Newcastle, for all sea coals carried from thence, coast-wise, for the term of 31 years, which commenced from Christmas 1660, at the rent of 1838*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per ann.: and, in 1675, his said late majesty demised to Eliz. viscountess Mordant, 4*d.* part of the said 12*d.* per chaldron, for 31 years, in reversion of the aforesaid term, at the rent of 612*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* per ann.: and, in 1677, his said majesty granted to Charles duke of Richmond and Lenox, and Lovise dutchess of Portsmouth, the whole duty of 12*d.* per chaldron, and the rents reserved on both leases; Habend' to the duke and the heirs of his body; and, for want of such heirs, to the dutchess and the heirs of her body; at four nobles per ann. rent; saving to sir Tho. Clarges, and his heirs, a grant, which was before made to him in fee, of 500*l.* per ann. out of this duty.

Coals.

Charles 2, demised to Horatio lord Townsend 4*s.* per chaldron (part of the duties on coals exported to foreign parts) for 21 years, from Michaelmas 1667, at 1000*l.* per ann. rent; which lease expired at Michaelmas last: but there was another lease made in Feb. 1675, by Charles 2, to Wm. Etterick, esq. of this duty, for 31 years from Michaelmas 1688, at the same rent.

R

Barilla and Pot-Ashes.

The customs upon these were granted in lease by Charles 2, to the late earl of kinoule, for 31 years. from Lady-day 1664, at 240*l.* per ann. rent; which rent was afterward released: the lease became void by his late majesty's death; but James 2 did, by privy-seal, direct the duty to be collected by officers to be appointed by the lord treasurer, or commissioners of the treasury, and to be paid to the receiver-general of the customs; who is first to pay the charges of management; in the next place, to pay 940*l.* per ann. to the executors or administrators of the earl of Kinoule; and the rest to Thomas Brodrick and Wm. Jackson, sub-farmers, during the residue of the said term; which will end at Lady-day 1695, unless the privy-seal be sooner determined.

Logwood.

This is an hereditary duty, and was demised by Charles 2. to the earl of Rothesier (supposed to be a trustee for Mrs. Gwyn) for 21 years, from Michaelmas 1683, at 5*l.* per ann. rent.

Writs.

The profits arising by sealing writs, &c. with the seals of the courts of King's-Bench and common Pleas, is granted to George duke of Northumberland, and the heirs male of his body; with like remainders in tale to his two brothers.

Lottery.

There is a grant made by the late James to one Ashenhurst, and others for the use of the royal oak-lottery, at 2200*l.* per ann.; but it not being entered before me, I cannot inform when it expires.

A Particular of old Debts, standing out before the year 1671, upon Registers kept on several Branches of the Revenue.

On London Excise	-	-	13,915	19	4
On Country Excise	-	-	5,234	10	7
On Additional Excise	-	-	2,100	0	0
On the Law-Bill	-	-	5,385	13	7
On Customs	-	-	74,800	9	0½
On Wines and Vinegar	-	-	44,850	6	9½
On Fee-Farm Rents	-	-	62,042	5	8¼
On hearth-Duty	-	-	110,500	2	1½
Revenue of North and South Wales	-	-	4,426	8	1
Recovery of Tin at Ostend	-	-	750	0	0
Four and a half per Cent.	-	-	5,472	8	0
Salt imported	-	-	500	0	0
Since 1671, Second Disbanding Act, for Principal, besides Interest due	-	-	54,390	4	4
Hereditary Excise, To the Creditors of the Goldsmiths, a yearly Charge of 79,566 l. 14 s 2 d. ; upon which there is due for Six Years, at Lady-day last	-	-	477,400	5	0

£. 861,768 12 6½

Charges upon the Revenue.

Mr. Tho. Fox, for the Security of his Place of Receiver of the Customs, by Tally	-	20,000	0	0
--	---	--------	---	---

Mr. Duncombe, for the same,

on the Excise	-	-	20,000	0	0
The City, on the Excise	-	-	185,525	0	0
To Mr. Hornby, on the Excise	-	-	5,000	0	0
To Mr. Hall, on the Hearth-Money	-	-	47,000	0	0

£. 277,525 0 0

There is an Arrear to the Army and Navy	-	-	300,000	0	0

---------------	---	---	---------	---	---

There is also a yearly Charge of 79,566*l.* 14*s* 2*d.* for perpetual Interest to the Goldsmiths, and their Assigns;

which is now in Arrear at

Lady-day next, for 6 Years	477,400	5	0
----------------------------	---------	---	---

Report concerning Sir T. Armstrong.] Sir Joseph Tredenham reported from the Committee of Grievances, the matter to them referred, concerning sir Thomas Armstrong, viz. "That having summoned sir Sam. Astrey, the clerk of the crown, with the record of the outlawry of Hill. 35 and 36 Car. 2, it appeared that the Quint. Ex. was Luna prox. post fest. sanct. Andreae Apost. 35 Car. 2*di.* That the Award of prosecution, was Die Sab. prox. post quindec. let. Trinitat. 36. upon a Nihil dicit, which was but six months after the said outlawry. That sir S. Astrey being examined, declared he was present at the Arraignment of sir T. Armstrong, who, being asked why execution should not be awarded against him, said, that by the statute of 5 & 6 Edw. 6. c. 11. it is enacted, 'That, if the party outlawed shall, within one year next after the outlawry pronounced, yield himself to the chief-justice of England, for the time being, and offer to traverse the Indictment or Appeal, that then he should be received to the said traverse. That he was answered by the lord chief justice Jeffreys, that he could pretend to no benefit, since he did not render himself to the lord chief-justice, as that statute requires; and that the court proceeded thereupon, to award Judgment against him as a Traitor, and believes he was executed accordingly. That Mrs. Matthews, (daughter of the said sir Thomas) being likewise examined, said she was in the court of King's-Bench, when her father was arraigned. That he demanded to have the statute of 5 and 6 of Ed. 6. read, and it was refused. That he, likewise, demanded council and a trial, but it was denied; and he urging that Holloway, who was in the said circumstance, had his trial, the Chief Justice said they had enough against Holloway. To which sir Thomas replied, that then they had not against him. And added, 'His blood be upon him,' meaning the Lord Chief Justice, who said, 'Let it! I am clamour-proof!' That she added, her father had council in Newgate, and advice from an unknown hand: that he was very much loaded with irons and very ill used, that her sister was struck by the keeper of Newgate, and she herself committed by the court of King's-bench, for crying out, when sentence was given, that her father was to be murdered."

Resolved, "That the Award of Execution by the court of King's-bench, against sir T. Armstrong, was a high Violation of Justice, and against the express laws of the land.—And that a Bill be brought in to reverse the Attainder of the said sir T. Armstrong."

Resolutions for raising the Navy Supply.]

April 30. The commons resolved, 1. "That towards the raising 700,000*l.* for the Navy, a Tax be laid upon all ground rents for new Buildings, upon new foundations, within the bills of mortality, since March 25, 1660, except such as are within the Walls of London. 2. That Provision be made in such Bill against the increase of new buildings. 3. That towards the said 700,000*l.* an additional Excise be laid upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, except Coffee, Chocolate, Tea, spirituous Liquors, and low Wines, for three years, from June 24 1689, according to the rates in the Act of 29 Car. II. for an additional Excise. 4. That a Bill be brought in for applying to the public use all such pecuniary Forfeitures as have been incurred for accepting and exercising any office, or employ, contrary to the act of the 25th of Car. 2. for preventing Dangers from Popish Recusants: and that such persons, who have so acted, may not be employed for the future. (To this an Instruction was added, for a Clause to comprehend all Forfeitures on Informations then depending) And that a committee be appointed to receive Proposals for raising Money upon security of lands forfeitable in Ireland, for the present Rebellion."

Remarkable Case of Edmund Prideaux, esq.]

May 1. Mr. Gwyn reported to the commons, the Case of Edmund Prideaux, esq. which in substance was as follows: "That the said Ed. Prideaux, esq. was seized at his own house, (Ford-Abbey in Devonshire) June 19, 1685, by one of the late king's messengers in virtue of a warrant signed by the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state, on suspicion of Treason, and brought to London, where he continued a prisoner at the said messenger's house, till discharged by Habeas Corpus July 14, on giving security for his appearance the next term. In evidence of which, the original warrant signed by lord Sunderland was produced. And Saywell, the said messenger, confessed the execution. The warrant was dated June 13, and the duke of Monmouth landed at Lyme the 11th. That the said Prideaux several times desired to be heard before the Council, but was constantly refused, which was confirmed by Saywell and a kinsman of the said Prideaux's, who was likewise bail for him, together with one Mr. Craig, in the sum of 2500*l.* each, Mr. Prideaux himself being answerable for his own appearance, in the penalty of 5000*l.* That the said Prideaux being committed a second time (to the Tower) his wife petitioned the king that he might be examined, but could obtain no answer; which was confirmed by one Mr. Slater. That during his second confinement, no body was permitted to see him for several weeks, and it was with great difficulty his wife at last procured leave, on the hard condition of being confined with him: which she consented to, till an indisposition obliged her to solicit a release; which was confirmed by one Mr. Slaughter. That while the said Prideaux was kept thus closely confined in the Tower, all the prisoners and condemned persons in the West, (on account of Monmouth's Invasion,) were tampered with by the agents of lord Jeffreys, with threats and promises of life, to be his accusers, as was witnessed by Mr. C. Speke before his execution; as likewise to Mr. Wm. Thompson of London, haberdasher, Mr. Joseph Standerwich, sergemaker, and Mr. Samuel Key, clothier, both of Ilminster. That the said Prideaux could never to this day discover of what he was accused. That the said Prideaux, his wife, lady Tooker his sister, and Mr. Bulstrode, one of the gentlemen ushers, having applied to several persons of quality to solicit the king in his behalf, were one and all informed by the said persons of quality, (of whom the earl of Tyrconnel is mentioned by name) 'That nothing was to be done; For that the king had given the prisoner to the lord-chancellor, (Jeffreys.)' That Mrs. Prideaux then saw the necessity of applying to the said lord-chancellor, and accordingly did by the interposition of one Mr. Jenkins and one Mr. Jennings, the last of which undertook to procure his pardon for 10,000*l.* which being demurred to on account of the extravagance of the sum, the demand was next raised to 15,000*l.* and insisted upon, on pain of his being left out of the general pardon: that thereupon by the friendship of sir Robert Dashwood the said sum was raised, and, with the abatement of 240*l.* for prompt payment of 2,400*l.* part of the said 15,000*l.* was paid to sir Robert Clayton, on account of lord Jeffreys, who, likewise, acknowledged the same; and that since the payment of the said sum, lord Jeffreys has made a purchase of two estates of the duke of Albemarle's, for which he paid about 34,000*l.*"

Ordered, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill, to charge the said two Estates purchased by the late lord Jeffreys, with the re-payment of the sum of 15,000*l.* and interest, which was by him extorted from Ed. Prideaux, esq."

A Bill from the Lords rejected.] May 4. An engrossed Bill from the lords, making and declaring it to be Treason to keep any intelligence, or maintain any correspondence with the late king James, being read a second time, a motion was made to commit it, but overruled; and then it was rejected without a division.

The King thanks the Commons for their Address for a War with France.] May 7. Mr. Hampden signified, That his majesty had been pleased to command him to acquaint the house, that he will presently issue forth a Declaration of War against France, and that he is encouraged thereto by the assurance this house hath given him of their assistance; and that his majesty was graciously pleased to command him to return his Thanks to the house for it.

*Debate on some hot Words that passed between Capt. Bertie , and Mr. Harbord.] Mr. Hampden, sen. I have taken notice of some angry words betwixt these two gentlemen. I move that they may stand up, man by man, and engage, upon their honours, not to proceed farther in this difference.

Col. Mildmay. I hope that you will not put it upon your Books, that a quarrel has been here, and your Votes to be sent abroad.

The Speaker. Let both the gentlemen stand up at one time, and no priority, or precedency, in the declaration.

Mr. Harbord. The gentleman (Mr. Bertie) is of too much honour to engage one that has not the use of either of his hands. If I have been ill-used, I cannot pass my word not to proceed farther, without satisfaction; therefore, pray consider with yourselves what you have to do. It is a hard thing for me to acknowledge I have received an injury, and require no reparation for it.

Sir Wm. Williams. If Mr. Harbord said, 'There were Pensioners in the Long Parliament,' your Books say so, and any man may.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I am sorry for the occasion of this debate. As Harbord is a man of honour, so he has expressed great honour relating to the other gentleman. But we ought to declare what was the occasion of the misunderstanding; and, I hope, these honourable persons will declare they will proceed no farther.

The Speaker. The two gentlemen say nothing; you must lay the commands of the house upon them to declare.

Mr. Harbord. I do not conceive myself injured at all.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I think these gentlemen both men of honour. It is out of their power to proceed any farther. The house will take care they shall not do it. Therefore they may declare.

Mr. Bertie. I apprehended Harbord reflected upon me as a Pensioner. I thought I was reflected upon about the election at Westbury.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I heard the words of 'Pensioner—Parliament.' I remember, sir Stephen Fox had questions put to him upon every member of the house about receiving Pensions. †

Mr. Garroway. The whole thing these gentlemen stand upon is a punctilio, who shall stand up first and declare. I would write both their names, and put them in a hat, and let them draw out who shall declare.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. This is a tender point before you, and nicety in the thing. I offer it, that both may come to the table at the same time, and there underwrite, 'That they will not prosecute the quarrel any farther.'

Mr. Bertie. If Harbord will say he intended no personal reflection upon me, I will be satisfied.

Col. Mildmay. Punctilio of honour is a great point; but it is the general opinion of the house, that no words were spoken of particular reflection by Harbord, but generally as the parliament-men were called over. So many judgments having passed, methinks these gentlemen should be more free, without putting the house or themselves to farther trouble. If not you may make use of your authority.

Mr. Colt. The depth of the matter lies upon what will be discoursed without doors; therefore I am for your members coming to the table, as has been moved.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I think, it is equal for both their honours. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that it is your part to make an Order, 'That being informed of some angry words betwixt these gentlemen, upon which a quarrel may ensue, they be taken into custody.' This is your duty that no mischief may ensue.

The Speaker. It is no dishonour to put these persons under restraint, for it is your work and order; and then friends may interpose.

Mr. Harbord. Do you think imprisoning me would frighten me to petition for release? I do not think myself injured, and can it be thought a man of my age would quarrel when I am not injured? If you do commit me, what will become of the king's business?

Mr. Herbert. I would have you very careful what sort of question you put. One declares, 'he does not think himself injured:' he has done it. All know there were Pensions, and if Bertie had thought himself injured, he should have complained. I would have them both stand up, and declare, as has been moved.

Lord Norreys*. I remember the case of Westbury. I have heard Bertie say, 'If Harbord will declare he meant not him he is satisfied.'

Mr. Harbord. I have heard it said, as if the thing seems too nice; it is not that at all. I could tell tales, if I were provoked, on the other side.

Sir Henry Capel. I am concerned for both these honourable gentlemen; one has been my friend these many years, the other is related to me; but it is the house must be judge of one and the other. As for that of Pensions, it has been universally spoken of, and will be

* Eldest son of the first earl of Abingdon; to which title he succeeded, on his father's death, in 1699. In queen Anne's reign, he was constable of the Tower, and had other high employments, as he had also in the reign of king George I. He died without issue in 1743.

* Brother to the earl of Lindsey.

† See vol. iv. p. 1141.

still, that the government may not be under any corruptions whatsoever. First, Harbord says, 'he is not injured;' therefore, if Bertie will say, 'he apprehends himself not reflected on.'—Or rather that the house vote there is no injury done—

Mr. Harbord. To put an end to this, write down what I should say, and I will say it, and obey you.

The Speaker proposed these words to be spoken by the two gentlemen, viz. 'I do promise, upon my word and honour, not to prosecute any quarrel, upon this occasion;' which was accordingly done.

The Bill of Rights and Succession sent up to the Lords.] May 8. A Bill for establishing the Articles presented by the Lords and Commons to their Majesties, and for settling the Crown, was read the third time.

Mr. Godolphin. After the limitation, in the first place, upon the king, queen and her heirs, and princess Anne, &c. when this limitation is spent, where will you go next? Where shall the crown devolve, all these dying without issue? Therefore I humbly offer this Proviso: 'Provided always, and be it hereby declared, That nothing in this Act is intended to be drawn into example, or consequence, hereafter, to prejudice the right of any Protestant prince, or princess, in their hereditary Succession to the imperial crown of these realms.'

Mr. Garroway. You are upon a high point. I do believe, this Proviso was brought in by this gentleman with a good intention: but, whether it be full enough not to break into the limitation of the Act? It is more expressive than the word 'hereafter.' I would not leave any loop-hole in the Bill, for any to come to the crown that you intend not. God knows how soon any body may die; therefore I would not leave it at large. Those who expect a Commonwealth in England, by failure of those you have named, I would disappoint them all. But if there be any umbrage, that the thing is not full, I would have it so, and shall agree to it.

Mr. Attorney Treby. This Proviso does not well agree with the Bill. He that spoke for retaining the proviso, says, 'He respects nobody by it in particular in the Bill, but to clear the matter of the Succession hereafter.' Therefore I think the Proviso is useless. Nothing, it is true, is appointed in the bill, farther than the entail upon the persons named; and I suppose (as the law does) that those you have named shall have issue; but if they have not, the common law provides for it, which is, the right heirs of the royal family: but when you say, 'a Protestant prince, &c.' it seems to exclude the right heirs that are not; and to say, as in the Proviso tendered, 'This shall not be drawn into example;' it is only a caution and admonition, that this flattering Proviso will not bind up their power. Rather than have a hand in any thing of a Republic, I would have lost my hand. Where there is a great territory, and a warlike people, as the English are, monarchy is a government fit for that part of the world; the experiment of a Commonwealth will be impracticable. This bill leaves the descent of the Succession to the common law, and no otherwise; let them be what they will, Protestants must be in the Succession; and so they will, without this Proviso.

Mr. Hales. In this bill, you have not thought fit to go farther than the present king, &c. and in no Acts of Succession farther than the issue of persons in being: but if you take the word 'hereafter' not to preclude any Protestant that has right to inherit, it will comprehend the prince of Wales, if he turn Protestant, and he may challenge the crown again. The words are exclusive to Papists already, and there is no reason to clog the Act with this Proviso: therefore I would reject it.

Mr. Ettrick. I have seen the Proviso, and I believe there is no design in it of favouring the prince of Wales. If the throne be vacant, this goes to take away the rightful succession of other princes, and is an abdication to the whole frame of the government. If there be no heirs of those in the entail, you have left the government to the people. You have great reason to countenance all vindication of yourselves from a Commonwealth; and therefore I think the Proviso fit to be received.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. As to the arguments of the word 'hereafter' if subject to such interpretation, then you would do well to amend it with the word 'hereafter.' I would have no doubt to affect the limitations of the Succession in the bill.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I never heard of this Proviso before. As it is penned, no gentleman can be for it; and, when it is mended, nobody can tell whither it will extend. You have already the Bill to establish the Government, and all people submitted to it, and you sit here by it; and now you are going over again to what you did so many months ago. You have provided against all Popish successors, and now you are going about to do it a-new. I do believe, this comes from the agency of some foreign minister; and do this now in a new bill, and then you must let the king, the queen, and princess Anne be heard. Why was not this spoken of sooner, in all this time? And now to enter into such a matter of state, now to bring in this, to put a doubt upon all you have done already! I am against it.

Mr. Godolphin. I hear it said, 'possibly this Proviso comes from the agency of some foreign minister.' I would have it known, I never took measures from any foreign or domestic minister. It looks, by the Proclamation, as if dominion was founded in grace—[and reads the Proclamation.] Here is no notice taken of the right of the princess of Orange's title, but of her merit only.* That the monarchy might be looked upon as hereditary, and not elective, was my motive to bring in the Proviso.

* "Whose zeal for the Protestant Religion will, no doubt, bring a blessing along with her upon this nation." See the Proclamation.

Sir T. Clarges. I conceive, the inducement to bring in this Proviso, is, because the limitation of the succession is very loose. There is no certainty of the life of any man; and I would not have the kingdom fall into a Commonwealth; which it may, if the limitation, &c. goes no farther. I heard a gentleman say, 'We did not wisely, not to keep things in our hands when we had them.' This is one reason, why I would have the words added that are moved: Instead of 'hereafter,' say 'after the limitations herein mentioned.'

Mr. Sacheverell. If there be any other person to be put into the limitation of the succession, pray let us know him, and not put this in general.

Col. Herbert. I saw a letter of a sister of prince Rupert's, wherein she was complaining of great hardship done her children, that they were not regarded in the entail of the crown; therefore I move, that they may be mentioned.

Sir H. Capel. By what has fallen from the gentleman, you see, foreign ministers have been doing in this matter; but you have it answered already, 'That the heirs at common law are asserted to succeed, for default of those in the entail.' I have heard it talked, as if king William was king by Divine Right, and Dominion founded in Grace; then you had best put the question, Whether the king be king, or not? Is not the clause in the Proviso, 'of not drawing it into example,' arraigning all you have done already? In the Long Parliament, when the court was carrying on their great designs of Popery and arbitrary government, gentlemen that opposed it were called Commonwealth's-men; and we are told of 'the Rebellion—and 1641—and cutting off the king's head,' and all this for opposing the court's designs, when they were about to destroy our religion and liberties. It can never be a Commonwealth. When the Succession in Hen. 8.'s time was turned this way and that way, it was put into the king's power to settle the Succession by his will: and where were the thoughts of a Commonwealth then? The first part of the Proviso is a reflection upon you for omitting it before; and the second there is no need of, or whether the prince of Wales comes in by it. Either a foreign minister is in it, or a stratagem from France; and I would throw it out.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I know not why we are told of 'France, and foreign ministers.' If we have not liberty to speak, let us go home. I know not what thoughts other gentlemen have of the prince of Wales; I have none: but I know we have had a Commonwealth, and a Rebellion in 1641 also. If the thing be capable of amendment, it ought to be retained; and it is the right of every gentleman to bring in a Proviso.

Mr. Godolphin. I defy any man to prove any such thing as 'corresponding with a foreign minister,' or that I manage 'a stratagem from France.' Turn me out of the house, if that be proved. This Proviso was suggested to me by no man.

Sir H. Goodrick. When I hear this fatal rencounter we have had with France, and then these reflections here, and that we may go into the country,—these expressions are made here, with a supposition that we have no liberty of speech; but this, said at this time, when the French are upon us, and who have had too much influence here; and we are told of 1641! After the admonition of the Speaker, nothing but the Vacancy of the Throne, and the not vacancy, occasions this business; and are we returning to 'vacant,' or 'not vacant,' upon our Petition of Right? And whoever speaks against it, doubts the government. The common law leaves all to the right of the succession, and there let us leave it.

Lord Falkland. I disapprove of the Proviso, as it is brought in; but it may be mended, so as to justify your proceedings abroad. It is said abroad, you have settled the Government upon the king and queen; it is true, they have no children, and the princess of Denmark none that have lived, though married a great while; so there are but three lives for it; if it should happen that these should die without issue, where is the hurt of this proviso? fortify the proviso against the tale of the prince of Wales. You have Protestant princes abroad, and the more you settle this, the more you protect them.

Mr. Hawles. Now I understand, by mending the proviso with the word 'hereafter,' I am more against it than I was at first. There has been talk of 'government founded in grace,' but much more mischief if founded in right. This questions the whole government. There is not one word in the Act that can prejudice any foreign successor; but this, by a side-wind to come in, makes me suspect it. When the City-Charter was questioned, the king's counsel against it said, 'It was a Commonwealth in a Commonwealth;' therefore I am not for this proviso thus introduced.

Mr. Somers. I think there is no hurt in wholly leaving out this proviso. In the case of Hen. 4th, it was a solemn Judgment, that the throne was vacant, and then it was settled on the king's sons, and no farther by name; for it would come into its own channel by succession of descent. In the Life of Henry 7th, lord Bacon reckons it as one of the wisest actions of his reign, that he limited the crown no farther, but left it to descend. Let us tread in the steps of our ancestors; you have declared the Vacancy of the Throne; but to do this now, would bring a suspicion upon what you have done: make your succession so founded on grace, that none but protestants succeed. This strikes at the whole foundation of what you have done. Therefore lay it aside.

Mr. Paul Foley. This proviso is of too great importance to be brought in by a rider. It is not fit, on the sudden, to take any farther prospect of the limitation of the succession by a rider, but refer it to a farther consideration.

The Proviso was then rejected; after which an ingrossed Clause was offered as a rider, to be made part of the Bill, and was twice read; and is as followeth: "That, from and after this present session of parliament, no dispensation, by Non obstante, of or to any statute, or any part thereof, shall be allowed; but that the same shall be held void, and of no effect; except a dispensation be allowed of in such statute. Provided, that no charter, or grant, or pardon, before the 1st of June, 1689, shall be any ways impeached, or invalidated, by this act; but that the same shall be and remain of the same force and effect in law, and no other, than as if this act had never been made."—To this the house agreed. The Bill was then passed, and ordered to the lords.

12d. in the Pound Land Tax granted.] May 10. The house in a committee on the Supply, Resolved, "That a Subsidy be granted their majesties of 12d. in the pound for one year, upon all lands and houses, &c. according to the true intrinsic value; as likewise on all personal estates, household goods and stock excepted; and also upon offices and employments, those of the Army and Navy excepted:" and a bill was ordered accordingly.

The Petition of G. Speke, esq.] The same day, George Speke, esq. presented a Petition to the house, complaining of certain arbitrary prosecutions against him, by Mr. Burton and Mr. Graham, on pretence of Treason, by which means a Verdict was obtained against him, and a Fine set upon him of 2000 marks: that afterwards, by indirect means, a Bill of High-Treason was found against his wife, and that he was obliged to compound the matter at the expence of 5000*l.* and praying relief. Upon which a Committee was appointed to examine the matter of fact, and report the same to the house.

Sir H. Monson and lord Fanshaw expelled, for refusing to take the Oaths.] May 13. The house was informed that sir Henry Monson, member for Lincoln, attended according to Order.*

Mr. Garroway. Before you call him in, pray make some Order how to hear him, whether in his place: and what punishment you will inflict upon his refusal of the Oaths.

Sir T. Clarges. If he will not take the Oaths, he cannot be a member, and ought not to have a place here.

Sir John Thompson. I hope you will be as tender to your members, as the lords are to theirs. If he has not sat, I know not how he is culpable. The Bishops have three months time to consider, &c. and I hope you will give him that indulgence.

Sir T. Littleton. We are no court of justice, but we may dispose of our own members: but if he refuses the Oaths, you may send out a new writ to chuse one in his place.

Sir T. Lee. If your members refuse to take the Oaths, their place is void; but, as for giving him time to consider of it, it appears not yet that he refuses them. I believe, in some time, you will see the government will be obeyed; and in a few months you may see how the parliament will deal with such as are not of the same allegiance. Therefore I would give him time.

The Speaker. You cannot hear him in his place, neither is it proper that he answers at the bar, being yet no criminal; therefore let him come up to the table, to be tendered the Oaths there.

Sir Henry Monson was then called in, and the Speaker thus spoke to him: "The house having taken notice that you have staid a great while about the town, and have not tendered yourself to take the Oaths of Allegiance, and the Test, as you ought to have done, hath summoned you to take them."

Sir Henry Monson. I am sorry I cannot comply with taking the oaths, to qualify myself to sit in the house, for particular reasons, such as no way tend to the disturbance of the government; and I do submit myself to the pleasure of the house.—He then withdrew.

Mr. Arnold. He knows that the refusal of the Oaths is a crime at common-law, and by statute-law. I would have him made an example.

Mr. Edw. Montagu. I know him to be an honest gentleman, and as well inclined to the government as any man. In Cha. 2.'s time, he voted for the Bill of Exclusion, and deported himself very well. What his particular reasons are for not taking the Oaths, I know not.

Mr. Pelham. I believe, as has been moved, you cannot regularly commit him, and if any man have a title to your favour, he may. No man went better in the former parliaments; and I beg that no farther mark of your displeasure be upon him, than to dismiss him from your service.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I never knew an honest man; both the son, and the father, true public-spirited men. I have sat long in parliament with them. You know what the statute directs in this case of refusing the Oaths; therefore I would not enlarge your jurisdiction farther than sending a new writ to chuse another member in his place.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I have sat in several parliaments with this gentleman, but I did not expect this from him. I would have him sent for in again, and a little time given him to consider.

Resolved, "That sir Henry Monson be discharged from being a Member of the house."

Lord Fanshaw then came up to the table in the same manner.

* Notice had been taken, two days before, that sir Henry Monson and lord visc. Fanshaw, though they were resident in or about the city of London, had absented themselves from the service of the house, ever since the Oaths were enjoined to be taken; and they were therefore summoned to attend this day. See the Journal.

Lord Fanshaw. I have been under a long indisposition; and though I have been about town, in the evenings, yet I was under a course of physic and diet; and since I was absent, an Act has passed; and being not qualified by taking the Oaths, I could not properly appear here.

The Speaker. But, my lord, are you willing to take the Oaths now you are here?

Lord Fanshaw. I must give a plain answer to that question: I am not satisfied to take the Oaths.—He then withdrew.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I suppose the house will take the same course with lord Fanshaw, that they did with sir Henry Monson.

Resolved, "That lord Fanshaw be discharged from being a Member of the house."

Debate on the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity.
May 14. The house resolved itself into a Committee of the whole house to consider of the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity*.

Sir Wm. Williams. I suppose you indemnify all crimes, and all mankind, unless persons and things excepted.

Sir Rd. Temple. Take the Act of Indemnity of Ch. 2. before you, and then you will see the Exceptions. I would extend them to as few as may be. It will be necessary to make some examples of those who have endeavoured the ruin of their country and government.

Col. Austen. I believe that, though persons within these walls may be concerned, it will be done with all worth; but let things find out persons.

Sir Tho. Clarges. That Act of Indemnity of the 25th Ch. 2, I hope, may be the better precedent. Consider, first, what Exceptions you will make; and next, what shall be pardoned; and next, consider that of 12th Ch. 2.

Mr. Sacheverell. Crimes of state are never to be forgiven. Name what crimes are not pardonable, and they will find out the persons.

Mr. Carter. If I take it right, the king has given us some measures. If offences against the government are so far in the dark, you will never find out persons. There is some discourse, without doors, that if we go about things, we shall set the whole nation on fire. I hope the king's direction will be most acceptable to the nation.

Sir Rob. Howard. I would willingly hear

* "The king thought nothing would settle the minds of the nation so much as an Act of Indemnity, with proper Exceptions of some criminals that should be left to justice. Jeffreys was in the Tower, (he died there soon after,) Wright, who had been Lord Chief Justice, and some of the Judges, were in Newgate; Graham and Burton, who had been the wicked Solicitors in the former reigns, were in prison; but the hottest of the Whigs would not set this on. They thought it best to keep many under the lash; therefore they proceeded so slowly in the matter, that the Bill could not be brought to a ripeness during this session." Burnet.

that Act read; and many things in it must be in this: but there are new-invented crimes in this age, that this Act cannot reach. We must go by things and men, and then by such things and men as no age ever saw. I know we have a large field of things and men: things of the worst nature are the largest field; therefore consider the nature of things; and if I ever move in favour of thing or man, I will tell you the reason, and unless some merit induce me to it.

Sir Rd. Temple. I agree with Howard in all but his last motion; not that I am an advocate for any person, but for the whole nation, if things involve many you would not. Treasons are always excepted in any general act of parliament. If we go to persons, we shall agree, for we all know them; if to things, we are in a wood, and shall never get out of it; and I despair that the Act will ever come to good. I would put men's minds in peace, and make examples only of notorious instruments.

Sir Henry Capel. If it be the sense of the committee, that all shall be forgiven, I am content; but what we do, is for satisfaction of the government, not that any gentleman can be pleased with this. I think to begin with things; and to prevent heats, I take this idea; as if in the country, they complain of hardships from the Judges, men of the robe, who throw dust in the eyes of juries; so if you take consideration of crimes against the laws, and the government, use the rest with what moderation you please, either by fines, or otherwise; and begin with things.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Consider of what consequence it will be to make a multitude of offenders. There are many offenders, and you know who they are. We know the great men that have offended in the open light. There is no other end in this Bill, but to reconcile men's minds to the government; and those you declare obnoxious, and it is no severity upon them, we know. When France was in combustion, it was the great care of Henry 4 to punish some, and leave the rest in some degree of favour. I desire, therefore, that you will proceed against persons that have been the most notorious offenders.

Sir Robert Cotton. The king has sent a gracious Message to us about an Act of Indemnity. No government can be so secure, as when satisfied that they have a gracious merciful king. I know the consequence of the beginning of the last government. Those in the West did see such a shambles*, as made them think they had a Turk, rather than a Christian, to their king. If you proceed that way, of enquiring into things before persons, you will leave such jealousies in people, as that they will not think themselves safe; it will go so large, I fear it will hazard the peace and safety of the nation. The great wheels, the primum mobiles, that have gone so violently, and brought us into this confusion, I move that you will proceed against them, and that the king's gracious intentions may have farther effect, and those only excepted.

* "After Monmouth's Rebellion, Jeffreys was sent the Western Circuit, to try the prisoners. His behaviour was beyond any thing that was ever heard of in a civilized nation. He showed no mercy, and hanged up in several places about 600 persons. And the king took pleasure to relate his proceedings in the drawing room, and at table, calling it 'Jeffreys's campaign.'" Burnet.

Mr. Harbord. I hope you will not pardon any of those crimes condemned by law already: they that changed their religion. You are hard put to it, to find out Money. Great men of 8, or 10,000*l.* per ann. I hope, may help you. You punish men that do not take the Oaths and the Test, and will you not punish those who have renounced God Almighty? I move they may be excepted.

Mr. Harley.* I think the king in his Message has led us, and showed us how to proceed for satisfaction of justice. 'There is a crime,' God says, 'he will not pardon,' innocent blood. A gentleman said, 'The West was a shambles of their quarters;' and what made that shambles? It began in law. It was the common discourse amongst the ministers, that the king cannot have justice, and, in order to that, began the violation of the City-privileges, in the choice of their sheriffs.

Sir Robert Howard. In those that were perverted and changed their religion, it was treason. Suppose you name the man, there must be an appendix of his crime; and must that man be a sacrifice for that particular thing? So whatever man you name, you must name the thing. If there must be so general a forgiveness of all, you must go equal. You must either take notice of all, or forgive all things, that the invention of times has found out of equal nature. In the Bill for repealing

col. Sidney's Attainder, you repeal the murder, but not a word of the murderers: shall it be excused upon direction of the Judge? We know what we did with lord chief justice Keeling. Try one way first; name any one man, by experiment, upon any one head.

Sir John Lowther. To reduce matters home, without foreign examples; we had often occasions for general pardons, formerly, when families thrust one another out of the throne, and then there was great need of pardons for the subject. When lord Strafford was charged in parliament, and other great exorbitancies, though the crimes and offenders were many, yet it was agreed, that such a number should be named, who should be excepted out of the general Indemnity. We are resolved, that these shall be prosecuted by the Attorney-General, and we need not descend into particulars here; but by general ideas, and so excepted.

Mr. Hawles. I am for excepting persons by particular names; but we are now only upon methods. Certainly, upon things, you intend not to pardon murder, nor robbery, &c. but now if you enquire into things, you will utterly destroy the government, which in king Charles 2's, and all king James's time, was as ill as the French government. Instance in Cornish's Trial, one of the most barbarous trials! Had I been concerned in it, I should have thought I deserved death as much as Vrats, that killed Mr. Thynne. Make it, that the Indemnity shall not extend to such and such persons, or such and such things.

Sir Rd. Temple. If you name the crime, you may involve more than you think of. Do you mean every man that had the least share in it? I mean only the notorious persons. Persons have had pardons, and you must void all those pardons before you can reach them; you must not hunt the herd, you will never single any. I would begin with the Chancellor,† a lawyer, and he to destroy all law! I would except him from pardon in his honour and lands.

* Son of sir Edward Harley, and Speaker in the two last parliaments of king William, and the first of queen Anne. In 1704 he was made Secretary of State, which he resigned in 1707. In 1710, he was appointed a Lord of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer. The next year he was created earl of Oxford, and soon after was appointed Lord High-Treasurer, which place he resigned four days before the queen's death. In 1715, he was impeached of High Treason by the house of commons, and was soon after committed by the lords to the Tower; but being tried two years after was unanimously acquitted by his peers. Burnet's character of him at this time is as follows: "Harley was a man of a noble family, and very eminently learned; much turned to politics, and of a restless ambition. He was a man of great industry and application; and knew forms and the Records of parliament so well, that he was capable both of lengthening out and of perplexing debates." He died in 1724.

* "At the beginning of king James's reign some base men tried to save themselves by accusing others. Goodenough, who had been under-sheriff of London, when Cornish was sheriff, offered to swear against Cornish; and also said, that Rumsey had not discovered all he knew. So Rumsey, to save himself, joined with Goodenough, to swear Cornish guilty of that for which lord Russel had suffered. And this was driven on so fast, that Cornish was seized on, tried, and executed, within the week. If he had got a little time, the falshood of the Evidence would have been proved from Rumsey's former deposition, which appeared so clearly, soon after his death, that his estate was restored to his family, and the witnesses were lodged in remote prisons for their lives. Cornish, at his death, asserted his innocence with great vehemence, and with some acrimony, but a just indignation, complained of the methods taken to destroy him." Burnet.

† Jeffreys, then in the Tower.

Sir Henry Capel. Temple says, 'If you proceed upon things, you will engage those you would not;' but are not you masters of your own methods? To answer Lowther, if we are to except nothing but treason, we are in a parliamentary way, and may declare treasons. As for the seizing Charters, there was nothing like that; that cuts up all your liberties by the root.

Mr. Garroway. I am at a stand what I shall offer for your service. If you go to capital crimes, you will be tender, and go but a little way. I would not dabble in blood; I would, from my heart, forgive them, but from pecuniary penalties I would not exempt them. You turned two out of the house yesterday, for refusing the Oaths. You will not think such a man fit for employment upon the first head, resolve what you will make capital, then for fines, and not to bear office for the future.

Col. Austen. I hear it said, 'that people guilty of these great crimes, are known;' but I lived in a sphere, at such a distance, I could not know them. The work has been done by a spirit in the dark, and unless you conjure down this spirit, you will never attain your end. Here has been something said of a Proclamation, &c. I would set up marks of severity for public justice; this is part of the king's directions. I would distinguish the things, and let the persons be who they will.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think there is a necessity to proceed upon persons, and not things, because you are told, from the bar, 'that possibly the offences may not be Treason, by 25 Edw. 3. but by your legislative power, you may proceed by Attainder.' If so, then proceed as tenderly as you can, because it is a declaration of Treason, and is always made as little use of as possible. For this occasion your Bills of Attainder will be without number; therefore I move that you will proceed upon persons, and not things.

Col. Birch. I think it absolutely necessary that you come to some conclusion before you rise. I would not leave the matter under an alarm, but, before you rise, leave them to what they shall trust to. If things must find out persons, you are in for a great while. Methinks you may go a nearer, and a surer way; for when you come to an Act of Oblivion, I suppose, (I dare not impose) you resolve to name your number capable of suffering life or limb, suppose 20 or 40, or as many as you will, (I am but for a small number for life or limb) and that blank be filled up; and, for all others, though not excepted for life or limb, yet I would except them from bearing any share of the government. The thing I drive at and design, is, to make an end. Put a certain number, and you will put the nation out of fear, and you have done your work.

Sir Rob. Howard. When you name Heads, let it be under death, fine, or incapacity of bearing office; then you will be easier under all the debate.

Mr. Hampden, sen. Where mercy is to be showed, I shall be as forward as any man, but I think justice is necessary. If you go on in this way, you will hardly come ashore. If you enumerate all sorts of crimes, you will go the farther from your end, they are so many, and of so many sorts; one of the greatest crimes that struck at your foundation was that of blood. But the foundation of these things was laid so early, that it will be a great way to look back. How many are concerned in the greater degree, and how many in the less, as particeps criminis? This will be a very long resolution. Now whether the men, or names of crimes, shall be first? To save a friend, that will be impossible to wrest out of human nature, but your end is to terrify men for the future. What is else the end of decimating armies? When the Act of Indemnity passed in 1660, (perhaps in as great a Revolution as ever the nation was under,) you set down 10, or 20, (I will not offer the number now) excepted for life, and so many for pecuniary mulcts, and incapacity of offices, according to degrees of crimes.

Sir Henry Capel. Will not you except the bloody Judges, and those who were of opinion for the Dispensing Power? When you have passed the Vote, cannot you except what persons you please.

Sir John Lowther. I believe it impossible to name crimes before persons; the season of the year cannot admit it. If you enquire into circumstances, the first promoter and adviser, if you keep this in suspence, it will be the greater dissatisfaction; therefore I am for naming persons before crimes.

Mr. Garroway. I am still of the same opinion that you will sooner come to your end, by voting Heads on capital offences, and then go to your men. I am not for 40 nor 15, but put it upon that head 'not exceeding ten;' you may have guesses at names, and put in, as in the last Indemnity, the greatest number. If named openly, there may be misfortunes and feuds of families hereafter.

The Speaker. Garroway mistakes. There was no such balloting as he mentions. In the Convention, it was only for sending gentlemen to go commissioners to the king into Holland. Then for excepting persons out of the Act, the first Vote was, 'but 7 for life, and 20 more for other pains and penalties,' and those were nominated in the house.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I rise only to rectify Powle. All the regicides in the Act of Indemnity, 1661, were notified by the crime; the rest, for other offences, were deprived of bearing offices. Many of the house may remember there was a long debate upon the persons upon whom the Proclamation went out; it was a great debate, whether they should be hanged, or not, because the Act said, 'they should not be pardoned.'

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, That, in proceeding upon the Bill of Indemnity, the Crimes shall be first declared, for which some persons shall be excepted, for vindication of public justice." Agreed to by the house.

May 16. The debate on the Heads for a Bill of Indemnity was resumed. The Grievances in king James's time being read, Mr. Harbord. The greatest offender of all the peers is turned Papist, lord Salisbury.

Mr. Boscowen. According to this head, the capital offender is dead (lord chancellor Jeffreys) I would therefore have him attainted, and his estate reduced to the same condition as when he began to offend, and his posterity incapable to sit in the lords house.

Col. Birch. That which lies heaviest upon the nation, is blood; you have several Bills to reverse Attainders. I would have some blood, though little, rather than be stained with what they have shed.

Sir John Lowther. I know not how far you will proceed, whether with all equally criminal. I suppose you will make distinction of those who gave opinion for the Dispensing Power, and other offences; how far you will proceed upon it I do not know, seeing you were tender in not taking away all Dispensing Power. They cannot all be punished, therefore say how many persons you will exempt.

Mr. Harbord. Begin with the Lord Chancellor, attaint him first. I will say something to induce you to it. Sir Thomas Armstrong's was a most barbarous case*, and his proceedings in the West†.

Mr. Palmes. The last day, the Committee had order, 'that crimes should precede persons.' Determine what crimes shall be capital and what mulctuary, before you begin.

Mr. Boscowen. It is a harder matter to say what this man was not guilty of, than what he was. Lord Russel's Trial before—and after he came into the West.

Sir Robert Howard. I think you have a particular engagement to go upon this man first. In sir T. Armstrong's case he committed murder, and without the help of a jury. By the statute of Edw. 6, outlawries were confined to 12 months. He came in within that time and surrendered himself in court‡.

* "When Jeffreys came to the king (Charles) at Windsor soon after Armstrong's Trial, the king took a ring of good value from his finger, and gave it him for these services: the ring, upon that, was called 'his Blood-stone.'" Burnet. This was in 1684. Sir T. Armstrong had met the duke of Monmouth and lord Russel, &c. at Shepherds, and afterwards made his escape to Leyden, where he was betrayed and sent over by Chudleigh, the king's envoy.

† See note, p. 244.

‡ "This being a point of law, he desired counsel might be heard to argue it. Jeffreys rejected all this. He said, 'the king might either after a trial, or not, as he saw cause;' and he refused to hear counsel. Which being demanded upon a point of law, the denying it was thought a very impudent piece of injustice. And when Armstrong insisted, 'that though they alleged he was forced to it; therefore this is a particular case.

Mr. Hawles. Suppose you except a man that is dead, a dead man cannot be tried, nor pardoned. I think it proper to say, what persons ought to be excepted, and when you enquire, you will find the Chancellor very little more guilty, than those who lately passed the Proclamation, little less than the Dispensing Power.

Sir R. Temple. In the Ecclesiastical Commission he was the sine quâ non, and in all the business of the West. If you go on upon the thirty Heads, you will involve more than you intend. I move, "That the late Chancellor and his heirs may be excepted out of the Indemnity, in order to Attainder."

Major Wildman. When I consider that the house spent four hours on crimes and persons, if you keep your own Order, you are not to meddle with persons now.

Mr. Harbord. I would except out of the pardon all who gave opinions with my lord chancellor, for the Dispensing Power.

Mr. Garroway. I think the Head of the Dispensing Power is what you can best make out. That is a breach of their oath, and a great one, and of that you have the judgment of the lords and commons, for breaking their oaths. In this I care not how narrow; but as for mulcts upon them, I would not destroy families, but leave them a livelihood, and no more. For other offences, something may be said in law, but not for this.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I cannot be persuaded that giving the king advice in the Dispensing Power be made capital. If we make the words general in the question, that of so many persons equally guilty, some few should be given up for a sacrifice—I believe it first an invasion of our rights, but the exercise of it long became a common error, and, I think, if they are not guilty of some other offences, this is not sufficient. I move that the Question may be a little more distinct, and say, 'as the Dispensing Power was of late executed.'

Sir Henry Capel. I never thought to have heard an argument within these walls for an universal Dispensing Power. We are slaves if it be so, and no freer than in Turkey. We know the king has prerogatives, but to say, 'he has a Dispensing Power,' is to say, 'there is no law.' He says, 'this Dispensing Power grew in upon us by time;' and is it therefore good because practised? The foundation of all our misfortunes is, That the Judges gave their Opinion for the Dispensing Power, and I would have them excepted in the Act of Indemnity.

Mr. Hawles. The Dispensing Power was the last grievance, and a bloody sacrifice to he asked nothing but the law,' Jeffreys, in his brutal way, said, 'he should have it to the full;' and so ordered his execution within six days. And the law was executed on him with the utmost rigour." Burnet.

the prince's pleasure, to the subversion of the whole government. The king might dispense with some obsolete laws, but no statute since 250 years ago was dispensed with till these three or four years. If this must pass for doctrine, we may go home, and the king may raise what money he pleases, and he may dispense with the Statute 'de Tallagio non concedendo,' and raise what taxes he pleases. King Ch. 1. would have been at it, and had Judges for his turn, who would have exercised this dispensing power as well as the Ship-money. Some people king James put out of office, though qualified, and some were put in unqualified. They began with Dispensing with the Act for Hackney-coaches, and by degrees would have done so with all the laws. I am for declaring this very illegal, though not all to be punished alike; for some did it out of weakness, others out of fear, and not out of the dictates of their judgment. As for the King's Counsel, if the Attorneys and Solicitors, with tufted gowns, impose upon illiterate men, pardon the illiterate, and punish the learned counsel. Just so do it; if otherwise, you throw up all your laws and statutes.

Sir R. Howard. I would serve you with a question, if I could. The gentleman who spoke over the way, ever gives instruction; I am sure he does to me. This is the doctrine; because a Non obstante may be given man by man particularly, it should be used judicially. Forbidding protestant books to be printed, and dispensing with popish books, asserted and allowed. Here is a general execution armed against us; first by books, and then by public power. The Papists are armed against us. When the Goths and Vandals over-ran Rome by an illiterate sort of men, Machiavel confesses there was a secret providence. When these men over-ran us, comes the prince of Orange and over-runs all accidents by his prudence, and saves us with deliverance from the Dispensing Power. But to wind up the question of Dispensing Power, they have done all these things to destroy, and we must look upon those who have given this opinion in judicial places, as fit to be excepted in the Act of Indemnity.

Sir Wm. Williams. There are two parts of the law, the constitutive part in the king, lords, and commons, and the executive part, lex loquens, in the judges. The other is a tacit law, and a silent law; they make the law speak, and men feel it. Is any thing more pernicious than the Dispensing Power? There is an end of all the legislative power, gone and lost. Right your legislative power, and your judicial law, and all will be set right.—[To proceed on the 18th.]

Debate on the Bill of Indulgence to Dissenters.] May 17. Mr. Hampden reports from the Committee, several Amendments made to the Bill of Indulgence.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I move you to give no Indulgence to them, who will give no Oath in evidence, but their Yea and Nay, Quakers:

now you are about to defend the kingdom, and these men not to assist you, they may introduce Popery. Have we not known them in Jesuits habits, and were told it by Oates and Bedlowe? Under this mask, 'according to the Holy Scripture,' (the words in the Bill) you hazard the government both of Church and State.

Mr. Paul Foley. This is much mistaken, that the Bill gives liberty to all persons. They are not at liberty. They must subscribe, and there is a law in force already to tie them up from preaching against the Church of England; you are only tying them from teaching contrary to their subscription.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am sorry to see some in the house differ from what they were at the committee: in an incomprehensible part of religion, we thought the Scriptures the best guide.

Mr. Hampden, jun. The Test is against the doctrine of Popery, which the Quakers take as you do, but to declare Allegiance to their majesties is not named, because they own no titles. In France there was a toleration to Protestant preachers, and they were not to preach against Popery, but they wrote against it, and so came within the penalty.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The gentleman reporter forgets to tell you, that the Quakers said nothing of this at the committee. 'According to the Holy Scriptures,' is a large field. They must not write nor speak against the doctrine of the Scripture; which will be full of controversy.

Col. Birch. I beseech every gentleman to consider that those ways are commonly the best, that are most trodden. These sort of people have been in the shambles these 20 years, and I never thought they would come so near us as in this Declaration, and now under a doubtful word, to throw out all that has been done! I am glad these Articles of Religion are so far agreed to by the Non-conformists. I like the Articles of the Church of England very well, but the Scriptures much better; the Apostles still tried all things by the Holy Scriptures. Having brought the Quakers in so far, I hope, in time, we may do it farther.

Mr. Ettrick. I am as much for Indulgence to tender consciences as any body. If I apprehend right, they are not to preach against the Doctrine of the Church, as it is in the Articles. As to belief, believing it is as they please; the only thing to be restrained is, not to write against it, and that only to be remedied. They say, 'The Doctrine of the Trinity is no more to be proved, than Transubstantiation.' Restrain them, that by writing they may not fill the world with endless controversies and disputes.

Sir Rob. Howard. I am rather of opinion with the committee, than of the lords Bill. I have for 7 years desired such a bill without success. In this point, you will give occasion for dispute and controversy. To tell a man, 'he shall forbear to write against a thing,' is no hardship; 'but that he shall not believe it,' is. The Articles are turned to the Scripture; this is the way to ask which manuscript they are out of; and as for the Holy Ghost, they will say, it is not in Scripture, and so they will raise endless disputes. I am glad we are so large in Indulgence. I am for supporting the doctrine of the Church of England, and would have the proviso so penned, as is taught by the doctrine of the Church of England.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. This Bill declares the profession of faith in other words; 'you shall not preach nor write against the Church of England;' this is only a saving to the words; they will say, 'if we can prove that these Articles are not according to the Holy Scriptures, we do not write against them.' They may insinuate this. They are at liberty to write or preach, if they can prove they are not according to Scripture: else you will set up a new controversy.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This Bill establishes a sort of bill contrary to the Church of England. I would therefore have it temporary and probational. I cannot foresee what it may reach to, therefore I would have it for 7 years only, and to the end of the session of next parliament.

Sir Rob. Howard. I hope this will bring more to the Church of England, than ever were found in seven years before. This tenderness will bring more than all the persecution. This is no new thing; it has been upon the anvil these seven years without success. It was brought forward in king James's time, but they could not and durst not perform it; their Church would never suffer it: and now, in the midst of all this expectation, to dash it with a temporary clause! You had as good grant them nothing at all; thus to deceive them into an Indulgence, and cramp it with time. Let us throw no cold water upon this warm thing; and pray do not disturb it with limitation.

Sir Tho. Clarges. For gentlemen to say, 'That the necessity of affairs induces this,'—it is not worthy of a parliament to say so. I do not restrain it to 7 years, to diminish it; but if we do it, is it not fit for us to limit it? If I thought it not for the church, and for their benefit too—I desire the Clause may be read.

 To make the thing temporary, will look like design. I would have it as large as the church of England, that we may be one in affection, and one in interest. All that is said against it is, 'That an ill use may be made of this.' I hope the church of England will increase daily by it. If they make an ill use of it, there will be always enough in this house to take it away. The late king James offered them Indulgence, and, like unwise men, they ran into it to be deluded: and I look upon Penn's quakers, who were so forward then, to be papists.

Sir Henry Capel. Rather than the bill should not be effectual, it were better they had none at all. As for what is said of 'making it temporary, to see how they will behave themselves,' it is the only way in the world to make them a dangerous party, and against you, to throw this out. In king James's time, they, through necessity, did comply; and God knows, in 7 years, what change there may be; and men, to ease their consciences, what may they do? I would not give them occasion to throw themselves out of the protestant interest. We hear of a general Indulgence in Ireland, and here we are cutting up ourselves. Let after parliaments alter it, if they see cause; let us pass it.

Sir Tho. Littleton. There was great reason why the committee refused the proviso. The committee, though they were for Indulgence, were for no Toleration. The committee thought not fit to make it temporary, because then they had a time certain, and might do mischief. They may possibly send the king money.

Mr. Godolphin. I have a great deference for the other side. I beg pardon, if I am not convinced by their arguments. The liberty you give them may be abused, and you may have experience, in 7 years, of their deportment.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I am against the Proviso, and therefore against reading it. The same reason may be, to make every bill a probationer as for this: I hope the dissenters will deserve it, and you do it upon a presumption that they will be true to the government. This will go with you, though perhaps not with the common people in Westminster-Hall. At this time, they are lending a considerable sum for uses you will approve of, I am sure. I cannot answer the argument, why you should limit this act, and use these people gently for a while to persecute them afterwards. You have not repealed the laws they are punished by, but only that they shall not be prosecuted by them. The repeal of the 35th of Eliz. passed the lords house, but what became of it, I am not willing to remember: That act is the only law left that the papists might ruin the church of England by. They say, their religion is the church of England; by which, if they meet in private houses, they must abjure, or be hanged. These laws with fresh vigour may be executed against them. Let no interruption be to the joy of these people, and lay aside the Proviso.

The Proviso was rejected, and the Bill passed.

May 21. The Thanks of the house were given to admiral Herbert, (afterwards earl of Torrington) for defeating the French fleet in Bantry Bay; though, according to Burnet, it appears, at most, to have been a drawn battle. War was this day declared against France.

Debate on the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill. May 22. Mr. Hampden, sen. What I shall move you, is for the king and the nation, 'That the Act for Habeas Corpus, &c. may be suspended for a time.' The lords shortened the time of the last bill, not you. Dangers usually come not in a day; growing dangers, and the consequences, are in the dark, when it is too late to prevent. What is the meaning of all the intelligence that comes out of the country, of ill-affections to the government? And have we not a body here that are mutinying against the government? In Lancashire, since the Irish were disbanded, they meet in parties, and you have no way to obviate this danger but by this Bill. You are willing to go home; what will the king do? Dangerous persons will be delivered out of prison of course, if this Bill prevent it not; and they may act to the subversion of the government. If you will leave Impeachments behind you, when you are dismissed, that will be a tedious way, and they may else come out. The same common danger with you induces me to move this. And if people conspire, the king cannot keep them in prison; since they must come out by Habeas Corpus, if you prevent it not by this Bill. We are in war, and if we make only use of that remedy as if we were in full peace, you may be destroyed without remedy. This Bill is for present occasion, and for a short time only I move it.

Sir Francis Russel. If this were taken away, possibly I might be for it; for a Habeas Corpus is the law already, without the new Act; and when we shall see better Judges, that law will have its course. This seems as if there was a defect in the government; and I hope you will rather take away the late Act quite, than prolong the last Act that suspends it.

Sir Robert Napier. This mistress of ours, the Habeas Corpus Act, if we part with it twice, it will become quite a common whore. Let us not remove this land-mark of the nation, for a curse attends it.

Mr. Boscawen. The gentleman is rather for taking away the Habeas Corpus, than this Bill: that, I think, is a great extreme. Let the danger be ever so great, I would not dispense with that law but by parliament. If dispensed with by the executive power, it is fatal always; by the legislative power, there is no danger. I am informed, from the North, of persons having been taken upon the borders, going to side with those risen in Scotland; therefore it is best to prevent the dangers: and is it not worthy the consideration of parliament, that the soldiers be prevented going into that country? There is no law against that; but you have ground to suspect, when they talk lavishly, that a little drill of a dam may make a breach in the bank. Will those gentlemen, that are not for the Bill, take upon them the danger that may ensue upon not passing it?

Sir John Lowther. I can add nothing to what has been said: I shall only say, that, as for those in the North, I shall acquaint you with matter of fact. Persons were taken, who confessed they were going to king James; though some are in custody, yet some have entered col. Langston's quarters. They refuse to take the Oaths to the king and queen; and, if there be no remedy, these persons will pursue their intentions.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I hope the laws and the government are not so loose, as to do any thing extraordinary upon this occasion, which is now law, and the ordinary course. I appeal to you, if going armed be not punishable by law; if in arms, in terror of the people? In these countries, if these things happen, the magistrates may remedy them by law. If every thing in parliament is well done, nothing I fear so much as establishing any thing against English liberty by act of parliament. If such a Bill be necessary, no man is more for it than myself; but if not, I hope the house will be against it. I would, therefore, farther consider the nature of this law; and, so far as consists with your safety, it may be abolished. The unsettledness of the nation, at present, is the only argument for it; but, I hope, now you will be settled, so as to have no need of it. In Rd. 2's time, the law of Provisors was made, which that king suspended; and afterwards an act with a salvo to the king's prerogative. If once you declare, that so tender a thing as this, for support of the government, may be suspended, it may make Westminster-Hall think so too, and follow your precedents. We have enemies abroad, and at home; and it is but a short time that this Bill is to continue; and it may be supposed that short time may not mend our condition. If people apprehend the government not firm, it will make them have a less heart to support it. If we will not trust it in little matters, surely we shall not in greater. Content yourselves with the laws you have already, and make no violation of them. Farther consider it.

Col. Birch. It is beyond my time to court 'this mistress' spoken of; but I will stick to this as much as any body. You are moved for a farther day to consider this, and this is your day. It is said, 'now the Government is settled, no need of this;' but we all know that it is not settled yet; and before it will be better, it will be worse. We are in a state of war, and worse than war. There is a great man on one side the water, and king James on the other; and a Popish party, and another, in the midst of us; and this is a state of war, sure. If this be our condition, and disaffected persons in every corner, I would know of any man how this Habeas Corpus Act is now practicable. These men that disturb the government have been picked up, but not tried, in two or three months. And you must deal sharply with them now. I think you cannot make it for a shorter time than November, at least; for we must go home, and then it will be worse. The lord-lieutenants and justices of the peace being in disorder, I hope this will keep us in safety at present.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Give me leave to put you in mind of a thing put into my hands. Your Bill does not take care for proof of a charge against a man. Upon a bare suspicion, information was given by a woman, 'That she was, with another gossip, in a house, where she heard declared, that there was a conspiracy against the present king, and that one sir Robert Sawyer did confederate with others to this purpose.' But I must declare, I never had that in my heart; and I believe that king James's return would be the destruction of England. At this rate, myself, or any man, may be clapped up in prison.

Mr. Hampden, sen. If such an aspersion be upon a man, he has reason to resent it; but he may remember, it is not the first time that men have, upon suspicion, been clapped up, and that gossips have given evidence, and judgment has been upon it. I cannot blame him for resenting it; but he is safe, being a parliament-man; and, I believe, nobody takes him to be in a conspiracy. Was the Act of Habeas Corpus made to shackle a good prince? You have heard of 40,000 to bail; and you would have the king do this to save the government? All this Sawyer knows.

Col. Mildmay. This Act will shackle the king you have confidence in. You must know that Westminster-hall Judges did that which Sawyer complains of; yet he is here. All that dare show themselves, do it now; practising, and yet they are so cunning, they do not come within danger of the law. It will not be for your service, to deny this Bill now. We desire to be at home, and it is fit we see these laws put in execution that we have made; and we may, in the interim, be in danger. Therefore let us first pass this Bill, not for a long time, but a necessary time; for six months.

Mr. Ettrick. I am against this Bill, because it grows still worse and worse than the first; which was, for six privy counsellors, or two secretaries of state, to commit. How far this may be, I know not. The security of all governments is the good-will of the people; and I fear this may take their good-will from you. Magna Charta was confirmed thirty-two times. I know not whether going by this, by degrees, may not tend to repeal Magna Charta. Upon what suspicions they will commit, whose they are, and on whom, we know not. It is said, 'Sawyer sits here.' You are going into the country, and I know not how soon some of us may be sent for again, and committed, perhaps till November, to a close prison all this summer. I look upon the Habeas Corpus Act as the greatest defence against oppression; and Westminster-hall may say, 'it is inconsistent, against the safety of the nation,' and a good ground for the Judges in Westminster-hall to suspend it.

Sir Rob. Cotton, of Cambridgeshire. As an Englishman, I am jealous of our liberties, and will not give my vote to betray them. The difference betwixt a subject and a slave is, that one has the benefit of law, the other is used at pleasure. Never since the Barons Wars did any thing come from the parliament to infringe that liberty. You are told, 'This Bill is necessary as long as the government is unsettled.' Lewis 11 of France desired only liberty to raise Money till the next parliament did sit; and he never called a parliament, and they have raised Money without parliaments ever since. I am jealous of a thing of so high importance to preserve our liberties, not to put the subjects in such a condition as to suspend their liberty for an hour.

Mr. Roberts.* This is not only to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, but all the liberties of the nation. The person is committed without oath, and may live in prison. This is putting arbitrary power in the government. I am against it.

Mr. Hawles. I think it fit that such a Bill be brought in, in time of danger from abroad, and within the realm; and it is only to confine them from doing mischief. I am glad to see that the king and government will not do it without an act. In 1683, several were clapped up in July, and not bailed till Nov. the 8th, and had not been then, but to bring the Popish Lords out of the Tower, lord Powis, and the rest; and if a distinction could have been found out in their cases, they had not been then released. I think this power fit to be lodged for the safety of the government, and I am for enlarging the time.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I am against such a Bill; it suspends not only the Habeas Corpus, but the law that was before it; (the fault of that law was, there was no punishment for the Judges) I am sorry the government is such, that men may be clapped up without oath, and detained in prison. We hear of several clapped up, and no prosecution against them, at the pleasure of those that confine them. We are told of some going to king James; if that be so, you have a law to punish them; and if any break in upon your army, it is rebellion, and you may punish them. I am not for confining men to prison, the greatest punishment next to death. I speak by experience: I have lain in prison. I hope you will not give leave to bring in such a bill.

Sir Henry Capel. I am glad to see the sense of the house so concerned for that law of Habeas Corpus; but it is the wisdom of all governments not to be strait-laced upon any emergency. This Bill was obtained with great difficulty, to stop the hands of persons from violence: but, in such a conjuncture as we are in, to be tied up not to do for the common safety, that people cannot be preserved by the government, that will lose the people's hearts. To do this by parliament, there is no danger; but that will be when Charters are voided, and no free Elections; and there is no danger in this parliament, freely elected. But shall those in Westminster-hall be compared to the legislative authority? But if they transgress, I hope they will be made an example. The time named in the bill, &c. is Michaelmas, or November. The Commissions of Peace are not gone out, and many will not act; the deputy-lieutenants have not had their commissions. In the Justices there is a failure, and it may be amongst the deputy-lieutenants; those are the life of the government; and if they will not act, nor the Army is secure, what shall the government do to keep us in safety? I think, upon these circumstances, this Bill may be for our safety.

* A younger son of the earl of Radnor, Vice-President of the Royal Society, &c. He died in 1717.

Mr. Ettrick. Had Capel known Westminster-hall as long as I have, nothing has been more ordinary there than to judge your laws void.

Mr. Foley. I know, Westminster-hall Judges have judged necessity in case of Ship-Money, and no inference that they may do it again; but that certainly we are in danger from Ireland and France, and some amongst us. If I am informed right, there were never so many Louis-d'ors in payment: a third part of great payments is made in Louis-d'ors.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This Bill is the most unreasonable and destructive that ever was made in parliament. We have had a struggle for it these fourteen years; and now, upon suggested necessities, to dispense with this law! I am sorry we should take example of this thing from corrupt times. I hear it said, 'We should not shackle our Prince.' In Oliver's time, in 1656, one Coney was committed by his order, and Judge Rolle delivered him. But Cromwell said, 'Princes must not be shackled.' Felony and treason are not bailable by that Act. But what other offence can it be unless that? It grieves me to hear this; would you have a man committed to prison because he wears his hat on one side? It is said, 'Persons will not acknowledge the king and take away horses; is not this treason?' If Justices of Peace are not yet named, the Secretaries of State may send all over England. And where shall we lay the consequence of the loss of Ireland, but upon the ministers of state? You are told, 'That, in Monmouth's Rebellion, men were denied copies of their Mittimus.' They had a good action, and might have had remedy. I am afraid of this. I tremble at the question, and desire no such motion.

Sir Rob. Howard. I hear divers arguments against this Bill; but I think it gives great veneration to the Habeas Corpus Act, that it cannot be suspended but by act of parliament. By the judges it cannot be suspended, to make this Bill an example, unless they will make an act of parliament in their bosoms. I wonder, in the last Act, that the lords should reduce the time so short as to make the Act useless; but, I apprehend it was the modesty of the style the lords used, and you see little use was made of it in that time; but I do not wonder that you provide against new accidents from the unsettlement of the whole nation. I observe, when the Prince of Orange was upon his design, if this dispensation had been made use of, many might have been clapped up (and the happy change prevented) and myself one. This is a strange distrust, in that which all mankind called then their safety. In the condition we are in, I think the Bill necessary, and I am sorry the condition of affairs makes it necessary. Other than this I know no safety; therefore I move for this.

Mr. Harbord. We are told, 'If 3000 men had been sent into Ireland, it might have been saved.' I would ask that gentleman, what 3000 men he would have had sent over? To send our own was not safe, and not fit to part with the Dutch. Those sent over have betrayed Londonderry, and those sent since have mutinied. I know not how Clarges can answer, that the king, persuaded by col. Landy, betrayed Londonderry.* There are ways for the king to punish men. It is no easy matter to impeach in parliament, and there he must lie till you meet again—and the nation lost.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I called upon two hands, one for the Miscarriage of Ireland, and they have made the consequence upon the ministers, not I. Deputy-lieutenants may secure persons, and that is another remedy.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. If Clarges says, 'The ministers were the cause of the Miscarriage of Ireland,' it may be he was one; but many were of opinion, that king James had not abdicated the crown, and that gentleman was one of those ministers.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I desire I may be vindicated. I am arraigned for debates; we ought to be free here; to say, 'that was the occasion of the Miscarriage of Ireland!' I desire to have

* "King James sent a small body before Londonderry, which was often changed; and by these he continued the siege above two months, in which the poor inhabitants formed themselves into great order, and came to generous resolutions of enduring the last extremities. They made some sallies, in which the Irish always ran away, and left their officers, so that many of their best officers were killed. Those within suffered little, but by hunger, which destroyed near two thirds of their number. One convoy, with two regiments and provisions, was sent to their relief: but they looked on the service as desperate, being deceived by Lundy, who was the governor of the place, and had undertaken to betray it to king James; but he, finding them jealous of him, came to the convoy, and persuaded them that nothing could be done; so they came back, and Lundy with them. Yet the poor inhabitants, though thus forsaken, resolved still to hold out, and sent over such an account of the state they were in, that a second and greater convoy was sent, with about 5000 men commanded by Kirk, who, after he came in sight, made not that haste to relieve them that was necessary, considering the misery they were in. They had a river that came up to their town; but the Irish had laid a boom of chains cross it, and had planted batteries for defending it. Yet a ship sailing up with wind and tide broke through: and so the town was relieved, and the siege raised with great confusion." Burnet.

right done me. I except against the words of that gentleman, which were, 'Those that were of opinion that king James had not abdicated the crown, nor that the Throne was vacant, were the ministers.'

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. I did not say any thing of 'Debates of the house.' I said, 'Those that held that opinion were the occasion.'

Sir Wm. Williams. The question is plain, 'Whether this law shall be suspended for any farther time; which is so much for the safety and preservation of the kingdom. Liberty of persons is the question. Whoever is for the safety of the kingdom must be for dispensing. We were under danger when we made that Act first; now we are in a more imminent danger, in worse condition, and Scotland in no good condition; and I apprehend it more dangerous, when the town is naked, and the king naked, and the parliament gone. I think this Bill may be qualified with, 'not to be committed without Oath.'

Leave was given to bring in a "Bill to empower his majesty to apprehend and detain such persons as he shall find just cause to suspect are conspiring against the Government."

May 24. The said Bill was read the second time.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I cannot but be troubled at this Bill, and the more for the reasons given for it. I am not convinced of the necessity of the bill, and more concerned for the king, who has delivered us from arbitrary practices, to have this king informed, that the laws of the nation are such, that the kingdom cannot be kept in peace with them. It is so much against the privilege of the subject that any man may be imprisoned, upon a bare suggestion, and not have benefit of Habeas Corpus. Upon commitment for treason, or felony, a man cannot be bailed. If he refuse the Oaths, he may be imprisoned, and the next refusal is præmunire. I would not have any man committed, by this Bill, but by oath, and that the accuser do give security to prosecute.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I think there is a necessity of such a Bill; the peace of the government depends upon it, now there are a sort of people disturbing the government. I observe how tender the government is now; in the last reign, every thing was 'conspiring the death of the king,' and that was the tenour of all their warrants; and since the king has done so modestly in the use of the two last Bills, not as formerly.

Mr. Garraway. I would to God, the king had not been put to it to get this Bill. But abroad in the world there are strange discontents, and such language as is not fit to repeat. The French king and king James are against us, we are now near a recess, and when we are gone, I know not what combustion may be; and for us to do nothing, and not trust the king!—I know not what combustion we may fall into; we are not now barely in fears and jealousies. I hope the same hand that protected you will do it still, and I move you to commit the Bill.

Mr. Boscawen. I am against Sacheverell's Proviso; this Bill is for the security of the nation. It has been opened, but you are at liberty to receive it or not. I have lately received a letter: I will open it, and then you may judge whether you will read it, or not. It is not from a fiction of my own, but it is really truth. A member delivered me a letter from lord Shrewsbury's correspondence, 'that persons about the court corresponded with one in the Post-Office, and he with king James.' You must know that what is done in council the clerks know. If you receive this Proviso, cast out the Bill. That there are such as wish not well to the government is certain. By the Proviso, you must enter every Information, or nothing at all. A gentleman comes, and upon his reputation gives in information—Taken down to order by Mr. William Forster abruptly.

Mr. Garraway. You have spent a great deal of time in this debate of matter of order. I am sorry the question should be put, 'Whether the Proviso should be brought to the table, or no?' I never saw it denied. If he open his Proviso false, you will have satisfaction of the gentleman. Let him bring it to the table, and judge of it.

The Bill was ordered to be committed.

May 25. The above Bill was read a third time.

Mr. Godolphin. I have some reasons to speak against this Bill. It is the inherent right of every member to speak his mind upon bills in parliament, though he is sometimes attacked for it. I think this bill to be against the king's service; nothing is more for the disservice of the king, than to create prejudice against him, and nothing more than to think he will govern by arbitrary power in the members of the privy council, as in France. The king makes an Edict, 'Car tel est notre plaisir.' This may subject your Bill to some questions hereafter. Some time ago we did arraign the government of arbitrary power, exercised against law. We go about now to establish arbitrary government by law.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The occasion of bringing in this bill was because it was thought necessary for the preservation of the government. At present, there are divers disorders, but when I consider we have got a good Fleet, and have had experience of our officers, it may secure us from foreigners, though we do not hear much of assistance from others; (but that by the by). What then must we be afraid of? It must be home Papists, not yet clapped up. It must be from some people within us. If more considerable than they are, we have an Army of 40,000 men to protect us, which may prove as fatal to those that shall attempt against the government as formerly. If we have such an army, there can be no need of such a Bill, to commit men to prison without oath, made upon suspicion only, which may be grounded upon malice, and be so construed as to bring misfortune to deprive gentlemen of their liberty, and, to their great charge, to be committed to the Tower; so I hope you will not part with such a law so useful to us, and so valued. It was one of the conditions of the neighbouring kingdom (Scotland) with the king, to have an Act of Habeas Corpus, as in England. They are in a state of war, and are not desirous of such a Bill as this.

Mr. Boscawen. If this bill deserves such a character as has been given of it, throw it out. I think it does not, and there is no invasion of the liberty of the subject; it is far from reducing us to the government of France; that king does all for his will and pleasure, we do all by the legislative power for preservation of ourselves. There is a sort of men that think of returning to king James, drinking his health, renouncing obedience to the king; the same spirit is working now as formerly. Were the days quiet, without apprehensions, to have this bill would be the greatest blemish to the government. They, in the last reign, came not to the parliament for liberty to suspend the penal laws, or this bill. This is for a time only, and far from the practice of the last government, or France.

Sir Robert Cotton. I am as much for the settlement of the government as any man, and will do as much towards it. I know, as circumstances alter, things must alter, and if only circumstances were altered, and a man to be committed without bail, but to alter the reason of the law is hard. Laws are made that a man may be safe, that a man may know his crime before he be committed to prison, and may recover his liberty in a legal manner, as the law appoints. If this was for suspicion of fact by words, or any ground of reasonable suspicion; but when the suspicion has no ground, but upon private resentments, and that not so open, and not know why suspected, this alters the very reason of the law of Habeas Corpus. I know not how to distinguish the Liberties and Privileges of the house, as was offered yesterday for a Proviso in this Bill; but if nothing be offered upon record, who will know that it is not for words here? and the liberty of parliament will be destroyed. We have had a Proclamation about French Goods spoken of here; and the Seal; and that could not be done without advice; and how far may the advisers resentment extend to those who complained of it here, and they touched with it? This is the greatest breach of the subjects liberty without, and the liberty of the house within, I hope you will throw out the Bill.

Mr. Hampden. I find gentlemen tender in this bill, and I cannot blame them. All the arguments I have heard were good, if we were about to take away the law, but if gentlemen think themselves safe, what need is there of a Militia, for security of the kingdom? These Acts are like buckets for water, to stand by till you have use for them. I know, the Romans gave up all their laws for a time to the Dictators, for the preservation of the government.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I cannot consent to pass this bill. When the first motion was made for this bill, it was for this end, to keep persons from imprisoning by arbitrary power, and now that persons may not claim their Habeas Corpus, when imprisoned, till the government were entirely settled; and now that it is in good forwardness, that case ceases. The privy-council, by this Bill, may imprison upon all suspicions, and the power of the bill last till Oct. next. How agreeable is this to the laws of the kingdom, to make so great an invasion upon our liberties, I must declare my dissent when the question is put; and since I have this occasion, I must make use of my liberty. I have a great respect for those that are to have this power, but such an extraordinary authority has always been found fatal to those that have executed it, and been entrusted with it, as lately was the Ecclesiastical Commission. There is a trust implied in those grants, and they are answerable to the legislative power for their actions, and it is a question whether they will approve of what they have done. The laws are not at all defective. The Habeas Corpus enacts only a declaratory law of what was the common law before the Great Charter; and the Habeas Corpus was a law to be tried in convenient time, and not to lie in prison, when committed for suspicion of treason and felony; and if this Bill make it not bailable in felony, surely not in treason, and the offence must be expressed in the body of the commitments. There has been (it is true) extraordinary bail demanded by the Judges, but whether is it more grievous to have extraordinary bail, or no bail at all, as by this bill, &c.

Sir Wm. Williams. I differ from that gentleman: for the very reasons he has alleged, I desire the bill should pass. Were it such a bill as to lodge an arbitrary power in the prince, I would agree to my own execution first; should a bill be brought in to place an absolute power in the prince, I would call that man to the bar who should bring it in. I take the privy-counsellors to act in execution of this bill as trustees for the kingdom of England. Had it been for my life, I would have had that clause in, that was rejected, about entering Informations into the Council-Book, &c. yesterday. Privy-counsellors are not all lawyers, and I would have that clause for their safety. Privy-Counsellors, by this bill, may commit for suspicion of treason; if they have no reason for what they do, I tell them to their faces, they must answer for it in parliament. They are not to suspect a man because he wears a white perriwig, or a mask, but upon a just cause; else he must not be questioned. This cannot secure them from answering in parliament; if they commit a person without cause, they must answer it to the law, and the kingdom. Therefore pass the Bill.—The Bill was then passed, 126 to 83.

Titus Oates's Petition to the Commons.]

May 23. A Petition of Titus Oates, d.d. was read; setting forth, "That, in 1678, he discovered a horrid Popish Conspiracy against the late king Charles and his present majesty, and the Protestant religion; of which several parliaments and courts of justice declared their belief therein, by the proofs the petitioner so fully made thereof: for which reason, and because he could not be prevailed with to desist in his discovery, the jesuits and papists pursued him with an implacable malice, suborning witnesses to accuse him of capital crimes: but, being defeated in that attempt, they procured king Charles to withdraw that protection and subsistence his majesty, at several parliaments request, had allowed him; and instigated the then duke of York to prosecute the petitioner in an action of Scandalum Magnatum, for speaking this notorious truth; viz. 'That he, the said duke, was reconciled to the Church of Rome: and that it is high treason to be so reconciled;' wherein a Verdict and Judgment was obtained for 1000*l.* and the petitioner committed to the King's-Bench: That, after this, they obtained leave from the king to prefer two several indictments against him, for two pretended perjuries, in his Evidence concerning the conspiracy: which they brought to trial in the reign of king James 2, where the petitioner was, upon the evidence of those very witnesses who had confronted him at three former trials, and were disbelieved, and through the partiality of the late lord Jeffreys, convicted of the said pretended perjuries; and received this unparalleled sentence; viz. to pay to the king 2000 marks; to be divested of his canonical habit; to be brought into Westminster-Hall with a Paper on his head, having this inscription, 'Titus Oates, convicted, on full evidence, of two horrid Perjuries;' to stand in and upon the pillory, two several days, for the space of an hour; and to be whipt, by the common hangman, from Aldgate to Newgate on Wednesday; and to be whipt again, on the Friday following, from Newgate to Tyburn; to stand in and upon the pillory five times in every year of his life: and to remain a prisoner during his life: all which was accordingly executed, with all barbarity, upon the petitioner; lying ten weeks under the surgeon's hands: but that some of them afterwards got into his chamber, whilst weak in bed; and attempted the pulling the plaisters applied for the cure of his back; and threatened to destroy him; procuring him to be loaded with irons of excessive weight for a whole year, even when his legs were swoln with the gout; and to be shut up in the dungeon; whereby he became impaired in his limbs, and contracted convulsion fits, and other distempers, to the hazard of his life: that, after all such illegal proceedings upon him, he hopes the house will vindicate the proceedings of former parliaments, and raise him from the low condition his long and expensive imprisonment hath reduced him to: and prayed the consideration of the house, and that they would recommend him to his majesty's royal protection and bounty, or to give him such other redress, as to them shall seem meet."

Ordered, That the said Mr. Oates, and his counsel, be heard at the bar of this house this day sevensnight.

Exceptions voted in the Bill of Indemnity.]

The same day, the house agreed with the committee appointed to prepare Heads for the Bill of Indemnity, in the following Resolutions:

"1. That the asserting, advising, and promoting of the Dispensing Power and suspending of laws without consent of parliament, as it has been lately exercised, and the acting in pursuance of such pretended dispensing power, is one of the crimes for which some persons may justly be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity, for the safety, settlement, and welfare of the nation for the future, and the vindication of public justice. 2. That the commitment and prosecution of the seven Bishops, is another crime, for which some persons may justly be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity. 3. That the advising, promoting, and executing the Commission for erecting the late court for Ecclesiastical Causes, is another crime, &c. 4. That the advising the levying Money, and the collecting the same for and to the use of the crown, by pretence of the prerogative, for other time, and in other manner than the same was granted by parliament, is another crime, &c. 5. That the advising the raising and keeping up a Standing Army in time of peace, without consent of parliament, and the quartering of soldiers, is another crime, &c. 6. That advising, procuring, contriving and acting in the surrender of Charters, and in the alteration and subversion of Corporations, and in procuring new charters, and the violating the rights and freedoms of elections to parliament, to counties, cities, corporations, boroughs, and ports, and questioning the proceedings in parliament, and out of parliament by declarations, informations, or otherwise, are crimes, &c. 7. That undue constructions of law, and the undue and illegal prosecutions and proceedings in capital crimes, are other crimes, &c. 8. That the undue returns of juries and other illegal proceedings in civil cases, are other crimes, &c. 9. That the requiring excessive bail, imposing excessive fines, giving excessive damages, and using undue means for levying such fines and damages, and inflicting cruel and unusual punishments, are other crimes, &c. 10. That the advising king Charles 2. and king James 2. by some of their judges and council, that parliaments need not be called according to the Statutes, is a crime, for which some persons shall be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity."

Report concerning Money issued from the Exchequer for Crown Prosecutions, &c.] Major Wildman, then, upon the motion of sir Tho. Littleton, delivered in his Report from the Committee appointed to inspect and examine the Accounts, in the hands of Mr. Auditor Done, of all such sums of Money as have been paid out of the Exchequer to Mr. Graham, or Mr. Burton, or either of them, for Crown Prosecutions, &c. which was in substance, as follows: "That from the year 1678, to 1688, Mr. Burton charged himself with having received out of the Exchequer for Crown Prosecutions, &c. 42,116*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* But was charged by sir Robert Howard's Accounts, with 42,616*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* which makes a difference of 500*l.* unacknowledged; that he charged himself with having received of Mr. Guy for the like uses, 1,438*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* Total of both Receipts, 43,554*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* Total of his Discharge, 43,522*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* Due to the king from the said Burton, (supposing his Accounts were allowed,) 531*l.* 11*s.*—That Mr. Burton and Mr. Graham charge themselves jointly, with having received from the Exchequer, 4,671*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*—That they jointly Account for 6,935*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* which is alledged in the said Account to be paid by Mr. Burton to Mr. Graham out of the Money charged upon the several Accounts of Mr. Burton: that they farther charge themselves with 12,466*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* received of sundry persons, by his late majesty's direction.—That by their joint Account they alledge, they have expended in Law-Suits the full sum of 12,466*l.* with an overplus of 1,300*l.* but do not acknowledge the 600*l.* charged to them by sir R. Howard, as a reward for prosecuting col. Whitley and lord Oswelston, over and above 3 years salaries.—That it appears by the Accounts of the said Burton and Graham that most of the said Moneys were paid to witnesses, jurors, solicitors, council, and to themselves in prosecutions of pretended criminals.—That, for instance, they pretend to have expended, in prosecuting for their lives, lord Delamere, 535*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* Mr. Hampden (for pretended correspondence with col. Armstrong) 527*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* Alderman Cornish, 346*l.* 11*s.* Mr. Hays, 232*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.* earl of Devonshire, 218*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* Sir S. Bernardiston, 717*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* Sir Tho. Pilkington, 264*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* Mr. S. Johnson, 181*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* Dr. Oates, 3,037*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* The seven Bishops, 183*l.* 1*s.* In procuring a Quo Warranto against the City of London, 1000*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* and against 80 other Corporations on the like Account, 1,197*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*—That it appears they expended several sums contrary to the laws of the land, as 3 and 5 guineas a piece to Middlesex Jury-men, and in treating them sometimes, 25*l.* sometimes 40*l.* and sometimes 50*l.* besides unwarrantable Fees to Sheriffs and other officers about juries.—That sometimes they retained 8, 10 or 11 council in a cause, to whom great fees are set down.—That great expences are charged in their Accounts for defence of several persons against their fellow subjects, for damages done them by the partizans of the designs of the late king; particularly in the case of sir John Moor, when many actions were brought against him by the citizens of London, for arbitrary proceedings in the election of sheriffs.—That it appeared on the Examination of several persons, that the said Burton and Graham then were employed in procuring, hiring, and otherwise influencing witnesses against the abovementioned pretended criminals.—In which they were assisted by sir Roger L'Estrange and one Hawes. That they offered one Cragg, a prisoner, 100*l.* quarterly if he would become evidence against the earl of Macclesfield, lord Delamere and major Wildman. But he refusing, they caused him to be kept a close prisoner in Newgate, without fire or candle, 40 weeks.—That they were the principal instruments against Stephen Colledge at Oxford; that together with the attorney general, they denied the said Colledge (who was condemned and executed) a copy of his jury, the use of his own papers, and other benefits of the law.—That several other witnesses concurred in their evidence, that the said Burton and Graham were employed in almost all the illegal prosecutions of the last 8 years.—That though no cause is assigned in the writ of the peers, for committing the late lord Jeffreys to the Tower, they find it to be notorious, that he was instrumental in the undue and illegal prosecution. &c. of lord Russel, col. Sydney, Fitzharris, Colledge, and Armstrong. And it is expressly avowed in the Accounts of the said Burton and Graham, that the said Jeffreys undertook the prosecutions in the West, after Monmouth's Invasion, and received of the said Burton and Graham, 1416*l.* 10*s.* for the job. To which may be added, that the said Burton and Graham paid to other Commissioners on the estates of attainted persons 1,117*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* more.—That the said Jeffreys past several grants under the great seal to violate, transgress, and supersede the laws; many shocking particulars of which are enumerated, especially relating to the tyrannical powers delegated to the High Commission Court, of which the said Jeffreys was appointed to be of the quorum, and sat accordingly.—That sir Robert Wright, late lord chief justice, and sir Tho. Jenner, late one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, had likewise a principal concern in these arbitrary proceedings; for which, in the opinion of the Committee, they were involved in the subversion of the laws and government of this kingdom."

Resolutions thereon.] Sir Thomas Littleton then moved, by the direction of the committee, "That the chairman of the grand committee of Grievances might bring in the commissions and other writings relating to the court for ecclesiastical causes. And a Resolution was passed accordingly; as likewise that schedules of Graham and Burton's accounts be delivered to the clerk of the house, to be kept for the service of the house; as likewise, that the former committee to whom it was referred to examine the cases of prisoners in the Tower, Newgate, and the Gate-house be revived, and do examine the writings taken with Mr. Brent, and make a schedule of them."

Debate on the Neglect of relieving Londonderry.] June 1. Mr. Leveson Gower. J

desire that it may be enquired, why the forces sent to relieve Londonderry came back again? If Ireland be lost, England will follow—And why the man that was sent to enquire the condition of Londonderry, landed not?

Mr. Colt. These delays must lie at somebody's door. A poor parcel of people defended themselves bravely, and gave a stand to the enemy. I would enquire who were the authors of the counsel, when the commissioners were sent to the army. That brave regiment at Stamford, instead of being sent into Ireland, was to go to Antigua, and the king knew nothing of the matter, but that it was one of the marine regiments. I would have this part of the instructions to your committee to enquire.

Mr. Howe. I gladly stand up to second this motion, and I hope, before we part, to second something of the same sort worthy your consideration. They that came back from Ireland perished in the ships by ill provision; those who gave this counsel are greater offenders than they that executed it. I see no justice done upon them; and I should regard them no more than a footman in the streets. I find stones thrown at my back, and I know not who does it, but if I find persons in the crowd that are my enemies, I believe they did it. King William came over and delivered us from these counsels; if we be delivered to these men, who formerly gave the ill counsel, and were of the privy-council to king James, they are not fit to be counsellors to king William. If you deprive him of these servants, who would draw the king into the same inconvenience they did king James, I hope affairs will go on much better.

Mr. *Smith.] I heartily join in this motion, but the motion is properly "for a committee to enquire into the miscarriages relating to Ireland, &c."

Sir Rob. Howard. I would willingly do the king present service, but now we are to apply ourselves principally to this business. I am glad I now stand in a parliament, where I may speak for the king and country, and not by interpretation of others, that we speak against the king, if for our country; but now it is otherwise. Two things are to be done concerning Ireland; one is, what has been done amiss, who should have stayed to have relieved them; the other, the slow assistance that has been sent them. He that will not speak plainly in this, must go against his judgment; I am sure it is against mine. You have made a bill to punish Mutiny and Desertion. This of Ireland is of so ill consequence, and a question, whether this matter comes within those two heads. The king will be tender in these things. My opinion is singular, and therefore I mistrust it. Great minds do great things, by conquest of countries, but to enslave their laws and subjects is the least part of princes. Edw. 3. knew how to conquer, and had great Aids; Edw. 2. and Rich. 2. to enslave us at home. We have a king of that great mind, that, when we came into this power, he might have quickly exacted it. Therefore it is no fault of his. If there be the least doubt in executing martial law, he will not do it. But as for the lords, we have a late Judgment in Oates's Case—I will say no more of that. If you are wanting in this, you send word to Londonderry to give it up. There is a thing called Impeachment; and it is the right of the commons to do it. Though the king will not come to it, yet I am of opinion that the act itself is a desertion of Lundy. If we do not our part, and are wanting in our duty to the king, we are like to have a melancholy session when we meet again. I move that a Committee may sit strictly to enquire if these men are worthy of an Impeachment. I would have a search, and a speedy search, into these things, that Ireland may see we desert them not.

Mr. Harbord. I hope we shall not only enquire into these, but what has been done in general, and if any person be faulty, to represent that too to the king. As to Ireland, nothing has been more industriously followed in some places, and defective in others. There was sent above 2000 l. in provisions, and not only to bring themselves back, but their provisions too! Either they are guilty of the greatest treason, or cowardice in the world. A Court Martial will handle these men tenderly, and I do not know whether an Impeachment will reach them; but if you do nothing, all will be lost. One came from Glasgow to Londonderry with provisions, hearing it was straitened: I sent the person to take away from the goldsmith what he pleased, and he will be at Glasgow in sixty hours. I have long foreseen such a storm as this, and I have carefully entered all this for your safety.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I move for instructions to your committee to enquire into a fresh pursuit about the Victuals. Some steps have been made towards this. An officer of Chester has been committed for great abuse; on complaint, the provisions he made were so bad, that a great many were little better than poisoned, and in a languishing condition. The prisons in Chester Castle broken—This is so newly done that it may be enquired into, and it is worth your enquiry what guilt lies upon the Victuals.

Mr. Harbord. The Victuallers of the Navy, Haddock and the rest, sent down to the person, and col. Richards told him, the seamen had rather drink their own water. The victualler's name is Anderton.

* "Mr. Smith was a man of clear parts, and of a good expression, and went through great posts in king William's reign with reputation and honour, being commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer: He had from his first setting out in the world been thoroughly in the principles and interests of the king, yet with a due temper in all personal things with relation to the times." Burnet.

In queen Anne's reign he was chosen Speaker, in 1705, by a majority of 44 voices, in opposition to Mr. Bromley.

Col. Birch. This of these Miscarriages is a great business, and, if well followed, will make the rabbit bolt. I would have instructions given to your committee to enquire into this. Now it is a good season, this month, and they may go in two or three days and come back; all that know those seas, say, they may tide it half sea over, and anchor at this time of the year. I would enquire into these things in general.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. If there be no other person to blame than him named, you come not to your end. Therefore I would have it enquired to the bottom.

Mr. Boscawen. I know not why we should be tender in naming persons. I think they should be particularly named, not only in the matter of fact, but their opinion of the whole.

The Speaker. The Committee are to report only the matter of fact, and it is proper for you to give opinion of the whole.

Sir Rob. Clayton. It is a thing admirable to me, that col. Richards, who raised the first regiment to fight against the Protestant Religion under king James, should be sent to maintain it. I would have this for Instruction to the Committee.

Mr. Hampden, sen. Lord Lisburne's regiment was thought fit at first to go to Antigua till it was reformed, which is now; but now another regiment is ordered.

Mr. Harbord. I would have it enquired into; but I have heard Mr. Blathwaite, the secretary of war, say, 'that the king would have a proper person to go, and sir George Lesley was pitched upon, but he lying near Scotland, the king had changed his mind, and that regiment was fit to go.'

Mr. Montagu, Clerk of the Council. I wonder gentlemen should twice repeat this of lord Lisburne. The first regiment was Lesley's, and that was ordered for Scotland, and the Papists were turned out of it; as good a regiment as his, lord Roscommon's regiment, as more proper, was ordered for Ireland.

Mr. Howe. I am glad of this good beginning. But I would have this Committee to examine particulars, why we had not kept the Papists for hostages, and why admiral Herbert was sent to sea with but 19 ships, when he should have had 30, and why so many ill men in all offices. It seems, those gentlemen want sense to manage, and so put in king James's officers; one bucket goes in, and another out. I would enquire into those that give these advices. It is said, in the country, we are betrayed, and if we address the king to remove those who are under Impeachments for crimes, and those that managed king James's affairs, we do but what we ought.*

* "The same day, Mr. Howe, vice-chamberlain to the queen, moved for an Address, to desire his majesty to remove from his presence and councils such as had been impeached by parliament, and had betrayed the Liberties of the subject: though nobody was named, yet

Mr. Holt. We are beholden to Londonderry; if that had not made a good resistance king James had been at Edinburgh before now. I never expect redress of these Miscarriages, till we come to the root. If Londonderry Miscarriage be not redressed, it will come home to us. The old army, we see, is continued, and the new one laid aside. Those who were king James's creatures are now in office and employment; and those who have been of the cabinet-council with the queen.

Resolved, "That a Committee be appointed to enquire who has been the occasion of the Delays in sending Relief over into Ireland, and particularly to Londonderry."

Debate on the Heads for the Bill of Indemnity.] June 3. Mr. Howe. I move that you proceed upon the Indemnity; and, as for Offenders, I would shake them off gently from my hand like a viper, but when it is upon the ground I would tread upon it, and destroy it, that it may hurt no more.

Mr. Garraway. We find great miscarriages in the government, but we do not know where to place them; the main of our miscarriage is, that we are not quicker with our Money to supply the present emergencies of the government. As for those who have abused their trust, let better men be put in their places. The military miscarriage is the source of all. Unless we enable the king, he cannot do it. I am sorry you give the Money at four quarterly payments: I would have had it at two. I will not presume to make you a motion, but I would go on this Bill of Supply to-morrow, and on Thursday on this Indemnity.

it was easy to guess that the persons, at which the address was to be levelled, were the lords Halifax and Danby, the President of the Council, and the Speaker of the house of lords, and that not so much on account of their mismanagements in former reigns, as their ascendancy under the present. This question was debated with great warmth; and, we are told, was so little expected by the courtiers, that if the contrary party had not unexpectedly cooled, it would have been carried in the affirmative. But this is not over-likely; because, on the morrow, Mr. Howe renewed the attack, and was supported by a great many: but the opposite side requiring them to name the persons, and nobody offering to do it, the motion fell; and all that Mr. Howe and his party were able to do, after the reading the Exceptions to the Bill of Indemnity, was to carry this Resolution, "That the king's pardon was not pleadable in bar to an Impeachment." Ralph, vol. ii. p. 127.

"Myn Heer Dyckvelt discoursed Mr. Howe about the motion he had made in the house; to which he answered, he did not think it to be of any ill consequence to his majesty; and besides, that a place at court should never silence him, when the good of his country required him to speak." Life of K. Will. vol. ii. p. 119.

June 4. Mr. Howe. I have an eye only to the present faults of the present government—(I mean no reflection upon the government.) But I see we have no Fleet gone out, and the French are coming out. I thought all the wisdom in the world could not have brought us to the pass we are in, much less the indiscretion. Qui non vetat, prohibet. I suppose it is the duty of every man in the Council to press forward in these affairs: for the miscarriage there is no question of. I should be sorry to put the scandal upon any man, but we must do something for the safety of ourselves. I look after being delivered from popery and slavery, that is all I desire to be delivered from; but I would have those persons that are obnoxious withdraw themselves, without any farther trouble; but I cannot believe that those who have sat in council with king James to the last, are fit now to be in council.

Sir Henry Winchcomb. I second the motion to remove all those persons, who sat in king James's council to the last.

Sir Wm. Strickland. I would look for what is to come, and address the king, that those who have been the authors of our former Miscarriages, may be removed from his councils.

Sir Ralph Dutton. It seems, by the silence of the house, nobody is in fault; therefore pray let us go home.

Sir John Guise. Every body is satisfied that we are governed by a sort of people who may come within the Indemnity. I know not but our misfortunes are from the same hands still. When they are at the stern of the government they may do us hurt in point of trade. The Dutch have convoys for their ships, and we have none.

Sir Wm. Williams. I see men have a quiet and easy spirit upon them. I will make bold to rouse them. I move for the Bill to assert our Liberties.

Mr. Howe. It is in vain to assert our Liberties, when men take the freedom to break them; they were always our liberties.

The Heads were then read.

Mr. Howe. There are a great many Heads to speak upon. If counsel have done ill, and we are merciful without justice, we shall do as ill. If it be their faults, it may move pity; if their confidence, it may move your anger. Some have been imprisoned, others whipped at a cart's tail. King James left Pardons to many: I would know therefore, if Pardons are pleadable against an Impeachment? If they are, we had as good except nobody; therefore I would know, whether they are pleadable, or no?

Sir John Thompson. I wonder gentlemen that carried up the Impeachment should be so silent in this matter. If this be an injury to the whole nation, I know not why they should still sit in the lords house under impeachments. I have discharged my duty to my country, do what you please.

Sir Wm. Williams. It has been said, 'that the laws of England are cobweb laws, that catch small flies, and let the great ones run through.' Whether a general Indemnity, or with exceptions,—that sticks in our teeth. You must either pass a round act, or leave out all. As long as this hangs in the air, men will be desperate. In the first place, take care for the crown and the government; and the next thing to do is the means, either by an universal Indemnity, or with Exceptions. If you go to particulars, then take care how far Impeachments, according to law of parliament, may be pleadable. Though I have suffered by parliaments, I will vindicate them while I live. If you will lie under your own breaches, I can shift for myself as well as another, but I will never complain of my particular. I have no Pardon. Every man needs it. I had my share—It is manifest that the commons have impeached persons. I cannot forget the parliament of 1680; what is become of those Impeachments? Not one message to the lords yet sent about them. At least we ought to come to some conclusion, how far Pardons are pleadable against an Impeachment. There are Pardons, and, I hope, learned men will not retract their opinions, that a pardon is not pleadable to an Impeachment in parliament. We are in a young government; you would not have that point lurking; either declare that it is a bar to an Impeachment, or not; and then the king may know what to do. Shall it be said this is too hot a question for the commons to touch, and leave this to the house of commons a vexatious question, to say one thing and do another? If Pardons from a prince be a bar to Impeachments, farewell to redressing Grievances! It is a vain thing ever to attempt it again; you will be like the commons in France, to give money as you are directed. I move this for posterity, that the safety of the government may not be lost.

Mr. Hawles. It is necessary to state this matter controverted; how a Pardon can be allowed to be a bar to Impeachment: It is necessary to determine it, if persons you except have pardons in their pockets; if so, you had better pass the Indemnity without any Exception. When the duke of Northumberland, in Edw. 6th's time, had a design to bring the crown into a protestant family, the Judges were prevailed upon, by him, to give their Opinion; who said, 'If they might have their Pardons, after they gave, they would give them.' They gave their Opinions in one hand, and had their Pardons in the other; the whole eleven Judges. If the law of parliament in Impeachments be doubtful, it is necessary to declare it. Do it now, and declare what the law is.

Col. Birch. I think this point was debated in the Parliament of 1679,* and I thought this would not have lost your time, being to be found fully in your Journals, without a negative. By the Pardon that great lord then pleaded, he confessed himself guilty of the charge; that case we all know, and, when it is farther debated, I will tell you my thoughts. It will be necessary that the king should know, that no Pardon is pleadable in bar against an Impeachment of the house of commons.

* See vol. iv. p. 1115.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Though the Pardon mentioned was pleaded to an Impeachment, yet it never came to an Act of Attainder. I remember, in the debates then you had some precedents of Edw. 3, of some that pleaded Pardons. The Spencers in Edw. 2. In Rd. 2 were pardoned Impeachments in parliament. Not that I stand in justification of persons accused, but certainly it is for the advantage of the crown, and its prerogative is to its own benefit. I would have a matter of this dangerous consequence remedied by a Bill, but I believe it is not law already.

Sir Henry Capel. I have observed, that of late years great attempts have been made against the government to pluck it feather by feather. If we have nothing to do here but give Money, is it a parliament, or a senate of New Rome, to set rates upon fruits and chesnuts? It is of the greatest consequence in the world that saying, 'That the king does no wrong;' but who must be answerable for the Miscarriages in the government, but the ministers? In Germany, though he be a sovereign prince, he is accountable to the Assembly of Princes for his actions, where all things may be redressed. If the king's ministers, after ill administration in their places, may plead their Pardons, you have not one king but twenty. I would have but one king, and the ministers, who are our fellow-subjects, are questionable as ourselves. You are told of a Bill of Attainder, and that is a summary way of proceeding, you may read it; but if not by Impeachment, it is a good way to prevent all prosecution of offenders. Pray put the question, "That an Impeachment of the house of commons is a bar to all Pardons."

Sir Rd. Temple. If it be so, I would declare it, but if not, make no reflection on it. Formerly there were Appeals of Treason, and those the king could not pardon; but by Hen. 4, all appeals of treason were taken away; as well as in murder and felony, the king could not pardon. I would gladly hear the Long Robe declare that this is a law. I should be glad if we could come at it, and I should have no tenderness for those who have violated the laws and liberties. You may make void Pardons, by act of parliament, as in the case of the archbishop of York, which was voided. I profess, I am doubtful, when no man has asserted this to be the law of parliament. It is not in the house of commons to declare law but in a christian way, and an Act may be made, for the future, to settle the matter. I would not assert a thing we cannot make good elsewhere.

Sir Wm. Williams. I am called up by Temple: he has refreshed my memory. If a subject be murdered, the next of kin may bring an Appeal, and for that reason an Impeachment is not pardonable, because it is at the suit of the subject, and an Impeachment is an Appeal of all the commons of England. He mentioned an address in Edw. 3.'s time, 'that no Pardons should be to persons impeached,' and it was resolved in the negative, and the commons sat down by it; but God forbid, all Addresses should be objected, which are done in modesty! Can he give one instance; that ever a pardon of an impeachment was allowed in parliament? The law of reason is for it.

Sir Rob. Howard. I have no mind to speak for this case, that the commons should have this turned into a law; we should be so fatal a people that all your Petition of Right would be damned by it, and must that have a blemish upon it, because you desired it? And you confess it is not law, because you desire it to be made law. If that argument be so, whatever you desire to be a law, is not lawful till confirmed.

Mr. Ettrick. The lawyers of Westminster-Hall know little of this matter. It is of great consequence one way as the other, either to the king's prerogative, or the right of this house. As to the inconvenience, it seems extremely wrong on one side, if one way, he must have a pardon; and in pleading that pardon, if the lords should hold the law to be otherwise than you do, you will have a foil in the matter. The king's prerogative will have a great consideration here, as well as in the lords house. I move that you will go on with the Heads of the Indemnity.

Mr. Hawles. Something of the king's prerogative I hear offered, but if we go to the precedent or judgment upon pardons pleaded, we must go to a parallel case. This is an Appeal to an Impeachment, and then a parallel case will carry it. The king cannot pardon, in a private case of an Appeal, much less what is against the public. As to what is said of the statute which takes away appeals of treason, it was from private persons to appeal one another in parliament, as in the case of lord Mowbray, and the earl of Hereford, they were private animosities. If you allow Pardons, there is an end of the case, and they need not plead a pardon in bar, but in abatement only. In that mentioned of Edw. 3, &c. there is a little weight in that.

Mr. Brockman. I wonder this should be so debated now. I remember a stamped pardon by creation. I appeal whether this did not formerly occasion conferences? Lord Anglesea managed for the lords, and as great a debate was upon it then as now, and the lords agreed, 'that it was no bar to an Impeachment;' and in the next parliament was the same thing debated, and another debate did arise of the continuance of Impeachments in intermission of parliament; and it was concluded, 'That in intermission of parliament there was no discontinuance of Impeachments.' You may see the Journals, that all this is true in fact.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If that be already settled, then the point is well declared already. I doubt the lords did not declare it.

The Speaker. This house did declare it, and demanded Judgment of the lords, upon lord Danby's pleading; therefore before you give your Judgment, see how the method stands upon your Books.

Sir Wm. Williams. Lord Stafford was impeached in one parliament, and attainted in another.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this house, that a Pardon is not pleadable in Bar of an Impeachment in Parliament."

Debate on the Judgments against Titus Oates.] Sir Robert Howard moving in favour of Dr. Oates's Judgment,* some gentlemen hissed. He said, Such gentlemen as did it I shall not be reconciled to, unless they love whipping and perpetual imprisonment, and no confirmation of the Popish Plot. I do acknowledge the lords the supreme judicature in parliament; but I know the legislative power may repeal a Judgment they have given. The lords have affirmed the Judgment in the King's Bench against Dr. Oates, and that a minister of the Church of England may be degraded of his priestly and canonical habit there: I hope gentlemen of the Church of England are not of this opinion. This was a temporal Judgment, and lord chief justice Jeffreys gave it. The lords have worded the Judgment in one place 'barbarous,' and an Algerine Judgment for an English crime. With all my heart let Oates be brought to trial for perjury, but nothing can be more fatal to the English nation, than that his testimony should be sufficient against lord Stafford, and yet he be convicted of perjury. This may confirm such Judgment for the future. The Judges all present in the lords house gave their Opinions, 'That the Judgment against Oates was contrary to law, and erroneous, and ought to be reversed.' Now I have said all this, I would not have Oates exempted from trial of Perjury, but not the Judgment of the King's Bench confirmed, to have these fatal effects; imprisonment for life, pillory, whipping, and to confirm the Popish Plot, to suppress all that, and it may be to reverse the Attainder of lord Stafford, and void that trial. The lords have found no

* "Oates was convicted of Perjury (in 1685,) on the Evidence of the witnesses from St. Omers, who had been brought over before to discredit his testimony: and he was condemned to have his Priestly habit taken from him, to be a prisoner for life, to be set on the pillory in all the public places of the city, and ever after that to be set on the pillory four times a year, and to be whipped by the common hangman from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and the next from Newgate to Tyburn; which was executed with so much rigour that his back seemed to be all over flead. This was thought too little if he was guilty, and too much if innocent, and it was illegal in all the parts of it." Burnet.

VOL. V.

error in the Record, and therefore have adjudged the Judgment, and affirmed all the parts of it; and now I leave you to judge, whether a Bill be not fit to be brought in to reverse all this.

Mr. Howe. It is strange that Oates, who has saved the nation—and if now there must be a question of the Popish Plot—I am for forgiving faults—The Romans had a respect for the geese that saved the Capitol, and would not let them be killed. At this rate, Johnson* must be whipped again. I am so much for the Church of England that I abhor all these proceedings, and so much against the two last reigns—Possibly it is the interest of some persons that no witnesses may be believed. I second Howard's motion.

Sir Wm. Williams. If Perjury be excepted out of the general Pardon, Oates will be excepted, and you cannot remedy it but by a Bill. I speak not for the sake of Oates, but for the lords and commons. By this great example, the little dogs will bark after the great curs. The lords have affirmed this Judgment, and there is no way to void it, but by an act of reversal. It is not fit that it be mingled with the indemnity, but be by itself a reversal, that such villainous Judgment may not be executed upon any commoner to be thus treated for the future. You have no way to void it but by act of parliament.

June 11. Sir Robert Howard reported, That he, with other members, had according to the order of the house, inspected the Journals of the house of lords, relating to the Judgments against Mr. Oates: and that the Entry therein is as followeth:

"Die Veneris, 31 Die Maii, 1689. Whereas, by virtue of their majesties writ of error, returnable into the house of peers in parliament assembled, a Record of the Court of King's-bench was brought into this court on the 4th of April 1689, with the transcript thereof, wherein Judgment is entered for and on the behalf of the late king James 2. against Titus Oates, clerk, upon a Judgment for Perjury: upon which writ, errors being assigned by the said Titus Oates, and issue joined by sir Henry Pollexfen, their majesties attorney-general; and, after hearing counsel for the said Titus Oates, no counsel appearing for their majesties, on the 26th of April last past, after due consideration had of what was offered by counsel thereupon; it is this day ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That the said Judgment given, on his late majesty's behalf, against the said Titus Oates, be and is hereby affirmed; and that the Transcript of the said Record, wherein Judgment is entered as aforesaid, be remitted."

"The tenor of which Judgment, to be affixed to the Record to be sent back, followeth:

'Postea, scilicet 4to Die Aprilis, Anno

* Lord Russel's chaplain, most cruelly whipped, fined, pilloried, &c. for his writings, in 1686.

U

‘Regni Domini Gulielmi, & Dominae Mariae, ‘nunc Regis & Reginae Angliae, &c. Primo
 ‘Transcript’ Record’ & Process’ predict’ cum ‘omnibus ea tangen’, prætextu cujusdam bre-
 ‘vis de Error’ corrigend’ pro præfat’ Titu’
 ‘Oates in Premiss’ prosecut’ predicti Domini ‘Regis & Reginae in præsen’ Parliament’ à ‘predicta Curia dicti Domini Regis & Reginae
 ‘hic transmiss’ fuit, prædict’ Titus in eadem
 ‘Curia Parliament’ comparens diversas Causas ‘& Materias pro Erroribus in Record’ &
 ‘Process’ prædict’ & Revocatione & Adnulla-‘tione Judicii prædict’ assignavit; et postea, ‘scilicet 31 Die Maii, Anno dicti Domini
 ‘Regis & Reginae supradict. in præsent’ Curia ‘Parliament’ predict’ Visis & per Curiam ibi-
 ‘dem diligent’, examinat’ & plenius intellect’
 ‘tam Record’ & Process’ prædict’ ad Judicio
 ‘super eisdem reddit’ qu’ predict’ Error supe‘rius assignat, pro eo quod videtur Cur’ Parlia‘ment’ predict’, quod Record’ ill’ in nullo viti-‘osum aut defectivum existit, & quod in Re‘cord’ illo in nullo fuit errat’, ideo ad tunc &
 ‘ibidem Cons’ est per eandem Curiam Parlia‘ment’ prædict’, quod Judic’ prædict’ in omni‘bus affirmetur, & in omni suo robore stet & ‘effectu.’”

Sir Robert Howard also reported, That the affirmations of Judgments are entered upon the respective Rolls, upon the writs of error returned before the lords in parliament. And that there is entered, in the Journal of the lords, the Protestation following:

“The lords having heard the Opinion of all the Judges, concerning the illegality of the two Judgments against Titus Oates, upon the point of Perjury, for which he hath his writs of error into this house, to have them reversed. The house upon consideration, and after long debate, had this main question proposed, Whether to reverse the two Judgments given below against Titus Oates, in relation to the two Perjuries. The previous question was put, Whether this question shall be now put; it was resolved in the affirmative. Then the main question was put, Whether to reverse the two Judgments given below against Titus Oates, in relation to the two Perjuries. It was resolved in the negative.—Leave is given to such lords as will, to enter their Dissents: and, accordingly, these lords following do enter their Dissents in these Reasons ensuing:

1. “For that the King’s-bench, being a temporal court, made it part of the Judgment, That Titus Oates, being a clerk, should, for his said perjuries, be divested of his canonical and priestly habit, and to continue divested all his life: which is a matter wholly out of their power, belonging to the ecclesiastical courts only. 2. For that the said Judgments are barbarous, inhuman, and unchristian. And there is no precedents to warrant the punishments of whipping, and committing to prison for life, for the crime of perjury; which yet were but part of the punishments inflicted upon him. 3. For that the particular matters, upon which the Indictments were found, were the points objected against Mr. Titus Oates his testimony in several of the Trials; which he was allowed to be good and credible witness, though testified against him by most of the same persons, who witnessed against him upon those Indictments. 4. For that this will be an encouragement, and an allowance, for giving the like cruel, barbarous, and illegal Judgments hereafter, unless this Judgment be reversed. 5. Because sir John Holt, sir Henry Pollexfen, the two Chief Justices, and sir Robert Atkins chief baron, with six Judges more (being all that were then present), for these and many other Reasons, did, before us, solemnly deliver their Opinions; and unanimously declare, That the said Judgments were contrary to law, and ancient practice; and therefore erroneous, and ought to be reversed. 6. Because it was contrary to the Declaration on the 12th of Feb. last, which was ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, then assembled; and by their Declaration, ingrossed in parchment, and inrolled among the Records of parliament, and recorded in Chancery; whereby it doth appear, that excessive Bail ought not to be required, nor excessive Fines imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted. (Signed.) Bolton, Bridgwater, Stamford, Bolingbrook, Herbert, Vaughan, Macklesfield, Oxford, Bath, Grey, Cornwallis, R. Eure, Wharton.”

The two Judgments in Hilary Term, 36 et 37 Car. 2. against Mr. Oates, for Perjury, were also read. After which,

Sir Robert Howard said, I should not have troubled you with this matter had I not thought it as great a thing as could come in parliament. I am zealous in one thing, not to blacken all things relating to Protestants, and whiten Papists. The rise of this began upon the condemnation and censure of two parliaments, in the business of the Exclusion of the duke of York, &c. Then it was when a Popish successor was thought no ill thing by the lords, and then it was that a Popish successor was excluded by you; when the strenuous assertion of that became a merit at court, then the attributes of a Popish successor were asserted; to secure this great business, to secure a Popish successor, came on the surrendering charters of corporations; when Judgments of law came to be given on the person, not the cause considered, there grew the rise of a Popish successor, the violation of the choice of sheriffs, corruption of judges, and their extraordinary censures, which produced this Judgment on Oates and Johnson, one of the greatest persons of the nation: he suffered under this, and was stripped of his ministry. I am heartily sorry this is come before us, but I am afraid that the affirming that Judgment condemns all we have done, and whatever the Papists have done is justified, and the Protestants condemned. Oates is the least of my thoughts, but to have Oates’s Judgment confirmed, and we all reproached for it, that sticks with me. Unless we are grown fond of Jef-freys's Judgment, which condemns all we have done. I move for a Bill to repeal this Judgment.

Serjeant Maynard. We do not know yet what Judgment this is, affirmed by the lords. I desire the Judgment may be read.

Sir Wm. Williams. Read the Judgment, and then you may have recourse to the Record, on occasion.

Serjeant Maynard.* I was in court when Oates was tried: he was indicted on two points; such a thing, such a time such a day, but he was not there at that time, and pleaded Not guilty. There were 18 or 19 Jesuits sworn against him from St. Omers college. I never saw evidence delivered with more vigour than that was. He would have begun with the latter, but the Chief Justice told him, 'that was his worst way—Truly if he was not at St. Omers at the time, all would fall.' I was present when he gave his Evidence in this place; he said it once, and twice, and varied it not, but some would have it a third time. I was against it. He was asked particularly here of a person of quality; he could not say it was the duke of York. His evidence was affirmed by several trials. It cannot be imagined who should suborn him. Two of his servants were suborned to swear things against him of a filthy nature. These two witnesses were examined, and it fell out, one crossed the other in the evidence. Says one, 'It is true.' Says another, 'It is not true.' Why should these two servants swear voluntarily against Oates, unless suborned? There is a man called sir Roger [L'Estrange], who, under the pretence of maintaining Church, publishes, 'That Oates alone was a single evidence against the duke of York;' and, 'that every magistrate, or chief governor, may forbid any religion, and to do this, the king has two advantages, he has law, and arms.' This sir Roger published before Oates's trial. Whether true or false, Oates was an enemy to the Popish religion. I speak this but to the purpose, eight or nine swore positively he was at St. Omers, and he had evidence to prove that he was not. He was convicted of perjury only in matter of time, which he had four or five witnesses to prove, but could not be heard.

Mr. Hawles. You have heard of some people that disown the government, and disperse pamphlets; and no wonder, when the worst Judgment that was ever given in law is affirmed by the lords. There is no such Judgment in law against any man, nor ever so exacted, and this gives occasion for people to talk, 'that one house was for it, and another house against it.' This verdict cost the king two thousand odd hundred pounds. I have known, that when a jury have had a guinea more given than ordinary, that verdict has been set aside as if given amongst them. If a jury goes against the humours of the court, as in Willmore's Case, and others, they are browbeaten, and as the jury are used, so are the witnesses. I would have this Judgment against Oates called 'a cruel and illegal Judgment,' and so to vote it.

* "The Compiler heard him imperfectly." Grey.

Serj. Maynard. To vote this Judgment so here, will not do your work, for here is the Judgment of the lords against your vote; you must do more; for when there is a Record in the King's-bench, there it remains. I would not meddle with the Judgment that the lords have given, but you may complain of it as a Grievance, and may so take notice of it as a stab to our liberties. Vote this illegal, and you have the Opinion of the Judges in the lords house with you; vote it a Grievance and you may have this Judgment cancelled.

Sir W. Williams. I think this will be too little. The lords are a court, and have recorded their Affirmation, and it is past their power to reverse it, and it is not safe for the Judges to give another Opinion in the King's-bench; but if they have the countenance of this in the King's-bench the lords themselves may feel it. This man is a clergyman, and to be unrobed, and divested of his orders in the King's-bench, and so to continue during his life—how a court of law can do this, I am unsatisfied. But what we are to consider of is this, whether a subject should rest under that judgment. There may be a precedent for whipping, but for all these parts in one Judgment, let any man give us a precedent to square with that Judgment. It makes the Judges arbitrary, and hereafter the Judges may be most injurious in punishing, this Judgment having had this sanction in the house of peers. This is the case; and what is there fit for us to do? but one thing; and that is to reverse the Judgment, by act of parliament. Go in the ordinary way of the legislative power, and not by the declaring this or that, but a reversal of that Judgment, as illegal. If we vacate the Judgment only, that will not do; the consequence will be that we must admit it for the future. But if, by law, you declare it illegal and erroneous, there is an obvious objection, 'that the lords will not agree to the Bill;' but that is no answer to me, for the lords will do it, and have reason for it, for the Judges gave their Opinion against it, (but that is not upon record). I do not deliver it as history, but it confirms my opinion, that you have opportunity to reverse it by Bill, as illegal, and that is worth a thousand votes. The writs of error that Oates brought are upon two records, and they are both entered affirmed in the King's-bench, so that it cannot be vacated but by Bill of Reversal.

Col. Birch. We are now a great many gentlemen met here, who were not here in the examination of the Plot. According to my place and ability, I had in the chair much of the Examination that went through my fingers, which was so clearly proved, that all England was satisfied, as well as the lords and commons. I know no blow can be given like this to the lords and commons. We well know who they were that did what they could to make this Plot a ridicule, but when a jesting business could not do, they took all the ways they could to suppress it. Under a popish prince, I expected much more than from Omers, I dare not call it St. Omers; and now that any body should be so bold as to pin this at our breeches, let them answer it. The house was dissolved, or else I had made a warm Report on the Monday. But as the commons are made black by this Judgment, so I would have a Bill to make somebody black too, and if we are denied it, to go home with honour, and they with shame. As they made us black, so the Bill will wash us, and lay the black where it should be.

Mr. Howe. I am sorry we are under sufferings; still the same hands are upon us. If we have a Bill to vindicate ourselves, we are sure the people will vindicate us against them. I would vote this Judgment 'illegal, cruel, and a Grievance.'

Mr. Boscawen. The affirming this Judgment is not for Oates's sake, but for the sake of the Popish Plot. I think there was so much art used to get that Judgment, that, for that reason, I would lay it to heart. I wish the same spirits have not the influence to do the same things again. I think it not amiss to add to the question, 'That it is your opinion that this Judgment against Oates was a design to stifle the Popish Plot, and by such arts as 3,000*l.* spent upon the Trial.' I would have something of that in the question.

Sir Henry Capel. This Judgment has a bottom deeper than I can well express it; it cost dissolving three parliaments. I remember when the crown and robes were carried in haste in a chair at Oxford, to dissolve that parliament, when we were upon the point of discovering Fitzharris's Plot.* If we pass this Judgment by, we approve all this. If you add to your Vote, 'upon suppressing the Popish Plot,' the world will then see the reason of your vote, and the occasion of this man's Trial, and the world will know it was upon the Popish Plot.

Mr. Foley. We have the Judgment before us, and what it cost, but, besides that, many have had continual pensions since. Sir Tho. Whitgrave of Staffordshire has had one, and no waiter. Therefore I move as before.

Sir Tho. Lee. Every body has agreed in the end; we differ only in the means. The consequence of this Judgment affirmed will affect every body, and, perhaps, if to do again, would not be done; the consequences were not foreseen as observed. 'Tis to establish a rule of punishment hereafter. But consider, Oates was not the sole evidence that convicted lord Stafford; therefore restrain your Vote to that question.

Sir Wm. Williams. One record of Oates's conviction relates to Ireland, the Jesuit; we have all that trial, and Whitebread, all founded on popery; do but deem the Judgment to be 'cruel and illegal,' it will do the business.

Mr. Hawles. I like the question relating to the Plot. I have as ill an opinion of those that gave the money as the clergyman that swore. I move that you will declare the verdict 'corrupt.'

Sir Robert Cotton, of Cambridgeshire. I am for the question to go single, 'illegal;' as it concerns every particular person, should you clog it with the 'corruption,' people will think it arises from corruption, and not from the nature of the thing.

Sir Wm. Williams. The affirming of the Judgment by the lords is the main Judgment; if you reverse only that in the King's-bench, we have not our end.

Mr. Garraway. If ever we obtain this Bill, you have your end; therefore avoid all words that may gain a dispute betwixt the lords and us.

Sir Tho. Lee. The Judgment against Johnson was but a bare misdemeanor for a libel; therefore take that within your Bill.

Sir Wm. Williams. Pass a Vote upon that Judgment only, for in that you may go in the ordinary way, and I believe the lords will reverse it.

The Speaker. That against Johnson is but barely Information for Misdemeanor. As for the degrading, that is no part of the record.

Sir Tho. Lee. I observe one thing, in the reversal by the lords. I would have the business of the Ship-Money looked into. They did not leave that Judgment; and to that particular judgment the thing was at an end; but they did it by a Bill. It is not your part, as the commons of England, to bring a writ of error; pray let one Bill serve for all.

Sir Wm. Williams. I would not have recourse to the last remedy, but in the last case: I would not do it by Bill. In the case of lord Hollis and Valentine, the Judgment was against the Privilege of the house. The Record was read in the house, and voted 'an illegal and a pernicious Judgment,' given in 5 Charles. It was voted 1667. It was a long time before that Judgment was taken notice of; and, at a conference, the commons brought the Vote to the lords, and they agreed the Judgment 'illegal and pernicious;' and voided the Judgment.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am not willing to run into controversy with the lords unnecessarily. I remember that Judgment in lord Hollis's case delivered at a conference. I have observed, that, in several things, the Long Parliament made Votes, and no more, and did not know the consequence. At the conference, the commons carried up the Vote; and when the lords agreed it, they began to reflect, 'We have let the commons into judicature;' therefore they put lord Hollis upon reversing it, by writ of error, thereby never to let the commons into judicature.

Resolved, "That Bills be brought in to reverse the Judgments against Mr. Oates and Mr. Johnson, as cruel and illegal."

Farther Debate on the Heads for the Bill of Indemnity.] June 12. Col. Birch. I did most heartily bless God, that the parliaments did what they did, in the last parliament; if they had done no more than what they did in relation to the Test, and Popish Plot, we should honour them. As to the Popish Plot, do what you will, but pray meddle not with parliaments: if any ill things were said in that parliament, let them go, and thank God things were no worse.

* See vol. iv. p. 1339.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am sorry you are diverted from the business of this day, upon account of that parliament. There was a great deal done there for the Protestant Religion; but the great fault of that parliament was, that it was filled with people depending upon the court. I cannot say there were Pensions then; that was the great fault of the Long Parliament: I hope we shall see no more such. There was an Address to the king, in that Parliament, about the Test; a worthy gentleman (Mr. Finch) was thrown out of his place about it: but if the question be, what things were spoken in that parliament (though there were things ill enough), parliaments may have great discouragements for the future. I hope those who did amiss then, have repented; and pray put no discouragements upon people for what they have said in parliament.

Serj. Maynard. No account is to be given out of the house, for what is done there; the account is only to be given here, else you shut up all our mouths; and I move you to put this off from your hands.

Sir Rob. Howard. It is not at all the question, what was said in king James's parliament, but what was done worth taking notice of against the Protestant Religion. One thought it worth their pains to turn over the Journals of the Exclusion-Parliaments; another, spirited with claret, seconds the motion. I shall never forget a worthy member (Clarges)* holding two Speeches of king James in his hand, and declaring them contradictory to one another. I shall ever honour him for it. We are ordering a committee to inspect the Journals relating to the Plot, in order to the matter yesterday relating to Oates; which I think very fit to be done.

Mr. Sacheverell. As for the proceedings of that parliament of king James, nobody will justify it in many respects. I would have a retrospect, in the Indemnity, of raising Money against the law; but if this should rake into a great number of persons, I am against it: but if there be one or two of them now about the king, I have no such kindness for my brother, if he stands before me in this matter; but persons that may be of use, I would be tender of; but if he give a jealousy to the nation, I would part with him, though he was my brother. Pray let nothing put an insecurity upon England's interest.

Mr. Howe. To explain my motion about inspection into the last parliament, they who thought the word 'Protestant' not fit to be in an Address to king James, and to leave out the word 'Popery,' are not fit to sit here; and I would take some notice of it. [He meant Mr. Bickerstaff.]

Sir John Trevor. I desire the Journals of that parliament may be inspected. Care was taken both at the committee, and in the house, then; and you will find the Report was never then made relating to the Popish Plot; but, in relation to the inspection, the direction was only for 'that part of the Journal relating to the Bill of Exclusion, to be expunged.'

Mr. Godolphin. I had the honour to be of that parliament so reflected upon. I was out of England when I was chosen. I cannot justify all that parliament did; but as for what is said, of their giving what was asked, it did neither give land-tax, poll, nor subsidy; but, that parliament was for the Protestant Religion, and suppressed two rebellions in England and Scotland: I wish other parliaments may do as well, I would not have enquiry made into mens actions in parliament, lest after-parliaments may do the same by you.

Sir Wm. Williams. For that very reason, I would look into what they did amiss. One parliament may question another; but to offer it as an argument, 'because others are questioned, we may be,' it is an argument of our sincerity. Let this, and all parliaments, be questioned.

Mr. Howe. As to what Godolphin reproaches us of 'taxes and poll,' I hope we shall never attain men, and seize their estates, without evidence.

The Debate went off, and the King's Letter was read relating to the Indemnity, dated Jan. 22, 1688.

Sir Robert Cotton, of Cambridgeshire. The advice the king has given in his Letter may contribute to the forwarding the business of the Indemnity, and satisfaction of the nation. Nothing will more settle the nation, than a quiet peaceable spirit amongst ourselves; and as the king has expressed great kindness to his subjects, so I hope we shall proceed with that temper as may quiet the nation, by as much moderation and unity, in naming the persons to be excepted, as possibly the nature of the thing may bear.

Mr. Howe. Pray lay a foundation: no man that has a falling house will live in it with props. For want of a foundation, a new building can never be strong. As to the king's Letter about the Indemnity, I wish it may be so for ever; but, as I wish to God we may forget what is past, so likewise that we may punish those who endeavoured to destroy our liberty and religion. Some, in the worst of times, did die martyrs for it. As I would forget, so I would not confirm, all the ill things in time past. I would have as few excepted out of the Indemnity, as may be pardoned, as any man; but I would not give encouragement to exercise the same thing on to posterity. The guilty are in haste to be forgiven, and the innocent fear a return of the same ill things. I hope we shall have a temper in what we do.

* See vol. iv. p. 1372.

The Record of sir Edward Hales's Case* was read.

Sir John Guise. If you intend to except any persons out of the Indemnity, you have now an occasion. We hear who the Judges were that gave their opinions in this case. I hear Jones and Wythens were so; pray make them examples.

Mr. Howe. You are going upon a Company of Judges like the East India Company; they were the instruments, but those who put them upon it, and advised, are rather to be excepted; but if you name a committee to bring in the names of the counsellors, then you may chuse whom you will make examples of, and distinguish them from honest men. Those who built theirs upon our misfortune, go about still in the world, and make speeches in vindication of what was done. I hope we shall proceed so as no man may have reason to blame us.

Marquis of Winchester. The Prince's Declaration turns all upon evil Counsellors: I hope they are gone away with king James; but if they still remain here, those are the persons you aim at, who sat with king James from the first to the last. I move for a Committee to inspect who those were, and then you will see whom to except.

Mr. Hawles. I wish you had gone on in order of time. This is the last, though first read. I think the Judges, and that Attorney and Solicitor (I know not who they were) I think they ought to be under one head, and sir Edward Hales another.

Sir Tho. Lee. I have sometimes sat here when mis-carriages have been spoken of, and have heard an ingenious gentleman say, 'Take them not as a whole faggot, but stick by stick, and you may break them.' Take them man by man, and you may come to your end.

Mr. Hawles. Let the committee enquire into the proceedings of lord chief justice Herbert, and justice Wythens, and you may know all.

Mr. Howe. Before you take out a stick, lay all the faggot before you. Let us know all the criminals, and then except whom you please. I move for a committee to bring in the names of them all.

The Speaker. That of sir Edward Hales was a fictitious plea.

Mr. Hawles. You will find it was a real plea: send for the clerks of that court, and they will inform you, that Hales was at 60*l.* charge in the suit.

Mr. Foley. I cannot see how we can proceed, unless by a Committee. Other Judges are more criminal about the Dispensing Power, than those named. Where a judge's opinion was for dispensing with one man, he is not so great a criminal as those who gave their opinions for dispensing with all. Till that be reported, you cannot give an opinion.

Sir Wm. Williams. I doubt we are going into a wood. You have received the Record of Hales and Godden; the committee must know the matter by record, or witnesses. It was Easter term, 2 James. Go into the courts, and you will see who were Judges that term. If I was a judge, I would confess the thing immediately. Why should things be concealed? It looks as if we were afraid; as if all were infected. All know that Herbert was the first, Wythens the second, Holloway the third, and Wright the fourth. Having said this, pray take my memory as you will take other gentlemen's. As for the Common Pleas, (I think Benefield is dead) Streete spoke against it, for his reputation, the only man—(Milton and Alibone are dead)—lord chief baron Montagu left his place upon it; barons Atkins and Jenner were for it: I speak only on my memory. Certainly, when that accursed Judgment was given, those who concurred with the rest are most to blame. Herbert spoke his own judgment, prompted by the rest. No man can alter his judgment without design. A man that had this bias, and found the rest of the Judges inclined, was confirmed in his opinion. I take them to be equally culpable. Herbert is abroad, and not here to excuse himself. The rest are dead, and have answered it in another place.

Mr. Hampden. Let a committee be appointed to enquire into those concerned, in every head, and then report it, and you may be then ready to go on with the names of the persons. My chief reason is, I would not have you go upon persons without good proof; not upon general fame; else, instead of doing justice in parliament, you will expose their reputation.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. This enquiry implies, that the person so excepted out of the Indemnity shall not have the mercy of this house, nor of the whole kingdom. Every gentleman, before he gives his resolution, will satisfy himself in the matter of fact; and any man is capable of seeing the Record. As to sir Edw. Hales's case of Dispensation, books have been published, and I shall say the less of that; most gentlemen, I presume, being satisfied, Herbert has written his own Justifica-

* "Sir Edward Hales, a gentleman of a noble family in Kent, declared himself a papist, though he had long disguised it. He had an employment, and not taking the Test, his coachman was set up to inform against him, and to claim the 500*l.* that the law gave to the informer. When this was to be brought to trial, the Judges were secretly asked their opinions; and such as were not clear to judge as the court did direct, were turned out; and, upon two or three canvassings, the half of them were dismissed, and others, of more pliable and obedient understandings, were put in their places. Some of these were weak and ignorant to a scandal. The suit went on in a feeble prosecution, and in Trinity term Judgment was given." Burnet.

tion, and it has with me some weight. As to the general Declaration, I could never find any thing in my reading to justify it, it pulling all up by the roots, and the law of no force; nothing like it but the Case in Ch. 2. Whoever will follow such a precedent, so justly decried by all people, deserves to be punished. Where there is just cause, you may proceed to exception, and let justice go with mercy.

Sir Robt. Howard. I suppose you will go farther than the four Judges; to the advisers and promoters of the Judgments. But how will you be informed, and bring persons to do it? The only way to do it is to name the persons visible, and who are matter of record; without a committee, it is impossible to have names. Therefore I move, that you will go upon the several Heads, and those to be referred to a committee, to name persons in relation to those heads. When these are all before you, the names may be put to the heads, and you may proceed upon them.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would understand what it is you are about: whether an Act of Indemnity, or pains and penalties? I conceive you are not going by impeachments, and I suppose you are not setting up an enquiry, who was of this opinion, or who that; if so you must go all England over. No man can miss the name of a man, if he please, they have been so notorious. These Heads lead you to every man you will except, and these are obvious.

Mr. Brewer. Whoever the judges were, they are great criminals; but I would have the offence certain. I dare say, no Judgment was ever given in the Declaration, but you may know who were judges in the King's-Bench then.

Mr. Howe. I suppose it is not designed that you should except all those names, and we do it at committees. We have begun this Head, though one of the last of Grievances: but I would have them distinguished from mankind. I would know those who broke the hedges, and let in the cattle; and then see who you will except, and who you will forget.

Sir Robt. Cotton, of Cambridgeshire. I am against a committee: I think it will alarm the whole nation. I think the former Indemnity did quiet the nation, and I hope this will. I think there needs no committee to inform you who the judges were, who the lord-lieutenants, and who concerned in corporations; persons so notorious, and so well known, that the whole nation can distinguish them; therefore I am against a committee.

Sir Robt. Howard. I do not apprehend the danger of a Committee. I wonder at this doctrine, 'that a committee should alarm the nation.' Is it not an alarm to the nation to have a Dispensing Power, and Judgments against corporations? I wonder this should go so high (as is said) to 'alarm the nation.' No such offences were known before; such powers were never known before: the very roots of parliament destroyed. I shall not be zealous in contending, whether you will have a committee, or no, to enquire into persons; but you must have a committee to enquire into the courts of justice; and I move, that you will go upon Names; and I think it will be for the content of the people, and not to 'alarm' them.

Mr. Hawles. I know not the custom heretofore, in bills of this nature; but I see no inconvenience in a committee. The officers of the court may give the same information to a committee as to the house. It is the shorter way to examine it before a committee, only to enquire into Officers and Judges. It may tend to expedite the matter.

Mr. Ettrick. I desire an end of this as much as any man. The Judges are going the circuits and the jails are full: your Act may come too late into the country. To enquire into the Advisers and Assisters will take up a great deal of time. Those who were notoriously exemplary I would put a mark upon; and let the others go off without any mark, and clear.

Mr. Sacheverell. I have not known, but if gentlemen are willing to relinquish a question never put, but that it has been laid aside; and pray put no difficulty upon the house.

The Speaker. I moved it; and gentlemen said, 'No, no.'

Col. Birch. If I knew the man, the mark you would shoot at, I could speak better. It is a plain question, 'Whether you will refer it to a Committee, or no?' If to a committee, then you are to give Instructions.

Mr. Coningsby. This Bill of Indemnity has been called 'a walking ghost;' and if you adjourn the debate, it will always be a shadow, and not regarded; therefore I am for going on.

The question for a Committee passed in the negative.

Sir Tho. Lee. I hope one day more will bring an end to your Resolutions in this matter of Names. Sir Edw. Hales has been named, and if I name a person with king James, I do nobody any harm. I name lord chief justice Herbert* to be one excepted.

Mr. Howe. I am against naming Herbert; it was his opinion, and he was guilty of no other fault; he has modestly retired and left our company. I would leave him out.

Ordered, "That the Officers of the King's-Bench bring in who were the Judges in sir Edward Hales's Case, &c."

Debate on King James's Declaration.] June

* "There was a new chief justice found out, very different from Jeffreys, sir Edward Herbert. He was a well-bred and a virtuous man, generous and good-natured. He was but an indifferent lawyer, and had gone to Ireland to find practice and preferment there. He unhappily got into a set of very high notions, with relation to the king's prerogative. His gravity and virtues gave him great advantages, chiefly his succeeding such a monster as had gone before him. So he being found to be a fit tool, was raised up all at once to this important post." Burnet.

13. The house was informed that sir Adam Blair, captain Vaughan, captain Moyle, Dr. Elliott, Dr. Grey, and several others, had dispersed a seditious and treasonable Paper, printed, and entitled A Declaration of king James the 2nd.

Mr. Hampden. Before you read the Declaration, I would not have it pass for doctrine, that there is no treason but what is declared by 25 Edw. 3. If you take not that for granted, we shall never be safe, nor any government, if you cannot declare treason. There are other ways of destroying the government than by raising armies. But it would be strange if you should not call that treason which is tantamount to treason. Read the Declaration, but let not that pass for doctrine.

Col. Birch. I did expect this, and ten times more, when a Bill from the lords lies by us about Treason. I desire one of those Declarations may be read, found upon the persons taken.

Sir Robert Clayton. I found my lord mayor at his house, examining those persons; and the people that took them took these Declarations upon them.

The Declaration was then read, as follows:

"JAMES R. Although the many calumnies and dismal stories, by which our enemies have endeavoured to render us and our government odious to the world, do now appear to have been advanced by them, not only without any ground, but against their own certain knowledge; as is evident by their not daring to attempt the proving these Charges to the world, which we cannot but hope hath opened the eyes of our good subjects to see how they have been imposed upon by designing men; who, to promote their own ambitious ends, care not what slavery they reduce our kingdoms to: yet we cannot but rejoice that we have had an opportunity to demonstrate the falseness and malice of their pretences, since our arrival in this kingdom of Ireland, by making it our chief concern to satisfy the minds of our Protestant subjects, the defence of their religion, privileges and properties, is equally our care, with the recovery of our rights. To this end, we have preferred such of them, of whose loyalty and affection we are satisfied, to places both of the highest honour and trust about our person, as well as in our army. We have, by granting our royal protection to such whose minds are shaken by the arts of our rebellious subjects, dispelled their apprehensions, and effectually secured them against the attempts of their private enemies. Our ear hath been always open to their just complaints; and so far hath our royal mercy been extended to those who were in arms against us, that we have actually pardoned several hundreds of them; and most notorious criminals are kept in an easy confinement, as they themselves acknowledge.—We have taken care that our subjects of the Church of England be not disturbed in the exercise of their religion, the possession of their benefices and other properties; and all Protestant Dissenters enjoy the liberty of their consciences, without any molestation: and out of our royal care for the prosperity of our people, we have recommended to our parliament, as the first thing necessary to be dispatched, to settle such a security and liberty, both in spiritual and temporal matters, as may put an end to these divisions, which have been the source of all our miseries; being resolved, as much as in us lies, to entail liberty and happiness upon our people, so far as to put it out of the power of our successors to invade the one, or infringe the other. And this, we take God to witness, was always our design; of which we see our good subjects here are more and more convinced, by the great numbers of those who, having been seduced or frightened by the restless importunities of our enemies, are returned to their country and habitations, and who assure us daily, more would follow, if the ports were open: but the usurpers know too well the sincerity of our intentions, to permit a free passage of our said subjects, fearing nothing more than that their experience should undeceive the rest, who are restrained more through ignorance than any ill intention; and therefore deny them that liberty which we afford to all, whose designs, we are satisfied, tend not to the disturbance of the peace.—By this our gracious and royal care of our Protestant subjects here (where the greatest part of our nation is Catholic) and have, as well as we received the highest provocation from their fellow-subjects of contrary persuasions; so that nothing but our own inclination to justice, and desire to see our people flourish, could move us to such a proceeding; we hope our subjects in England will make a judgment of what they expected from us: and we do hereby promise and declare, That nothing shall ever alter our resolutions, to pursue such and no other methods, as by our said subjects in parliament should be found proper for our common security, peace and happiness. And that none may be debarred of assisting us in recovering our rights, and redeeming our people from their present slavery, out of any apprehension from past miscarriages, we do hereby assure all our subjects, of what quality soever, let their crimes against us be never so great, that, if, in twenty days after our appearing in person in our kingdom of England, they return to their obedience, by deserting our enemies, and joining with us, we will grant them our full pardon, and all past miscarriages shall be forgot; so little do we delight in the blood or ruin of our people. But if after this our gracious condescension, they shall still continue to assist our enemies and rebels, we do, before God, charge all the blood which shall be afterwards shed, upon them and their adherents. And, we doubt not, by the blessing of God upon our arms, to force the most obstinate to their duty; though, as we have made appear in reducing our rebellious subjects in this kingdom, we desire to use no other methods than lenity and mercy.—Given at our Court in Dublin Castle, the 18th of May, 1689, in the fifth year of our reign. God save the King."

Mr. Garroway. You have now some names of persons taken with these Declarations; and when you charge any by Bill, you may add these; and I hope it will strike such a terror upon others, that you will have the effect.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You have but two Christian names. I am not of opinion to impeach men by other names than their Christian names; it may be reflection upon families of the same name, who are innocent. Order my lord mayor to send their Names and Examinations to-morrow.

Mr. Hampden. I think we are under some dispute, to vote before we know their Christian names. I would not have imputations upon persons of the same name. You may say, 'Dr. Grey to be impeached, who spread such a Declaration;' and then to-morrow, when you please, send up an Impeachment to the lords; you may pass such a Vote and describe them.

Sir Wm. Williams. A person that draws his sword against the king, by description of the person, is committed. It may fall out that you cannot know his name; therefore you may commit him by description.

Serjeant Maynard. I am against Impeachment of these persons, that they may be punished. These Papers are high treason; an Impeachment may walk long, before it comes to issue. Prosecute them by way of indictment, and then you may punish them severely and legally. Let the Judges lay it as a charge upon the Attorney and Solicitor-General, that they effectually prosecute them at common-law.

Mr. Garroway. You see many people abroad in the nation, who refuse to own the government. We cannot give too much assistance to support it. I desire this prosecution may be by Impeachment, and not by indictment, that the world may see you stand by your government.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I was of opinion, that impeachment was the best way for your justice. I am altered since, from what I have heard, viz. 'That you should bear your testimony of it.' If you send to the lords, to order the Attorney-General to prosecute, you may have speedy justice, the term now in being, three or four days in term time; indictments may be found by the grand jury, and you may have speedy trial, and speedy execution. I am afraid that these things have gone all over the nation, and I would have prosecution at the assizes all over the nation. Whereas the danger is great, so the resentments should be quick, and the like prosecution all England over.

Sir Rob. Howard. If any thing be done against the government, I would bring in the old manner of Impeachments; nothing will settle your government better.

Sir Henry Capel. This is a point of safety, and that has led the house into this of Impeachment. As for sending to the lords, to order the Attorney-General to prosecute these, have we not a king to command his officers, and judges to try them? For many reasons offered, and many more that may be, I am for impeaching.

Sir Wm. Williams. If you proceed against him in the King's-bench, he cannot be tried till next term. If he be tried in London by a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer,—I like well trial in the King's-bench, solemn in the face of the kingdom; but if he be impeached in the name of all the commons of England, it gives a dignity and honour to the king. If impeached by the commons, it is not tied to this or that county; 'tis left indefinite and not confined to the formalities of other courts.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The greatest consideration of all with me is, Whether the house of commons dare take notice of this? and men may take farther encouragement, and say, 'it seems the house of commons dare not meddle, but put it to the inferior courts;' therefore I am for Impeachment.

Serj. Maynard. I have as much zeal for the punishment of these men as any man here, and am grieved at the slowness of proceedings; but when you may do it by law—This act was done in London, in a tavern in London—It may be, he cannot be tried in eight or ten days; but here is a clear offence: when you have brought it up to the lords, the men are in their judgment, not yours. One man tried and condemned at common law, will work more upon the people than ten Impeachments. If once you make that an example, not to try without the lords, I do not know the consequence. I come here with grief of heart, to be here five months, and do nothing at all of this nature. Therefore I would not go before the lords, when the law is clear, and may be tried by juries.

Mr. Hawles. The question is, Whether you will go by impeachment, or indictment? I am for impeachment. I do not think this to be a plain case of treason, by 25 Edw. 3. I do say, no court can judge this offence to be treason; and that statute did plainly not bind the superior court of parliament, but the inferior only. Look but over the statute of 25 Edw. 3, and you will not find any words to reach this Declaration, &c. to be treason. The proper way is, to judge this high treason; and therefore I am for proceeding by Impeachment.

Resolved, "That the persons who dispersed the Declaration, viz. Dr. Elliot, capt. Vaughan, sir Adam Blair, capt. Mole, Dr. Grey, &c. be impeached of High-Treason."

Mr. Howe. Several are now in town who stand charged upon former Impeachments. I think it fit that the house give their opinion, 'That all such persons withdraw themselves from Court.' Out of my duty to my country, I shall name them, if you please, that they may be secured.

Col. Mildmay. For what they have done formerly, lest they should attempt the same again, and it be too late to remedy it, I desire you would remove them from the king and his councils.

Mr. Hawles. It was the opinion of lord chief justice Hale, 'That if the government must be subverted, it must come from Westminster-Hall.'—Fitzharris's Case and lord Russel's—Upon the business of the Charters, some went out, and others came in; but only when it came to the Dispensing Power, they could not swallow that. Whilst there are lawyers, they will be tools to do as they are bidden. The Trial of Fitzharris was one of the wickedest things, and that about lord Russel's Jury you know, and the giving new Charters to have voted a parliament after their mind. You have been well moved to know who were the privy-council at that time.

Sir Wm. Williams. It is not the cards, nor the dice, they are but the tools; it is the hand that cheats you. I have gone post often, and have found a good horse under me, but he would go no farther than his stage. You ought to go to the fountain, the great Council, in the Declaration, and they will betray one another: we must go to the visible Council; the committee of Trade, the Cabinet-Council. The first thing done was the Trial of Fitzharris, but they would not destroy the City-Charter then; the post-horse failed them—He did afterwards destroy the Charter, and break that, but was not so profligate as to break all the laws. Charge them, and they will accuse one another.

Mr. Garroway. I think, we are not going the right way. When the Judges shall be here, ask them any question you think fit. I have seen lord chief justice Keeling sent for hither, about calling 'Magna Charta,' 'Magna Farta.' They will tell you who did it.

The Speaker. Such as have been Judges you may send for by warrant? but to such as are attendants on the lords you send only an intimation, lest exceptions should be taken by the lords.

Mr. Hampden, jun. These Judges laid it down for doctrine, 'That there was no Treason but against the person of the king; the king therefore might pardon him.' But there is a treason against the realm, which the king cannot pardon; the king cannot be without a realm. You have it in parliament declared, 'That an Impeachment continues from parliament to parliament:' will you suffer the Popish Lords to go about under your impeachment, and not be prosecuted? I move, that you will appoint a Committee, to enquire by whose authority those lords were delivered out of the Tower, illegally; and send to the lords to commit them.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The question is, for sending for the Judges. Garroway has put you in the way. For method's sake, divide the question; one by way of Order to appear, and the other by way of Desire to appear.

Mr. Garroway. One formerly informed against one of your members (sir Rd. Temple) for being an undertaker to carry on a business with lord Bristol.* The house sent to lord Bristol, by Mr. Vaughan, to know whether his lordship said any such words to the king. Lord Bristol prayed, 'that he might come into the house to give an account of it, because he might speak his own words.' He came, and gave others little satisfaction abroad, and us as little here; and I do not doubt but the Judges will give you the same satisfaction.

Mr. Leveson Gower names Mr. Justice Dolben, Mr. Justice Gregory, Mr. Baron Neville, and Mr. Justice Powell, to be sent for to come to the house.

Sir Wm. Williams, names sir Francis Pemberton, sir Creswell Levens, sir Thomas Jones, Mr. Serjeant Montagu, sir Francis Wythens, also, sir Rd. Holloway, to know who gave the Instructions to the Judges, &c.

Mr. Howe. I know not how to take notice of the Cabinet-Council, nor what it means; I know not whether it be a lawful council; I know not whether it be a crime to be a cabinet-counsellor: but I would desire the king to deliver us from those that were Counsellors then, that we may be troubled with them no more.

The above Judges, and others, were then ordered, or desired, to attend the house tomorrow.

The Judges examined touching the Dispensing Power, &c.] June 14. The Judges, &c. as above-mentioned attended, according to order. Lord Chief Baron Atkins, Mr. Justice Dolben, Mr. Baron Neville, Mr. Justice Powell, and Mr. Justice Gregory, were severally called in.

The Speaker. My Lord Chief Baron, the occasion of the intimation the house gave you of their desire, &c. is to be informed of some things. They would know, why, in Ch. 2's time, you were turned out of your Judge's place?

Lord Chief Baron Atkins. "I suppose there were several reasons. There was a great Cause depending betwixt sir Samuel Barnardiston and Mr. Soames. The cause was of great expectation and consequence in the King's-bench. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, Barnardiston. After that, Soames brought a writ of error. Eight Judges argued, (there was a great appearance) and Ellis and myself argued to affirm the Judgment; others, to reverse it; which, I suppose, was not acceptable to some great persons then. There were other things objected against us. In the circuit, I declared against Pensions to parliament-men, and there was great complaint against me. I went the Oxford circuit with Scroggs, where Scroggs called Bedlow 'a perjured person.' I told him, he had passed Judgment upon his Evidence. There was a Petition from my lord mayor, &c. for the sitting of Parliament. I was willing to avoid all occasion of discoursing with Scroggs. He said,

* See vol. iv. p. 269.

'That Petition was high-treason.' At last, I affirmed, 'That the people might petition the king; so that it was done without tumult, it was lawful;' and of this he sent word to the court. But what filled up the measure was about the king's Power, 'Whether he might not prevent printing and publishing, &c. by Proclamation.' I said, 'It was most proper for a parliament—If the king would do the work of a parliament, we were like to be without a parliament.' I said, 'In case the people do represent things by false news, they may be met with, and punished.' I advised against the opinion. There was another lay heavy upon me (lord chief justice North) and it was about selling Offices. I found they were discontented at me, and I impute it to the two Chief Justices."—He then withdrew.

Mr. Garroway. I would not travel now into the business of Pensions; that may be hereafter; but I would principally drive at the discovery of those who advised the Dispensing Power. This, he has told you, was as to other cases.

Mr. Howe. All these Pensions were for the advantage and interest of France; if they had not been supported by France, they could never have brought us to this. It was the beginning of our woes; and now especially, when we have a war with France, I would have those who corresponded with France excepted.

Sir John Lowther. Such a question is irregular; 'the Dispensing with the laws' is the proper question.

Mr. Hawles. We are not tied up to one head, to enquire of a Witness. The lord chief baron can give you no account of the Dispensing Power; he was turned out long before that came in question. It is proper to ask him any Question before you.

He was called in again.

The Speaker. The matter of the Petitions was objected against your lordship. The house would know who said it to you?

Lord Chief Baron Atkins. "I did drop that word to give you occasion for your question. Lord Clifford took occasion to tell me what favour the king had conferred upon me; 'that I had attended diligently in parliament, and was taken from my profession, therefore the king had thought fit to send me 500*l*.' I replied, 'I thank you; I will not accept any thing for my attendance in parliament.' Sir Stephen Fox asked me, 'why I would not send for my money? I have a good sum lies by me for you.' I did take occasion upon this, to advise my countrymen, 'that those who took Pensions were not fit to be sent up to parliament again;' and I never went farther in it than I have told you."

Mr. Fox.* I find a reflection upon sir

Stephen Fox. I would know what time this was?

Mr. Smith. I think there is no reflection upon sir Stephen. I remember there were members sent for sir Stephen Fox's Books, to know who had Pensions† He was so ingenious as to tell you upon his memory who they were, and there is no need to send for him.

The Speaker. Mr. Justice Dolben, the house has sent for you to enquire why you was discharged so suddenly from your place in the King's-bench.

Mr. Justice Dolben. "It is now seven years since, and I cannot certainly tell; but I think it was for giving my Judgment for the king in the Quo Warranto, brought against the City of London. Several came to me, I know not from whom sent, or whether they came out of curiosity, to discourse with me, as I thought, about the Quo Warranto, &c. I must confess, one came to me (he was my friend) I think he said, Mr. Secretary Jenkinson was the occasion of his coming; he asked my opinion about it. He found me at my house at Hampstead, my Papers were before me considering the case. He told me, 'it was far from him to persuade me, but, whatever comes of it, to follow my conscience. If you are for the king, you must stay in. If not, you must be turned out.' I gave my opinion, and was discharged the next day. The docket was sealed on Friday, and I was discharged the Tuesday after."

Sir Wm. Williams. It is a common thing, not to come to a man to corrupt him plainly, but to bid him use a conscience. I am not afraid of the dead, but of the living; I am afraid of those alive. When that man is named, I shall know how near the king he was and what office and place he bore in the ministry.

Mr. Garroway. I would not have you go farther than what he declared to you, but you see plainly a practice upon them that would not do their business.

Sir Robert Howard. I am against asking him any more questions. I see we shall find none but dead men. I wish they would tell us no more stories of the dead: I see they must bear all.

The Speaker. Mr. Baron Neville, the house would know how you were placed in the Exchequer, and how you came to be discharged?

Mr. Baron Neville. "I shall acquaint you with what I think was the reason. I was sent for by king James to Whitehall the last Michaelmas term. I attended at Mr. Chiffins's chambers. After I stayed awhile, king James came to me for my Opinion in some points, in a Paper he had in his hand; it was about the Dispensing Power of the penal laws. I said, 'I doubted, his majesty could not dispense with those laws; but I could not give my opi-

Revenue in Ireland, and was likewise Treasurer to Catherine Queen Dowager. He died in 1713.

† See vol. iv. p. 1141.

* Son of sir Stephen Fox, and Paymaster General of the forces in the reigns of king Charles, king James, and queen Anne. In the reign of king William he was Vice-Treasurer, and Receiver General, and Paymaster of the nion suddenly; upon reading the paper, I would consider farther.' A little while after, chancellor Jeffreys was sent by the king to know my opinion. I said, 'I gave the king my sudden thoughts, but I would farther consider of it.' A week after, when I had considered more of it, I waited again, &c. and gave my positive Opinion, 'that the king could not dispense, &c.' I sat quiet after this, for some time; and before the circuit I was sent for to the same place; where was Mr. Justice Streete. He was the senior Judge; he gave his opinion, and I mine. The chancellor made a long discourse, and disapproved our reasons, as the king had done. So I was dismissed, and my commission not sealed till two days before the circuit. I took my leave of the king, and had my direction after the usual manner. I went with Mr. Justice Holloway, where were the king, the chancellor, lords Sunderland, Rochester, and Godolphin. The king asked Opinions: Holloway gave the same opinion with me. The chancellor disapproved the opinion—I was dismissed again. Monday before the term, I was sent for to the chancellor's house, who told me, 'If I persisted in my opinion, I must expect to be discharged.' I said, I must persist, for I had no reason to alter it, and would submit to the king's pleasure.' About seven or eight days after, I had my Quittus; and was told, that Mr. Harris brought it."

Mr. Smith. You have had a fair account from this gentleman. I would have one question asked him, 'Whether any body else was with the king the first time?'

Mr. Howe. I desire you would ask him, 'Who more were there the first time, and whether they concerned themselves in this matter?'

Mr. Foley. I desire that he and all the others may be asked, 'Whether the king did not ask him, whether he might grant out commissions of martial law, or raise money without parliament?'

The Speaker. Was any other question asked you than that of the Dispensing Power?

Mr. Baron Neville. "There were more questions asked, but all tending to the Test-Act. There was no signing at all of a Paper proffered me to sign, and I know not who drew it. I read it, and returned it. The first time I came, there was no body but the king himself. The second time there was the chancellor, &c. (as before.) If the lords then present said any thing, they discoursed with one another. The chancellor managed the whole thing."

The Speaker then addressed himself to Mr. Justice Powell, as before.

Mr. Justice Powell. "I was turned out suddenly. I know not perfectly, the reason, but I suppose it was about my Opinion of the Dispensing Power. Another, I suppose, was upon giving my Judgment about several Quo Warranto's, where the borough chose members of parliament by prescription; but I know not certainly. I remember not any person that discoursed with me. I was sent for to the king, (as before) I asked the messenger, who else was sent for? He told me 'several others of the King's-bench.' The king said, 'he hoped all the Judges would be of the same opinion.' (A Quo Warranto was brought especially against Marlborough.) I happened to be of a contrary opinion, and that I take to be the occasion of sending for me. There was lord chief justice Wright, Alibone, Holloway, and myself there. My opinion at the King's-bench was not pleasant. And, I guess, these were the reasons why I was removed. I cannot recollect any time I was sent to before. There were present chancellor Jeffreys, the Attorney-General Powis, the Solicitor-General Williams, and sir Samuel Astrey. I think no lord was present but Jeffreys. The late king spoke to induce the Opinion. The Chancellor enlarged upon it, and after he had commented upon it, some ordinary matters were discoursed. I remember nothing relating to the law. A quarter of a year before, I was sent for by the chancellor to take my Opinion, whether a borough, for a misdemeanor, did not forfeit their right of election of parliament-men? And whether such as had no residence in the borough, and were foreign burgesses, had right of election? The Chancellor would know the Judges Opinion. I delivered my opinion, 'That there was no such power in Westminster-hall to question any such thing. I thought that power was only in the honourable house of commons.' At which the king seemed satisfied. When I came home, I searched my books, and some authorities. Justice Lutwich was abroad then, but did seem to be of the same opinion, 'That it was not proper for Westminster-hall.' I conceived that the misdemeanors of corporations, &c. were pardoned by the Act of Indemnity. I cannot call to mind that I had discourse with any man, but the late chief justice, who asked me, what my Opinion was? I answered, 'When the matter came before me, I should give it on the bench.' The first news I heard of my discharge was from my lord chancellor, who (at his house) very kindly told me, 'he was sorry for it, but would not send my patent of revocation till the last day of the term.' And I sat out the whole term."

Mr. Justice Gregory. "I did continue baron of the exchequer till Michaelmas term, 1685. The king came with a Paper in his hand (as before,) &c. I gave my Opinion against the Dispensing Power."

Sir Thomas Jones. "I was removed for my Opinion of the Dispensing Power, &c."

Sir Francis Pemberton. "I was removed out of my place, without visible reason, the first time; neither do I know the reason of my being removed from the King's-bench to the Common Pleas. I was never sent for to Whitehall, nor to my lord chancellor's. I was willing to remove. The night before, my lord said nothing to me, but the next morning I had a Supersedeas."

Mr. Serjeant Montagu. "I was removed for giving my Opinion against the Dispensing Power, &c." (as before.)

Mr. Serjeant Levens. "I thought my discharge was because I would not give Judgment upon the soldier who deserted his colours, and for being against the Dispensing Power."

Mr. Serjeant Wythens. "I suppose the reason of my discharge was for refusing to give sentence on the soldier," (as before.)

Mr. Serjeant Holloway. I suppose my removal to be because I did declare 'That the Bishops Petition was not a seditious libel;' and 'that the Dispensation was illegal.'—They then withdrew.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Having heard all this from the Judges, I desire we may not rise without some opinion of the whole of this strange dealing.

Mr. Garroway. That will not do your work. Jones told you, &c. 'he must give his Opinion; the king must have all the Judges of a mind.' When the whole thing is before you, then you will see who came in their places that were turned out, and make use of their evidence to punish the rest who were of another opinion.

Col. Birch. This will be odd to posterity, if it appear not upon your Books for what you sent for these persons. I would know who were of the Council at dissolving the Oxford Parliament (and who of the Cabinet, if possible), when Papers were to have been put into Protestant pockets, to have them knocked on the head. I would have them particularly examined, what they know of the Declaration that was pinned at our backs after the Oxford Parliament.

Sir John Lowther. What a multitude of persons will this of delivering up Charters involve the nation in! We have now a war with France, and king James is in Ireland. I wish you would forbear this, or adjourn it, till the house be in better temper. If the clerks of the Council give you imperfect answers, you will alarm those who are under the shelter of the government, when they expect an Indemnity. I therefore move you to adjourn the debate.—Adjourned.

Report of Mrs. Fitz-harris's Case.] June 15. Sir R. Nappier reported from the committee appointed to inspect the Case of Mrs. Fitzharris, "That the said Mrs. Fitzharris had a pension of 200*l.* per ann. for 15 years allowed her, on account of her father (who was commander of the York frigate), his being killed in the public service; that this pension was constantly paid her till the year 1681, when it was stopt because she would not persuade her husband to lay a Popish Plot on the Protestants; over and above which, she was threatened to be imprisoned on the same account. One John Lunn, likewise, affirmeth, that he was an instrument of conveying Mrs. Fitzharris away, and was therefore sent for to Windsor; where being brought before the late lord Conway, the said lord first threatened him, and then offered him, the said Lunn, 5000*l.* to deliver up the said Mrs. Fitzharris, which he refused. It further appeared on the evidence of one Mr. Harrington, that the said Mrs. Fitzharris was instrumental in delivering the earl of Shaftsbury, the earl of Bedford, and some other lords, and divers members of the house of commons (some of which have acknowledged the same), from a design of putting treasonable Papers in their pockets. That she advertised several persons of the villainous project against them, and was the only person (under God) which prevented its taking place; by persuading her husband to desist from the villainous attempt, though he had already received 200*l.* as an earnest of the late king (which said 200*l.* she remembers her husband brought home in a hand-basket), and though she lost the Pension which she hopes to be restored to, and that this honourable house will recommend her and her three children to the present king as objects of charity."—Which the house agreed to, and ordered her to be recommended accordingly.

Address of the Commons relating to the Irish Protestants.] The same day, the commons agreed to the Address relating to the Irish Protestants, which was as follows:

"We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, &c. having taken into our serious consideration, the many great sufferings of the Protestant nobility and gentry of Ireland, which their zeal for the Protestant Religion, your majesty's service, the interest of England in that kingdom, and love to our nation, have exposed them to, &c. being the only body of Protestants ruined by the late happy Revolution, which hath wrought so great a deliverance, &c. most heartily crave leave, in their behalf, to offer their deplorable condition to your majesty's most princely consideration.—And whereas, by reason of their numbers, they are very apprehensive of their being and continuing a burthen to this kingdom while they remain in such condition unemployed, and that many of them, for their interest in, and knowledge of that kingdom, as well as their experience, &c. in military affairs, being well-qualified to serve under your majesty for the reducing thereof, and all of them pressing and forward for that service, &c. 1. We humbly recommend such of the said nobility and gentry as are fit for military employments, as very proper persons for reducing that kingdom to its due obedience to the crown. 2. That such as are not fit for the field may be put into such civil employments, as they are most capable of. 3. That for their present subsistence, we humbly pray that the sum of 15,000*l.* may be forthwith distributed among them. And that for a further and standing Fund for their subsistence until Ireland shall be reduced, your maj. will be graciously pleased to issue forth your royal proclamation requiring all Papists beyond seas, who have estates in England, and all Protestants that are in arms, or otherwise engaged against your majesty, if any such there be, to return within a certain time; and that the estates of such as shall not give obedience thereunto, be seized into your majesty's hands for the relief of the said nobility and gentry, who are, or shall be deprived of their estates there.—And we the rather make this our humble supplication, to your majesties, because we esteem ourselves obliged to afford them present relief and to represent the speedy recovery of that kingdom, of great importance to this in all respects, as your majesties, and the nation's true interest.—And we do humbly beseech your majesties to take the duke of Ormond, and his great merits and sufferings into your particular and royal consideration, and that your majesties would be pleased also to consider of the rest of the nobility and gentry, already fled, and daily coming up from Ireland, that remain unprovided for.—And that your majesties favour and bounty to the said nobility and gentry may be distributed with the greater ease and advantage, we do humbly recommend to your majesties, that what you shall be graciously pleased to advance for their present supply, you will be pleased to order the same to be paid into the Chamber of London, or such other place as your majesties shall think convenient, with as much expedition as the urgency of your affairs will admit; to be thence paid out for them respectively, with as little charge and trouble of attendance as may be."

Further Debate on the Heads for the Bill of Indemnity.] Mr. Ettrick. The house seems inclinable for their convenience to go into the country. It has been proposed, for method, to go upon Heads, and to name persons obvious and notorious, on several heads. You have been told 'that it is necessary to go to the fountain and spring head.' In Ch. 2.'s time we were afraid of a Popish Successor; that was the spring; and lately we have had a Popish king. You have now a Protestant king, and I hope will destroy Popery and Rome. The prospect of the duke of York to be king put men upon a compliance with arbitrary government, and to close with Popery. That now ceases, and so I hope we need not go about to remove counsellors, pensioners, and officers. I thank God, there is no danger of the French king's influence; he has his hands full. Ireland and Scotland are not yet reduced. Under these considerations it is necessary that we unite all here, I hope, against the public enemy, the Papist; but I hear no talk of them, they wipe their mouths. But then, as Solomon says, 'it is wisdom to pass by an offence.' Persons that have made an atonement by their present services, I hope you will bury all in oblivion. The Chancellor was the tool of Popery. I hear no mention made of lord Sunderland, though it be treason to reconcile to the Romish Church*; and hearing nothing of Popery, I remind you of it only to look upon the great instrument of introducing Popery and arbitrary government.

Sir Robert Cotton. What does seem visible to us is the Judgment in the King's-bench in sir Edward Hales's Case. I would put the question upon these Judges. I think no way so proper.

Sir John Lowther. You are hardly ripe for that question yet; that Judgment has two parts; one was ecclesiastical, in the case of the Bishops; the other civil, in sir Edward's case. If you please, let all the Judges be named, and you will be ripe for that matter.

Mr. Machell. That is beginning at the wrong end: shall we let the Chancellor go off? pray begin with him.

Mr. Hawles. If a man were beyond sea, there is a proclamation to render himself by a day. 'Tis an irregular thing to say, that man that is dead should be excepted, when you may bring an attainder against him.

Serj. Wogan. You may exempt him, as you did persons in the former Act of Indemnity. He has a son and a lady left, and there are settlements upon them. For the man I cannot say any thing, but you may except him as formerly.

Mr. Sacheverell. I see some gentlemen in the house think nothing can be excepted, but what is at this time; but they may be in your Bill, and what exceptions else you please. I stand up, not out of respect to Jeffreys. Never let a minister of state leave to posterity what he has raised by his iniquity. It should be always to the use and benefit of the public, and his family be never the better for it; and when you come to the Indemnity, I shall move you to appropriate their estates to the public. He that will venture upon the life of his sovereign (which is the case)—If not, you will never discourage a man from being a rogue to his country. Let this, therefore, alone to the Bill of Attainder, and let it be forfeited to the public. I cannot let a man go away with an estate he has got with ruin to England.

Sir W. Williams. That was a wise law of Henry 8. to forfeit estates for treason: before that law, estates were not forfeitable. By the provision of that statute, the children were to lose their estate for the iniquity of their parents.

Mr. Hawles. Now we are in the right way. 'Tis reasonable to declare that those men that have got honour by doing ill may be degraded. I would have them refund what they have got by the Charters of Corporations. I believe, if you will go this way, you will do right to the public. Those whom they have despoiled ought first to be restored. I would go first upon persons living, for I believe they have done us most injury.

* See Appendix No. III. "The Earl of Sunderland made the step to Popery all of a sudden, without any previous instruction or conference. So that the change he made looked too like a man, who, having no religion, took up one, rather to serve a turn, than that he was truly changed from one religion to another." Burnet.

Mr. Howe. If you go about to degrade those who have new honour, I know not how you will come by them: some have great estates and titles, and nobody knows why. And Bishops, nobody knows how they came to be so, or how they deserved it. Let us not, like Falstaff, fight with dead men: let us punish the living; the dead will stay for us.

Mr. Harbord. I have heard it said, that punishment is much better than laws, of which we have enough. Here are Papists now in town; they will not stir. 'Tis said by some, 'tis because of foreign alliances; but we must think of home dangers, else they will affront you to your face. As for the Judges, it is said eleven consented. For present example, confine them to a little number. The head Justice was hanged at Tyburn in Rd. 2.'s time.* I wonder not they are so ill men, for no others would serve them. I move that two of them may be hanged at Westminster-hall gate.

Mr. Brewer. I believe, it is not for the honour of the house to proceed upon the Judges. Have you any witnesses out of the King's-bench, or any thing under their hands, any Judgment in Westminster-hall? Common fame is a good interpreter, but no good judge. I would proceed upon the Judges who gave judgment in the Dispensing Power.

Serj. Wogan. I was with that Judge (Holloway) who is said to have come over to the Opinion of the rest, on the Dispensing Power. He declared against it, and was going to print his Vindication, and denied that he gave any such opinion. I have known him these 25 years. I dissuaded him from printing, &c. for it would be looked upon as a libel, and he and his family be undone. But he declared he would take the first opportunity to do it, and immediately he did at the Trial of the Bishops. I do not know that he was ever of that opinion, but there were ten of the Judges of that opinion.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I would be tender in reflecting upon any man, but that judge sat two years and a half under that imputation of Opinion. Powell delivered his opinion for him, and to this day he never acknowledged it. He will take the sacrament upon it, that he never gave his opinion for it; he hath solemnly declared that he had his Quietus upon it, and offers it still. Streete, who gave his Opinion, did declare that Holloway had wronged him.

Mr. Hawles. When a judge of a court delivers an Opinion of a judge absent, the next time he sits, if he does not disown it, he confirms the report. It is an usual thing to deliver an absent judge's Opinion, but very improper. I have known when a judge has been misrepresented in his Judgment, he has denied it in court.

Sir Wm. Williams. Here was the case. The Opinion was delivered in the King's-Bench. Powell was not a judge of that court, but of the Common-Pleas. He had no opportunity then to contradict this, but did it at his first opportunity.

Sir John Lowther. I am very indifferent whether this be true or false, but what I look into is, who were most notorious, those who gave the Opinion in the King's-bench, and then sat in the ecclesiastical court, or those Bishops who sat—and all concerned in Magdalen College. You must exempt the most notorious out of the Indemnity, who persevered to the last.

Mr. Ettrick. Powell was not then a Justice of the King's-bench. The question is, whether he was there, and whether he gave any opinion? They were at lord chief justice Herbert's chamber, and Powell said, 'It was a new thing, and he could not suddenly give his Judgment.' They would give judgment on Monday, and not upon surprize. Holloway resolved to vindicate himself in print, but as soon as he was removed into the King's-bench, and had an opportunity, he gave his Judgment; and Wright said, 'You always, brother, have been of that opinion.' Powell is a man of too much learning and honesty to be of that opinion.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I would know why, to this day, he would never say to his brother Holloway he had done him wrong.

Sir Robert Howard. I think we are not at all travelling towards the Indemnity. We are told hearsays of Powell and Holloway. Pray put the question upon those who gave the Opinion in sir Edw. Hales's Case. I cannot but be a little surprized when the use was for the king to dispense these laws, and by consequence all laws; and that in the case of the Bishops they should bind—I hope these extraordinary Opinions may be condemned. The fault was, saying what opinion they were of. If Holloway had been a judge for life, possibly he would not have been of that opinion. I hope this may be prevented for the future.

Mr. Howe. Which is the greater crime; they that went a fishing for a knave to do it, or the poor knave that did it? Was there no property in England till Magdalen College? Nor any liberty till the Bishops were sent to the Tower? It will be impossible to find them out. Rather adjourn the debate, or give a general Act of Oblivion to all, for the greatest part of England were criminal.

Mr. Hawles. I have heard that Judges patents were formerly, 'Quamdiu se bene gesserint,' and if you do not punish the 'Bene placito' men, you will confirm those of 'Quamdiu,' &c. to do as those before them. The last Grievance was that of Magdalen College, and those turned out, got by it. If I were to begin, I would at the first head; that is, the Oxford Parliament. We know that sir Edw. Hales's Case was a moot, a feigned case. Wright is dead, and Herbert fled; some were frightened, and some cared not what they did a rush; but the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General are men of estates; let us know who was the attorney and solicitor-general then; let us know at that time who passed that patent, and then you have a criminal before you.

* See vol. i. p. 209.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. When you will exercise your justice, I would not do it till the greatest criminals are named. You have been told of taking away Charters of Corporations: consider what a great number will be involved on that head, and how safe the government will be when so many are unsafe under it. The Regulators, which happened after the surrenders, that comes under that Head. When offences come to be general, there is no way but to cover them all by a general act of parliament; for these reasons, when you look into the Revolution, all sorts of persons have contributed to it; and people will rather upon severity cover past faults with greater, than be reformed.

Sir John Lowther. In conversation, through frailty, we both give and take offence. No man here but may have his revenges, and some upon me: I am willing to forgive, I desire to be forgiven by all the world. We have got the government settled: I would punish for the future, and pardon all that is past.

Mr. Smith. I should heartily concur to the motion, if it would give content to the people. If we name not some persons, we must allow their offences. I speak for the justice of the nation. Those who have got estates by our misfortunes, will get into the government, and you go about to qualify them for it. I must say, if you respect not the king's Declaration, nor the justice of the nation, I cannot agree.

Mr. Hawles. I never heard of a general Act of Indemnity. Will you except robberies, murders, and let these men run away? If you go about to please those who have offended, you will anger twenty more that are injured; though I am not for blood. Was not the attainder of Cornish illegal, by the express evidence of Rumsey, who was not there, when he swore he was? And the whole Trial of lord Russel was illegal, and as bad; and col. Sidney's as bad as that. I have had no injury done to me, nor any of my relations have suffered; but if you do not justice to them without doors, we shall not sit long here.

Mr. Papillon. I think you have read but one Head, and then, certainly, it is very improper to go upon a general Indemnity. I am not for revenge, but to vindicate the nation. We are to vindicate the Protestant religion. The Papists would turn all upon you, and you have an opportunity to vindicate England. The parliament has been abused, and papers pinned at our backs, upon a dissolution; and now we are told, 'you do nothing to vindicate yourselves by punishing some offenders.' When you come to particular persons, let every man do what he pleases, but I see men justify what they have done. The Popish Plot was laid aside, and laid on the Protestants. Pray vindicate the justice of the nation.

Sir Robt. Cotton. If crimes have been epidemical, and you cannot distinguish men, it may be of ill consequence. Those who acted in Westminster-Hall, were set on by greater persons, and those are fitter for our justice. Mercy becomes this house, and I never knew but persons must be eminently distinguished, and you will find some have their crimes alleviated, and so all are equally criminal; but if you cannot distinguish, and it is so general and epidemical, let us be impartial, and pardon all.

Mr. Boscawen. If you do not condemn others, you condemn yourselves, and take all upon yourselves. I have met with an act of the Irish parliament, on the other side the water, that has attainted many. You ought to be careful, now the present government is called in question. If you pardon before and after, what will the world say? The Papists will be confirmed in all they have done. If you make a general sweep-stakes, you make all the world believe you are wrong.

Sir Robt. Howard. I have seen great revolutions (at least seemingly) in opinion, in this house. In your Vote some persons were to be excepted by name. I see some are inclined to a general Indemnity, and this is one revolution of opinion that has been here. As the nature of the thing stands, when I had seen an Act of Indemnity, I did suppose that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and those concerned in Charters, would have been named. If you would not have thought them crimes, you would sure have put a clause of indemnity for yourselves, and you were punishable, if you had not thought that you had not done very well. When you have enumerated all offences, to excuse yourselves, you must have excused yourselves.—And let all the world see they are not so great as you have believed them—I am sure our judgments are shaken, and pray God send nothing else be shaken, amongst the people! They may say, the good house of commons have seen something too great, something too deep for them. Had this been said at first, it might have gone some way with me; but now you have gone thus far, and on the sudden changed your minds. You have excepted a lord that changed his religion (Sunderland,) and went an Embassy to Rome (Castlemain) and all that Jeffreys has done. The time of the day wastes, and, it seems, our thoughts waste, therefore I would adjourn the debate.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think, by the Vote you have made, it does not hinder a general Indemnity. I think it for your service to pass that Act, as great a satisfaction as any thing that has been done since the settling the crown. I would rather err in mercy than on the other hand.

Mr. Sacheverell. For my part, I wonder at this debate, and more at Musgrave to put it so largely. I am as much inclinable to mercy as any body; but as for the Judges that have so violated your laws, what will that come to in time to come? What sit you here for? I cannot sit patiently at this. I am for equal justice to all; but he that gives his opinion that the laws may be suspended, I give my opinion against him. Are we to pass by all these, to be established in corporations, and capacitating these Judges to do the same thing again, the same crimes? The king has given his sanction. He is inclined to mercy; but for Fines, I would never forgive them; I would not except one Judge, but as they have offended singly, as they merit, one by one. When the law has been perverted, and religion violated, I would never forgive them.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I am unfortunate that it is my right to speak, and I cannot obtain your eye. I stand up only for the service of the house. When I considered the motion, the charity, the safety, when I considered the authority of so considerable a person as Lowther, so far from the intention of the inferences made, I ought to suspect no person, much less that honourable person. It was far from his intention to invade any thing by interfering. For these crimes I wish examples were made, and am so far from palliating them, that I would stamp a mark of your indignation upon those who advised king James. I confess, I am for a general Pardon; it has a charm in it to me. All England hopes for it, or else farewell all safety of liberty or religion! I do intend nothing to be pardoned of crimes since you sat. There spoke of an ambassador sent to Rome by king James; could Lowther, or I, be thought to justify that, or to pardon the Popish party, who have been the first spring and motion of all this? The Jesuits set on the Papists, and I will go farther in this than your Heads. I am still for a general Pardon, but still for Protestants only. I go not about to pardon, nor justify, the Chancellor, who was worse than a Papist, that professed himself a Protestant. I beg persons may be excepted, but very few; the king has recommended it to you; follow his steps, in his wisdom and charity. There is not a spirit of revenge in Protestants, like Papists. I move you for an Indemnity, with all ordinary limitations and extraordinary limitations—Papists excepted.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I suppose this place gives liberty of speech; it is the honour of the house, and the liberty of the nation. Will you lay aside all these Heads at once, and sit all this while, and say that nothing shall be done upon them? Is not this to seem light and unadvised? I have expressed my tenderness; I have suffered, yet I can forget and forgive as much as may be, for the safety of the nation. Blood no mortal man can forgive; nobody but God can forgive; you only leave a latitude to judge whether it is wilful. I will wash my hands of the innocent blood that has been shed in the nation. We take off Attainders from those that suffered by these ill men: were they guilty or innocent? If guilty, you have done ill to pass it; if innocent, you cannot pass it by. If the nation will take that blood upon them—If I forgive this, God will not forgive me. The whole nation was of opinion, that the not punishing the baseness of Ship-Money was the occasion of the great mischiefs that followed.

VOL. V.

Mr. Hawles. The first question was, Whether you will name persons, and now I hear of a general Indemnity. When others break your laws, they may hope for indemnity for what they shall do for the future. I am not concerned with friendship, or anger, of any man, but I am not for 'crudelis clementia.' Charles 1. had as learned lawyers as ever sat, and yet they did as irregular things. For the Ship-Money, had those Judges been punished, they durst not now have done it. The Case of Magdalen College is but a trifle to what they have done in other things.

Sir John Lowther. I hope nobody thinks I would excuse shedding innocent blood; but I believe there is a sort of skill that, when a thing is not liked, it may be easily clogged with what was not intended. I would have the Exceptions read, and because iniquity grows with times and ages, I would have some added.

Sir Henry Capel. I do not think that Lowther has any intention to countenance blood, or the destruction of government; but a general Act of Indemnity surprizes me; and yet some persons should be under Exceptions. For two or three reigns have we not had warning that the government would be destroyed in Westminster-hall? We have had learned judges and ignorant, and yet all have conspired our ruin. Punishment is hard, and I am tender, yet if the government requires it, it is incumbent upon us. The government is executive in the king, when we are gone; he is a good king, yet we may have one with corrupt Judges. Westminster-hall has been the undoing of us all, and those two things must rest upon them. We are told, 'the Jesuits have infused mischievous designs into the Papists; but it has been our misfortune, that Protestants have joined hand in hand against us. Upon the whole, I would not adjourn the debate; it is against the honour of the house to do nothing before you rise. I would name them all four.

Sir Rd. Temple. The question this morning was about these four Judges, but the Exception was but to two of them. If I can be instrumental to serve the house, I would willingly. You say in your Vote, 'that some may be excepted from pardon,' but if you previously resolve how many for life, or other exception, this is your only method, to what degree for lives, or other disabilities of bearing office; propose some Resolution to limit this, so as not to give too much latitude, nor too great alarm.

Sir Tho. Lee. You began with two of the Judges, and then you came to all; at last, to an universal proposition; but I suppose it was intended to all common crimes, as rapes, &c. usually excepted. But as to the universal offence of subverting the government, the consequence is, number enough is security enough. All these Judges will become practisers, and their party will be their clients, and so get more money than they did before. I have heard of Persons, who for being of the king's Counsel have lost money by it. It would be a pretty sight for the bishop of Durham [lord Crewe] to come to his diocese. When you have named a person, the law tells you his punishment. Here lies the difficulty with me, a necessity that so many offenders should be at ease, and not necessary that a great many should be punished, though necessary that some should. If limited to four or five, say those are the persons fit to be marked and punished. If it be a general Indemnity, with few to be excepted, it is the happiest question that ever was put.

Y

Sir John Lowther. It has been moved with great caution. If you please to nominate a small number to be excepted, it is a prudent, good, and honest motion.

Sir Robert Howard. Of all the questions I have heard to-day, this last proposed is the strongest. It is impossible to lump this at a venture. So many for blood; how if you take too many! If you judge a man for estate, you are bound up, and I find you would not involve it. The most indeterminable thing in the world! Judge the man, and proportion his crimes. I do not speak to chill the charity of any body. The proper question is, Whether you will proceed upon the Judges of the King's-bench? King James has abdicated the crown, and if we lump them in, who have helped to lump him out, you say king William has done all the wrong, and they none.

Sir Ch. Raleigh. If this must pass off so, for God's sake let us send for king James again.

Exception was taken at Raleigh's words.

Sir John Lowther. I cannot see how any such imputation can be upon what he has said.

Sir Tho. Lee. You are right in order of explaining. I would not have words written down; it is a great injury to the gentleman if written down. I hope the gentleman will so explain himself, that it needs not.

Sir Ch. Raleigh. What I spoke was ironical only, if we proceed to punish the lesser, and let the greater pass.

Sir Robert Rich. I never apprehended the gentleman willing to bring in king James; but to pass by all bloodshed and violation of our laws, is the way to bring in king James.

Sir Walter Yonge. If you are sure there has been no innocent blood shed, I would not concern myself. This may perhaps fall upon few, whether five or seven, I care not how few, but blood has been spilt. I move for a general question for life; for some have been concerned out of the King's-bench as well as there.

Sir John Thompson. I would ask one question, Is any man guilty of blood? And will you exempt them? Will you think it honourable to stand upon your Book, that you except any man for blood; but let that take the last place?

Sir Robert Rich. I bear malice to no man, none of these offended me. The crime of dispensing with the law is great. Nothing washes away blood but blood; but when you have restored blood, I would have them excepted, as for life; the rest not excepted for life.

Mr. Eltrick. I see not that, by any law, you can take away a man's life; for blood, and for murder, you will except that, but else I cannot give my consent to take away life.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would have the long robe declare, Whether these offences extend to any man's life. Therefore I lay the consideration when the person you would except—If at the king's suit, he is answerable, the king may prosecute him, and he has not the Act of Indemnity to plead for him—If the crime is not so, you need not put in that word of 'Exception for Life.'

Sir Wm. Williams. There were Judges who did act, by virtue of that dispensation, as judges. For those to sit and try men for their lives, that were not judges, I should make no difficulty in them. Wright and Alibone are dead. It is a case worthy consideration, when a man has no power, and ceases to be a Judge. Let that be your rule, as to this Exception.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I speak to your question, not the debate. I am sorry the question is brought to this. I am not of opinion only to leave them out of the Indemnity, and as to Westminster-Hall, if they have art and cunning enough, they may escape. This is a crime the law does not suppose, and if you cannot use the legislative power to punish such offences, it is strange. Is it not treason to subvert the government as well as to clip a shilling? What government are we under? The law is on their side then, and there is no remedy for these offences; he must say Amen to what he is bidden to say is law: if you say, so many shall be excepted out of the Act, and reserve yourselves for penalties afterwards, I agree.

Sir Henry Capel. I think, what is said is of the last consequence. The statute 25 Edw. 3. names Treasons for Westminster-Hall to judge, and, at the same time, there is a declaratory clause for the parliament, in doubtful cases, to judge treason. Are there not offences that no denomination can be given to? To subvert the government, and subvert parliaments, by taking away the Charters of Corporations, is certainly the greatest of treasons. I take it for granted, that such offenders cannot be tried by the laws, as they stand, and must they not be punished? I hope that sort of doctrine will not be here. Such treasons are to be punished by parliament. I hope we shall never depart from that doctrine. I will not.

Major Wildman. I had not been called up now, if this doctrine did not only pardon what is past, but endanger the government for the future. It is of dangerous consequence, when we took up arms, and we were involved in blood—In an universal Act of Oblivion, we confess, that we were the offenders, and needed it. This new doctrine, of having these offenders to Westminster-Hall, is as much as to say, they shall not be punished. These offences cannot be punished unless the parliament punish them. It was the custom of our ancestors to bind the Judges to the letter of the law, and to declare nothing treason, but what is specified, &c. and in a doubt to go to parliament. Our ancestors thought, by that statute, that there were treasons which could not be specified; therefore left it to Parliament to do it. When the ten Judges, and the king's Counsel, answered the questions at Nottingham Castle, proposed them by Rd. 2. had they done any offences against the statute 25 Edw. 3? Nine of them said, they were under fear of their lives—But in the midst of that mercy, they were banished, and a law made that fear must never be the case. I move that these men may be reserved to such penalties as shall be declared in parliament. I am so tender of blood, that I have said nothing to-day to wish any body's finger to be cut; but we are like to be in blood to defend what is begun, it may be with a sea of blood; therefore, those that have been the occasion of all this blood I would have such justice upon, as may procure our safety hereafter.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am as much against a general Act of Indemnity, as against excepting all. Suppose you declare them in as hard words as you please—but I would do it to reconcile the nation. Make them support the government by setting all mankind at ease, (some must be excepted) and that will do your business.

Sir John Lowther. I am not for a separate question, but for complicating altogether. If you divide the incapacity, there is a legal incapacity that will involve a great many. I am for setting all at ease but Papists.

Mr. Howe. As for excepting all in a lump, I am against it. Many are fit for fines that are not fit to die, nor fit to bear offices.

Resolved, 1. "That no person shall be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity, as for life, upon this head. 2. That some persons shall be excepted, &c. as to other pains and penalties, not extending to life."

June 17. The debate was resumed.

Mr. Garroway. You say in your Vote, 'some persons shall be excepted.' If nobody else will name a person, I will name one who sat in Magdalen College Commission. It is Jenner.

Mr. Brewer. He was not one of the Judges of the King's-bench, and I see not how he can be under this Head of the 'Dispensing Power.' He was a baron of the exchequer.

Mr. Hawles. Perhaps he gave his Opinion for it, and I believe it, but it appears not to us; though possibly he may be on some other Head. I have examined, and I know of none, and can find none. There were some fines set, and you enquired of sir Samuel Astrey, and he informed you, that a grand jury was discharged—And you have not then any evidence. Whoever made that patent is as much criminal as any body, whether the Attorney or Solicitor General.

Sir Henry Capel. Two things you are to know. One, who gave the Opinion in the Dispensing Power, in sir Edw. Hales's Case. You were well moved to have the patent produced, and then it may appear whether Jenner was one of them.

Sir John Guise. It may happen, they may tell you upon what ground those Patents of Dispensation were drawn.

Sir Wm. Williams. No Judge is to give his Opinion extrajudicially. There is no such patent in nature; but there is a commission with Non obstante, and there were several commissions granted out with Non obstantes.

Sir John Guise. There was, I mean, a Patent of Dispensation for sir Ed. Hales, under the Attorney's or Solicitor's hands; they went upon their own heads, and drew it; and it was pleaded in his case.

The Speaker. I saw a patent of Dispensation for most of the principal Papists about town.

Mr. Hawles. The docket of the patent will discover from whence it came.

Sir Robert Sawyer. There was such a patent, and it passed my hand, and I will give a true account of it. The first warrant came to me the 21st of Nov. that did include both the Pardon and the Dispensation for the future. I said, 'I could not pass it.' I told Mr. Burton, 'that the Dispensation would spoil the pardon.' I will show you the whole: I have almost worn out the papers in my pocket. After I had told him my Judgment, he brought me a warrant for a Pardon of what belonged to the king. On Dec. 31st, they brought this patent in question. I told them then, 'I could not pass it;' and I told the king, 'that in point of law, the power was not in the king.' The king referred me to my lord chancellor and lord Sunderland; they told me, 'I was but a ministerial officer, and might do it.' I did not conceive the king had that power, and I could not do it. The king desired my reasons under my hand. I consulted an honourable person, Mr. Finch, and then gave it under my hand. The king said, 'He had a respect for me; but will you agree to it, if it be the Opinion of the rest of the Judges?' I said, 'I was but a ministerial officer; but if it was the Opinion of the Judges, I must obey.' I heard nothing farther till three weeks after; when the king sent for me again; where were present the Chancellor and Chief Justice. The king said, 'I am advised by the Judges that I have that power;' and then it was brought, and I, as a ministerial officer, did pass it. Soon after, six of the Judges were turned out. Then they brought Walker's patent. I had the greatest veneration for the Judges not concurring. If they come to be of that opinion for fear or expectation of preferment, the nation can never be safe. I begged, on my knees, that the king would put me out of my place. I desired to know, why I was not turned out? I was told, 'because the king would not gratify another to come in my place.' Then I was brought the duke of Berwick's patent of lieutenant and Custos of the forest. I told them, 'I would not pass it with a Non obstante.' I was sent to by the Chancellor 'that the king would remove me.' Nobody then about the king, but knows I stood stiff upon it. I was Attorney in all these transactions, and you will find my integrity the greater, that I could hold it in those times. I knew, all things were set up to introduce Popery. I gave my opinion, 'that the Lease of the Excise, on the death of king Ch. 2, was a void lease,' though there was an overbalance of Judgment that the lease was good. There was another project of Brent's to set a new valuation of First-Fruits; they were then undermining the whole clergy of England. The commissioners of the treasury were glad there was an obstacle put to it. I will show you all my papers that I have to justify me. I never had a Pardon, nor ever desired it.

Mr. Hawles. Upon what has been opened by Sawyer, I think him the greatest criminal upon this head. This gentleman was not satisfied that this patent was legal; why did he give it out then? I am sorry to say, that a certain learned member had a hand in passing these patents, (there were many patents passed to persons that did incur the 500*l.* penalty) and was earnest for the 500*l.* men.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Mine was but a private Opinion, not a judicial opinion. The Judges are the king's counsel, and they are advised with; but the great hurt is when Judges are corrupted in opinion. I submit whether any officer must not do as I did.

Mr. Howe. Sawyer has endeavoured to vindicate himself. I am not a judge of the law, but when he comes to vindicate himself, then is the time to speak to that. That horse which carries the first stage, and that which carries the last, are all post-horses alike. It may be, some would be content to be hanged to leave 1000*l.* a year to their families. I hope these Judges and others, &c. may be reduced to their former estates that they had, before these crimes were committed. They would be willing to sit down with 2 or 300*l.* a year, and laugh at us. I would move something, to know the names of the persons you would enquire into for acting and promoting this. I will give my opinion as freely as any body, to provide for the future against the infamy of such persons to be in office, who have very lately been in arms against us.

Mr. Hawles. The way to know is from the officers of the court in the Case of Goodwyn and Hales. Let us not give occasion to think we do injustice, but inform ourselves.

Mr. Boscawen. I would know what oaths the Judges and great officers of the law take. If their oaths, and the fear of breaking them, will not keep them to their duty, you may proceed farther.

Sir Tho. Lee. If I thought you would not proceed without proof, then there must be a committee to enquire. I suppose, when you come to apply punishments, you will hear every man what he has to say in his own defence. One tells you, 'he knows not who was there;' another, 'he knows not how Opinions were given.' It is apparent that the Judges gave no Opinions; but their practice gave the example, and it was an opinion that put on the Chimney-money upon the paupers, which Sawyer gave. Archer and others, who had their patents 'Quamdiu,' &c. though they retained the ordinary fees of court, yet not their salary of 1000*l.* per ann. If the matter be apparent, then you may proceed, and not lose time.

Col. Austen. If the justice of the house can go no farther, it is in vain to proceed. If you will not come to a justification of what you have done, let us go home.

Sir Wm. Strickland. Those who were the great darlings of king James, not to turn them out! Those are the persons to be excepted. I mean Sawyer.

Mr. Harbord. What is the reason for taking away chimney-money? Was it not, because it was barbarously collected against law? The king's counsel gave their opinion, to shelter the privy counsellors, that ovens and cottages should all pay. These have grown up by the advice of Sawyer; and if you fall not upon them that did this, you are defective in justice. I would always have it a maxim here, 'that to levy money against law is treason.' If privately, cunningly, and traiterously they give an opinion in law, those you must lay hands on. I am tender of blood, and cannot give my consent where no blood has been shed. The blood I mean is that of sir Thomas Armstrong, a most barbarous thing! And all foreign nations where I have been cry out upon you, and say, there is no living amongst you. I would except them even for their lives.

Sir Robt. Howard. This is not your business now, but what you will do on the Judgment given in Hales's case. Sawyer has told you, why he did do it, and has papers in his pocket. He tells you, 'He had the opinion of the Judges, but the king and my lord chancellor told him so.' All must be seen before you, and perhaps you may make these things clear; and let sir S. Astrey and Henley bring you the Judges names. But this now looks a little short, that Sawyer did this upon hearsay; but I would not condemn him upon hearsay; send for Astrey and Henley, and adjourn it to tomorrow.

Sir Wm. Williams. It is true that this extrajudicial Opinion was given, but how shall the house be satisfied? I was present in court when Judgment was pronounced. It was by lord chief justice Herbert. He had consulted all the Judges, and there was but one dissenter: on that Opinion, judgment was given. But that they should be quiet under that law, and not be contradicted, is strange to me, who gave and persisted in this Opinion. But whether you will refer it to a committee, or send for the officers, I submit.

Sir Robert Sawyer. I will bring my papers to-morrow, and you may have all the matter before you.

Sir John Lowther. I think it not possible to come to a Resolution of this question, till you have the state of this Head before you. The words of the Head are, 'advising and acting in pursuance of the Dispensing Power, &c.' So you must make no distinctions; they are all equal crimes, and when you come to the Case of Hales, you will not think that so great as the lord-lieutenant's, who came down to urge persons to declare for the taking away the penal laws, and the Test, and to act without it. This is levying war openly. The Judges, who have given their opinion in Westminster-Hall, I cannot think more criminal than those that contrived it. I presume, the wisdom of the house will weigh the 'advising and asserting' it. I presume, you will find 'acting' one of the least crimes. Consider the quality and greatness of these men; you will not lay the load upon some men only, and let those equally concerned escape.

Mr. Garroway. I rise up to second the motion, 'That serjeant Streete and justice Powell may be here to-morrow.'

Mr. Ettrick. When you sent for the Judges last, you sent some of your members to attend them. Powell is a sitting Judge in the lords house, and I think it fit you do it to him.

Resolved, 'That Mr. Justice Powell, sir Tho. Streete, and the Prothonotary, Secondary, and Remembrancer, be sent for.'

Address to the King to secure the Garrisons, &c.] June 18. The following Address from the Lords to the King was sent down to the Commons for their concurrence:

"We your majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled in parliament, having taken into our consideration the great importance the Isles of Wight, Guernsey, and Jersey are to your majesty's dominions, and the great danger to which they are exposed during this war with France, do, in most humble manner, represent to your majesty, That we are informed, that that Isle of Wight may be put into a good posture of defence in a small time and with a small charge: and we do humbly desire your majesty would be pleased to send, with all expedition, a supply of troops, provisions and stores, to all these places, and particularly to order some men of war to Guernsey and Jersey, that may constantly attend there for the better defence of these Islands; and likewise to give such further orders for the security of the Isles of Man, Scilly, Anglesey, and of the Cinque Ports, Milford, Pendennis, and Falmouth, and all other places that lye opposite to France and Ireland, as your majesty in your princely wisdom shall think fit.— And we further desire your majesty to give effectual order, that the Act for confining Papists within 5 miles of their own houses, and the law lately made for disarming Papists and reputed Papists, and for taking away their horses, may be forthwith executed; and, in order thereunto, that the Judges may be directed to give these Acts in charge to the justices of the peace in their several circuits; and particularly that they examine whether any Protestants have, contrary to that Act, owned such horses as in truth belong to Papists.— We humbly lay these things before your majesty, as conceiving them to be of great importance to the safety of your majesty's person and government and dominions."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Garroway. This Address is as if the king were in Holland, and Stadtholder, to teach him his duty, and not king of England. I am against it.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. If this Address be publishing our weak condition, I am against it. It is certain, these places are in no good condition, and since it is not mended, it is our duty to represent it to the king, and we cannot else do right to our country; especially this coming from the lords, makes me for it.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Guernsey is in ill condition, though the best harbour in the world. It lies opposite to France. There are no guns, nor ammunition. The consequence of the place is great. As for the Isle of Wight, it is a place of infinite consequence, and so ill-fortified, that the governor, sir Robert Holmes, at his own charge, has done something. Yarmouth and the Castles are much out of order. I hope it may for the present be done without much charge. I would concur with the lords.

Sir Tho. Lee. I find we are now upon the debate of Address to the king about the Isle of Wight, &c. and therefore it is not fit to pass at the table in a moment. I could have wished the king had sent to you before, or you to him. I hear of garrisons making, and we may draw more garrisons upon ourselves, and at another time it might be suspected. For Jersey you may do something, and I am sorry to hear from Goodrick, 'that Guernsey cannot be kept.' The lords, I believe, have had informations before them, and I would have you do so too, and consider as they have done.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I take this Address to be of great weight. This has been examined by a committee of lords, and it is not usual for us to take things upon trust. Inform yourselves, as the lords have done, and then, upon committing it, you may take the same steps, that the lords have done, and then you are ripe for judgment.

Sir Hen. Goodrick. The Fleet is now drawing towards Brest. I see no manner of summer guards, and we have nothing to send men into these islands. I suppose they may land men out of France with flat-bottomed boats; have we any frigates to hinder a descent from France? Unless we send out some ships presently, we may run an irreparable hazard.

This is the purport of the Address from the lords, and I hope it may be effectual.

Mr. Harbord. I am willing to commit this Address. The lords have had this before them three or four days, and I would go the most decent way to the king: I would examine the thing and the charge of it; it will cost the king money; therefore, upon the whole matter, I would commit it.

Sir John Thompson. It seems, the king has not been put in mind of this by his counsellors, and therefore we must do it; but I will not see it with other men's eyes, when I can see with my own. I question whether this Address will not bring on the consideration of Money; and since this is for our defence, I would have the committee take some care of the Navy, and see what present state the navy is in.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This motion of Garro-way's, of computing the Charge, is letting the lords in to raising Money. I do not know but the Commissioners of the Admiralty and Ordnance have done their duty; but this is too great a presumption that they have not. We have given two millions already, besides the Revenue. I would have the Commissioners of the Admiralty and Ordnance give you an account of their proceedings.

Sir Henry Goodrick. The Office of Ordnance has not wanted application to the Treasury for Money, which it wants. The duke of Schomberg has made application. Nor has Wharton, the engineer, been wanting; he has viewed all these places, and has orders to make them in as good defence as possible.

Sir Thomas Lee. You may enquire as much as you please into these things; but I think Clarges has minded you well of letting the lords in to giving money, though I know not how he can make out "two Millions" given. I think it for your service to enquire if it will cost you money by an Aid, and you may see if the revenue can pay it, and not do it without that, lest you let the lords into giving money.

Mr. Howe. To address the king to do what he has done already is a reflection. As for the islands, I hope they may be speedily done; and for Londonderry, I would see what forwardness we are in for Ireland, and would know how many Dutch ships are to join us; and if, upon enquiry, you find the Dutch ships out, and Ireland in good condition, there will be no occasion for this address.

Mr. Boscawen. An engineer was sent to Jersey, and Guernsey, and Scilly, to compute the charge. I desire you to take notice, that, before you make this address, you should inform yourselves what care has been taken. I have this morning spoken to duke Schomberg about it.

Mr. Ellwell. Are we only to fight and have no trade? To be neglected, and no convoys for merchants? They make fortifications in France, and shall we have no fear of invasion? There is no Militia, and Pendennis-Castle is in ill condition, and lies open to the French and Irish too. I would have particular instructions to the committee to enquire into the Navy.

Col. Birch. This address comes in a most unusual way, but when any thing is before you, I would know the bottom of it. I would have the Committee examine what is done, and what is not done. One part of the Address relates to shipping; our safety is, in the first place, to be looked for. I desire, a paper may be laid before us of the number of ships in the whole kingdom, how many fit, and not fit, and where they lie. Some talk of 30, 40, and 50—('tis none of my trade) I would know what you have for reserves, with the several particulars of guns and burdens.

Serjeant Maynard. I would have the Committee enquire into the captains of the navy. I hear there are young men put into ships, that never were at sea before. The question was formerly, 'Was he a godly man?' And he was put in. I asked then, 'Whether a godly man could make a watch, or a pair of boots?'

Sir Tho. Lee. If being of a party makes men fit, I have heard that young men are fittest to fight. Those that know and have fought, are thought the fittest to judge. Lord Torrington* is fitter to recommend a captain than I am, that live in Buckinghamshire. The charge is computed at 100,000*l.* a month, the Estimate, and when I have said that, it will not bear the Charge of this summer's expedition, (and gives an account of the Shipping) but do what you can, there will be leakages. As many ships as are appointed, are nearly ready to a ship. The king has ordered 20 to cruise betwixt Scotland and Ireland. Those who are experienced were thought best to recommend officers; and to my observation, those who were never in the king's service are not so forward with their ships as those who were in the king's service before.

Col. Tipping. I was lately at Portsmouth, where I saw one of the greatest ships given in upon account fitted, and weeds grew on her sides, three times as long as the table; which, lord Torrington said, must have been, at least, three years laid up.

The Address was ordered to be committed.

Mr. Justice Powell and others examined touching the Dispensing Power.] This day Mr. Justice Powell attended, according to order, and being called in,

The Speaker said, The house has sent for you to desire you to inform them, whether the Judges were sent to, to meet together in sir Edward Hales's Case?

Mr. Justice Powell. "The Judges were sent to, to meet my lord chancellor at Serjeant's Inn, in Fleet-street; all the twelve Judges were present, and there it was proposed, Whether the king could dispense, &c. in sir Edw. Hales's Case? I beg the favour to be excused from making answer as to persons. It is improper for me to accuse any. I humbly beg the favour that I may be exempted." And withdrew.

* Admiral Herbert, so created a little before this debate.

Col. Birch. It seems, he is tender in revealing what passed, on private considerations; but what was done upon that occasion was on a public account. I conceive it not the intention of the house that this gentleman give evidence; but I think it necessary that you know what Opinion was given, because you were told that 11 Judges were of that opinion.

Mr. Leveson Gower. I am of opinion, that no imputation can lie upon him to tell you the opinion they gave; but I would not ask him what opinion he was of; but how many signed their Opinion at that time.

Sir Tho. Littleton. If you go through with this question, he may live uneasy in his Judge's place. I doubt not, Powell gave his Opinion for it, and Streete was the only man against it. I think he has given a very particular account to the lords, and it is fit he should do it to you likewise.

Mr. Garroway. I wonder what you sent to this Judge for. Now he comes, he makes you a great compliment, whether you will ask him the question, or not? If the crime be such as that all is at stake upon it: ask him plainly, what Opinion these Judges gave, but not himself. I hear he has frankly and freely given an account in the Lords' house.

Sir Henry Capel. Was this Judge in any public court on oath, he ought to tell what he knows. For once, let us not part with our laws, without some struggle for it. I stand amazed that Powell is tender in it here. He is not to be excused for his modesty, though a good thing. When that compliment and excuse is over, for the good of the nation, he ought to give you a clear account. I hope, you will tell him that this house requires it of him to inform you, and I believe he will obey you.

The Speaker. Mr. Justice Powell, the house has considered your answer, and have commanded me to acquaint you, that for what concerns yourself they will not question you nor require an answer; but for what you please of the other Judges, there can be no tie of secrecy; you are under a duty to tell your knowledge. This is not properly an accusation of the Judges, but your testimony is required to deliver your knowledge.

Mr. Justice Powell. "I am very free to declare any thing relating to myself, but to others, unless you command me, I desire your excuse. 'Tis at a great distance, a great while since, but I shall declare what I remember. I am unwilling to incur the displeasure of this honourable house. Going on Wednesday or Thursday in Trinity Term [2 James 2.] to dine at Serjeants Inn in Chancery-lane, I was desired to attend at the other Serjeants Inn, in Fleet-street, at four o'clock; where being met, my lord chief justice Herbert told us what the business was. He desired my Opinion, with the rest of the Judges, in sir Edward Hales's

Case. He cited some Cases to make out the king's Dispensing Power. He cited Coke's 12th Report. After he had done, it was my turn, as puisne judge, to speak. I answered, 'the Case was of great importance, and, for the present, I was not able to do it, till I had consulted Books against Michaelmas Term.' He said, 'he would have it on Tuesday.' I said, 'The time was short, but I would wait on him.' Milton, who was then baron, gave his Opinion, 'That he might dispense.' The next was Lutwich, who said, 'He restrained it to this Case, and thought the king could dispense in this Case, but not in ecclesiastical cases. He restrained it to that Case before us not relating to Religion.' Jenner was next, who said, 'The king might dispense.' Wright was for dispensing. Holloway, I believe, was for dispensing; I cannot say it positively; I was at a distance. Streete was against it. Lord chief baron Atkins was at a greater distance; I could not well understand him; he cited several Cases. Lord chief justice Bedingfield's Opinion was, 'That the king could dispense.' This is all I can say in the matter transacted so long ago. Nothing was put in writing, nor notes taken of what was then spoken. As for what concerns myself, I attended my lord chief justice, at his chamber. I called on Mr. Justice Lutwich, who went with me, and there I heard first of the Judgment given on the Monday morning. 'Twas given on Monday, because there was a grand jury of persons of quality that day, and it was thought the next would not have had such an audience, and therefore they hasted giving Judgment that day; so I did not deliver my Opinion. I beg pardon, it was my forgetfulness not to name Wythens and Heath—[Upon the Speaker's asking of them, &c.] They were with the majority for the Dispensing Power. I think no persons were present but the twelve Judges, and I am pretty confident of it. The question was delivered by word of mouth, by lord chief justice Herbert, 'Whether the king could dispense with the statute of 25 Ch. 2. and the accepting a Commission by that Dispensation?'—He then withdrew.

Sir Samuel Astrey, being interrogated by the Speaker, said, "Lord chief justice Herbert, Wright, and Holloway, were present at pronouncing the Judgment in the Case of sir E. Hales and Godwyn. The Opinion, in the Dispensing Power, was pronounced by lord chief justice Herbert, who said, 'It was not only the Opinion of the Judges in the Court, but he had consulted the rest of the Judges, and it was the Opinion of ten of them.' He said, 'There was another Judge did hesitate when they did meet.' I beg pardon if I mistake in words, but in substance he said 'Ten were for it.' Justice Streete was against it, and another Judge did hesitate, but that he was informed, by Holloway, that Justice Powell had declared his Opinion for it."—He withdrew.

Sir Robert Henley, being interrogated in like manner, said, "I was present in Court 2 James

2. when the case of Hales and Godwyn was argued. There were present in court lord chief justice Herbert, Wythens, Holloway, and Wright. The Case was argued but once, by a young gentleman, Mr. Northey, against the Dispensing, for Godwyn against Hales, upon an Action of Debt on the Statute, Tam quam, &c. The king's counsel argued for the defendant on the other side. I am certain these were the Judges. I looked on my Book. The Case was argued but once, not seriatim, but by Herbert only: He said, 'He had consulted the Judges, and they did all concur; but that Streete and another Judge doubted.'"

Mr. Garroway. I have something to ask more. I would know who were the king's counsel, who argued against the king? That was a very pleasant thing.

Sir Robert Henley. "Sir Thomas Powis, the Solicitor-General, argued for Hales, and Mr. Northey for the king."

Sir Samuel Astrey. "I cannot charge my memory with lord chief justice Herbert's argument."

Sir Robert Henley. "I remember, the precedents cited were for 'the necessity of it, and that the king was judge of that necessity.' The Rule-Book will exactly tell the day."

The Oath of the Attorney-General, and the Ecclesiastical Commission, were then read.

The Speaker, to Mr. Bridgman. The House have read the Ecclesiastical Commission, and they find your name in it as a Register. They would know whether you attended as Register?

Mr. Bridgeman. "I was generally there and attended, but, in my absence, Mr. Smith of Doctors Commons attended. In the business of Magdalen College, one Tucker, my clerk, then attended. I was sent for to Westminster, being in the secretary's office, and the commissioners gave me a draught of a warrant to ingross: I heard nothing of it before. Lord Sunderland brought it, but I remember not who carried it to seal. I entered all down in a book, who were present. Smith and Tucker were my clerks that entered them in the book. We had loose papers as minutes, which were entered after the rising of the court, and the book was the Register I kept."

Sir Tho. Clarges. I hear of a committee of lords and others, called 'Regulators for all England;' I would know whether there was such a Committee, and who sat in it?

Mr. Bridgeman. "I attended the Commission, at the Judgment given upon the bishop of London. I cannot charge my memory with the names of the Commissioners in the Books, but I remember there was a difference of opinion, at two meetings; they did not agree both times. The lord chancellor, lord Powis, lord Castlemaine, sir Nich. Butler, and father Petre, were of the Committee for Corporations. I cannot say, they sent Instructions into the country, for I attended only in the secretary's office. That business was managed by Mr. Brent for me. I was frequently sent for to attend the committee. I have seen the names of persons in the country, that consented or refused taking the Penal Laws and Test, &c. but I never saw any but loose papers, all in one hand-writing, and in the Secretary's Office, and, I believe, some of these papers are in my custody still. I was not employed in the surrender of Charters, only in the secretary's office. I was present when the Warrants were signed for the commitment of the Bishops to the Tower, and I remember not who signed; only two or three lords went out, and did not sign. I remember the earl of Berkeley only. I was indisposed in my health, and remember no more."

A copy of the Commitment of the Bishops to the Tower was delivered in and read.

Mr. Smith. I observe that Bridgeman was sick, when he had no mind to tell who they are; pray ask him very strictly, whether there were any more, and who they were?

Sir Robert Clayton. I would know, whether Penn and Lobb were of that Commission?

Mr. Garroway. I would have Mr. Bridgeman recollect himself of the names, from his notes.

The Speaker. Mr. Bridgeman, the house takes notice that the persons you name are either dead or absent; can you name any others present?

Mr. Bridgeman. "There were my lord chancellor, lord president, marquis of Powis, earl of Castlemaine, Mr. Petre; these met at lord Sunderland's Office. Brent and Trinder, to my best remembrance, managed. Robinson attended. I never saw Penn nor Lobb there. In the Case of the bishop of London, lord chief justice Herbert dissented. In Magdalen-College, and all public matters, he dissented to every one. I know not particularly as to the bishop of London's Plea, but he dissented to all public matters."

Mr. Kendall. I hope you will consider lord chief justice Herbert, for the sake of a noble person, his brother (lord Torrington) who lately had your thanks for his good service, and show him favour for his sake: though he is of a different opinion from his brother,* yet he has a natural affection for him, and I hope you will consider him for his sake.

Mr. Holt. I had my education in Winchester-College with lord chief justice Herbert. I have discoursed this point of Dispensation with him. He aimed at nothing of preferment; it was his opinion and judgment; but he went

* "So little regard had the Chief Justice's nearest friends to his opinion, that his brother, admiral Herbert, being pressed by the king to promise that he would vote the repeal of the Test, answered the king very plainly, 'That he could not do it either in honour or conscience.' And though he was poor, and had much to lose, having places to the value of 4000*l.* a year, he chose to lose them all rather than comply." Burnet.

not so far as king James would have had him, and, in the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court, he did dissent from the rest.

Sir Wm. Williams. When he gave Judgment, &c. he did say this that did allay me: 'He would not serve purposes to destroy parliaments, and he would not give his Opinion to dispense the lords and commons from taking the Oaths, &c.'

Sir Robert Cotton. If Herbert did not come up to the others, and order soldiers to be hanged up for deserting their colours in time of peace—I would except those who had their hands in blood. You have heard how he carried himself in the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Sir John Thompson. I think we are out of the way. We were for naming men to be excepted, and why should one man be excepted, and not another? If you will excuse them all, with all my heart. If they partake of the same crime, it is fit they should have the same punishment. Consider in the lump, whether they shall be excepted on this Head or not?

Mr. Boscawen. I would not have all Oblivion and Indemnity. I would have some punished for example. God forbid all offenders should be excepted! I took the sense of the house to be, that some should be excepted, &c. and that implies you will excuse others, and I am at liberty to pardon Herbert.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. By what I have heard said, Herbert is not one of those notorious offenders you aim at. He tied up his Opinion to one particular case, and gave not a general opinion.

Mr. Papillon. You have excepted none yet for life; this Head is only for pains and penalties. I see not how you can excuse this person, if you take any other person in. All have been upon this foundation. If you excuse this man totally, he may be Chief Justice again, and then maintain this Opinion. He has been the Head of this Opinion; so you must do something on him, but as little as you will.

Mr. Hawles. If I would consult my affections, this is the gentleman I would have pardoned. I know him an honest gentleman. If you excuse him because a man of learning, strike off all that head. Milton is not a man of learning, and Wythens, I think, very little so. if he judged well in other things, except him now: he went out upon the City-Charter; he was not for a total Dispensing Power; he was for a man to be hanged in his own country, and not at Plymouth, for deserting. If you will admit these excuses, lay all aside. If I would plead for any of them, it should be for him. But since the penalty of death is passed over, yet I would have a punishment, though a mild one, and except him.

Mr. Leveson Gower. If he must be excepted out of the Act, I would have your advice, whether you will not make a conditional proviso that the king may pardon him. I hope it will be in the consideration of the house, that then he may be left to the king's mercy, when you come to the pains and penalties.

VOL. V.

Sir Robert Howard. I am willing this person receive favour and mercy, but not for the reasons proposed, 'That his Opinion was his conscience and judgment.' But the matter is, now we are against the Dispensing Power, that we should be the great dispensers of the law. They held an Opinion, 'That the king was supreme, and might dispense;' shall we dispense with this? We may become censured in this place. As he was the first mover of this Dispensation, so his brother, the admiral, was the first who gave his opinion against it, and frankly gave up all he had. I think the Judgment must be, he must be excepted, and then that you will petition the king (for his brother's sake, who deserves as much as any man) that it may be upon his merit he is pardoned.

Resolved, "That sir Edward Herbert be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity upon this Head."

Debate on Mr. Justice Wythens.] Sir John Lowther. I am afraid that excuses will be unwelcome to this house. I say, in behalf of this man, that no sooner was he promoted, but to all sorts of men he denied patents of Dispensation from the oaths. He did it only as to officers in the army: but he has said before good witnesses, 'That he wished his tongue had cleaved to the roof of his mouth, when he gave judgment, &c. and if the parliament should consent to the Dispensing Power, he should never think them men of honour more.' He lost his place for his Opinion about hanging the soldier, who run from his colours. He was never corrupt; he never took a shilling. I perceive I am ill heard upon this subject, [there was a great noise,] but I leave him to your mercy.

Sir Francis Blake. This man was in the blood of sir Tho. Armstrong; he was one that condemned him.

Mr. Harbord. This gentleman was brought on his knees in this house, about the abhorring Petitions to address the king for the sitting of the parliament*.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I suppose you intend an Indemnity, and your Exceptions not to be many. I know this gentleman, and must do him right; his Opinion was only to that particular matter before him, (Hales's). Herbert wrote a Book in defence of the Dispensing Power; but this man did not: no man can think me a favourer of this Dispensing Power. I beg your mercy for him.

Mr. Hawles. This man was deep in almost every thing: except as to the Soldier, you will find him involved in all things.

Sir John Lowther. I have no obligation to this gentleman, and therefore can only testify what I have said. He stayed but one entire term in his place, after he gave the Judgment of the Dispensing Power. There is mercy before you as well as judgment, and I hope he will find mercy.

* See vol. iv. p. 1174.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I was with him in the western circuit, and I must bear him witness, that he was against the Dispensing Power.

Resolved, "That sir Francis Wythens, and sir Rd. Holloway, be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity."

Debate on Lord Chief Justice Wright.] Sir Tho. Clarges. If any fact he hath done be felony, or treason, make his estate forfeitable, and I am for it. But where there is no offence in law that he has committed, I would not have him excepted.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It would be an ill thing for such a man to be upon your Books, to stand there with no mark upon him.

Resolved, "That sir Robert Wright be excepted."

Debate on Lord Chief Justice Bedingsfield.]

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is an extraordinary precedent. I would have the committee search precedents. I have not known, when a man has had no capital crimes against him, that, when he is dead, you have proceeded against him.

Col. Tipping. If you will not except him out of the Indemnity, why have you excepted Herbert, and the rest? Lord keeper Coventry was fined 10,000*l.* when he was dead, for the Judgment he gave upon Lilburn in the Star-Chamber.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. This case is quite different from the rest. This gentleman gave no Judgment in court, any more than in private discourse and conference, and I cannot give the same judgment against him as if he gave it in court.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Before you pass judgment upon this gentleman, to attain him, since he is laid in the dust, pray consider his innocent posterity; and punish not them as if they were really guilty.

No Vote was passed upon him.

Debate on the Lords Amendments to the Bill of Rights and Succession.] June 19. On the 9th of May, the commons had sent up a Bill to the Lords, for declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and settling the Succession of the crown; which their lordships having considered, they found the latter part of it (as they thought) defective, no mention being made in it of her electoral highness the princess Sophia, dutchess of Hanover; and thought fit, amongst other Amendments, to add a Proviso in her highness's favour. The Bill, thus amended, was this day returned to the commons.

Sir John Lowther. This looks like a kind of perpetuity. There may be revolutions and changes; this princess of Hanover may turn Catholic. Queen Elizabeth would not determine the Succession, and she was a wise princess. Till I am better convinced, I cannot agree to it.

Sir Rowland Gwynn. In the Instrument, you have limited the Succession of the crown, and I would do nothing contrary to it.

Mr. Sacheverell. I desire you to consider what you do, before you agree to this addition. Is it your intention that those bred abroad Calvinists or Lutherans, that may come to the crown, and receive not the sacrament according to the church of England, shall be taken for papists? Will you exclude that king that should marry a Papist, and know her not to be so? To exclude a Papist barely, so far I can agree. The other clause is putting it into the power of the privy-council to name you a king. He shall be no king, till he shall take such an oath as is tendered him by the privy-council, and it lies in the power of the council to tender it. Had it been left to the parliament, I should not have been against it, but I would not leave it in the power of the privy-council to tender the oath, or not.

Sir Tho. Clarges. When queen Elizabeth died, king James was in Scotland, and he had no invitation to come hither, but by the privy council. Cardinal Richlieu used to say, 'Two words often spoiled things, faisons mieux.' There has rarely been this occasion. When queen Elizabeth was declared queen, the privy-council invited her to accept of the crown.

Sir Tho. Lec. The privy-council did it not alone, and there was no such power in the council alone; but it was done by the lords, the lord mayor, the noblemen, gentlemen and citizens.

Mr. Boscawen. Though he be a Papist in his heart, yet if he takes the oaths, he may be king. The prince of Wales beyond sea, by this Amendment, may be called in.

Sir Robert Sawyer. The privy-council summon all the lords in and about the town. The lord mayor is not summoned; but when they proclaim the king, the lord mayor is sent for to proclaim him. A short Amendment may do this; some power must be lodged somewhere. It is of dangerous consequence, if on the sudden, and no parliament sitting; and he that comes in may be a Papist.

Sir Robert Clayton. I have not looked into the matter much. I have seen the original Proclamation of king James. The lord mayor of London signed the Proclamation first; his power was not determined by the king's death; his power was in being when all other commissions ceased, for he has it by charter, and not by commission.

Col. Birch. Consider well, before you throw out this clause; but make it larger, 'That the lord mayor, and the lords about town, may proclaim, &c.' You may mend it at the table.

Mr. Garroway. I think it is not so easy to mend it. I hope gentlemen will not exclude themselves from this right of being a party in proclaiming the king.

Mr. Hampden. Whatever the clause is, be pleased to remember, 'That the lords desire you to sit, and have something to communicate to you of great importance.' All I know of it is, if you delay this Bill, it may be of little use to you.

Sir Tho. Lee. I desire gentlemen to consider, that, if you adjourn this till-tomorrow, no debates can intervene between it. I think the Bill has lain too long already, and shamefully too long upon the table.*

Treasonable Papers communicated to the House by order of the King.] The same day the house of lords communicated certain treasonable Papers to the house, by order of his majesty: before the reading of which, Mr. Hampden acquainted the house, "That the said Papers were found upon two persons, who were going to Ireland, in a ship which had stole out of the port of Liverpool, but was stopt about five miles at sea: that they were dispatched up to town, by the mayor, and that the Letter to Piggott, and two more, were written by king James, though he had, in one of them, somewhat disguised his hand."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Garroway. It has been some wonder to me that the relief of Ireland has been so slow. I hope this will quicken those it concerns. Let them look to it whom it concerns, and if they give not a good account of it, you may call them to question.

Mr. Howe. It seems, the Committee is fallen that was to draw up the Impeachments; it is time to call those persons to question before they do more mischief; if we lose Ireland, and Scotland be lost, we are never like to give an account of England. A great many of king James's former servants are still in employment; they are too many to name them. Some in the lords house have protested under their hands, 'that we cannot impeach commoners;' I think all these persons ought to be proceeded against.

Sir John Guise. What you have before you is of the greatest importance.

Mr. Hampden. This was thought, by the king, of great weight and consideration. Two things in these Letters are clear; the intended Invasion, and a Conspiracy in England. They are no fictions, nor plots forged upon you; but has there been more Money given than is needful? You have given great sums, and great sums I find have been employed. In the civil government, not half has been applied to it, but to the public charges. The king, I may say, has robbed himself to supply the public. You say yourselves, the Fleet cost you 1,800,000*l.*—The Civil Government, the Money for the Dutch, and that borrowed of the City. This is but head arithmetick, but I say this in general, that there is not so much mismanagement, nor miscarriage of the sums you have given, (and gives a large Account of the Revenue.)†

* The Clause occasioned the loss of the Bill this session, both houses adhering, the one to retain, the other to reject it. Add to this, that it became less necessary on account of the birth of the duke of Gloucester, on the 27th of July.

† "Mr. Hampden had neglected the usual

Mr. Leveson Gower. The hon. gentleman has proposed nothing. I should be glad to hear of something of what is wanting, and where it may be had.

Mr. Hampden. I have told you the danger, and the king has sent a Letter to have your assistance. Pray tell the king how the French shall be kept out. One thing I will propose; put the Militia in good order, and what the king wants supply him with.

Mr. Smith. No doubt the king desires your advice to extricate him out of his danger, but I think the Accounts proffered to be showed us are not so proper at this time. The Army is upon the roll 60,000 men, and I can make it appear, that there are not 40,000 men; so there is something struck off in the charge. I know no way to secure you, but to secure the most considerable Papists in England. I would know why persons have stopped the lieutenancy of Middlesex from seizing Papists, and taking away their horses? I should be glad to give Money—King James takes estates in Ireland; I know no better way than to seize their estates, like him, for your use, and I doubt not but those will supply you for the present.

Mr. Howe. I hear it said, 'there is no Money misplaced.' I would hear how it is applied. I shall give it more heartily though not so discreetly as those who were of king James's Council, and now in council and employment. I would know the retarding of the Fleet, and the relief of Ireland. I believe those about the king do tell him. We see miscarriages; they cannot be at our doors, nor the king's. There are several in Council, not our friends. He that was against abdicating king James, and, 'the throne not vacant,' is not fit to be trusted in k. William's Council.

arts of ministers, to bespeak the favour of the majority: so that instead of carrying his point, he was not so much as seconded; no not even by his own son. On the contrary, having, in the course of his speech, insisted on the necessity of a farther Aid, to save the nation from falling into the hands of the Irish and French, another member said, 'Add the Dutch.' Mr. Garroway, though a known Williamite, gave it as his opinion, That they had granted money enough for one year; that if they had thought there had been occasion for more, they would have prevented the king's demands: That it was not the want of money, but the ill conduct of those who had the management of affairs, which caused the difficulties of the government: that the Miscarriages in not assisting the Protestants of Ireland, were both so manifest and so pernicious in their consequences, that if they were not speedily remedied, the house would be obliged to take notice of them. Mr. Howe had the boldness to assert, That their present dangers proceeded from their not addressing the king to remove his evil Counsellors, in conformity to his late motion." Ralph.

Sir Tho. Clarges. By what we find from these Letters, we ought to provide for our security; but to have a sad tale told us, and Money at the end of it, is very extraordinary. Let us have the state of the monthly Revenue. All you have given will come in neat money at St. John come twelvemonth. I am not given to farming, but, I believe, the money in the Poll-Bill may be rated at 600,000*l.* You are told by Hampden there is need of four million; is that for four months charge? Let us see our fair monthly charge; it seems so great; and yet the poor Irishmen are not relieved. We have had war with France and Holland, and not still 'Money, money, money.' I have those accounts, and could have produced them, if I had thought of this. The Revenue this year is nearly 1,800,000*l.* I hope, the customs and the Excise will answer the expence in the largest extent. I do not desire the crown should be straitened, but all we have given is not to be spent in 3 months, and more money for that which is given already, to set things on the wheels till we meet next. Let the country breathe a little, I pray; though all the money is not paid out of our lands; yet the farmers have paid their polls. We are trusted by the people with their estates, and their lands; let leave be asked, according to order, for a motion for Money, and not be brought in by surprize.

Sir John Thompson. I do not wonder that gentlemen of the Treasury move for Money. It is an odd way this, to ask money for Holland, when the danger is in Ireland. Pray let us know what is in the Treasury. In Monmouth's business, there was 400,000*l.* given to suppress it, and the money is scarce paid in to this day. If you will have an account from persons in office, how fit it is for your service, pray consider of it.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I will not take upon me to say how money has been employed; of that I know not; but we are past money, sure, now. The whole Scheme of it has been before you. The Revenue has been paid, and that is considerable. You compute for the Navy but from March, and in winter when all comes in, then it is time to think farther of Money. I hope such an Army, with the Militia we have, and the Fleet, may hinder all invasion, if we are so great in force; and we hear nothing of the Holland Fleet, nor our alliance with them. There can be no occasion for Money till winter.

Mr. Smith. We are told, in the Letters, of a conspiracy, and I wonder all should be strangely ended in Money. The papists are all conspirators, and ill protestants join with them. As has been moved, I would have the Papists seized, and I would address the king for a proclamation limiting a time for those with king James: recall them by a day limited; if they surrender not themselves, seize their estates. Let us know why orders to seize the horses and arms of Papists have had counter-orders. If that was done, I doubt not but the king may appear at the head of the militia as well as at the head of a standing Army.

Sir Wm. Williams. You have had it proposed, by Hampden, 'Advice and Assistance;' Advice what to lay before the king—'Tis no time to form a law for the militia; let us make use of it as it is; you ought to execute the laws as they are, and let them form the Militia as well as they can; there are men enough in England to defend themselves, and money enough. If we must send abroad for men, we are in a miserable condition. If there be men and money enough, nothing remains but management. I have heard very little to-day but what I heard a week ago; there wants nothing but management. I would have a Committee of lords and commons to sit in the interval of parliament, to manage affairs.

Mr. Garroway. I never heard of such a proposal as this is for lords and commons, &c. to take the government out of the king's hand. We have heard little to-day but what we heard a week ago, and it weighs little with me. Let us know who returned the horses and arms taken from the Papists—And now we talk of the Militia. I would address the king to know who ordered these horses to be delivered back again to the Papists.

Col. Birch. When I speak for Money, I would lay the fault where it is. I will not talk of Account of Money now. It is pity these brave fellows in Ireland should be deserted; we are likely to lose those 10,000 brave men, to our shame all the world over. It is said there is a boom cross the river to Londonderry; a new fashioned thing! We are told by the Letters, 'That about the time king James should come to it, it would be delivered up.' This I say, it is a sad case they should be eaten up in the North, when, at the narrow sea, they may go over into Ireland twice a day. I wonder, notwithstanding this boom, we land nowhere else. Let them waft over, and cut this boom in pieces; there is no great force with king James. This may be done, and this is advice; and if with our men we cannot go ashore near, in 18 or 19 miles going they may go ashore; and if you do not land men, never think to regain Ireland.

Mr. Hampden. Gentlemen seem to be displeased that persons are not removed. As for myself, I would willingly resign my place, but I would have such persons named as gentlemen would have removed. The city, upon these Letters (it may be) will seize the Papists and all suspected persons that may disturb the government.

Resolved, 1. "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, that the considerable Papists, or reputed Papists, of this kingdom, may be forthwith taken into custody; and the arms and horses of all Papists, and reputed Papists, be searched for, and seized. 2. That whatever Protestants, who shall own, protect, or conceal, any arms or horses, belonging to Papists, or reputed Papists, shall be looked upon as enemies to their majesties and this kingdom; and be proceeded against accordingly. 3. That the humble Thanks of this house be given to his majesty, for his gracious communicating of divers Letters, and other Papers, which were intercepted coming from Ireland; and this day sent to, and read in this house."

Farther Debate on the Lords Amendments to the Bill of Rights and Succession.] Serjeant Wogan. I think the lord mayor and nobility in town should be joined with the lords of the council to tender the Declaration and Subscription. I think it not safe in the hands of the lords of the council of the last demised king only.

Mr. Foley. Here is a power in the Bill vested in the privy-council, to declare that the next heir shall inherit the crown. I would commit it.

Mr. Howe. I think this Bill will not give satisfaction to the nation; it excludes all commoners from tendering this Declaration, if none but the lord mayor be admitted. If the last house of commons were to be summoned, it would content the people.

Sir Tho. Clarges. To have the last house of commons sent for would have great inconvenience in it. The custom is, upon demise of the king, that the nobility meet, and declare the Successor, as it was done in the case of queen Elizabeth*. I think it very well, for such of the nobility as are at hand, and the lord mayor, to declare, &c. and then that commissioners be sent to the king.

Sir John Guise. I am not for the lord mayor to represent the commons of England. I think this king came to the crown as well and as rightfully as any of his predecessors, and he did send for all the lords and commons to consult them, and so you will approve what is done yourselves. If not absolutely necessary, I would not have commissioners sent to the king: I think the crown of England is worth coming hither for. I would not put the crown into the hands of a few.

Mr. Howe. I think it no great matter if the Clause were cast out, rather than to have commissioners to bring in what king they please.

Mr. Sacheverell. This is a matter of great importance; here are more things than one, and this Clause will not do. In the same clause they are kinged and unkinged again; and an intermission of Interregnum during the time of swearing. I think it fit for a committee.

Mr. Hampden, sen. I am for committing the clause, by reason I would make as few differences with the lords as I can. This Bill I take as a confirmation of what we have done, when the crown was presented to the king and queen. What would be the consequence, if the lords should not agree with you? (As I hear, the Bill for settling the Crown escaped narrowly, for a Clause in it was carried but by two votes). But this is in majorem cautelam, or confirmation of what you have done; it would weaken it all, and much hazard it; unless absolutely necessary to differ, I would not, but pray commit the clause.

Mr. Sacheverell. As to the other Amendment, should you agree with the lords in this, the Dispensing Power is confirmed, for the future. If thought necessary, there may be a Bill to dispense in some cases, &c. but of those but a few. If any can be so dispensed, it is not fit a Judge should chuse what laws are fit to be executed, and what not. If you say in a Bill what laws are fit to be dispensed, and what not, then it is for the safety of all England.

Mr. Garroway. If you agree with the lords for what they have done already, and exclude the Judges, you cannot punish them. I would not agree.

Mr. Ettrick. You heard, the other day, that in Hales's Case, the Judges did agree, 'That the law was the king's law, and he might dispense with it;' and seeing you can find no qualifying clause in this, I see no other way but by Bill. In the mean time I would disagree with the lords.

The Speaker. You cannot now amend your own Bill, but you may qualify the lords Amendments.

Serj. Wogan. In the 28th Hen. 8. the lord chief justice, &c. were excepted from the circuit in the place of their birth and residence; and it is hard, on the other hand, that the king cannot dispense in any case. Perhaps the sheriffs attend the king, or this house, so that if the king could not dispense with their residence, they would be in an ill case; if the Star Chamber were up, they might be fined. Sometimes a Jury may be headstrong, and find it murder in the person whom he killed defendendo; you will, by it, restrain the king from all mercy, and especially in the case of Mercy, it is against the nature of all government.

Sir W. Williams. I am for agreeing with the lords. If that stands for law, that the king can have no power to dispense in any case that can happen, then perhaps you will find that the subjects shall suffer more in this than in the Dispensing Power. Because Pardons have been abused in Impeachments, shall the crown have no power to pardon? 'Tis as necessary for the people as eating and drinking. People will necessarily stand in need of Pardons. I would not clog this Bill for Limitation of the Crown with this. It will be more natural in a Bill by itself. No man in the house, nor in the world, but will think this necessary in a Bill. It will have free agitation in this house, and before the lords. I would agree with the lords.

Sir Tho. Clarges. 'Tis now six weeks ago since this Proviso was tendered, and the gentleman told you it was necessary in five or six cases. It seemed, at the Committee, the king had that Power, and, in all debates, that that might have been done. For the king's Power of Pardoning there is no doubt; but I say, by the law the king has no Power of Dispensing. He has none by statute law, that we know, nor by common law. In *Non obstante*s, they say, why may not the king dispense as well as the Pope? This is of vast consequence, and, I believe, the lords have advised with the Judges about it: but at a conference, we shall show, how convenient it is for the king to dispense in case of a misnomer for murder. The Judges are going the circuits, and the Attorney General may easily consider of it, to part with this Clause, so dismal to our liberties; and, I hope, you will agree with the lords.

* See vol. i. p. 631.

Mr. Attorney Treby. I shall endeavour to rectify a mistake; you are told, 'the Bill was drawn by the king's counsel.' If you can show such an order, I will draw a Bill extempore. If the lords have made an order for the Judges to inspect the Bill, much more is it incumbent upon you. As for drawing the Impeachments, I can never do it till the committee will meet; and as for the king's Power of Dispensing, it is said, 'He can neither do it by common nor statute law;' for common law there is nothing above Henry 3. 'Tis said, though that be convenient, yet it was before—For statute law it is plain, that by many kings this Power has been executed, and without reproof of parliament; I believe it. Judge Hale gave Judgment of Dispensation in the Case of Thomas and Sorrel; but if enquiry be made, and you find it founded originally upon no solid bottom, nothing but a parliament can say, that is not a law convenient to be used. A stone ill placed in a wall at first may be mended, but you would not undermine the inheritance of persons. In Hanson's Case, a man was supposed to be murdered, and was not; therefore there was a reason why the king should pardon him; and it must be taken for law, because a continuance of practice. You say, 'The late king did use that Power of late, and dispensed in a case not dispensable;' not to John and Thomas, but all the people at once. 'Tis said, 'That, if we do not something in this, we acquit all the Judges of what they have done, and condemn ourselves.' There is not one word of retrospect in the Bill; but it says, 'From the first of June no Non obstante, but as formerly;' all the proceedings of the Judges are in the same state as before. When reading will satisfy, I need not speak; pray read the Clause.

Mr. Sacheverell. I hope Treby will justify me, that I attended the committee. As to this other, I would know how came the Clause of Non obstante, if the king could dispense without it? For the time past, I am glad to put up with a great many injuries done us, only to prevent for the future.

The Clause was ordered to be committed.

Petition of John Bearecroft, Esq.] June 21. A Petition of John Bearecroft, esq. serjeant at arms to Charles 2, was read; setting forth, "That the petitioner, being always zealous for the Protestant interest, was made choice of by the late earl of Manchester, then lord chamberlain, and by the then secretary Morris, to arrest and take into his custody several Popish Priests and Jesuits, who kept a mass-house and school in Holborn, and perverted many Protestants to the Popish religion: which the petitioner faithfully performed accordingly, took them from the very altar, and brought them prisoners to Whitehall; for which he hath, ever since, gone in danger of his life; and was forced to dispose of his place at Whitehall, and to abscond himself; and, having but one only son, did settle what he had on him, that thereby he might receive a competent maintenance from him during his life: but, the petitioner escaping the rage and fury of those times, his said only son was murdered in the street by one Narrative Smith, a Popish priest; and the petitioner thereupon immediately thrown into the King's-bench prison, to his utter ruin, and remained there prisoner till this most happy Revolution; not doubting then but to have found suffering men to have been rewarded: but, finding the contrary, and his petitions being rejected, for any place above-stairs in the king's household, by those that had the disposing of most there, that both knew the petitioner, and his former services and sufferings; and that they openly sold the places to those that would give most for them; and the petitioner wanting bread at this time; notwithstanding which he was forbid to trouble them any more: and praying, that the house would be pleased to call before them Fleet Sheppard, Simon Smith, and Rich. Cooling, esqrs. that they may give an account of the many thousand guineas they have unjustly got from those now put in his majesty's service; and that the petitioner may be empowered to bring forth his witnesses to prove the same."

Resolved, "That the Petition be referred to the committee appointed to inquire into the abuses in the Selling of Offices, and to prepare a bill or bills to prevent the abuses in selling Offices for the future."

Debate on Irish Miscarriages.] June 22. Sir Edw. Seymour. I do not apprehend how 400 men can keep England safe, if those who manage Ireland play fast and loose with you. It is time to enquire after these Miscarriages, and to repair to the Council-Books, for your information and satisfaction. If you do not what has not been done before, you will be what you were before. I was not for the abdicating Vote, but I am for preserving the government.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If you appoint some to inspect the Council-Books, unless they may have copies, I know not what use you will make of them. You must take the whole matter, and gentlemen will not undertake to say what is fit to report, and what not.

Mr. Howe. I second the motion. The hearts of the people are upon Ireland, and there is a fault somewhere. Some lay it on the house of commons, others somewhere else: for the satisfaction of all persons, I desire the Committee may have Copies of the Books of all the Orders, &c. and the transactions relating thereunto.—Which was ordered.

Case of Mr. Samuel Johnson.] June 24. Mr. Christy reported, from the Committee, to whom it was referred, to examine how and by what authority Mr. Samuel Johnson came to be degraded, That the committee find the Case to be as followeth; viz.

"That in Trinity Term, 2 Jac. Reg. 2, an Information was exhibited against the said Samuel Johnson, in the King's-bench, in the name of sir Robert Sawyer, the king's attorney general, for making, printing, and publishing, a scandalous and seditious Libel, intituled, 'An humble' * * * *. That, the same term, they forced him to plead; procured a jury to find him guilty; convicted him; and gave the Judgment following, which was pronounced by sir Francis Withens; 1. To pay 500 marks to the king, and to lie in the prison of the King's-bench, till it was paid. 2. To stand in the pillory three days, in three several places; viz. the Palace-yard, Charing-cross, and the Old Exchange. 3. To be whipped by the common hangman from Newgate to Tyburn.—That the Judges of the King's-bench, who sat then in court, were the lord chief justice Herbert, sir Francis Withens, sir Robert Wright, and sir Richard Holloway. That the Sentence was to be executed in Nov. in the next Michaelmas Term; but they desired, that Mr. Johnson might be first degraded; for that it would be a scandal to the clergy, to have so infamous a punishment inflicted upon a minister.—Whereupon he, being a prisoner in the King's-bench, was summoned the 19th Nov. 1686, to appear the next day, in the Convocation-house of St. Paul's, in the diocese of the bishop of London; he being rector of Curringham in Essex, within that diocese. Upon the 20th, a Habeas Corpus was brought to carry him from the King's-bench prison to the Convocation; where he found the bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, commissioners to exercise the authority and jurisdiction of the bishop of London, during his suspension, with some clergymen, and many spectators; and a libel exhibited against him by one Godfrey Lee, a proctor, dated that day, charging him of being guilty of great misbehaviours; but specified none, nor proved any; and only referred to a record before the king's temporal judges.—That Mr. Johnson demanded a copy of the Libel, and an advocate; both which the bishops denied him; but proceeded immediately to sentence him: which was, 1. That he should be declared an infamous person. 2. That he should be deprived of his rectory of Curringham in Essex. 3. That he should be a mere layman, and no clerk; and deprived of all right and privilege of priesthood. 4. That he should be degraded thereof, and of all vestments and habits of priesthood. 5. That he should undergo the punishments aforesaid. Against which proceedings Mr. Johnson protested, as being against law, and the 132 Canon, not being done by the bishop of London, his own diocesan; but they refused his protestation.—That then he appealed to the king in chancery; but they refused to admit his appeal. And immediately they proceeded to execute the said Sentence, and to degrade him by putting on his head a square cap, and then taking it off again; then they pulled off his gown, then his girdle, which he demanded as his proper goods, bought with his money, which they promised to send; but they cost him 20s. to have them again. After all, they put a Bible into his hand; which he would not part with, but they took it from him by force. All this was done, viz. the Libel, Sentence, and execution of it, in three hours space, on Saturday the 20th of November, having decreed summarily, as they did.—That, on Monday after, the Judgment in the King's-bench were executed with great rigour and cruelty, the whipping being with a whip of nine cords, knotted, shewed to the committee; and that Mr. Rouse the under sheriff tore off his cassock upon the pillory, and put a frize coat upon him.—That Mr. Johnson's wife had also an Information exhibited against her in the King's-bench, for the like matter as that against her husband."

Resolved, "1. That the Judgment against Mr. Johnson in the King's-bench was illegal and cruel. 2. That the Ecclesiastical Commission was illegal; and that, consequently, the Suspension of the bishop of London, and the authority committed to the aforesaid three bishops, was null and illegal. 3. That Mr. Johnson not being sentenced, deprived, and degraded, by the bishop of London (if he had deserved the same), was illegal. 4. That a Bill be brought in to reverse the Judgment in the King's-bench; and to declare all the proceedings before the three bishops to be illegal, null, and void. 5. That an Address may be made to his majesty, to recommend Mr. Johnson to his majesty's favour, for some ecclesiastical preferment suitable to his services and sufferings."

Articles of Impeachment against sir Adam Blair and others, for dispersing king James's Declaration.] Mr. Attorney-General reported from the committee, to whom it was referred to prepare Impeachments against sir Adam Blair, captain Vaughan, captain Mole, Dr. Elliot, and Dr. Grey, That they had prepared and agreed upon an Impeachment, accordingly: which he read in his place; as followeth:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT OF HIGH TREASON, and other high crimes and offences, against sir Adam Blair, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, John Elliot doctor in physic, and Robert Grey doctor in physic;

"Whereas king James 2 having abdicated the government; and their majesties king William and queen Mary having, on the 13th day of Feb. 1688, accepted the crown and royal dignity of this kingdom, according to the Resolution and Desire of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, now assembled in parliament; their said majesties did become, were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, king and queen of England, and the dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whose princely persons the royal state, crown, and dignity of this realm, with all honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities, to the same belonging and appertaining, were and are most fully, rightfully and intirely, invested and incorporated, united and annexed; and their said majesties have been solemnly and publickly crowned, according to law, and the laudable custom of this realm: and whereas, in and upon their majesties preservation and government, the unity, peace, tranquillity, and safety, of this nation, doth, under God, consist and depend: nevertheless sir Adam Blair, capt. Henry Vaughan, capt. Frederick Mole, John Elliot doctor in physic, and Rob. Grey doctor in physic, being subjects of their majesties, together with divers others their complices and confederates, wholly withdrawing the faith, and due allegiance, which true and faithful subjects should, and of right ought to bear to their majesties, as false traitors to their majesties, and this realm, did, upon the 10th day of June, 1689, and at divers other times, most wickedly and traiterously design, contrive, agree, conspire, resolve, and, to the utmost of their power, endeavour to disturb and destroy the said peace and common tranquillity enjoyed within this realm; and to move, make, raise, and levy war, rebellion, and insurrection, within the same; and to persuade, induce, and incite their majesties subjects to abett and assist them therein; and to deprive and depose their majesties of and from their royal state, title, crown, and dignity; and to subvert the government of this kingdom, so happily preserved and settled by and under their majesties: and to that end they did traiterously assemble themselves, meet, and consult concerning the most proper means to be used, to execute and accomplish the aforesaid wicked and traiterous designs: and, in pursuance of the same, and for the purposes aforesaid, they did traiterously hold, maintain, set forth, declare, and publish, That their majesties were Usurpers; and that the said late king James the 2nd did continue lawful and rightful king of this realm; and did attribute to him the honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities, belonging and appertaining to the imperial crown of the same: and, to compass, fulfil, complete, and bring to effect, their said Treason, and wicked purposes, they did traiterously, maliciously, and advisedly, contrive, make and procure, and cause to be made and procured, a certain detestable and traiterous Libel, purporting a Declaration of the said late king, by and under the name of king James 2; in which Libel it is contained, expressed, and declared, as followeth; viz. "A Declaration of his most sacred majesty king James the second, to all his loving subjects in the kingdom of England." [Here follows the Declaration, see p. 303.]—And they did conceal the said Libel from their majesties, their magistrates, and ministers of justice; and the same did traiterously print, publish, and disperse, and did cause to be printed, published, and dispersed, to and amongst divers of their majesties subjects: and this was most maliciously contrived, prosecuted and done, whilst their majesties were engaged in a just and necessary war, for the defence of this kingdom against the French king, and in the suppressing a Rebellion, procured, supported, and carried on, by the means and for the interest of the said French king, against their majesties, in their kingdom of Ireland. All which Treasons, Crimes, and Offences above-mentioned were contrived, committed, perpetrated, acted, and done, by the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and their complices, against our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen, their crown and dignity, and against the laws of this kingdom. Of all which Treasons, Crimes, and Offences, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, do, in the name of themselves, and of all the commons of England, impeach the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and every of them. And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusations or Impeachments against the said sir Adam Blair, &c. and also of replying to the Answers, which they, and every of them, shall make to the premises, or any of them, or to any other Accusation, or Impeachment which shall be by them exhibited (as the cause, according to course and proceedings of parliament, shall require); do pray, That the said sir Adam Blair, &c. be put to answer all and every the premises; and that such Proceedings, Examinations, Trials, and Judgments, may be, upon them, and every of them, had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice, and course of parliament."

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is a case of blood, and I hope, if I am tender you will excuse me. In 19 Ch. 2, there was a committee appointed to consider lord Clarendon's Impeachment. Nov. 6, the Articles were brought in. The course then was, that a day was set to consider, upon debate of the house, 'Whether the facts charged were, in the judgment of the house, treason.' Nov. 9, the consideration of the first Head of the fact of Treason took up from nine in the morning to five at night, 'Whether Treason should be assigned?' Then it was declared, 'That there should be no Impeachment, but on the statute 25 Edw. 3.' Then lord Vaughan stood up, and would make good the 16th article; and said, 'I do accuse lord Clarendon of corresponding with the king's enemies*.' I observe that in this parliament more attainders have been reversed than in any one parliament, and the reason is, the great oppression of Westminster-hall; and these are cautions for succeeding parliaments to be careful; and I move for a day to consider, whether this be Treason or no.—The articles were then ordered to be engrossed.

* See vol. iv. p. 384.

Debate on the Breach of Privilege upon the Earl of Danby.*] Sir W. Strickland. I would know how this Breach of Privilege came? I would not have this lord affronted.

Earl of Danby. Had I thought this a breach of Privilege, I would have complained, nor was it of that kind. You have so many weighty affairs upon your hands, that this is not worth your consideration.

Mr. Smith. I stand up only to tell that noble lord, that, if he will say he was not taken up by a messenger, I am satisfied; if he was, it must be Breach of Privilege; but if there was no such warrant sent, the noble lord will tell you, and you may proceed to other business.

Sir Walter Yonge. I would have that lord tell you plainly, whether he was taken into custody? If he will not, you must go another way. Common fame says, a messenger served a warrant upon him; and I desire the messenger may be sent for in custody.

Mr. Smith. I am always for the rights of my country, and of this house, and if he will not tell you, an honourable person will tell you, that he saw the warrant; and that is sir John Guise. I would know of him, whether the messenger had not a warrant, signed, 'Nottingham,' to take lord Danby into custody?

Sir Edw. Seymour. I do not see any extraordinary method you need take in making enquiry into this matter. The privilege of the house is not to a member only; it is to the house. The highest Breach of Privilege is the imprisonment of a member. If that be not, I know not what is. Where are the debates of this house, if this shall be? Nobody can sit here with safety. Have your predecessors had so much caution in these cases, and will you be indifferent? Shall you suffer your member to be taken out of a supreme court into custody by a Subpœna? That the Speaker, a privy counsellor, should know of an order of council, that breaks your privilege to sit in council, and he not hinder it! This is a catching age for precedents, not only of making, but imposing precedents, when I consider how you parted with the Habeas Corpus act, when you sit here obnoxious to a great man.—Lord Danby says, 'He does not know that his privilege was broken;' but he can tell, if he will, all the matter. Put a buoy upon the anchor, that men may debate freely, and not have that a doubt when we are gone away.

The Speaker. Complaint was made to the council of a ship seized at Exeter—Notice was taken that Seymour was a member, and there was no Order, but a messenger gave notice.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I shall be tender of representing a thing not as it is. I was served with two Orders, and I said I 'would not appear to the summons of a lesser council, when I was a member of a greater.' I told the king, 'I came in obedience to his commands, but not to the Order of Council, but persons that sat in council should know I was a member.' The king said, 'He knew nothing of it.' When I had the honour to sit in that Chair, and in Council, no member can say that ever his privilege was broken.

Sir Henry Goodrick. If we must believe this lord, &c. he tells you, 'It was no Breach of Privilege; but what if I, or any man, say, no warrant was produced; I heard him say, 'A man came from lord Nottingham, and desired to speak with him;' if this be made out, he has dealt candidly with you, and all mankind.

The Speaker. We are gone off from the matter. Persons of honour are shy, and think it hard in what concerns themselves: they look upon it as a point of honour. If a warrant was ordered, it was a Breach of Privilege. I cannot blame Westminster-hall, if these things be suffered when you are gone, if, when you are here, you may be served as lord Danby was. He tells you, 'He took it not for a Breach of Privilege!' But that there was a warrant, and served, is another breach of privilege. But if this be a breach of privilege, it is proper to send for the messenger.

Mr. Smith. What I insist upon is, that Guise may inform you what he knows of the warrant.

Sir John Guise. All I know is this: I was in the Gallery at Whitehall on Saturday, where I met the messenger, Evans (whom I had the honour to know, having been in his custody,) I told him, 'He would be brought before the house for seizing lord Danby.' He replied, 'He had his justification in his pocket,' and produced the warrant for seizing lord Danby for treasonable practices, signed 'Nottingham'.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I hope lord Danby will have a better opinion of me, than that I did reflect upon him. Pray order the messenger to attend you, seeing the noble lord is tender in telling you.

Sir Henry Goodrick. If it be treason, your member has no privilege. I would not stifle the thing, but send for the messenger.

Mr. Garroway. I would nip this in the bud. The Clause in the last Act of Habeas Corpus excepts members from being attached without acquainting the house. I would not only send for the messenger, but the warrant.

Evans, the Messenger, was ordered to attend the next day with the Warrant.

Debate on Mr. Justice Bedingfield, touching the Dispensing Power.] The house proceeded in the consideration of the first Head of the Bill of Indemnity.

* Eldest son of the marquis of Carmarthen, and called up to the house of lords a few months after, by the title of lord Kiveton. Being brought up to the sea service, in 1702, he was appointed vice-admiral of the red, and in 1712, he succeeded his father as duke of Leeds. He died in 1729, and was great-great-grandfather to the present duke.

Mr. Garroway. Bedingfield is dead, and it is said of him that his Advice was extrajudicial. If once Judges shall be summoned to court to give private advice, there is an end of your laws. You cannot disable a dead man from office, but you may set a mark of displeasure upon him, though he be dead.

Mr. Christy. If the king demands his opinion, and he gives a dangerous opinion, and no case drawn, it remains a doubt whether he was for the Dispensing Powers, or not.

Mr. Hawles. To what purpose shall we name a man that is dead? For except all opinions, and crimes may be more than in court. If there be a doubt in the case, he cannot answer for himself. I would have no question upon him.

The Speaker. I must take notice that, in the last Vote, you excepted a dead person; lord chief justice Wright.

Sir Robert Rich. It is known how late he came into his place; he could not get much money. He was the worse for his place; his estate is very small, that descends to his posterity, and I would not except him.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. He is dead, and the question is, Whether the sour grapes he has eaten have set his son's teeth on edge? He was dead before you made the Resolution, and I question whether properly you can name him.

Mr. Smith. I believe, this gentleman had a small estate, and so would the rest have had, if honestly got. You will do the living justice in sparing the dead.

Sir Henry Goodrick. This man gave his Opinion at a private conference. His Opinion was not a Judgment in public; let it be affirmed by any gentleman, that he was so far from countenancing the law as to take the Test. I would restrain it to this point, and no more upon this Head.

Mr. Foley. All the country know that the Judges gave the Dispensing Power in charge; but because the house is inclined to spare, put the question in general.

Mr. Hawles. Before you put a general question, think of another person who told you, 'He had his defence in his pocket.' (Sir R. Sawyer.)

Mr. Garroway. You have had a touch by Hawles of the Attorney-General. He can satisfy you positively, whether he had not order to advise, and have the consent of the Judges, to draw Hales's Patent; if not, he is in the case.

Mr. Hawles. In the Attainder of Stafford in Hen. 7th's time, the king sent to have the Judges Opinion; but they would not give any Opinion but in court, because they might hear the matter argued by counsel. This is the same thing; and those out of court are as criminal as the court. I wish the gentleman (Sawyer) had his writings here that he told you of, to inform you. It is plain and down-right, that this was to suppress the Protestant Religion. The same person that drew this Patent, gave the Patent to the Popish bookseller to print Popish books, not to exceed 5000 in a year, and in that Patent there are the same Clauses, as in Hales's Case. If Bedingfield be exempted, I am contented; but I would not let the less guilty be exempted, and the more innocent go free.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Four are a reasonable number to except: I would not make too many desperate. What are the Solicitor and Attorney? They are but ministerial; the Draught is sent to them in hæc verba, and they do but sign it; and where they are but barely ministerial; I would leave them out.

Mr. Palmes. When you intended to except but a few, it was that you would make them capital. If you do not lay your hand upon those alive, they may do the same thing again. Will you part with eight Judges in a breath?

Sir Rob. Cotton. We are upon the Judges, and I am surprized we should fall from the question upon the Attorney-General, who was but ministerial. He left his place of Attorney-General about prosecuting the Bishops. This will alarm many less criminal, and I am against it.

Sir Tho. Lee. There is a collateral question on a member, who seems to be justified or excused, because he was but barely ministerial. I would ask one question for all, but I would not have it hereafter go for a rule, that a ministerial officer may do any thing (indeed all are ministerial.) But, suppose the chancellor is so, who sets the seal to an illegal Patent—Families depending, it may raise many enemies, which is not the end of the Indemnity, but to punish some, and bring others heartily to embrace the government for the grace they receive. Great numbers of incapacities are so many marks of ignominy upon so many families.

Sir John Guise. Upon this maxim of policy, I cannot agree to employ those I cannot trust, or put them in a capacity to do more mischief. What will all the people ruined by these men say to us? Pray what have they deserved your favour for? For breaking all your laws? I believe, you will not exclude one of that number from justifying himself. Pray propose every man in particular, and not a general question.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I think you cannot take the Indemnity too far. It is our business to heal the nation; so far as is consistent with our safety, pardon all you can; only in one case, you cannot pardon, and that is, not to bring blood upon your posterity. But as for ministerial officers, they are all so. Posterity is innocent, whoever is guilty, and put the general question.

Resolved, "That no more persons be excepted out of the Bill of Indemnity on this Head."

Debate on a Petition being presented from the City of London, unsigned. June 25. The Commons received a Petition from the Common Council of London, by the Sheriffs.

Sir Robert Howard. I never heard of this Petition till now. To one thing I can speak; certainly there is no question of the loyalty of the city of London, and their full adherence to the government. They got a Common Hall, and went in entirely to the Change, and defended it with their hands. You have had petitions here without names. You are told the Sheriffs are the proper officers, &c. and that they will sign it, and pray let them sign it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I have known formerly strange Petitions from the City of London. In 1641, to alter your laws on several heads till they took off our heads; but the City is in much better temper. I know not, by what appears, whether the Petition be from the body of the City, and I would not have it read.

Mr. Howe. I would keep out that filthy trimming trick, to disoblige our friends, and oblige our enemies. I wonder we should go back to 1641, and not remember three years ago. A great many members have suffered in 1641, as much as Clarges, and I would not do any thing that may seem to disoblige the City.

Col. Birch. The time I have sat here, I never knew when a Petition came from public persons, that ever it was signed; but as for the motions to return the Petition back, for the City to call a Common Council to have it signed, I believe it is true, that the country is in many places disaffected to the government; therefore I would not disoblige them: that safety we sit under, by God's blessing, is from them. There wants but one thing; if they could get us loose from the city of London, their work is done, that are disaffected. I would rather receive the petition in the usual manner, but rather than not receive it, I would send it out to be signed.

The Petition was sent out, and signed by the Sheriffs.

Sir Tho. Lee. When a member brings a Petition to you from any body, he must open it, with his desire to present it. The person who petitions must come to the bar, and own it.

Sir Wm. Williams. If your member was the messenger to receive the paper only, it is no great matter; but if he present it in his place, the matter is, whether you will send it out to be signed, or receive it from the member. If he will, let him move for them to come in. He has taken it out of their hands; he ought to open and move it.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. It was the Resolution of the house that this Petition should be signed. I appeal to you, whether it be signed; they only tell you they are directed from the Common Council to present the Petition to you.

Sir Robert Clayton. If that gentleman did understand the constitution of that body, he would know that the common seal is never set, but only signed 'Wagstaffe.' You have the Petition from the hands of the Sheriffs, as good vouchers as you can have from that court.

Sir Patience Ward. The practice of courts makes the best interpretation of things. The city is a great body, and cannot sign the Petition, but you have the Sheriffs who will sign it. I do avow it, and so will other members, if required.

Mr. Hawles. I understood, that, when you sent it out to be signed by the Sheriffs, it should be in no other manner than it is, 'That they delivered it by command of the Common-Hall.' Perhaps they were told it would be a criminal matter to come with a multitude of hands. I think it ought to be read.

Sir Tho. Clarges. By the rules of the house you ought not to read the Petition. Forms preserve essences, and they must be observed. Any Order of Court must be signed, and approved by the court sitting, and the order registered. But they say, 'No, not that; but in a tumultuary way'—when it comes to be an act of theirs, they will not do it. This is not such a signing as the gravity of this house expects. It does not shew that the Sheriffs and Common Serjeant approve it, and for these reasons I must give my negative.

Sir Tho. Lee. I hope reading the Petition depends upon the nature of the Petition, and not the form of delivering it. The use of signing the Petition is, that there be no scandalous matter in it, and that they do avow it, and are accountable to you for their discretion in the matter of it. I would read it.

Sir Wm. Williams. I do agree with Lee, if we could pass to the matter without the form. If it have not that form requisite, you never look into the matter. We are upon the outside of the Petition, on the face of it; the matter you cannot look into. If it be universally true that a petition ought to have hands, or seals, to it, you cannot receive it, and you have done wrong to so many persons and corporations you have received petitions from, without hands, or seals. Why do you require hands to petitions? It is that the petitioners may be answerable for the contents. Those say, 'They have order from the Common Council to deliver it to you.' You must have the Petition owned, not for form sake, but a necessary rule. Suppose there is Treason in it, and no person to answer for that Treason, that libel. In the name of the Speaker is in the name of the house; I know it by experience in my prosecution. They are a body without a head, a body without a hand, when not signed. To read it without a hand,—I am against it. Let it be signed as it is usual. It is the sanction of the Petition, and without a hand to it, I shall never give my consent for it to be read.

Mr. Boscawen. I appeal to gentlemen, in times past, whether a Petition from the City, signed by a public officer, was not taken to be from the city? The sheriffs and common serjeant (who is the proper officer) who are members of the Common Hall, are included as part of that body. You must put it upon that question, and valeat quantum valere potest. If you refuse that, you refuse what was never done to the city.

Mr. Hampden, sen. The only question now is, Whether they have so signed the Petition as to prepare you for reading it; and they have not signed it as petitioners, but avow it from the Common Hall. They were present at the framing the Petition, and when it was agreed. If gentlemen have no mind to hear reason, (Upon some noise made) you may put the question presently. What farther confirmation would you have? Does it not answer the end of all signing petitions? 'but,' says the gentleman, 'the Sheriffs, &c. will not sign it as petitioners, but as ministers of the Common Hall;' and, suppose the case should be that they do not consent, you are obliged to receive it; it is no fiction, no piece of poetry, but authentic. If because the Sheriffs do not agree to sign it, and therefore you will not receive it, you put the negative upon the hall by the sheriffs.

The Speaker. They that are against receiving a Petition from the Commons ought to go out, because it is their right to petition.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Till the Petition is opened, the house is not possessed of the matter, and those for it ought to go out.

The Speaker. I am satisfied in my judgment that the Noes ought to go out.

So they did: and the Petition was ordered to be read, 174 to 147.

Petition from the Common Council of London for taking off the Tests.] The petition was then read, setting forth, "That the body representative of the city of London, in the Common Hall assembled for the choice of sheriffs, cannot but with all thankfulness acknowledge, upon this occasion, the infinite mercy of Almighty God in his gifts of heroic courage and excellent conduct to his now majesty, and wisdom and counsel to your honours; whereby the petitioners right to elect their chief magistrates freely and quietly hath been wonderfully preserved, all their liberties, and the very being of justice, peace, and prosperity, in the city, depending thereupon. That, by the gracious influence of Divine Providence, this city is become very powerful, and a strong bulwark for the defence of the Protestant Interest and the security and quiet of his majesty and the kingdom, if an universal amity and unity be preserved amongst the protestant citizens, who do equally and perfectly renounce and detest all communion whatsoever with the Papacy and the Roman Church, and do adhere only to the authority of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament: the principal danger, impending over our English Church and State, being, from the politic popish designs, to divide the protestants, as they did heretofore in the beginning of the Reformation; whereby they first subdued and destroyed the Calvinists; and then, with the like bloodthirsty cruelty, suppressed the Lutherans, whom they had deluded to help them in the destruction of their Protestant brethren: and praying the ancient right of the city, freely to elect their Sheriffs and other magistrates, may be vindicated from all invasions and questions concerning it: and for that purpose, that the Bill for restoring Corporations to their rights and privileges may be perfected, as the weighty affairs of the house will permit. And, in regard of the present dangerous Conspiracy of the Papists and their accomplices against the Protestant Religion, our king, and government; and the Invasion threatened by the French king, whereby the united force of all the Protestants is apparently necessary; they pray, that our most gracious king may be freed from all restraints of using his Protestant subjects indifferently, in his military or civil services, according to their several qualities and abilities, wherewith God Almighty, nature, education, and experience, have endowed them, to that very end, that they might be useful to their king and country, and therein serve God in their generation."

Debate on the Impeachment of Sir Adam Blair, &c.] June 26. The Impeachment of sir Adam Blair, &c. was read.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This Impeachment being matter of blood, I would have it debated, Whether the matter contained in it be Treason? In lord Clarendon's Case, it was said, there was never any precedent from Henry 4; nor by the words of the statute 25 Edw. 3, and I believe no precedent since that time. Fitzharris was impeached, and that was for conspiring the death of the king. We are the grand inquest of England, and I hope I shall never be wanting in my duty. I would know, whether, if an indictment be brought to a grand jury, the question ever was, 'Agree, agree,' [some calling out so] enquire whether the Indictment be according to law. I desire so much satisfaction as a jury would have. A consultation held, and no war levied, as in lord Russel's case, is no Treason. If the king's counsel will declare it to be Treason, I shall agree; if not, I doubt it.

Mr. Howe. Though we have no power to make treason, I hope we shall not have power to connive at it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is an extraordinary thing for a gentleman to say, 'that when a man speaks his mind here, he connives at treason.' Lord St. John, in his Argument against lord Strafford, says, 'that judgment cannot be exercised but by Bill.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I confess, that I have not read that Argument this long time, therefore I will not controvert it, but I never heard that a parliament could not judge; but it is a power to be kept solely in parliament, lest it should be an example to Westminster-hall; and therefore judged by Bill of Attainder. Before Edw. 3rd's time, Treason was dressed up as in the late Informations. If men act such things, it is destructive to the whole, and this was put into the statute of Edw. 3, by way of caution, like firing of a beacon. You send not up the Impeachment till the house dares venture their credit upon making it good, and the commons ought to be satisfied that the evidence will hold out with the lords as well as here; else the evidence should be punished. It is a mischievous practice, when the courts of justice have been exorbitant, and would be safe in so doing. This Declaration that sir Adam Blair has published, declares another king, and de-thrones this. If this be a general opinion, I think we ought not to carry up this Impeachment; if it be a crime (which every body thinks) it ought to be carried up to the lords, that it may be judged treason.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Lee was of opinion, in lord Clarendon's Impeachment, 'That there was no common law treason;' upon debate, that Impeachment was not carried up till it was clear, that the Article was Treason. Before the statute 25 Edw. 3, Treason was so ubiquitary, that it was treason, to assert treason, with the proviso relating to the judges in doubtful cases, &c. After that act, Treason was banded more than before. In R. 2nd's time, sir Thomas Hawksley was adjudged for making a motion in parliament, insomuch that Hen. 4 was petitioned by the lords and commons, 'That Treason might not be so hackneyed about;' and in queen Mary's time it was repealed. I dare put my credit upon it, there has been no Judgment of Treason from H. 3rd's time; and lord Coke is express, in his chapter of Treason, 'That the statute Edw. 3. was taken away by the statute of queen Mary.' Lord chief justice Vaughan used this argument, 'That there was no common law treason, no constructive treason.' Lord Vaughan, (now lord Carberry,) brought in an Article in Clarendon's Impeachment of his 'corresponding with the king's enemies, and betraying his secret counsels *,' which was special matter; and then the Article was voted Treason.

Sir Tho. Lee. My friendship to lord Clarendon induced me no farther, than that I was against the Address for removal of him from the king; but I concurred with the house, and went through every vote to make impeachments easy here. At that time the king was angry with Clarendon, and took the seal from him, that he might go out of town into the country. The duke of York did support Clarendon, who at that time went to church, and was reputed a Protestant; at the same time, all the lawyers, raised by Clarendon, followed him, and a gentleman then said (Waller) 'Touch a lawyer, and all the lawyers will squeak.' Vaughan (who was quickly after made Chief Justice) argued as strongly against the Impeachment, as he had done before for it, but told you he had changed his opinion. There are two ways of delivering in an Impeachment; one at the lords bar, another at a conference. The Impeachment of lord Mordaunt was delivered at a conference, by Mr. Seymour†. I leave the house to consider, whether you will deliver this Impeachment at a conference.

Col. Birch. I have sat here long, and seen many things done. It is usual that the most able lawyers go up with an Impeachment to enforce it. I see in my eye a person of great worth, though aged (serjeant Maynard) I would have him go up with it.

Serjeant Maynard. Pray put not that upon me, who know nothing of the business. Pray let Birch go, who knows the whole business.

Col. Birch. I never refused the service of the house. The reason why I moved for serjeant Maynard was, because never any man did argue better in the Impeachment of lord Strafford. Clipping a shilling is treason, and is not subverting the government? I would have the person to carry it up, who is the fittest to carry it on.—The Impeachment was ordered to be carried up to the lords by col. Birch.

When the above Articles were carried up to the lords, they appointed a Committee, to inspect the Journals, what hath been the method and proceedings upon Impeachments from the house of commons. This committee reported on the 27th, "That they have considered the Journals as far as the Impeachment of the first duke of Bucks in 1626; and did not examine further off, because they found the entries still shorter the further they went. Their lordships do not find, as far as they went, any particular account touching the method of receiving Impeachments. They find, sometimes, Impeachments have been delivered at conferences, and sometimes with and sometimes without Articles; but when they have been delivered at the bar of the house, it hath always been by way of message from the house of commons: but it does not appear whether the lords on the woolsack were sitting while the Articles were reading; nor doth it appear that any difference hath been made between the receiving a Message where an Impeachment hath been brought up, and any other Message."—On the 29th of June, the house of lords appointed a committee to inspect the Journals, as to precedents of Impeachments, and the grounds and reasons of those precedents. On the 2d of July, the earl of Rochester reported what precedents the committee had found in the Journals, and amongst the Records of the Tower. After considering this report, and much debate, the question being put, "Whether this house will proceed upon the Impeachment brought from the house of commons against these persons?" it was resolved in the affirmative.—The persons impeached were then ordered to be brought to the bar, in safe custody, by the keeper of Newgate, or such of them as are in his custody, on the 4th of July, to hear the Articles read. On the 4th of July, some of them are brought; the Articles are read; they are allowed copies and counsel; and then are ordered to stand committed to Newgate, in order to take their trials.—On the 12th of July they put in their Answers in person at the bar; which were carried down to the commons on the 13th and 23d of July. *

* See vol. iv. p. 385. † Vol. iv. p. 347.

* It does not appear that the Commons

Report of the Warrant against the Earl of Danby.] June 28. Sir Thomas Clarges reported, from the earl of Nottingham, an account of the Warrant issued out against the earl of Danby, viz. 'That on Friday last, the earl of Nottingham was informed, that lord Danby had fitted out a small vessel with arms, with some design unknown to his relations, and a wherry to carry him away; that he had this information from the lord president; that he had not time to put it in writing, nor was it given upon oath, but he wrote it, upon memory, for his own satisfaction. Upon enquiry of the reasons, &c. from lord Danby, he said, 'That the vessel was his own yacht, that he had fitted it with the same arms it had, and no more than before, to make use of for his diversion; and that he had no design in the least criminal.' 'This,' lord Nottingham said, 'he found so ingenuous an Answer, that, considering his behaviour in the change, in contributing to the present establishment, he released my lord without bail, but with promise, upon his word and honour, to appear upon summons.'

Debate thereon.] Mr. Howe. I am willing to go on in the Act of Oblivion, but I am concerned that this proceeding sticks not only on the people, but that their representatives may be in danger. But if, by intreaty, a man may be taken up in this manner, every mother's son may be taken up. I hope you will order the matter so, that you may justify your proceedings.

Mr. Bickerstaffe. This was in the afternoon, and the house not sitting; upon complaint to the president of the council, he could not do less.

Sir Robert Rich. I suppose that gentleman was not here, when the messenger gave an account of it. He said, 'He had served the warrant, and whispered lord Danby in the ear.'

Sir John Thompson. You may remember, Evans, the messenger, acquainted the house, 'That lord Nottingham granted the warrant without oath.' I have nothing to say to lord Carmarthen, but one member is injured, and I know not how to justify the thing. If this warrant was granted as a privy-counsellor, or a justice of peace, I know no law for it; for if six privy-counsellors do it, and here is but one, it is worthy your consideration. If as a justice of peace, he cannot take up a man without oath. If one counsellor shall whisper to another, and imprison a man, I know not who can be safe. If we take up this now, at the rate elections go at, and the determination in sir Samuel Barnardiston's Case, they may have a parliament as they please. I know not but that it may be in the power of one great man to make a parliament. I hope the house will be jealous of their right.

ever made any replication to these Answers. On the 31st of March 1690, in a subsequent parliament, sir Adam Blair petitioned the lords that he might be bailed, which was consented to.

Sir Robert Cotton. I take it, any member of the house may be arrested for treason, or felony, without leave of the house, but he cannot be detained without leave of the house. But the question is then, Whether there was an oath given? In this case, I think it was necessary. I think the power of the Habeas Corpus late Act lays that aside. But whether one privy-counsellor, without six, can take up a man, without oath, in matters of felony, or treason, that is the question.

Sir Francis Blake. I should be loth to go into Northumberland without this being decided; there would be no safety for me when I am at home.

Sir John Guise. I am much concerned that this, by a general silence, should be passed over. The Breach of Privilege seems plain; is it not a thing to be mended? If this be prejudicial, and made only a jest, to pass it thus over, if this be done to one, it may to another. Whether if you complain to the other house, of this breach of privilege, it may not be prejudicial? I would pass it over rather than give interruption to the great business, but so that neither I nor any man else be taken up.

Mr. Garroway. I cannot see but that this is a breach of privilege. I would not drive it high, but declare my mind. What you will do in it is another thing, but I hope you will vote it a breach of privilege, though it be no commitment, the only taking the member up without oath. I would go as softly as we can, but I know not how to proceed upon lord Nottingham, without coming to the lords. I would vote it only a Breach of Privilege, and address the king to take order that the like be not done for the future.

Mr. Howe. I cannot agree to this motion. Have we not declared our right? What are we the better? In two months, this man may go round the house, thus. I hope, as Englishmen, we shall not forget our rights; and any man that will do this is not fit to be employed in the government.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think this is a breach of privilege. I suppose it is not the intention of the house (since the Act of Habeas Corpus requires six privy-counsellors to sign the warrant,) to approve it in one only. If that be not our privilege, I know of none that we have. I would not have it go off, that he could warrant the thing. I think we ought to vote it a breach of privilege, and address the king that nothing of this kind be done for the future.

Col. Birch. If this had been done by a person that had not very well understood privilege of parliament, I would be for it as proposed; but the thing apparent in the warrant is called 'treasonable practices,' and it was evident to him before he signed the warrant. If there be any thing you do not see, pray let us feel it, if you will examine it to the bottom. I am not so much lawyer as to distinguish 'treason,' and 'treasonable practices.' See the bottom of all, and then take your resolution.

Mr. Charles Montagu *. There is one thing I cannot solve. The Paper that lord Nottingham gives in says, 'The Information was given in on Friday,' and the warrant bears date on Thursday.

Sir Tho. Clarges. That may be a mistake. He said, 'The warrant was for treasonable practices,' which is bailable. For treason and felony plainly expressed, if an ordinary justice of peace may bail, this may be so too. Pray vote it a Breach of Privilege, and address the king to signify your opinion of it, that it may not be so for the future.

Sir Rowland Gwynn. I am willing you should put the question, but if you say no more than is proposed, I am against it. I think my lord of Nottingham's answers are not fair. I know not what to make of it.

Serjeant Maynard. As this case stands, a member is imprisoned, and a warrant is made to take him for treasonable practices; if we take notice of it, and let a member sit amongst us so accused, we cannot well answer that. We are to vote it a breach of privilege, and then enquire what those treasonable practices are. At this rate, we may all be imprisoned, and whipped to our lives end. Vote it a breach of privilege, and sit not mute upon so plain a breach.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I look upon this as an invasion of privilege, and worthy your cognisance. I hear it moved to refer it to the committee of privileges to enquire into it, but I think that not fit. From whom will you have informations? Will you send for lords Nottingham and Carmarthen? I would have a good correspondence with the lords; the peers will not come to you, and there will be a rupture; but if you will come up to the motion, for your honour and ease, vote the breach of privilege, and then address the king.

Mr. Garroway. I shall speak to your question. It does not appear by that Answer, which lord Nottingham gave, that there was sufficient cause to take lord Danby into custody, and therefore vote it illegal, and a breach of privilege.

Col. Bireh. I desire to speak a word to the question. I have told you that I thought this a strange thing, and it was as strangely done for a person of his understanding and honour. To me it appears more; when lord Danby to this house is upon his parole to appear when summoned, and we all know he is in custody by that; which makes me think, there is more in it than at the present appears.

Mr. Harbord. I would know what you aim at, that I may see whether you are like to have good success. I take this imprisonment of lord Danby to be occasioned by his father. I would do as I would be done by. If a child do against his father's desires, a parent would prevent it. Here comes the marquis of Carmarthen to lord Nottingham, and tells him his son will go to sea, in a hostile manner, without a commission, and he is a pirate by doing so, and must die for it. He applies to lord Nottingham; but that is not a good way; he should have applied to the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, and has not done as he should, but it is a hard case to lay the stress upon lord Nottingham; and if I had a son that had done as lord Danby, I would have done so; and therefore, as Garroway proposed, the complaint against lord Danby is not sufficient to put him in custody. I have no obligation to lord Nottingham: I speak my mind, and I care not two-pence for those who interrupt me, [something in passion] be they who they will. I have drawn my sword for the king, and I care not for the censure of any man. I would leave lord Nottingham out of the question.

Sir John Thompson. He that touches the parliament, touches the vital part of the nation. The fault is the greater; for the man is not fit to be secretary that carries about him the legislative authority to commit in this manner. The messenger had been clapped up, if he had not done it; it was the secretary did it. Put the question thus, 'That granting the Warrant without notice, &c. was a Breach of Privilege.'

Mr. Howe. I am satisfied of Harbord's good intentions; but if I had a child, I would have a French Protestant to govern him, and not a secretary of state. We are told of your member's pirating, but what reason for his taking up, I know not; but pray right yourselves, and put the question.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I desire, that my son should be tutored by an Englishman, and not by a French Protestant. I am entirely

* "A young man, Mr. Montagu, a younger branch of the earl of Manchester's family, began to make a great figure in the house of commons. He was a Commissioner of the Treasury, and soon after made Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had great vivacity and clearness both of thought and expression: his spirit was at first turned to wit and poetry, which he continued still to encourage in others, when he applied himself to more important business. In the parliament of 1700, that the most eminent man of the Whigs might not oppose them, they got him to be made a baron by the title of Halifax, which was sunk by the death of that marquis without issue male. In 1701, (being then Auditor of the Exchequer) he was impeached by the commons, but acquitted by the lords. In 1707, he had a great share in the Union, and having proposed the Bill for settling the Succession in the House of Hanover, he was appointed by her majesty to carry over that Act to the elector. He continued in the queen's favour till the change of the ministry in 1710. On the king's accession he was appointed first lord of the Treasury, and soon after was created earl of Halifax. He died without issue in 1715, aged 54." Burnet.

for the question proposed. If it be a Breach, it ought to be so tender that hereafter it may not be a precedent for the loss of privilege; for that reason, I would not pass it over in silence; the consequence may be fatal. I was with lord Nottingham, but the question is, Whether his Answer was a ground to attach your member? But there is a distinction between those that have the honour to sit here, and a private person; I see him no otherwise criminal for this warrant, but as lord Danby is a member. But as for the kindness of the father to his son, the complaint ought to have been made unto you. Some gentlemen are for a committee to enquire into it, but if you are not at the bottom already, I would have a committee. The present business is to vindicate your own privileges. Therefore I am for such a question.

Sir John Guise. I am sorry we should have comparisons betwixt father and son, to our detriment. Something of piracy was spoken under me, &c. but I hope that is but a conjecture. But if the vessel was armed, nobody knew who it was for, or who against. I would name the person that granted the warrant, and refer the rest to a committee.

Sir Henry Goodrick. It is certain that lord Danby made his application to the duke of Schomberg, and the office of Ordnance, and had ammunition and provision to scour upon privateers; it is a little vessel, and can fight or not fight as he will; the general gave directions for it, and he had arms, &c. accordingly. I have not seen the marquis, but his mother was alarmed, and was not willing the whole stay of their family should run hazard with privateers, under a pretence to scour about the river. But such imminent hazard he was like to run of his life, that they were resolved to take all means to stop him. I hope this will satisfy the house, and not rest upon him as any scandal. I aver this to be matter of fact, and I would only vote this to be a Breach of Privilege, without naming lord Nottingham. Perhaps he was led by this inducement.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think Goodrick spoke against the addition of the question naming lord Nottingham, because it appears on your Journal the warrant was entered there; and therefore no reason for the addition, being now no occasion. The thing is to assert your privileges and rights, and the question will run well without the addition.

Sir Robert Howard. The thing is very unhappy, and much mistaken in the manner of proceeding; but natural affections must not be used to try tricks with the government. Natural affection may be showed, and stop there. Suppose lord Nottingham should tell you he did according to law, is not that a sufficient excuse? Lord Nottingham, upon information of a privy counsellor, granted the warrant, but still the fact is done, and you vote it a breach of privilege, and that is all.

Mr. Smith. Howard says, 'It will justify lord Nottingham, because he had his information from a privy-counsellor.' I would be satisfied whether a privy counsellor must not give information upon oath, as well as another?

Sir Walter Yonge. I am very indifferent whether you name lord Nottingham in the question, but assert the crime. There is no fault in the messenger; he knew not of it; but I am sure lord Nottingham must know of it. Granting the warrant is a thing that must not be passed by so hastily. You will find few messengers that will deny such execution of a warrant. Pray put it, 'That the granting such a Warrant is a Breach of Privilege.'

The Speaker. The messenger undoubtedly breaks your privilege, as well as the bailiff that arrests your member.

Mr. Hawles. The bailiff, and he that sues out the writ against a member, are upon record, and if you only call upon the person who does officiate, your privilege will be quickly lost. Whoever issues out the warrant is more, or equally, guilty than he that executes it.

Col. Birch. Let it appear on your Books that you judge prudently. See the date of the warrant.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. At the same time that lord Nottingham received the information, he made the warrant and put it in writing for his memory. I never knew it a breach of privilege, if a writ was never executed. In some cases, the statute of non-claim may be pleaded; if the writ be not taken out in legal time, it is excluded. If it be necessary, several precedents may be produced, not to hinder a man from a just debt. But prosecution of a writ will hinder a member from his attendance; but if it be not served, it is no breach of privilege, because it does not hinder a member's attendance.

Resolved, "That the granting a Warrant to arrest the earl of Danby, a member of this house, and the taking him into custody by virtue of that Warrant, is a Breach of Privilege of this house."

The King's quickening Speech to both Houses.] This day his majesty made the following Speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen; The time of the year being so far advanced, and there being several Acts yet to be passed for the safety and settlement of the nation, I desire you would expedite them as soon as you can, it being necessary there should shortly be a recess, both that I may be at liberty to pursue the business of Ireland with all possible vigour, and that the members of both houses may repair to their several counties to secure the peace, and to put the Militia into some better posture. I am very sensible of the zeal and good affection which you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, have shewed to the public in giving those Supplies you have done already; and I do not doubt, but, from the same inducements, you will be ready to give more, as the occasions require; which I must let you know, will be sooner than perhaps you may expect, because the necessary expence of this year will much exceed the sums you have provided for it. And that you may make the truer Judgment in that matter, I am very willing you should see how all the Moneys have been hitherto laid out: And to that end, I have commanded those Accounts to be speedily brought to you; by which you will see how very little of the Revenue has been applied to any other use than that of the Navy and the land-forces. I must remind you of making an effectual and timely provision of the Money for the States of Holland; and I doubt not but you will take care to see a fitting Revenue settled for myself.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I will add no more, but to recommend earnestly to you to avoid all occasions of dispute or delay, at a time that requires union and vigour in your counsels, upon which the preservation of all that is dear to us doth so much depend: and I do promise that nothing shall ever be wanting, on my part, which may contribute towards it."

Debate in the Commons on the King's Speech.]

Sir Robert Howard. The king is pleased to leave the matter to us; and, in the first place, let us return Thanks to the king, &c. and go into a committee to consider the Speech, paragraph by paragraph.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We cannot be able, before the recess, to make a judgment of the arrears of the Money; by winter we shall have time to make recompence for what falls short. Till then we cannot compute what that will be. The Poll is contingent with the other taxes; till then we are not able to give the king any Answer, and then we may make up what is deficient.

Mr. Howe. I think there is another business upon our hands, as well as the Indemnity. We are not yet off from lord Danby's Breach of Privilege: I would neither frighten the messenger, nor any body else in the king's service, but if you will pass this over, I will say no more.

Col. Birch. We all desire a recess, and to me seem to do a quite contrary thing. The Bill of Oblivion has held us a Month, and, for ought I know, we may sit till Michaelmas, and not do it. This is a fine thing to keep you from all business. I would dispatch all bills relating to Money, and when you have the Account, you will be satisfied in a day or two. 'Tis true some things are contingent in the Poll-Money. I remind you that Money stands voted in the house for the Dutch. Their ships came heartily to our assistance; therefore take the king's Speech into consideration on Monday.

Sir John Thompson. Let us do our country justice, and the Dutch justice; they came for their own preservation, as well as ours, against the great preparation of the French king.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The Dutch have no great war upon their hands now, but we know who has; we have the French and Ireland.

VOL. V.

We shall comply amply with the king, if we go upon what is before us; and to-morrow we may go upon the Excise. If we go on upon the Accounts, we shall have no hopes of a recess; therefore go to-morrow upon the Excise.

Mr. Howe. I am willing to go as soon as possible upon Money. I am sensible of the service the Dutch have done; many an honourable gentleman has done you great service, and yet brings you no Bills of Account for it. I hope the king will give us satisfaction in the Irish Affairs, and save you the labour of particular Accounts. If the Dutch can fit out more ships than they have already, they may do it in Money. Upon the whole, I am ready to give money when it is requisite; but you may see the Accounts mentioned.

Sir Tho. Clarges. In our Aids to the king, we have not limited one thing nor another. We hoped that 200,000*l.* had been paid off of what we had granted, to the Dutch, and the rest supplied. I cannot see how more money can be expended before we meet again; and in February next, is the last payment of the Subsidy, and we may consider betwixt this and then. Here in the Poll-Money and the Revenue, altogether, are three millions betwixt this and February. There is no absolute need of falling upon the Revenue, to settle it; till the Book of Rates be perfected, we cannot settle the Revenue. Here is the Excise—And I know not how to put the wheels faster upon a run than they are.

Resolved nem. con, "That the humble Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty, for his gracious Speech."

Mr. Hampden acquainted the house, "That he, with others of his majesty's privy-council, had, according to the order of the house, attended his majesty with their Address, That the considerable Papists or reputed Papists of this kingdom may be forthwith taken into custody, and the arms and horses of all Papists and reputed Papists be searched for and seized: and that his majesty was pleased to answer, That he would use all means he could, to secure this kingdom from any danger that might arise from Papists or reputed Papists, or any other that shall disturb the peace of the Government."

Sir Henry Capel acquainted the house, "That he, with others of his majesty's privy-council, had, according to the order of the house, attended his majesty with their Address of Thanks for his gracious communicating to this house divers Letters and other Papers, which were intercepted coming from Ireland: and that his majesty was pleased to say, he was glad of any thing he did, that gave satisfaction to this house."

Sir Henry Capel also acquainted the house, "That he, with others of his majesty's privy-council, had, according to the order of the house, attended his majesty with their Address, That his majesty would be pleased to give leave, that some members of this house may inspect the Books of the Privy-Council, and the Books of the Irish Committee, and take copies of all Orders and Instructions therein relating to the Irish Affair: and that his majesty took it into his hand, and said, He had likewise an Address from the lords to that purpose, which he had given no answer to; and that thereupon he the said sir Henry Capel supposed he would consider of both."

Further Debate on the Heads of Exceptions in the Bill of Indemnity] July 1. The house proceeded on the further consideration of the Heads of Exceptions in the Bill of Indemnity. The prosecution of the Bishops was moved to be another Head.

Sir Leveson Gower. I have spoken with several of the Bishops about their Prosecution. They are better Christians than to desire any body should be prosecuted upon their account. I think therefore the house may pass upon some other Head.

On the Commission for Ecclesiastical Causes.

Mr. Garraway. I think, if you proceed upon the debate of this Head, that it will puzzle the lawyers to make it capital. Though the High-Commission Court is down by act of parliament, yet the king has a great power in ecclesiastical affairs. As for Mr. Johnson, I would make him satisfaction for his sufferings*; and then the question will be, Whether you will proceed any further upon this article?

Sir R. Temple. The Bishops were proceeded against for addressing the king about the Declaration, that cut up all your laws by the roots. I take this occasion to venture a motion, to except some persons. If you go head by head, you will nominate so many, that you will alarm the whole nation, and never be at an end, and be much entangled in the business.

Col. Austen. I am for naming mighty members, but you do not justice to the nation, nor is the cry of blood answered, if you do not your duty.

Mr. Hawles. I am for excepting few as to life, suppose four or two. You know a dead man for one, one in the prison for another: some are at liberty, and the most guilty persons escape. If the ministerial persons be excepted, and escape, if that be so, do as you please, and except as few as you please.

Mr. Howe. I think what you are now doing is in consideration of what has been done before, so as to secure you for the future. Some have gone so far as to justify king James in what he has done; if you exempt those, you arraign what you have done already. The first rise and spring of the Bill of Exclusion was the Popish Plot, and for maintaining Popery you rejected him out of the kingdom. Kings do no wrong, but if ministers do no wrong—Therefore for our own justification, either yield that king James is wrongfully put out of his kingdom;—if you proceed not against his counsellors, we must conclude either that we have done wrong, or that king James has done none at all.

Mr. Harbord. I am for catching the great fishes; to catch little rogues is not worth your while. I would not fall into this same misfortune by not making examples. This Ecclesiastical Court was not managed by Jenner; he is a little fellow. But for a secretary of state (lord Sunderland) to renounce his God, and act in that commission, you had as good give up all as not to question him. Mr. Johnson's wounds smart upon us. If he escape thus, what security can we have? I am not for sweeping all the Commissioners, but go on upon this Head, and make some examples.

Mr. Arnold. I wonder that those who serve for the university of Oxford, are no more concerned in this Commission of Magdalen College.

Sir Wm. Williams. Consider this Commission in its constitution. Nothing in itself, these seven or eight years, has been so pernicious, that ecclesiastics should be constituted, not only to suspend this or that bishop, but to unbishop and unecclesiastic them! Things grow on by steps and degrees; when they found that the bishops and temporal peers came into the commission, they would be felo de se. It is fit to make an example of these persons, who have violated their own function and their own law. Make one example of him, as you have done of the Judges.

Mr. Coningsby. This is lumping indeed. If we must lump, I would do it in mercy; do in this as in the other Heads. Here are but ten, and as you have exempted but two out of the former, pray exempt but two out of this.

Mr. Smith. None of these acted according to their commissions, but set up a law-making power. This did subvert both church and state; but to say, that some favoured the Protestants—but I would have it showed, what Protestants, unless their private friends, to excuse them. I would favour as much as any man; some that have gone farthest, as those in the first and second Commission, I would lay some punishment on lightly, but remark those that acted in the latter; I would not so much as exempt the clerks. If I make enemies of them, I care not. I am not for being an enemy to my country. I would put some mark upon them all.

Mr. Wynn. Will you except one (lord Rochester) who gave up his white staff, and would act no farther when he saw how things tended?

Mr. Howe. This power was certainly unlawful. In those who modestly withdrew from the Commission, it shows repentance. Those who are dead, are past your justice. If you please, let all their names be read, and then distinguish them.

Major Wildman. I must speak against my

*"Mr. Samuel Johnson, (who had been chaplain to lord Russel) setting forth 'An humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in the army, &c.' was prosecuted for it in the King's Bench, and being convicted, was sentenced to stand in the pillory three times, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, which no martyr ever did suffer with more fortitude than he." Ralph.

own nature and disposition now. It is natural to spare all, but of necessity we must vindicate our country's liberties. I have sat here with astonishment, to hear excuses for any that sat in that Commission. It was called 'the Ecclesiastical Commission,' but it laid the axe to the root of all our properties, goods, and land in England. In one clause of the last Commission they were more modest than in the first. It gave a power to make all the noblemen and gentlemen in England dance attendance upon them, and power to examine every man's conscience concerning his whole life against God or man; upon pain of excommunication they must answer every question, or else the Chancellor was ready to grant out the writ De excommunicatio capiendo; whatever the crime was, though against himself. This gave a liberty to all informers; they might give what costs and damages they pleased. As the Commission gave power of all persons, so also of colleges and cathedrals, to dispose of all the lands in England of all bodies corporate at their discretion, however confirmed by acts of parliament. They had power to cause Mass to be said in churches; they might turn out all incumbents, and take their lands for popish uses. By this it is most apparent that king James broke the original Contract with the people, and violated all the laws that were made to protect our liberty and property. They executed these powers in part; they caused all colleges to bring in their statutes. In Sidney College, the founders took especial care, and did abhor the errors of Popery, and to have free elections in the college; they called for the Statute Book, and razed those out for ever, and, when they could not get mass to be said in the college, they set it up in the porter's lodge, that at length it might come into the college. Never was there such a thing done in the face of the sun, to bring in popery, and to discourage the Protestant religion, giving costs and damages, and all mens estates at their will. The duke of Norfolk was not excepted; he had a writ De excommunicatio capiendo issued against him, if he did not obey them, in an order about his lady. All was at their will. If you excuse these men, except all the rest without ceremony. Our ancestors, when they came to reform the government in Henry 8th's time, made examples of Empson and Dudley, who cunningly got a patent to punish men in a summary way, without juries. Empson and Dudley were attainted for Treason, for so the record is entered in the parliament-bill. Their decree was without any remedy; by that cursed Non obstante to the laws of England, all was laid level before these commissioners. As that prosecution of Empson and Dudley,* who were the instruments of the ill government, cost them their lives, so severe was their punishment. But when queen Elizabeth gave but a poor patent for a place, and sent it to the Judges to pass it, they said they durst not; examples were fresh of those who advised against the laws, although the queen commanded it too in person. They saw the shipwreck, where our ancestors had set up buoys, and it was avoided. You need look no farther to find their proceedings than into their own books, how they unfunctioned the Clergy. I leave them to your justice. All they have done has been proved before you.

Sir John Guise. I should not pretend to exaggerate this Commission, but am of opinion that there can be no degrees in it; but I observe one thing in it, that it principally arises from the privy-council, who first ordered it, and then executed it themselves. I speak plainly, I think it of so high a nature, that whoever does own such a commission is never fit to serve the nation in any public capacity. I know not their names, but begin first with the privy counsellors, and their actions; that if any be employed now, to take care they shall never be for the future.

Mr. Ettrick. Being named of this Commission, and acting upon it, are very different. I am for making as many friends as we can; so many as you except, so many enemies you make to the government. To take all who were named in the Commission, you must take the archbishop of Canterbury*. Many that were not versed in law knew not the saving in taking away the High Commission Court. When they saw it gone, they could not apprehend the consequence. Those who acted upon the third, fourth, and fifth Commission plainly acted against the laws. You did take several commissions, and read several names in them; all of them did not act in it. I would not put blots upon persons who have been and may be useful to you. Lord Rochester quitted the staff purely because he would not go on in the popish interest. It is plain that this lapping them takes him in. Therefore I would have them that acted in the Commission, excepted by name.

Major Wildman. I did not, in any thing I said, reflect on the abp. of Canterbury. I said only, 'He was named in the Commission;' but he never sat.

On lord chancellor Jeffreys.

Sir Wm. Williams. No man deserves to be excepted more than he; but will you begin with a dead person?—He was excepted.

On the earl of Rochester.

Sir Tho. Mompesson. Pray put no question upon him; he was left out of three commissions.

* "Sancroft lay silent at Lambeth. He seemed zealous against popery, in private discourse, but he was of such a timorous temper, and so set on the enriching his nephew, that he showed no sort of courage. He would not go to this court, when it was first opened, and declare against it, and give his reasons why he could not sit and act in it, judging it to be against law: but he contented himself with not going to it." Burnet.

* See vol. i. p. 477.

Sir Wm. Williams. If you save any man, this ought to be he. When your privileges were arraigned, he stood to you; he is but in the first and second commission; let him be left out.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I find it the disposition of the house to pass by this lord. But put the question solemnly; not to pass it off as if he were a great man, and had friends, and so left out.

Sir John Guise. I shall be as gentle upon this noble lord as any body. I cannot consent to excuse him, but put no question upon him.

Mr. Smith. I am ready to excuse this gentleman, if by vote, but not to excuse him by a vote will seem to the world as if he was guilty of no crime. I am satisfied he has deserved great punishment if his merits had not atoned for him. He has served the nation well in the Bishops case, and is a good Protestant.

Sir Robert Howard. I have heard from the bishop of London the great tenderness this lord showed in his case, and how he behaved himself in the public dispute, managed by Dr. Jane and Dr. Patrick, with the Jesuits. I would never put it to the question, but to have it marked as an ill thing to sit in the Ecclesiastical Commission, but to say it is no crime, that is a fault. I would have these things applied to his pardon, not to his justification; therefore I would put no question upon him.

Earl of Ranelagh. There is nobody in the house, but will say this was a crime in this lord; but whether he shall not be excepted out of the Indemnity for having sat in the Ecclesiastical Commission, is the question.—No question was put upon the earl of Rochester.—The earl of Sunderland was excepted by vote.

On the bishop of Durham*.

Sir Robert Howard. The bishop has gone through stitch which all the commissioners. He understood little law, and less gospel, but he was an ecclesiastical knowing man, who gave counsel to the lay lords. He went through all the Commissions, and in the last Commission of such an exorbitant nature, where every man's estate, liberty, and wife, were at their disposal. I was a trustee for the duke of Norfolk.—In that court he took great consideration of the dutchess. In that court he gave her more than the marriage settlement. This pre-

* Nathaniel lord Crew. "He was lifted up with the Ecclesiastical Commission, and said, 'Now his name would be recorded in history.' And, when some of his friends represented to him the danger of acting in a court so illegally constituted, he said, 'he could not live, if he should lose the king's gracious smiles.' So low and fawning was he. At the Revolution he absconded for some time, and was waiting for a ship to get beyond sea, fearing public affronts, and had offered to resign his bishoprick, but was prevailed on to go to the house, and by voting the new Settlement to merit at least a pardon for all that he had done." Burnet.

late stuck to this Commission, from first to last, with equal violence.—He was excepted.

On the bishop of Rochester*.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. It is known to most how this bishop behaved himself. He was intreated by the bishop of London to stay in the Commission. He protected the Protestant religion, and I cannot reckon him so highly criminal.

Mr. Arnold. I wonder that the bishop, when we consider the worthy book he writ, 'the History of the Plot,' should find advocates here.

Sir Robert Cotton. He was a friend to the University and the vice-chancellor. He argued the injustice and unreasonableness of the proceedings of the Commissioners. He opposed every thing in the proceedings against Magdalen-College.

Mr. Baldwin. There is this farther to be said, that he deserted the Ecclesiastical Commission wholly, when they proceeded against Magdalen-College, and wrote a book against it.

Mr. Dolben. He acted with great zeal for the Protestant religion. He never gave his consent to one vote or decree of that Commission against the Protestant religion. He made it his business to defend it. Except acting in that Commission, he is guilty of no fault.

On lord chief justice Herbert.

Mr. Howe. You have excepted him once; he is put into the Bill of Attainder. I would not worry a man that is gone out of the kingdom.

Mr. Smith. You cannot vindicate the justice of the nation, if you take no notice of him, when three witnesses have sworn, that he is in Ireland, and he is put into the Bill of Attainder.

Mr. Howe. Something is to be said in his behalf. He left his place, because he would not give his Judgment against the deserters.—Lord chief justice Herbert was excepted.

On the earl of Mulgrave†.

Mr. Howe. Nobody can think I can have had long acquaintance with this lord, but I have been well informed that all his life he has voted for his country's interest, though he was in court. He came in to the government in the late change, and did this king service. Let him pass.

* "Dr. Sprat, justly esteemed a great master of our language, and one of our correctest writers. He died in 1713." Burnet.

† "Lord Chamberlain to king James, and afterwards duke of Buckingham. He was apt to comply in every thing that he thought might be acceptable; for he went with the king to mass, and kneeled at it. And being looked on as indifferent to all religions, the priests made an attack on him. He heard them gravely arguing for transubstantiation. He told them, 'he was willing to receive instruction: he had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who made the world and all men in it: but it must not be an ordinary force of argument that could make him believe that man was quits with God, and made God again.'" Burnet.

Mr. Smith. His name is in the last Commission, and I know those injuries you have heard have been from those commissioners. If it appears that he was in the business of Magdalen-College, I am not for excusing him. Let his quality be ever so great, if the country be concerned, I would not except him. Let any gentleman tell what he has done for the good of the nation, and I am for excusing him.

Col. Austen. I stand not up to excuse him; but from a great clergyman I have had it, that he stood for the Protestant religion.

Sir Wm. Williams. If any member can say he was more active than some you have excused, I would not pass him by. You find nothing in the Books of this man's actions. I would pass him by.

Sir John Guise. I have heard of good things he has done; he stood for us in the house of lords for the good of the nation.

Mr. Howe. This lord is not charged for acting, but for taking the Commission. He may pretend to as much favour as another.—He was not excepted.

On the earl of Huntingdon.*

Mr. Carter. I hope this lord will not appear to be the greatest offender. He came in to act in this Commission when the lawyers and bishops thought it safe to act. He was well assured before he acted, and advised with several lawyers, who gave him encouragement to proceed. [He was called upon to name those lawyers.] He dissented in divers things that they acted against the Church; and before the bishop of Rochester came in, he dissented. I move, that he may not be excepted in the Bill.

Mr. Harbord. I could tell a story of this lord, how that three days after the prince of Orange landed at Torbay, he went post to Plymouth, to take possession of it, to keep the prince out with his regiment, which was then quartered there.

Mr. Smith. It is strange to see how prettily we are turned off from what was proposed. Because this lord was in the last, and not in the first Commission, therefore now some would excuse him.

Sir John Guise. I am for the series of the inclinations of men. This lord was once a great patriot. He acted in the three last Ecclesiastical Commissions. He did go through Devonshire to raise the country against this king, and has done no service since:—surely you will not exempt him for that.

Mr. Smith. If one gentleman will name his bishops that advised this lord, Carter can name the lawyers.—The earl of Huntingdon, and the bishop of Chester,† were excepted.

* One of king James's privy-council, and colonel of a regiment. He died in 1701.

† Dr. Cartwright. "He was a man of good capacity, and had made some progress in

On sir Thomas Jenner.

Mr. Smith. I know not if ignorance and poverty may be an exemption from punishment; if it be an excuse for this man, he may claim it.

Sir Jonathan Jennings. He was so troublesome in the Ecclesiastical Commission at Magdalen-College, that the bishop of Chester and the Judges thought to put him out.—He was excepted.

Extract from the Treaty with the States.]

July 2. Mr. Hampden acquainted the house, That, in Answer to their Address, relating to what number of Ships and of what Force, the States-General have set forth, or were obliged to set forth, for this Summer's Expedition with his majesty's fleet, his majesty said, all were come in, but two: and ordered lord Nottingham to give an Extract of the Treaty with the States, which was as follows:

"The States-General shall put to sea 30 ships of war, viz. eight from 70 to 80 guns, seven from 60 to 70, and fifteen from 50 to 60 guns, beside 9 frigates and 4 fire-ships: on board of which shall be embarked 10,572 effective men."

July 3. Resolved, "That a second Address be presented to his majesty, for leave to inspect the Books of the Privy-Council, and those of the Irish Committee, and for taking copies of such Papers as relate to the Irish Affairs."—And a Committee was appointed to draw up the said Address, accordingly. Who were likewise instructed to enquire, why the Dutch Fleet was out no sooner to join the English Fleet. Also, why the English Fleet was laid up, and why there was a delay in setting forth another.

Resolved, "That an Address be presented to his majesty, That he will please to appoint a Fund of Credit, for such as will furnish Money for relief of the Irish Protestants fled into this kingdom;" which the house engaged to repay.

July 5. The Address was read and agreed to, for leave to inspect the Council-Books, and learning. He was ambitious and servile, cruel and boisterous: and, by the great liberties he allowed himself, he fell under much scandal of the worst sort. He had set himself long to raise the king's authority above law; 'which (he said) was only a method of government to which kings might submit as they pleased; but their authority was from God, absolute and superior to law, which they might exert as often as they found it necessary for the ends of government.' So he was looked on as a man that would more effectually advance the design of Popery, than if he should turn over to it: and indeed, bad as he was, he never made that step, even in the most desperate state of his affairs. He, Wright, and Jenner, were the three Ecclesiastical Commissioners for visiting Magdalen College, and he, in particular, acted in so rough a manner, that it showed he was resolved to sacrifice all things to the king's pleasure." Burnet.

to take copies, especially from Dec. 27, 1688, to June 1, 1689, in which, the deplorable State of Ireland was charged on the neglect, or ill conduct of some persons employed in the affairs of that kingdom. And the reason of this inspection is said to be, That we may be enabled to give your majesty such advice, as may prevent the like Miscarriages for the future.

The same day, a Report was made of several children, educated in Popish Seminaries abroad, by direction of their parents and guardians. And leave was given to bring in a Bill to prevent the like abuses, and oblige such children as were then abroad, to return.

July 6. Colonel Birch made his Report, from the committee, appointed to examine the Petition of John Topham, esq. serjeant at arms; the substance of which was as follows: "That the said Topham being served with several actions of assault and battery, by certain persons he had taken into custody by order of the house, had pleaded obedience to the house, in justification: and that his pleas were, notwithstanding, over-ruled: Jeffreys, Holloway, Walcott, Pemberton, Jones, and Raymond, during the time of those several Actions, being Judges of the King's-bench."

Resolved, "That the said different Judgments, given in the King's-bench against the said Topham, are illegal, and a violation of the privileges of parliament, and pernicious to the rights of parliament, and that a Bill be brought in, to reverse the said judgments."—Ordered, That sir F. Pemberton, sir T. Jones, and sir F. Withins, do attend the house.

July 10. The Bill for an additional duty on Coffee, Tea, and Chocolate, under the title of 'An act for collecting the duties upon Coffee, Tea and Chocolate, at the Custom-House,' was passed, and ordered up to the house of lords.

Sir F. Pemberton and Sir T. Jones, examined.] July 10. Sir Francis Pemberton being desired by the house to give his reasons for over-ruling a Plea of the Order of that house, in the Case of Jay and Topham, he replied, That he knew little of the Case, it was so long since. But, that in case the defendant should plead he did arrest the plaintiff by order of this house, and should plead that to the jurisdiction of King's-bench, he thought, with submission, he could satisfy the house, that such a Plea ought to be over-ruled: and that he took the law to be so very clearly. He then withdrew.—Sir Thomas Jones being then examined to the same point, was pleased to reply, That though it was long since the Case was argued; and that he, not knowing what he was to attend upon, could give no account thereof: but, that, if any such Judgment was given, he hoped it was according to law, as the matter was pleaded. And then he withdrew.—Sir Francis Pemberton was then again called in, and his Reasons being demanded, for his general assertion, before said, he desired time to answer, both to the whole together, and the particular Case of Jay and Topham. But an immediate Answer being insisted on, he said, That what he spoke, was quoad hoc, to that Case; however, he gave what he had said, for his present thoughts and reasons.

Being withdrawn, it was Resolved, after a debate, "That the Orders and Proceedings of this house being pleaded to the jurisdiction of the Court of the King's-bench, ought not to be over-ruled."—Ordered, That sir F. Pemberton, and sir T. Jones, do attend the house again.

Reasons to be offered at a Conference on the Bill of Rights.] July 11. Mr. Carter reported, from the committee appointed to draw up Reasons to be offered at a conference with the lords, on the Bill 'for declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and settling the Succession of the Crown;' That the said committee had agreed, as follows:

"That the commons do not agree with your lordships in the 1st Amendment, Skin 7, l. 25. (relating to the Settlement of the crown in the Hanover line) for these Reasons: 1. That it is not contained in the Declaration, which was presented by both houses, to their majesties, upon their acceptance of the crown. 2. A farther limitation of the crown, may be dangerous, and of ill consequence.—To the last Amendment, they disagree, because the Dispensing Power has been assumed, within time of memory. Because it hath unreasonably increased from time to time, to the overthrow of multitudes of good laws. Because all laws, made for the benefit of Trade, may be thereby eluded, and monopolies erected. And, generally, because the mischiefs, that have been consequent thereon, are so great, that the commons can find no remedy to prevent the same, but by insisting upon the clause, and proviso."

Ordered, That the Conference be managed by the said committee.

Judgment of the King's-bench, against a late Speaker, reversed.] July 12. The Record of a Judgment of the Court of King's-bench, upon an Information against William Williams, esq. in the name of sir Robert Sawyer, attorney-general, being read, Resolved, "That the said Judgment, &c. for matters done by order of the house of commons, and against Wm. Williams, esq. as Speaker thereof, is illegal, and against the freedom of parliaments: and that a Bill be brought in to reverse the said Judgment."—Ordered, That sir Robert Sawyer do attend in his place, to give the house a particular account of the Orders, &c. he received for the said prosecution.

The King's Message for a Recess by Sir R. Howard.] Sir Robert Howard then informed the house, that he was commanded by his majesty to let them know, "That his majesty is very sensible of the great burden of business that has lain upon them; and, which he hopes is now near finished, that the country may receive the advantage of a Recess by the several members assisting in the settlement of public affairs; and also, that they may have the benefit by it, to take care of their own particular concerns. And that though his majesty believes, that this house is assured, that by what preparations are made and must be continued and encreased, there will be need of great sums of money, yet his majesty is so sensible of the disposition of this house, that he is willing no farther proceedings upon raising of Money should be, till the meeting towards winter; other than what the house have, now, themselves designed: and had commanded him to acquaint the house, that, what they have given him, shall be so applied, as that when they meet again, he is confident they will receive satisfaction, (which he always desires) in examining of. Lastly, his majesty commanded him to remind them of the Act of Indemnity, which was all he had in command."

Resolved, That sir Robert Howard do present the humble Thanks of the house to his majesty. Resolved, That a Clause be added to the Bill for settling the Revenue, That the lands and revenues, granted to, or in trust for the queen-consort of the late king James, be vested in their majesties, and that all acts relating to the same be repealed. And that the Revenue to be settled upon their majesties, be free from any charge, or incumbrances.

July 13. Sir John Guise acquainted the house from the committee on the State of Ireland, "That it has appeared to them that several persons who are in arms in that kingdom, had been in custody here in England, and were released; and had Passes given them, and that Mr. Jephson, a member of this house, was then secretary; and that the committee had directed him to move that Mr. Jephson might give an account thereof to the house." And then the house made an Order accordingly. As likewise, that the auditor of the exchequer do bring an account of what Monies have been issued out of the exchequer for secret services, and to whom, since 1682.

The King's Answers to two Addresses.] Sir John Guise then farther acquainted the house, That having waited on his majesty with the Address, for leave to inspect the Council-Books, &c. his majesty was pleased to answer, 'He would consider of it.' That he had likewise presented to his majesty the other Address, That his majesty would be pleased to appoint a Fund, for credit, for such as should furnish money for relief of the Irish Protestants fled into this kingdom, and that his majesty was pleased to say at first, 'That he liked it well.' That his majesty then asked the sense of the house touching that matter; and being told the Irish were in necessity, and that the house would take care to satisfy what was disbursed, added, 'That he would do what he could in it.'

A debate ensued on his majesty's Answer to the first Address, and then the house resolved, nem. con. "That those persons who have been the occasion of delaying sending Relief to Ireland, and those persons that advise the king to defer the giving leave for some persons to inspect the Council-Books, &c. are enemies to the king and kingdom."

A debate then arose, touching an Address to be presented to his majesty, for removing the marquis of Halifax, and marquis of Carmarthen, from his council; but was adjourned.

Mr. Jephson's Vindication.] July 15. Mr. Jephson appeared in his place according to order, and acquainted the house, "That he had perused the Books by him kept while secretary to his majesty, and that he did not find any of the persons in dispute mentioned there." Whereupon the house was satisfied that there were no Passes granted to any of the said persons.

Report of a Conference with the Lords on the Bill of Rights and Succession.] July 16. Mr. Carter reported from a Conference with the lords on the Bill of Rights and Succession; That lord Rochester managed for the lords, and gave these Reasons for disagreeing with the house thereon.—"1. Though in the Instrument offered to their majesties, the limitation went no farther than their persons, yet in a law which has respect to all succeeding ages, and that settles for ever the Liberties of the Subject, they think it reasonable to carry the limitation of the Succession of the crown farther than was necessary in that instrument, in which the crown was offered to their majesties, and that had no view but of the Succession to their posterity. 2. They can see no danger, nor any ill consequences that may follow on a farther limitation, but very much to the contrary. For, 1. This secures the nation effectually from the danger of having a Papist to reign at any time hereafter: since of such a number of Papists as stand next the crown in the lineal succession, some might be prevailed upon to shew a change in their religion, if they had a prospect of succeeding to the crown, upon it; and no danger being so great as the having one who is a pretended Protestant, but is, in truth, a concealed Papist to reign over us, the most effectual way to secure our religion, is to declare the Succession in a family, that we know is certainly Protestant. 2. It is the interest of England, at present, to do right to that great house, by limiting the Succession according to the Proviso. For, since this limitation has been proposed, if it should be now laid aside, it would look like an excluding of this house, which might provoke them to take resolutions which might be of great prejudice to the nation in the present conjuncture.—And since for these Reasons, the lords insist upon their Proviso, the same Reasons determine them likewise to insist upon that part of the rider, which relates to it."—The question being then put to agree with the lords, in their Amendments, it passed in the negative. After which, farther Reasons were ordered to be proposed to be offered at a free Conference with the lords why the house did not agree to the said Amendments.

The Duke of Schomberg takes leave of the House.] Sir Henry Capel acquainted the house, that the duke de Schomberg desired to have the honour to wait upon the house; that he being just going in the service of the crown, on the Expedition to Ireland, he would very willingly acknowledge the care this house hath had of him, and the fruit he had received of it, and take his leave of them; that his merit was great, and that the king had rewarded it like a king; having made him a duke and peer of England, and settled 5000*l.* a year on him and his heirs, in lieu of the like Revenues he had lost in France and Germany: two peers and two of the house of commons being named trustees, for the making purchases in order thereto.—The duke being then introduced, sat down, covered, in a chair placed for him towards the middle of the house, where having continued some time (the serjeant with the mace standing at his right hand) he rose, and, uncovered, spake to the following effect:

“Mr. Speaker, I have desired this honour, to make my just acknowledgments for the great favours I have received from this house, and doubt not but to find the effects of it in his majesty’s grace and favour; and also take my leave of this honourable house, being now going to Ireland, where I shall freely expose my life in the king’s service and yours.”

The Speaker then replied as follows: “My lord, the services that have been done by your grace to their majesties and this kingdom are so great, that they can never be forgotten: I am therefore commanded by this house to acquaint you that they are extremely satisfied that his majesty’s army is committed to your grace’s conduct; and they doubt not but the war will be prosecuted in such a manner as will fully answer all their expectations. This house doth likewise assure your grace, that, at what distance soever you are, they will have a particular regard, as much as in them lies, of whatever may concern your grace, or the army under your command.”

His grace then withdrew, and Mr. Comptroller acquainted the house, that his majesty consented that the Council Books might be inspected, both as to the collecting the Customs and Excise, after the death of Charles 2, and in relation to the Irish Affairs.

July 19. Sir Francis Pemberton and sir Tho. Jones were severally examined, touching their Reasons for over-ruling the plea of serjeant Topham, to the action brought against him by one Jay, and ordered into custody of the serjeant at arms.

July 20. Sir W. Pulteney reported from the free Conference with the lords on the Bill of Rights and Succession, that the matter had been debated by both parties, and that there were hopes the lords would agree with this house, touching the said bill.

July 22. Sir Thomas Littleton reported the Reasons to be offered at a Conference with the lords, on the Bill for reversing the two Judgments of the King’s-bench against Oates. But the whole case being hereafter recapitulated, we shall, for the sake of brevity, insert the said Recapitulation only.

July 24. Resolved, That leave be given to bring in a Clause to the Bill for settling the Revenue, to repeal the Act which settles the Revenue upon the late king for life.

Report from the Council-Books, relating to the collecting the Customs and Excise.] July 25. Mr. Papillon reported from the committee appointed to examine the Council-Books, with respect to the collecting the Excise and Customs, from the death of Ch. 2. “That, with regard to the Customs, the commissioners who appeared at the Custom-House, from that time, were lord Cheney, sir Rd. Temple, sir Nich. Butler, sir John Buckworth, Wm. Dickenson, sir John Worden, sir Dudley North, and Tho. Chudleigh. That among other instances, Mr. Francis Miller informed the Committee, That being at the Custom-House, about a fortnight after the death of king Ch. 2, and discoursing with the Commissioners, he told them, ‘He was not free to pay the Customs, and had his fears of what might come thereafter.’ To which sir Nicholas Butler replied, ‘That it was fears which brought on the last Rebellion.’ This was confirmed by one Mr. Cutler.—Mr. Cockram said, That he and others being at the Custom-House with the commissioners, the said commissioners asked, ‘What lawyers the merchants had advised with?’ And it being replied, ‘They had as yet advised with none;’ Sir Nicholas Butler rejoined, ‘We know what you are: if you are ready to dispute it, we are ready to dispute it.’ To which sir John Buckworth added, ‘Do not dispute it! It must be paid.’—That as to the Excise they find a printed Proclamation dated Feb. 16, signifying that the Commissioners of the Treasury, viz. lord Godolphin, sir J. Ernley, sir S. Fox, sir Dudley North, and Frederick Hume, had farmed the Excise to sir Peter Apsley, sir Daniel Bathurst, and James Grahme, for 3 years, for the rent of 550,000*l.* That according to the Opinion of the Judges the said contract was valid in law, notwithstanding the death of the late king; and requiring all commissioners, sub-commissioners, and all other officers, to aid and assist in collecting the said duties during the said term.—That they find by a Commission, dated March 1, Jac. 2. sir Darcy Ashburnham, Francis Parry, Ch. Davenant, John Friend, Felix Calvert, Nath. Hornby, and Rd. Grahme, to be Commissioners and Governors for receipt of the Excise, &c. and all the said Commissioners had acted as such, &c.”—The said Report was ordered to lie on the table, to be considered when the Bill of Indemnity came next before the house.

Reasons for not agreeing with the Lords Amendments to the Bill for an additional Duty on Coffee, &c.] Sir John Trevor reported from the committee, the Reasons to be offered at a conference with the lords, for not agreeing with their lordships in their Amendments to the Bill for laying an additional duty on Coffee, Tea and Chocolate: which were in substance as follow. 1. “The commons have always taken it for their undoubted privilege (of which they have ever been tender and jealous) that in all Aids given to the king by the commons, the rate or tax ought not to be any way altered by the lords. 2. The Amendments being in point of time, the commons hope your lordships will not now renew a question concerning the method of granting Aids, which formerly occasioned great debates; and which may now beget many conferences, and end in great inconveniences. 3. The said Amendments make the Bill incoherent, for both houses having agreed, that the forfeitures should commence from July 20, it will look strange that the Forfeitures should begin before the duty is made payable. 4. Ships are now arriving daily, with the commodities mentioned in the Bill; and it will therefore be a loss to the king, by putting the commencement of the duty so far off. 5. As to your Proviso, it being an Alteration, the commons assign their first Reason for disagreeing to it: and hope your lordships will not revive old disputes."

The two houses had a Conference on the Bill to reverse the two Judgments against Oates, when the lords insisted on their Amendments.

The Lords Reasons for insisting on their Proviso to the Bill for an additional Duty on Coffee, &c.] July 28. The Lords, at a Conference, gave their Reasons for insisting on their Proviso to the said Bill; which were in substance as follow: "The lords are much surprised at the assertion of the commons, That, in all Aids, given to the king by the commons, the Rates or Tax ought not to be any ways altered by the lords, since they conceive it hath always been their undoubted right in such case, to lessen the said rate or tax, whereof several precedents might be given, which at present they are willing to forbear, that they might not revive old disputes. But as to their present Proviso, their lordships are of opinion this general point is not to the case now in difference; it being neither an alteration nor lessening of the duty laid upon those commodities; for a drawback on the re-exportation, cannot be said to lessen the rates imposed upon them; it does indeed take away so much from the king's income, but adds much more to the benefit of trade, which the lords conceive they are equal and competent judges of, and therefore may very well insist on their Proviso." To which the duke of Bolton added, "That he hoped a good correspondence would be maintained between the two houses; for that they were Englishmen, as well as the commons." And the question being put, to agree with the lords, it passed in the negative, and Reasons to be offered at a free Conference were directed to be prepared.

Aug. 31. The lords desired a free Conference on the Bill of Rights and Succession, of which Major Wildman gave the following Report. "That the Bishop of Salisbury was chief manager for the lords, who said the lords had considered of what was offered at the last free conference; and as to the two clauses, and all matters depending thereon, touching the Declaration to be made by the king and queen, and the persons to take the same, the lords insist upon their Amendment; and that they adhere to their Amendment touching the limitation to the princess Sophia of Hanover. That the managers then proposed to the lords, whether the lords would admit of any farther debate touching the said matters; to which the lords reply, No; they had no such thing in charge from the lords."

Report of the Conference on the Bill for reversing the Judgments against Oates.] The Solicitor General made the Report of the free Conference had with the lords, touching the Amendments proposed by the lords to be made to the Bill for reversing two Judgments given in the Court of King's-bench against Titus Oates, clerk. Which Report is as follows:

"That the Conference was begun by the managers of this house; who did acquaint the lords, That the commons had desired this free conference, in order to a good correspondence with their lordships. That they look upon the Bill for reversing the Judgments against Oates, not to be the business of a particular man, but of every subject in England, with regard to his person and estate: and that the honour of parliaments, public justice, and the Protestant religion, were concerned in it, as well as the integrity of king Charles 2. and his privy-council: and that the lords Amendments, if agreed to, would make that Bill of great prejudice to the subject, instead of answering the ends which were intended by the commons.

"That the lords Amendments were of two sorts; some relating to the Judgments, and others to the Verdicts. As to the Amendments relating to the Judgments, the commons had hoped, that, after the Declaration presented to their majesties upon their accepting the crown (wherein their lordships had joined with the commons in complaining of the cruel and illegal punishments of the last reign; and in asserting it to be the ancient right of the people of England, that they should not be subjected to cruel and unusual punishments; and that no judgments to the prejudice of the people in that kind ought in any-wise to be drawn into consequence, or example); and after this Declaration had been so lately renewed in that part of the Bill of Rights which the lords had agreed to; they should not have seen Judgments of this nature affirmed, and been put under a necessity of sending up a Bill for reversing them; since those Declarations will not only be useless, but of pernicious consequence to the people, if, so soon after, such Judgments as these stand affirmed, and be not taken to be cruel and illegal within the meaning of those Declarations.—That the commons had a particular regard to these Judgments, amongst others, when that Declaration was first made; and must insist upon it, that they are erroneous, cruel, illegal, and of ill example to future ages; which is the character fixed upon them by the Bill sent up to the lords.—That the lords having gone so far as to agree the Judgments to be erroneous, it could not be denied, that they were illegal: for that which makes a Judgment erroneous is, for that it is against law. That it seemed no less plain, that the Judgments were cruel, and of ill example to future ages. That it was surely of ill example for a temporal court to give judgment, ‘That a clerk be divested of his canonical habits; and continue so divested during his life.’ That it was of ill example, and illegal, that a Judgment of perpetual imprisonment should be given in a case, where there is no express law to warrant it. It was of ill example, and unusual, that an Englishman should be exposed upon a pillory, so many times a year, during his life.—That it was illegal, cruel, and of dangerous example, that a freeman should be whipped in such a barbarous manner, as, in probability, would determine in death. That here were precedents made, which did not concern this man only, or only this offence; but the Judgments pronounced against Oates, were judgments against every Englishman, subject ecclesiastical as well as temporal; the lords as well as commons.—That this was avowed when these Judgments were given by the then lord chief justice of the King’s-bench; who declared: ‘That all the Judges had met; and unanimously agreed, that where the subject was prosecuted at common-law for a misdemeanor, it was in the discretion of the court, to inflict what punishment they pleased, not extending to life or member.’—That as soon as they had set up this pretence to a discretionary power, it was observable how they put it in practice, not only in this, but in other cases, and for other offences, by inflicting such cruel and ignominious punishments, as will be agreed to be far worse than death itself to any man who has a sense of honour, or shame: so that, it was hoped, the lords would find themselves concerned in interest to depart from their Amendments, and not to rest satisfied with a bare saying, that such practices ought to be prevented for the future: much less to insist upon their additional Clause A; which is so far from declaring those Judgments to have been illegal, that it does plainly import an allowance of them: nor does it go so far, as to provide a remedy for the future: for it does only enact, That such excessive punishments ought not to be inflicted for the future: which seems rather to refer to the severity of the execution, than to the Judgment itself.—It was agreed by the lords at the last Conference, That the Judgments of affirmance given by the lords, cannot nor ought to stand, when the Judgments of the King’s-bench are reversed: and therefore the commons think themselves concerned to insist, That the Act may speak plain; and that it may be understood by all who have heard the Judgments against Oates were once affirmed by the lords, that those Judgments of Affirmation may subsist no longer.

“As to the lords Amendments, which relate to the Verdicts; It was urged by the managers for the commons, That so severe and extraordinary a thing, as the making a man infamous, and taking away his testimony by act of parliament, ought not to be done, but upon the greatest consideration; especially in such a case as this, where the honour of parliamentary proceedings, and of the English justice, were more concerned than Oates.—The business of the Popish Plot had great examination in several parliaments, and in several courts of justice: in all which Oates stood a good witness: and though his testimony did not stand alone, but was confirmed by other witnesses, and by papers and letters (evidence which could not be mistaken); yet it did deserve to be considered, if the declaring him to be an incompetent witness, by act of parliament, would not be interpreted a great step towards disavowing the Popish Plot; it being certain, that what had been done by the lords, in affirming the Judgments against him, had already had such an interpretation beyond sea: it was therefore fit to have it plainly known, whether that was intended; and to have it well weighed, whether the thing will be so much for the honour of our nation, or our religion, that we should go out of the way, and do an extraordinary thing to come at it:—For, by law, when the Judgment is erroneous (which is confessed in this case), the whole record is to be annulled: and therefore, to let so much of the record stand as relates to the conviction (which is in effect done by the lords Clause B), is to do an extraordinary thing; is plainly to pass a new censure upon Oates; and to make that which was singly the opinion of the jury before to be the act of the whole parliament: which the commons can see no reason to agree to.—And, though it be confessed, That the present proceeding is in the legislative way, and therefore there is no necessity of strictly pursuing the forms of Courts of Justice; yet, when the commons reflect how they came to be driven to use this extraordinary course for reversing these Judgments, they cannot satisfy themselves, that it is just to take from the party an advantage which he ought to have had in the ordinary methods of law, without stronger Reasons than they have heard in this case.—They observe, The perjuries assigned against Oates were not in the substance of his evidence, but in the circumstance of time; in which there might be an innocent mistake, without contracting the guilt of wilful perjury; and that a colourable counter-evidence might be easily set up to such a point of time; especially when the thing was under the management of Jesuits, whose whole order was wounded by Oates’ Evidence, and who are not scrupulous of using indirect acts, to preserve their credit or interest.—It was also to be observed, That the matter in which the perjuries were assigned, were not new discoveries; but the very same things had been objected, and insisted on at former trials, several years before, when matters were fresh in memory, and when most of the same witnesses were examined against Oates: and yet, after a full hearing of them, and of the witnesses produced on the behalf of Oates, his testimony was supported, to the full satisfaction of the judges and the juries.—So that, after all endeavours to the contrary, Oates stood upright, his testimony unshaken, till a Papist was upon the throne; till irregular sheriffs were made; till new Freeholders Books, consisting only of persons fit to serve the present turn, were formed; till Graham and Burton were by experience become perfect in the mystery of managing Juries; till neither counsel nor witnesses could, with safety, appear for Oates; till those times were come, when (as the lords and commons have both affirmed in their Declaration of the 13th of February) partial, corrupt, and unqualified persons were returned, and served on juries.—That violation of law, partiality, and corruption, were the character of the times; and were visible in every thing that moved towards the attaining those Verdicts: and therefore the commons think themselves well justified in calling the Verdicts corrupt, though no direct giving of money to jurors, or witnesses, could have been proved: for if nothing else but a direct proof of money given, make a corrupt verdict, it would be very difficult to shew, that ever a corrupt verdict was given: nay, it is possible a jury may have taken money; and yet give a true and honest verdict.—Any partiality in the jury, let either malice or affection be the motive, makes the verdict corrupt: if the juror do but declare his thought before the trial, it is a good cause of challenge: so nice is the law in requiring, that jurors be indifferent, that if any one of the jury be returned at the denomination of the party, or to the end that he should be more favourable to the one side than the other, the whole array ought to be quashed.—It appeared to the committee of the house of commons, who were appointed to inquire into the proceeding upon the indictments against Oates, That so great a price was set on the destroying Oates' credit, that the prosecutions were notoriously carried on by express directions and commands from the court; that great sums of money were distributed, in order to it; and fit instruments employed in procuring and instructing witnesses to swear against Oates, in the same points, which had been fully examined before; that, under colour of paying their charges, considerable sums of money were given to witnesses; that, to make sure of them beforehand, they were required to make affidavits, beyond sea, of what they were to swear at the trial; which were drawn so, that it was proved to the committee, that one of the intended witnesses refused to swear again what they had thought fit to set down for him in his affidavit.—It did appear to the committee, That clubs were kept at taverns; where jurors were named in these State-Trials (as they were called); and where Burton and Graham were assisting, and gave their directions.—Besides, there lay an exception of partiality to the witnesses, being all of them, in a manner, novices at St. Omers, a college of Jesuits; against which college, Oates had given particular testimony: besides (as Jesuits) they could not esteem it of little consequence to their order, to discredit the evidence of the Popish Plot; and disparage those parliaments who had prosecuted it with so much vigour: and how far the principles of the Jesuits would allow them to instruct their novices, that an oath, administered by heretic magistrates, was to be little regarded, might deserve to be thought upon.—It appeared to the committee, That in this case no less than nine of the most considerable counsel were employed against Oates, and had frequent meetings, and great fees; which seemed extraordinary, when nothing was in question but a point of time.—It appeared, that great treats were given several times to the jurors; which the law does not allow.—It appeared also, by the accounts upon record in the exchequer, that above 3,000*l.* was expended about convicting Oates: which the commons could not but think was too great a sum to be fairly spent, upon occasion of two trials by London Juries.—The commons saw no cause to add any authority or reputation to such Verdicts, upon a bare possibility that new matters might arise between the former trials, and those for the perjuries (which was a thing insisted on by the lords at the last conference); since it was, at least, alike possible, that no such new matter did arise; for, on the one side, it was owned by the lords, that they had not examined the fact; and on the other side the indictments shewed, that the points, in which the perjuries were assigned, were not new matters, but the same which had been drawn in question at the former trials, and upon the credit of the same witnesses: so that the presumption lay stronger on the commons' side.—As to what was mentioned by the lords at the last conference, 'That the corruption of the Verdicts did not appear to them;' it was said, That was not the fault of the commons; the lords having the same means of being informed as the commons had, if they had thought fit to use them.—It was agreed to the lords, That there was a respect to be had to legal proceedings; but then that respect ought to be equal, and the examination of the same facts, in the several trials in king Charles's reign, did deserve, at least, as much regard as the examination of the very same facts in king James's time: especially when the former trials stood confirmed by the concurring opinions of king Charles himself, and so many successive parliaments: besides, it was scarce credible, that the Judges, who could be guilty of giving such an extravagant judgment, could be indifferent in their directions at the trial.—The managers did further urge, That the lords Clause (B) did make it impossible for Oates to clear his innocence, though that was said to be the end for which it was intended: for if the conviction stand, there is no legal course left for hearing and determining the matters for which he was convicted : and were it supposed the lords should think fit to give themselves the trouble to enter into the examination of the whole matter, and could find out a means of doing it ; yet, if the lords Proviso was agreed to, Oates could have no manner of advantage, though his innocency were fully cleared, by any judgment the lords could give ; but he must still remain an infamous person, unless a new law were made to restore him : and how far it is consistent with the rules of justice, to leave a man in such circumstances, seemed very easy to determine ; especially since, by pursuing the known methods of law, and intirely reversing the Judgments by act of parliament now, as it ought to have been done before by the lords in their judicial capacity, Oates may be again indicted, and brought to an indifferent trial ; according to the success of which, his credit will stand or fall : and that is the only regular way which does remain, to have these matters re-examined."

The Managers for the lords, who spoke at the Conference, were the earls of Rochester, Berkley, and Nottingham, the lord bishop of London, and lord bishop of Salisbury. The substance of what was said by the Managers for the lords, as to their Amendments, with relation to the Verdicts, was,

"That, if it were proved to them, that the Verdicts were corrupt, it would incline them to agree ; that being the issue between the two houses : if that was not made out, the lords did not think it fit, that Oates should take advantage of an erroneous judgment, to destroy the verdict.—That, in order to let them into the examination of the matter, they had added the Clause B : that the only proper time for the examination of that matter was, after the commons had agreed to that Clause : for the lords could not enter into the examination of it in their judicial capacity, because they were then only to take the records as they stood before them.—That to make the Verdicts corrupt, there must be some corruptions made out between the time of the former trials, and the time of the subsequent trials for the perjuries. That they agreed there might be other methods of corruption than by money ; but that it was hard to assign them. That the persons who served upon the juries at Oates's trials, were men of great consideration in London, some of the first form of merchants ; and to dispute their Verdicts was, in effect, to attain them : that few men but would have been pleased to have had such a jury in a case of their own. That the lords would rather believe Oates guilty of perjury and knavery, than look upon the grand jury and petty jury to be perjured. That there was no proof before the lords, That there was any favour in the return of the jury ; or, that they were nominated by a club. That there was no incompetency in the witnesses against Oates ; for though he had sworn against many, he had not sworn against all the jesuits. That the treating of jurors was acknowledged to be scandalous ; but there was no proof of that before the lords ; and, if it were true, yet it had not been sufficient to set aside the Verdicts, without other proofs of corruption, and those fit for a court of record to receive.—That they did not think it sufficient evidence, that Graham and Burton had charged great sums in their books as paid upon the account of those trials ; for that might be false : or, suppose it were expended on the witnesses, did that make the Verdict corrupt ; so that the lords might legally, judicially, and honestly, give their vote upon the question.—That it was a matter of great importance, and concerned every man in his life and estate, if it were taken for granted, that, because a man had, at a trial, passed for a good witness, he was not to be prosecuted afterwards for perjury : that a man accused was then in a very unfortunate condition ; for the grand jury was to keep the king's secrets : the prisoner, in such a case, was for the most part kept close, and his witnesses were not sworn ; so that he could not be ready for his defence for the present : and if the witnesses might not afterwards be prosecuted for perjury, by him or his, then there was an end of all prosecutions for perjury.—That the point of time was material : and that a person accused of treason had hardly any thing else whereby to make his innocence appear ; since there was no proving of a negative.—That counsel was assigned to Oates : and that witnesses were summoned, and did appear for him ; as they had heard.—That there was no way to reverse a Verdict but by act of parliament : and, before that was done, justice did require, that the party should clear his innocence.—That the lords had reason to expect, the commons should make out to them, the corruption of the Verdicts ; and shew, that they had unquestionable evidence to prove that several thousand pounds were expended.—That they looked upon Oates as perjured in other matters : that he had accused the queen dowager of high-treason, in conspiring the death of her husband, at the bar of the house of commons ; which nobody could believe of her.—That he had sworn at the council-board, he had no other person to accuse ; and yet, after, had accused the queen dowager.—That Oates at first might come in with a fair intention, and for discovery of the truth ; but that, appearing in the presence of so many great persons, and finding so much ear given to what he said, it was natural, that it should either damp and terrify him, or create too great a confidence : that it had the latter effect upon him ; and made him fancy himself to have a right of creating evidence, rather than delivering it : that it was not fit to encourage such witnesses : that his brain seemed to be turned . and that, when he was lately brought before the house of lords, he seemed to hang his rod over them.—That now the parliament, acting as legislators, were not tied down to form : that they did not inflict any new censure on him, but left him in the state they found him.—That this was a matter of great expectation: that the eyes of all Europe were upon it: and that it would be the occasion of great censures, if he should be set up for a witness again, without a full examination of the whole affair; especially in the case of a conviction for perjury; which had something in it more peculiar than other crimes; for every one had a particular concern to be covered from it.—That they would not enter into the question of what was the difference between an erroneous, and illegal judgment; though, perhaps, a judgment that was erroneous in point of form, might not be said to be illegal.—As to the Affirmance of the Judgments; and the amendments relating to the Judgments; The Judges had owned to the lords, that there was a latitude left to the court in Judgments, in case of perjury; which was one thing that moved them to affirm the Judgments; but that they had never done it, had it not been attended with the Verdicts; which the lords thought of fatal consequence to take away.—That, when the case came to be debated in the house of lords upon the writs of error, there was not one lord, but thought the judgments erroneous, and was fully satisfied, that such an extravagant judgment ought not to have been given, or a punishment so exorbitant inflicted upon an English subject: but, considering his accusing the queen so impudently, and several other instances; rather than leave so ill a man as Oates capable of being a witness, they, in that streight, chose to affirm the judgments, though they were satisfied of their being erroneous; and, to shew that they were sensible of this, at the same time when they affirmed the judgments, they thought fit, that a bill should be brought in to the house of peers, to prevent the inconveniences of the like Judgments for the future.—And therefore, when the lords had gone so far in their judicial capacity, as to affirm the Judgments, rather than the Verdicts should be set aside, the commons were not to expect, that they would recede now, and set up Oates for a witness again, without unquestionable proof of corruption in the jury. That the principal matters, insisted on by the lords, were, 1. To leave out what concerned the corruption of the Verdicts: 2. That their proviso against Oates's being received for a witness, do pass: 3. That so great an hardship should not be put upon the house of peers, as that they should, in express terms, reverse their own Judgments, since there was no necessity of it."

The Managers for the commons, by way of Reply, gave a summary Account of the whole Proceedings, in relation to the Popish Plot; and of the several subornations, and other foul practices, which had been used to stifle the evidence, and discredit the witnesses, particularly Oates. As to the lords amendments, which concerned the Judgments, it was said by the managers, "That there were precedents made, which affected every Englishman. That, by taking upon them to affirm such Judgments as these, the lords had, in a manner, taken the law into their hands. That this arbitrary power, in the lords judicature, is a new discovery; and, if it had been understood in former times, would have been a very expeditious way of altering the law, upon several occasions.—The lords, as a court of judicature, are as strictly tied to give judgment upon a writ of error, according to law, as any inferior court whatsoever: They must not proceed upon considerations of convenience; but this judgment of the lords is agreed to be given, not according to law, but according to an opinion which their lordships had conceived of the party; and that also, without any judicial examination: instead of correcting the acknowledged errors of the judgments in the King's-bench, they affirm them; and so change the law, which ought to be the certain and steady rule of government, into the arbitrary resolutions of that house.—That nothing was aimed at by the commons in this bill, but to set that matter right: if this bill be lost, the lords have settled it for law, that every subject may be used in this ignominious and barbarous manner. Oates is the least part of the question, how much soever he seem concerned in it: the grievance is, that the whole kingdom, for Oates's sake, must be made liable to these whippings.—The commons hoped, the lords will take this opportunity of redeeming this error, by passing the bill as it was sent up by the commons; and not expect, because they have given a wrong judgment, that therefore the commons must join to support it by an act of parliament: for their lordships clause did really countenance the Judgment against Oates; enacting only, That such punishment shall not be inflicted for the future.—That it was of great importance to the kingdom to have this matter settled; judgments of this kind having been extended to several persons, and to very different cases; as in that of Mr. Johnson: it was thought (with reason enough, perhaps) by the ministers of those times, that such punishments would awe the people, and fit them for slavery, worse than death itself; according to sir Thomas Smith's observation, 'That no nation is less fearful of death, or more afraid of torments, than the English.'—That the commons could not think the nation safe without an express and plain declaration, not only, that the Judgments of the King's-bench were illegal, cruel, and of evil example to future ages, but also, that the affirmation of those Judgments was contrary to law."

To what was said, by the lords, to maintain the Amendments which concerned the Verdicts, the Managers for the commons replied to this effect:

"That the lords, by insisting not to agree to the clause in the bill which calls the Verdicts corrupt, unless the commons could bring positive proof of an express contract for money, to be paid directly to hire the jurors to give the verdicts, did seem to have inverted the several methods of proceedings in their distinct capacities.—In their judicature, where they ought to act by the strict rules of law, they proceed according to a supposed convenience: in their legislative capacity, where there is a latitude of proceeding according to a moral certainty and convenience, a single expression, ‘of a corrupt verdict,’ though inserted upon such just grounds, will not be allowed; unless a precise proof be made in the strictest forms of courts. If Oates’s brain was turned, as was said by the lords, the more wrong was done, by convicting him for perjury; which a madman cannot be guilty of: and, after such cruel usage (which would make a wiser man mad) it may with more reason be believed his brain is turned; and then there is little danger of his being used in evidence for the future. That it was observable, that Oates was sentenced to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate on the Wednesday; and from thence to Tyburn on Friday following: which could be intended no otherwise, but in the nature of a rack; that, by the smart of the first sufferings, and the approaching terror of the next, he might be brought to make such a recantation as was desired: and it is hard to think, that any thing, but a full persuasion in himself, that what he swore was true, could support a man under such torture. If Oates had been guilty of perjury about the Queen-dowager, or any other matter, which has not hitherto been brought in question, it did not relate to the present case: he is liable to be indicted, and punished for it, whatsoever becomes of this bill.—That the commons did not argue, That, because a man had been once believed at a trial, he was not to be prosecuted for perjury after: but they observed, that the very same objections had been made to Oates’s testimony at former trials, and proved by the same witnesses; and yet the juries gave credit to Oates: so that, according to the lords way of reasoning, to suppose Oates to be perjured in those points, was to attain those former juries; and the lords ought to be as careful of charging such a guilt upon one jury, as another. Upon the whole matter, the commons did not think it reasonable it should be required of them to concur to support any part of this erroneous record. It is the right of the subject, that all that is done before or after an illegal Judgment, should fall with it; and though, in proceedings in the legislative way, the commons are sensible they are not tied up to forms, yet they are certainly bound to the rules of natural justice, and are not to deprive the subject of his legal advantage.”

The Managers for the commons concluded the conference, by stating the case, in short, to the lords: “A writ of error is brought in the house of peers: the lords do all avow the judgments to be erroneous; yet, as judges, do, for collateral reasons, assume an arbitrary power to affirm it. The nature of the Judgment being such, as that every subject was concerned in the highest degree, that so dangerous a precedent should not stand, the commons find themselves under a necessity of sending a bill to the lords to set the matter right, by reversing the Judgment. The lords refuse to pass this bill but upon terms: 1. That part of the record must stand: 2. That there must be no notice taken of the Judgments of affirmation given by the peers: As these are the terms now stood upon, so in any other like case they might impose what other terms and conditions they had a mind to. The consequence must be, that the lords, as judges, make what they think fit to be law; and the matter shall never be set right in the legislative way, but upon such conditions as the lords shall be pleased to impose: and how far this concerned the king, and the commons, as to their right in the legislature, was obvious.”

A debate arising in the commons, touching the said Amendments proposed by the lords to be made to the Bill; and the question being put thereupon severally, That the house do agree with the lords in the said Amendments; it passed in the negative.

Ordered, “That the committee who managed the above Conference do inspect the Journals of both houses, and examine, whether there be any precedents of free Conferences desired, and yet there hath not been thereat a liberty of debate of the matters for which such free Conferences have been desired.”

Protest thereon.] These lords following entered their Dissents to the question of adhering to the Amendments, for the Reasons ensuing:

1. “Because the persons who gave Evidence against Titus Oates were incompetent witnesses.
2. Because Titus Oates’s Evidence had before been verified upon those very points in which the perjury is assigned.
3. Because it was at a time when neither council nor witnesses could, with safety, appear for Titus Oates.
4. Because it was at a time when the whole course of the administration of the government was corrupted.
5. Because a vast sum of money, on that trial, and other foul practices, were used both with the witnesses and jurors.
6. Because it makes it almost impossible to prove that a Verdict is corrupt, if nothing but the giving and taking of money may pass for evidence; whereas the law has declared, that many other things may make a verdict corrupt.
7. Because this gives the jury preference in point of justice above four successive parliaments.
8. Because it casts an imputation on the verity of the Popish Plot, and on the justice of the nation, and justifies my lord Stafford and the rest that suffered on the score of the Plot, so long as the Judgment against Oates stands in force.
9. Because it is expressly against the Declaration of our Rights on the 13th of February last.
10. Because it is the greatest blow that ever the English liberties received; and puts them under a greater disadvantage than if they had not so lately been declared.
11. Though a Bill should be brought in to declare the like Judgment shall not be given in time to come, yet it would imply, that before, such Judgment was lawful; which may be of pernicious consequence.
12. Because this

Judgment against Oates has so far been received for law, since Oates suffered, that whipping hath been used in other cases besides perjury. 13. Because the lords have allowed the Judgments against Titus Oates to be erroneous. 14. Because it is more consistent with the honour and justice of the house of peers to rectify a mistaken Judgment, given by themselves, than to adhere to it. 15. Because, at Oates's Trial, the court refused to grant a Habeas Corpus for his witnesses that were in prison, though often by him demanded, and no notice was taken of his demand even by the jurors themselves. (Signed,) Bolton, Herbert, Monmouth, Bolingbroke, Radnor, Stamford, Granville, Montagu, Paget, Shrewsbury, Ward, Delamer, Newport, Cornwallis, Rivers, Vaughan, J. Lovelace, Bath, Culpeper, Macclesfield, Oxford."

Aug. 9. The Resolution of the Committee of the whole house, That it was their opinion that an additional Proviso should be added to the Bill for settling the Revenue, for granting 40,000*l.* per annum to the princess Anne of Denmark for her life only, was reported; and on the question, it was resolved, that the debate should be adjourned, till the Revenue came again under consideration.

Mr. Hampden, chairman of the Committee, also, at the same time, acquainted the house that he was directed by the committee to move that a Bill may be brought in for settling a particular Fund, for satisfying the 600,000*l.* to the Dutch for defraying the Charges of the Expedition to England; and also for 60,000*l.* for the servants of Charles 2. to both which particulars the house agreed.

Aug. 12. The Committee upon the Irish Affairs delivered in their report; the principal part of which, turning on the conduct of col. Lundy, governor of London-Derry;

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, that colonel Lundy be sent over to London-Derry, to be tried there for the Treasons laid to his charge.

Reasons to be offered at a Conference with the Lords for settling the Order of Conferences, &c. Aug. 13. The Reasons to be offered to the lords at a Conference with the lords for settling the method of proceedings between the two houses, upon Conferences, and free Conferences, were reported by the Solicitor-General, and were, in substance, as follow: "The commons have desired this Conference, on occasion of your lordships Message to them, signifying that your lordships adhered to your Amendments in the case of Oates; and have commanded us to open it with a brief of the Dispute between the two houses.—Writs of error were brought to reverse two Judgments against Oates, for perjury, by which he was sentenced to be degraded, to be set in the pillory annually several times; to be imprisoned for life; to be whipt from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn the next. These Judgments your lordships thought fit to affirm. These precedents being of such dangerous consequence to every English subject, the commons thought themselves under a necessity of sending up a Bill to your lordships to have them reversed; in which bill they are called erroneous, 'illegal, cruel, and of evil example to future ages.'—Your lordships by Message acquainted the commons, that you had agreed to the Bill with amendments. By these Amendments the words 'illegal, cruel, and of evil example to future ages' are left out; and a Clause is added, that such excessive punishment should not be inflicted for the future. The words relating to the annulling the said Judgments of the peers on the writ of error, are likewise left out; and a Clause is added, That, till the matters for which Oates was convicted be heard, and determined in parliament, he should not be received as a witness in any court or cause.—The commons, at a Conference, delivered their Reasons why they could not agree to these Amendments; your lordships did the same for insisting on them; but they not proving satisfactory to the commons, a free Conference was desired and obtained, in which your lordships owned that the whole house of peers was satisfied that the Judgments given by the King's-bench, were erroneous, extravagant, and the punishment so exorbitant, as ought not to be inflicted on any English subject, and also that you would not debate whether an erroneous judgment was not illegal: but yet your lordships did declare, that, upon the writs of error, you had chosen to affirm the judgment, rather than Oates should be restored to his testimony; which must have been the consequence of the reversal.—After your lordships had owned so much at the Conference, the commons were extremely surprised to receive a Message that you adhered to your Amendments. 1. Because by this general Vote of adhering, your lordships depart from what was yielded at the free Conference. 2. Your lordships proceeding to adhere upon the first free Conference, they look upon to be irregular; at least, contrary to the ordinary course of proceedings between the two houses: especially, if such adhering should be looked upon as conclusive, since it is usual to have two free Conferences or more, before either house proceeds to adhere.—And, as to the course of parliament, so it is suitable to the nature of things, that there should be no adhering before two free Conferences, at least: because, before that time, each house is not fully possessed of the Reasons upon which the other does proceed, nor have full opportunities of making replies: wherefore, to adhere sooner, is to exclude all possibility of offering expedients.—Beside, this method of adhering so suddenly and unexpectedly, draws very great inconveniences after it: as hath appeared this session; 'The Additional Poll-Bill,' having been lost, to the great prejudice of the crown, by your lordships adhering upon the first free Conference. 'The Bill of Rights,' likewise, in which your lordships, as well as the commons, are highly concerned, by that same quick way of adhering, is in danger to be lost: and no inconveniences can be greater than what must follow the loss of this Bill, if your lordships should take upon yourselves to be conclusive, by adhering upon the first free Conference.—For the commons think it undeniable, That in proceedings in your judicial capacity, upon writ of error, your lordships are as much bound to give judgment upon the record, according to the strict rules of law, as any inferior court whatever, and ought not to enter into the consideration of persons, or collateral respects.—That, for your lordships to assume a discretionary power, to affirm a Judgment, though at the same time, you agree it is erroneous, is to assume a power to make law, instead of judging according to the rules of law.—That, when the commons send up a Bill to your lordships, in order to prevent the mischiefs of such destructive precedents, for your lordships to refuse to reverse those Judgments, though confessed to be erroneous, (unless upon such terms as you are pleased to impose, and to which the commons cannot, in reason, agree) is to leave the kingdom without redress against acknowledged wrongs.—It is recorded, to the honour of your noble ancestors, That they declared they would not change the laws; and the commons hope, you will pursue their steps, and not, by affirming erroneous Judgments, go about to make that law, which was not so before; and, by insisting upon collateral terms, before you will reverse those Judgments in the legislative way, take to yourselves in effect the whole power of the legislature; which is not only to change the law, but to subvert the constitution of the government; if your lordships should persist in such a way of proceeding, and the commons should acquiesce in it.—The commons, therefore, hope your lordships will not persist in this unusual way of adhering, which manifestly tends to the interruption of a good correspondence between the two houses, at this time of such absolute necessity for the establishing the government, and for the peace and safety of the kingdom.*

Petition against Colonel Copley.] The same day, George Mawson, deputy post-master of Kingston upon Hull, exhibited a Petition to the house, complaining that colonel Copley, lieut. governor of Hull, had divers times taken into his possession the post-mail coming to the said town, and disposed of the Letters at his pleasure, to the great prejudice of the traders, &c. of the said town, and the gentry

* “Upon the whole matter Oates, by the dint of the struggle, made a shift to obtain, 1. An Address from the parliament to the king, requiring that his majesty would be graciously pleased to grant him his pardon, 2. The king’s pardon in consequence of that Address, and, 3. A pension of 5*l.* a week in lieu of the several pensions formerly granted him by king Charles of 624*l.* 60*l.* and 200*l.* per ann. which he had been deprived of, and which he had now again applied for, and expected to be restored to.” Ralph.

in the neighbourhood. That he having made complaint of this to John Wildman, esq. post-master general, the said post-master ordered him to cause the mails to be brought directly to his own house; and, likewise, wrote to the said col. Copley to enjoin him, not to open the mail for the future; Notwithstanding which, the said colonel behaved as before, and sent for the petitioner to come to him, who declining it, on account of indisposition; the said Copley ordered a serjeant, and four musqueteers to bring him, tied neck and heels, which they did with such a strange violence, that the blood gushed out of his nose and mouth, and kept him in that intolerable posture for two hours. In consequence of which, the said petitioner is disabled in his limbs, and impaired in his sight, &c. and for as much as the said petitioner cannot have his remedy against the said Copley, by a due course of law, praying the house to take his case into consideration, &c.

Ordered, That lieut. colonel Copley do attend the house.

Aug. 14th, The said Copley attended accordingly, and the petitioner having made good his allegations,

Resolved, “That the seizing the Mail, and breaking open the Post-Letters by any military officer or soldier, is a violation of the right of the subject. That the breaking open the Letters directed to, or sent from a member, is a Breach of Privilege. That the imprisoning, or inflicting any punishments, by any officer or soldier, upon any of the subjects of this kingdom, not being in actual military service, and in pay, is a violation of the rights of the people. That the case of the Petitioner be referred to the committee of grievances.”

Another Petition was presented against the said Copley, for exacting a farthing a tun, from every ship entering the port of Hull: upon which he was again summoned to attend the house; and alledging the said farthing a tun was his perquisite, as lieut. governor, for the maintenance of a certain Chain;

Resolved, “That the levying a farthing a tun, or any sum of money on Ships coming into the port of Hull, upon pretence of maintaining a Chain there, is an illegal exaction upon the people.” And he was afterwards enjoined to levy the said pretended duty no more.

A tumultuous Petition of the Silk-Weavers, occasioned by a Woollen Bill.] This day the commons having sent up a Bill to the lords, for the enjoining the wearing the Woollen Manufacture of this kingdom at certain times of the year, the bailiffs, wardens, and assistants of the companies of Silk-Weavers of London and Canterbury, presented a Petition to their lordships in a tumultuous manner, praying to be heard before the said bill should be passed into a law. Whereupon the house ordered their Speaker to tell the petitioners, “That the lords did not then think fit to give an Answer, because they observed there was an unusual manner of application of men, who ought to be better directed by them who were bailiffs, wardens, and assistants of the Company. That the lords did first require that those crowds should go home; and when that was done, neither they, nor others, people of this nation, needed to doubt, but that their lordships would do justice, and hear the objections of parties concerned in this or any other Bill that should come before them."—And to prevent the eruption of this unruly multitude, which was supposed to be egged on by the discontented, the lords desired his majesty to command some of the horse and foot guards to be aiding to the civil powers; and ordered the governor of the Tower to take care to prevent any unlawful concourse of people in the hamlets of that fortress; the lord mayor of London to have a sufficient number of the Trained Bands in readiness to hinder the passing of any extraordinary numbers of people through the city towards Westminster. And the deputy lieutenants, and justices of the peace of Middlesex, to provide for the security of the city, and liberties of Westminster. The Weavers, seeing these preparations remained quiet in their houses: Whereupon the lords discharged the Trained Bands which had been posted in the Palace yard, Westminster. However, upon the second reading of the Bill for the enjoining the wearing the Woollen Manufactures, their lordships unanimously rejected the same.

Conference on the Bill of Attainder.] The commons having past the Bill, 'for attainting several persons in Rebellion against their majesties,' and sent it up to the lords for their concurrence, the committee whom their lordships appointed to examine the same, prayed, 'That the commons might be desired by a Conference to give a List to the lords of the persons that gave evidence to the commons, against the several persons designed in the Bill to be attainted; that the lords might be fully satisfied by evidence, viva voce, to attaint the several persons, (as they supposed the commons were;) for that if the lords should by themselves enquire of such evidence, they might fail of hearing all the evidence the commons had had.' The lords having agreed to this motion, a Conference was desired and managed betwixt both houses, at which the commons gave a list of the witnesses that deposed at their bar, against the persons mentioned in the Bill of Attainder. These witnesses were W. Watts, Matthew Gun, Basil Purefoy, and W. Dalton; whose Evidence not satisfying the lords, the Bill lay neglected for some days; but the commons having pressed their lordships by two Messages to give expedition to it, the house agreed with the committee in leaving out Thomas lord Howard, the earl of Dover, the lord Hunsdon, sir Roger Strickland, sir Edw. Herbert, colonel Hugh Southerland, and sir W. Jennings, because there did not appear sufficient evidence against them.—The prorogation of the parliament, which happened soon after, put a final stop to this Bill.

The Speaker's Speech to the King at the Ad-
VOL. V.

journalment.] Aug. 20. The Bills being ready for the royal assent, the king came this day to the house of peers, where the Speaker of the commons addressed his majesty as follows:

"May it please your majesty; the commons in this present parliament assembled, having taken into consideration the great assistance that was given by the States of the United Provinces to your majesty, in your glorious design of restoring these kingdoms to their ancient rights and liberties, and how for that end they intrusted their army and fleet to your majesty's disposal, at a time when they had a war declared, and an invasion threatened, by the French king, merely to divert them; they do here humbly present your majesty with a Bill for the appropriating certain Duties of Excise and Customs for the raising of 600,000*l.* which they desire may be applied by your majesty for the satisfaction of the Charges which have been expended by the States in this Expedition.—It is little more than an age, since the most illustrious prince of Orange, your majesty's great grandfather, whose name will ever be famous for his love to his country, did, by the assistance of the English, redeem those Provinces from the like oppressions; which shews how inseparable the interests of these two nations are: and since it was the fatal policy of those that laboured our destructions to endeavour to divide us; it ought to be the endeavour of all true lovers of their countries to keep us firmly united, in order to our preservation.—The commons have likewise considered of the great Arrears that were left due by king Charles 2nd to his Servants; and have therefore made a provision of 60,000*l.* for them, which they humbly desire your majesty would please to distribute amongst them, in such proportions as your majesty, in your princely wisdom, shall think most fit.—And having proceeded thus far in the weighty affairs depending before them, they now become humble suitors to your majesty for a recess, that thereby they may have the opportunity of repairing into their several counties, and promoting your majesty's service there; and what remains undone at present, for want of time to dispatch, they doubt not but that they shall be able to perfect at their next meeting, and, as they hope, to the intire satisfaction of your majesty and the whole kingdom."

After passing the several Bills, the lord privy seal signified, That it was his majesty's pleasure that both houses should severally adjourn themselves till Sept. 20th; but that his majesty did not intend there should then be a Session, unless some emergency of affairs happened: and that, whenever a session was to be, his majesty would give them notice by proclamation.

The King's Speech to both Houses.] Oct. 19. The parliament met, when his majesty made the following Speech* to both houses:

* It is remarkable, says Oldmixon, that this Speech, which met with universal applause, was composed by the king himself, who, on the

"My lords and gentlemen; Though the last sitting continued so long, that perhaps it might have been more agreeable to you, in relation to your private concerns, not to have met again so soon; yet the interest of the public lays an indispensable obligation upon me to call you together at this time.—In your last meeting, you gave me so many testimonies of your affection, as well as confidence in me, that I do not at all question, but in this I shall receive fresh proofs of both. I esteem it one of the greatest misfortunes which can befall me, that, in the beginning of my reign, I am forced to ask such large Supplies; though I have this satisfaction, that they are desired for no other purposes, but the carrying on those wars into which I entered with your advice, and assurance of your assistance. Nor can I doubt of the blessing of God upon an undertaking, wherein I did not engage out of a vain ambition, but from the necessity of opposing those, who have so visibly discovered their designs of destroying our religion and liberties.—It is well known how far I have exposed myself to rescue this nation from the dangers that threatened, not only your liberty, but the Protestant religion in general, of which the Church of England is one of the greatest supports, and for the Defence whereof I am ready again to venture my life.—My Lords and Gentlemen; That which I have to ask of you at present, is, that what you think fit to give towards the Charges of the War for the next year, may be done without delay: and there is one reason, which more particularly obliges me to press you to a speedy determination in this matter, because this next month there is appointed, at the Hague, a General Meeting, of all the Princes and States concerned in this war against France, in order to concert measures for the next campaign. And till I know your intentions, I shall not only be uncertain myself, what resolutions to take, but our allies will be under the same doubts, unless they see me supported by your assistance. Besides, if I know not in time what you will do, I cannot make such provisions as will be requisite, but shall be exposed to the same inconveniences, which were the cause that the preparations for this were neither so effectual nor expeditious as was necessary: the Charge will also be considerably lessened, by giving time to provide things in their proper season, and without confusion.—I have no other aim in this, but to be in a condition to attack our enemies in so vigorous a manner, as by the help of God, in a little time may bring us to a lasting and honourable peace, by which my subjects may be freed from the extraordinary expences of a lingering war; and that I can have no greater satisfaction, than in contributing to their ease, I hope I have already given proof.—That you may be satisfied how the Money has been laid out, which you have already given, I have directed the Accounts to be laid before you, whenever you think fit to call for them.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I have one thing more to recommend to you, which is, the dispatch of a Bill of Indemnity; that the minds of my good subjects being quieted, we may all unanimously concur to promote the welfare and honour of the kingdom."

18th of October, produced it to the Council, written with his own hand in French, at which time he was pleased to say, 'I know most of my predecessors were used to commit the drawing of such Speeches to their ministers, who generally had their private aims and interests in view; to prevent which, I have thought fit to write it myself in French, because I am not so great a master of the English tongue: therefore I desire you to look it over, and change what you find amiss, that it may be translated into English.'

Resolved, That the humble Thanks of the house be returned to his majesty, for his gracious Speech*.

The same day, the sheriffs of London waited

* "The Speech, we are assured, was received with universal applause. Among the lords, no objection was started; and among the commons but one, (which met with little countenance) by sir Tho. Clarges, who made it a matter of complaint, that the words, 'as by law established,' did not follow the mention that was made in it of the church of England: Both houses returned their solemn Thanks; and after this seeming earnest of their good humour, it was thought advisable to provide yet farther for the peace of this session, by extinguishing, as far as possible, the broils of the last: as that had been closed by adjournment only, the several contests between the two houses were left open, and the several inflammatory bills depending; which might be again prosecuted at pleasure: but a Prorogation cancelled all, and laid the malignants under a necessity to begin their webs again. A prorogation was therefore resolved upon; and yet such was the caution of his majesty at this crisis, that he would not exercise that branch of his prerogative, without the concurrence of both houses: accordingly he applied to them for their sense of the matter, and had the pleasure to find that of the lords exactly conformable to his own: but among the commons there was a party who asserted, that such a prorogation was altogether irregular, after his majesty had in his Speech proposed new matter to their consideration: and, in truth, it seemed reasonable enough to conclude, that if a prorogation destroyed all connection between session and session, in relation to the matters depending in either house, it would also do the same with respect to the matters proposed to them from the throne. But the majority were of another mind: and thus, fortified with the approbation of both lords and commons, his majesty on the 21st put a stop to the current of public business, that it might flow the more freely on the 23d following: for it was then that he came again to the house, for form's sake, and opened the session anew with a short reference to his last Speech." Ralph.

on the house, and being admitted, signified, That the lord-mayor and citizens of London, humbly prayed, that the house would do them the honour to dine with them, on the lord-mayor's day. Which invitation the house accepted of, and returned their Thanks for the same.

Oct. 21. His majesty, by message, by the lord chief baron Atkins, Speaker of the house of lords (the marquis of Halifax having desired to be excused from that office), commanded the house to attend him in the house of peers, where he was pleased to prorogue the parliament to the 23d.

SECOND SESSION OF THE CONVENTION PARLIAMENT.

Oct. 23. Both houses assembled again, when his majesty was pleased to declare from the throne, "That, having spoke so lately to them, he need not say any thing now; matters not having been altered from what was then: and therefore referred to what he had said last to both houses, and desired that speedy resolutions might be taken."

Oct. 24. The house resolved, nem. con. That they would stand by, and assist his majesty in reducing Ireland, and joining with his allies abroad, in a vigorous prosecution of a War against France. And, that his majesty be humbly addressed, That he would be pleased to direct, that a State of the War for the ensuing year may be laid before the house.

Proceedings against Burton, Graham, and sir Tho. Jenner.] Oct. 25. The Misdemeanors of Burton, and Graham, were again reported to the house, from the Journals of the last session (see p. 278.) At the same time was reported, likewise, the case of sir Thomas Jenner, late one of the barons of the exchequer: who was charged with declaring for the king's Dispensing Power, for being a commissioner for ecclesiastical causes, for having acted as one of the visitors of Magdalen college in Oxford, and committed most notorious offences, in expelling the president and fellows, &c. and afterwards joining in a decree to make them for ever incapable of preferment, either spiritual or temporal: all which, it was said, involved the said sir Tho. Jenner in the subversion of the laws and government of the kingdom. The house being then informed, that several state prisoners were at that instant bailing in the King's-bench, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus act, ordered, That sir Thomas Jenner, Graham, and Burton, be immediately brought to the house by the governor of the Tower, to answer such matters as shall be objected against them; and the said Jenner being bailed before the warrant of the house could be served, the serjeant at arms was ordered to take him into custody; as likewise Burton and Graham, which last were brought to the bar and examined; but not giving satisfaction, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Charge against them.

The Earls of Salisbury and Peterborough impeached, &c.] Oct. 26. Ordered, That the governor of the Tower do immediately bring before the house the earl of Castlemain, sir Edw. Hales, Ch. Hales, esq. and Obadiah Walker, to answer such matters as should be charged against them.

Resolved, That an Impeachment of High-Treason be sent to the lords against the earls of Salisbury and Peterborough for departing from their Allegiance, and being reconciled to the church of Rome. And that Mr. Foley do impeach the said earls at the bar of the house of lords, in the name of the house of commons, and of all the commons of England, which was accordingly done; and the lords committed the earl of Peterborough to the Tower the same day, where the earl of Salisbury was already confined.—Sir Edw. Hales, Chas. Hales, and Obadiah Walker, being then severally brought to the bar, and put on their defence, Walker and sir Edward were ordered to the Tower, but Mr. Hales was discharged.

Oct. 28. The earl of Castlemain being brought to the bar, and there examined, it was ordered that the said earl be charged in the Tower, by warrant from the house, for High-Treason and other high crimes and misdemeanours. And the said earl desiring he might have the liberty of the Tower, and of being waited upon by his servants, &c. and not to be confined close prisoner, as orders had been of late given, both with regard to him and others; a debate arose, (the earl being first withdrawn) the result of which was the appointment of a committee to bring in a Bill for the better regulating the Imprisonment of the subject, who were likewise empowered to examine into Abuses committed by gaolers, &c.—Resolved further, That Mr. Attorney-General be ordered to prosecute Mr. Richardson the keeper of Newgate, for his illegal usage of several of the king's subjects, during their imprisonment.

An Enquiry voted into the Conduct of the War.] Nov. 1. Sir Henry Capel (Auditor of the Imprest) presented to the house two Accounts of the Monies arising from the Revenue, and the Issues by way of imprest. Lord Ranelagh, (Paymaster of the Forces) likewise presented to the house by his majesty's command, a State of the War for the ensuing year, viz. For the English forces in England. For the Dutch forces in England. For the English forces in Holland. And, for the forces in Ireland.—Sir Thomas Lee presented the State of the Navy for the ensuing year; and sir Henry Goodrick, a State of the Ordnance. All which Accounts being read, Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inspect the Expences of the War the last year, and to make their report to the house.

Resolved, nem. con. That a Committee be appointed to examine by what means the Intelligence came to be given to their majesties enemies, concerning the several stations of the winter-guards of the Navy; as likewise into Miscarriages in the victualling of the navy; the transportation of the army, and whatever relates to the last year's conduct of the War.

Debate on the State of the War.] Nov. 2. The house resolved into a grand Committee on the State of the War; Mr. Hampden in the Chair.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The Forces now in pay are 70,000 horse, foot, &c. I think the nation cannot keep them. When we were at war with the two great powers of the world, Holland and France, the establishment was much short of that. Now the king is graciously pleased to come in to us to relieve us from civil and military oppressions, I hope we shall be in that way and order as to have no extraordinary Forces. Though we are in a state of war, we need not above 25,000 men. Our conditions with Holland are upon the foot of the treaty of Ch. 2, of mutual alliance and defence. If either party be attacked, we are to deal by mediation; and if we cannot compose, we are to assist with 8000 men, and are to come into the war in three months. I think we ought not to continue the 8000 men. I know, none of the allies are obliged to beat king James out of Ireland; we are to support that. I do not think it for us to take more upon us than we necessarily are obliged to. I think, 40,000 men may be taken out of this establishment; I am sure a less number conquered Ireland in 1650. I profess, I am much in the dark, till I hear some proposition from the king of the State of the War for the next year, and till we know the obligation of Alliances. The Dutch forces are given in 14,000. They are not all in Ireland, some are in Scotland. They are upon parole to keep up 70 in a company, &c. and perhaps they are but 32 in a company, and in a year they will be filled up; so that we have a chimerical army. Let the muster-master acquaint you farther.

The Earl of Ranelagh gave an account of the Establishment, and rectified Clarges's mistakes.

Mr. Garroway. I see no certainty of the number of men in England, Scotland, and Ireland. I think the Account that has been transferred to you comes from the muster-master, and the king is abused. I would go on regularly to the State of the War, what the king thinks fitting, and they to bring in where the men are; without the certain number of men, you know not how to provide. I think it fitter to apply to the Fleet, and retrench the Landmen. England knows no need of them. I believe the Money is not all spent. I think it may be embezzled. I never saw a worse Account. If we do not presently give Money, I would have some Vote to give credit to the war. I would have the true state of the number of men; it is no matter whose regiments they are. I would have Accounts brought here by somebody that will allow them, but I desire not to go blind-fold. Let the Money be rightly applied, and I will go with the highest, and I desire the king to give us the State of the War.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I speak to method, which is carried on with great uncertainty.

Some may seem abuses of the muster, and that is no part of your order. It is 'to consider the State of the War,' and it is more pertinent, to consider the numbers necessary to carry on the war the next year. If gentlemen think England in a condition to carry on the war for themselves, and the confederates, I am afraid they are mistaken. I believe, all concurrence is little enough for what is necessary to carry on the war. I think you had good service from Clarges, who proposed retrenchments of the Dutch Forces: I am sorry that Englishmen are not fit for English interest. If, for fear of an enemy within you, you must have an army, you will never be without one. I am sorry the interest of England is said to be safer in foreign hands, than English. If, by the Treaty, you are to provide for Holland 10,000 men, you are no farther obliged than till you come into the war; then that is a charge extraordinary. You that are come in at the last part of the day as assistants, now are made principals; and they will leave you out when it is their interest. Upon another debate to talk of suppressing popery, and your allies leave you—If you stick there, we must either suppress them, or they us. There are 7000 Danes designed for Ireland; a great sum is gone for them. I will not repeat the scarcity of money; but how many Irish gentlemen must fight for their own, and yet we send for foreign forces, and give all we are worth for Ireland, and know not whether we shall be masters of it. I do think, that, as to the 8000 to be sent to Holland, you are not obliged to it. The Dutch army is unnecessary, and I hope you will think of it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am of Seymour's opinion, to begin with Ireland; but, as for the Danes, I think there is a great deal of difference in the Charge betwixt them and Irish gentlemen, who will not serve for common soldiers, as the Danes. I hope we shall keep Ireland, when we have got it: let us get it first. As for the 8,000 men we are to supply Holland, at the same time those are withdrawn, they may withdraw their fleet.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We are now possessed of the whole province of Ulster, where, by computation, are three Papists to one Protestant, and in Munster more Protestants, and I am well informed that a great body may be raised there, who will fight pro aris et focis. The best inducement to have the Danes is, that they should not go to the French.

Sir Rob. Howard. By this debate, we shall find, that making too melancholy a prospect is to the advantage of our enemies, but may be, upon serious consideration, for our use. Should you, out of good husbandry, strike off 10,000 men from Ireland, I believe you will give great satisfaction to king James. Seeing you shrink in that, you may increase the French king's resolution in supplying him. King James's army in Ireland is supposed 20,000 horse, and 30,000 foot. The loss of 10,000 of ours there may have strange effects.

Mr. Garroway. I am still of the same opinion that this is the worst Account I ever saw in my life. When king James went away, he left 30,000 men, and we had 10,000 out of Holland. The English arms are all lost; and now effective, rank and file, you have not 20,000 of these men left.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am not of capacity to say how many men may serve for Ireland, but I would have his majesty moved to declare the numbers for next year.

Major Wildman. I would remove a mistake; we talk not here for the king, but for the kingdom. I have heard a doctrine preached here, 'Take care we be not principals in the war against France;' but against king James we are principals in that war to defend us from popery and slavery. It has been the doctrine of this house many years, that France is in the bottom of all slavery, and that was to be brought upon us. We are in a worse condition than the confederates, and have need of all the confederates against king James and France. The French king would have made conditions with Holland, and offered money to divide Holland from us, with all offers of trade, if they would have left us in the lurch, and not assisted the prince of Orange; and they may still make peace. I believe nobody here is inclined to treat with king James. We must have war upon us, and if we are wanting to ourselves, and give the least discouragement to the confederates, they may leave us to ourselves to struggle with France and king James. It has been by the treachery of late princes that we have been brought to truckle under France, which has brought him to be able to oppose the greatest powers by sea, the English and the Dutch. I remember the time when the French durst not build a ship without giving an account of it. I move that you would supply the king with what forces are necessary for Ireland, and what may wholly suppress Ireland.

Mr. Garroway. I do not agree with him for so great a supply. I do not think to lay a foundation for such a war as that the king of France should not build a ship without our knowledge. I believe, if it were not that the crown of Spain would be in dispute, you never would have had the company of the confederates, and the emperor would make peace. I do believe that we cannot support the war above a year longer. Therefore say you will grant a Supply to carry on the war, and I am for it; but 'that the French king has 40 or 50,000 men in Germany,' I have heard it, but I believe nobody ever saw it. That the French king should have 200,000 men, and suffer Bonn and Mentz to be taken! And possibly, if he had chopped 10,000 men into Mentz, they had done him more service than all he could do. I am free to make a provision for a good force. I care not what it costs us, but I would not be cozened.

Col. Birch. It is not known to me, whether we are to have 30 or 40,000 men; that will be in due time. You may preserve Ireland and yourselves, if God Almighty does not take away your understandings; therefore I move, 'That 40,000 men may be for the next year's establishment in Ireland.'

Sir John Guise. You have been told of the former reducing of Ireland. The Forfeitures were taken of Papists estates, and at three years value raised 320,000*l.* I move that you will consider some such way now.

Sir John Trevor. The question is, Whether you will consider the numbers of men, or a lump of Money for Ireland? I am for men, and if you appropriate not the money, it may be applied either to the navy, or the Dutch, and not for Ireland, and neither done at last. I do not understand that what is sent to you is an Answer to your Address. If you compute for 36,000 men, I would venture to give for 50,000. I am sure it is more proper for the king. We are not a council of war, but representatives of the people, to assist him. We are but to supply, according to the numbers of men; the king cannot else carry on the war vigorously. If you make not an end of the war this year, I know not how we can supply it another. I move, 'That the king may send us the State of the War.'

Sir Henry Capel. Several of the Council attended the king about the Admiralty and the Army, and the state of both is delivered to the house, as approved of by the king.

Sir John Trevor. Capel goes a great way, but those who gave in that State of War to the king, understand war no more than himself.

Sir George Treby. There is a necessity that Ireland should be reduced: I have no share of it when it is reduced, but I would have it reduced. I am not so vain as to say that France should be reduced, but I would suppress so great a neighbour. Our consideration is for carrying on the war, but most discourses seem to depart from that rather than to pursue it. But I hear spoken of, our being delivered from a Standing Army; we had a standing army, but were delivered from it by the duke of Albemarle (general Monk.) But there is an absolute necessity of an Army, unless you would be annoyed at home, when you are defending your outworks. I hope those who are not for supporting the government, will be reckoned amongst French and Irish. It is said, 'There are mismanagements in the Accounts;' to which no man is a greater enemy than myself. I have seen the time, when those who cheated the king were thought the best men. The Money we are to pay now is our redemption-money; for what we paid to beat our enemies formerly, was spent upon dissolute persons at court. I agree if we look to the well-management of the Money, it gives double; and notwithstanding it is so good, it must be taken in its proper time, and not hinder what is for immediate safety.—It has been said, 'That the emperor is not obliged to reduce Ireland;' but if he opposes France, he helps to reduce Ireland. There is a meeting of the Confederates at the Hague the next month, [see the King's Speech,] and when the king knows your intentions, he will take his measures accordingly; and till you declare how you will assist him, it is not possible for him to take his measures. It is said, 'We have foreigners in the nation, and that the natives might be sufficient to preserve you;' but though prorogation annuls 'Votes' of parliament, yet not 'Acts.' You have desired their assistance, and given them Money. Denmark might have had better terms from France: you will not entertain him, and he casts himself into the French king's arms. We look upon them (as in great part) naturalized to our interest. We were grieved with popery; where was the back? It was France gave the back to that edge, but instead of an 'actual war,' that we had given money for, it proved an actual peace, and we were choused of it. France heretofore was but an inland province, and now is great at sea. It is well to provide that all malefactors be punished, that we may live well, but we must live before. What is wanting to this state of war? You would have some Estimate of the war; you have called for Accounts, for this day's work, and contented yourselves with all materials requisite, and believed you would accept this given as a State of the War; should you have more, it is but in order to giving Money. Now, having this before you, it is enough to inform your judgments as proper to guide your vote.

Mr. Garroway. Two millions will not do the Charge, according to the computation of horse and foot; but if you be pleased that it be added to the Revenue, it will do all your business, and I believe you will be supplied fully.

Resolved, "That, for the reducing of Ireland, and joining, this ensuing year, with their majesties allies abroad, in a vigorous prosecution of the War against France both by sea and land, a Supply be given to their majesties, not exceeding the sum of two millions, to be added to the public Revenue."—Which was agreed to by the house nem. con.

Debate on the Bill of Rights.] Nov. 6. An ingrossed Bill for establishing the Rights of the Subject, was read the third time.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I find in the latter Clause of the Bill a power in the king of dispensing, &c. If that be admitted, all the rest is nothing. I would advise not to part with the Money-bill till this be perfected; let it lie upon the table.

Sir Edw. Hussey. There is a Clause in the Bill, that I do not understand; 'That no Papist shall succeed to the crown, none of the Church of Rome, and no Protestant shall be put by. If a Protestant be a reputed Papist, he shall be put by.' Charles 1. was thought a Papist: Charles 2 by many was reckoned popishly affected; and I fear, as there was Spanish gold stirring in court and parliament, in James 1's time, why may not these things happen again? I hear of no Test to the king to distinguish him from a Papist; must the muzzle be set upon the king when the council please? This may prevent a Lutheran from coming to the crown, because he comes not up to all the points of our religion. I fear, it may be like the Bill of Oaths, which the greatest lawyers of England understand not. There is a clause in the Bill, 'That the king shall not suspend laws, &c.' What if a murder be committed and a man wrongfully condemned, shall he be hanged for want of the king's power to pardon? I stand not up to oppose the Bill, but I would have it explained and moderated. —The Bill was then passed, nem. con.

Debate on Major General Ludlow's coming to England.] Sir Joseph Tredenham. I hear that major-general Ludlow * is come into England, and is in town, and that his old accomplices do comfort, aid, and abet him. By act of parliament he is attainted, and is a declared enemy to the king and kingdom. To what end do we raise taxes upon the people, but to support the government? To what can these persons pretend, but to bring us into the same anarchy as formerly? Now we are setting things in order, they are contriving to make us victims to their passions. I am for the public security, and it is to that end I stand up. I would address the king to issue out his royal proclamation, to command him out of the nation.

Sir John Guise. I offer it to your consideration, whether any body will make it appear that Ludlow is here?

Marquis of Winchester. I think it well moved. The gentleman at the bar tells you, that he walks in the face of the nation. 'Tis necessary the gentleman should give you Information. I know nothing of the person. My family, I am sure, has suffered in king Charles 1st's time.† I speak nothing of the man but for your justice.

* "Ludlow had been a ringleader of the Republican party in the Civil Wars, had distinguished himself in the battles of Edge-hill, Newbury, &c. and he was also one of king Charles 1st's Judges. He served afterwards under Cromwell as lieutenant-general of horse in Ireland, and had a great share in the reduction of that kingdom. At the Restoration he found means to escape to France, and from thence went to Lausanne in Switzerland, where he resided many years. He afterwards removed to Vevay, where, in spite of many attempts that were made to assassinate him, he not only survived king Charles 2, but lived to see the ruin of king James 2, by the Revolution, in which he earnestly desired to have been assistant; and left his retreat at Vevay, and came to England, in order to exert his old-age in that cause; having some expectations of being employed in Ireland, against the popish and other adherents to the (as he styles him) 'abdicated king.' And with this design he ventured to appear openly in London, &c." Biograph. Britann.

† His grandfather John marquis of Winchester, made a garrison for king Charles 1, of

Mr. Hawles. I do not see how Ludlow comes to be so considerable a man as that this house should address the king about him. Every private man may attach him. He is attaint upon record. Many have been guilty of murders; you have said so, and yet they walk abroad.

Mr. Coningsby. I think it the strangest thing that ever was heard of a parliament sitting, to suffer one to face you that is attainted by parliament. Upon this extraordinary occasion, do an extraordinary thing, and address the king, as is moved.

Col. Birch. I am in a new perriwig, and pray let the house look upon me before I am heard. For this person to come in the face of a parliament, is a horrid thing, if it be so. I am curious to know whether he be here, or no. Pray let somebody avow him to be here before you make the order.

Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, that he will please to issue out a Proclamation for the apprehending colonel Ludlow, who stands attainted of high treason, by act of parliament, for the murder of king Charles 1: And that he will please to propose a reward to such as shall apprehend him."—Ordered, That the said Address be presented to his majesty by sir Edw. Seymour†.

Debate on Attaching lord chancellor Jeffreys. Col. Tipping. The late chancellor Jeffreys died in his bed, with so much guilt of murder upon him, and the house sitting. 'Twas he that voided the Charters, and backed the Judges in the Dispensing Power, and in it passed sentence on all your laws and liberties. He had his hand in lord Russel's and col. Sidney's blood, and executed sir Tho. Armstrong, by a rule of court, expressly against the statute of Edw. 6. Innocent blood he sought for, his fine seat at Basing, which endured a two years siege, from Aug. 1643 to Oct. 1645. But at last it was taken by storm, with himself in it, with about 400 persons, and was burnt to the ground by the enemy, having found in it of money, jewels, &c. to the amount of 200,000*l*.

† This Address being presented the next day, his majesty, without any hesitation, returned this Answer: "That the Address was so reasonable, and the desire so just, that he would order a proclamation to be issued out immediately for that purpose." See the Journal.

"But Ludlow, as soon as he was informed of the motion, had hastened to the sea side, whence, after waiting near a fortnight for a good wind, he returned to Vevay; where he continued till his death, which happened in the year 1693, and in the 73d of his age. His Memoirs were first published about five years after his death." Biograph. Britann. ubi supra. Sir Edward Seymour was particularly zealous against general Ludlow, on account of his having a grant of the general's forfeited estate in Wiltshire.

and condemned; as Mrs. Lisle, for harbouring a traitor knowing him to be such, and he knew he was not*. He has raised his estate on the ruin of the laws. His estate and honour are the price of your blood. I move, That you will attaint him.

Mr. Coningsby. It is all one, for a man in a gown, or a man with a sword, to ruin your laws. I would reduce him to that state he was in before he did these villainies.

Resolved, nem. con. That a Bill be brought in for the forfeiture of the estate and honour of George late lord Jeffreys, † baron of Wem,

* "Her husband had been a regicide, and was one of Cromwell's lords, and was called lord Lisle. She was a woman of great piety and charity. The night after the duke of Monmouth's defeat, in 1685, Hicks, a violent preacher among the dissenters, and Nelthorp, came to her house. She knew Hicks, and treated him civilly, not asking from whence they came. But Hicks told what brought them thither; for they had been with the duke of Monmouth. Upon which she went out of the room immediately, and ordered her chief servant to send an information concerning them to the next justice of peace, and in the mean while to suffer them to make their escape. But, before this could be done, a party came about the house and took both of them, and her for harbouring them. Jeffreys resolved to make a sacrifice of her, and obtained of the king a promise that he would not pardon her; so she was brought to her trial. No legal proof was brought that she knew that they were rebels; the names of the persons found in her house were in no proclamation; so that there was no notice given to beware of them. Jeffreys affirmed to the jury, upon his honour, that the persons had confessed that they had been with the duke of Monmouth. This was the turning a witness against her, after which he ought not to have judged in the matter; and though it was insisted on as a point of law, that, till the persons found in her house were convicted, she could not be found guilty, yet Jeffreys charged the jury in a most violent manner to bring her in guilty: all the audience was strangely affected with so unusual a behaviour in a judge; only the person most concerned, the lady herself, who was then past 70, was so little moved at it, that she fell asleep. The jury brought her in 'not guilty,' but the judge, in great fury, sent them out again; yet they brought her in a second time, 'not guilty.' Then he seemed as in a transport of rage, and upon that, threatened them with an attaint of jury. So they, overcome with fear, brought her in the third time 'guilty.' The king would show no other favour but that he changed the sentence from burning to beheading. She died with great constancy of mind, and expressed a joy that she thus suffered for an act of piety and charity." Burnet.

† "Jeffreys died on the 18th of April 1689 in the Tower; having, as it is said, hastened his late lord chancellor of England: and it is recommended to colonel Tipping to take care of it.

Debate on the Supply.] Nov. 7. The house went into a grand committee on the Supply.

Sir Edw. Seymour. The question is, Whether persons liable to the 500*l.* Forfeiture shall be charged towards the raising the Money that you have agreed? I suppose no man but believes, that, before you raise this sum, there will be a great many hardships somewhere. You will not make price of their folly. You know what attempts have been made against our religion and laws; this penalty is no more than what they are liable to already. Nothing can be of greater consideration of justice than to make this a fund. To pay 100,000*l.* a month—a man may live to be mistaken. The prince of Orange's Army, and the other Forces in the West country, have eaten up all the fodder of the last year, and you will have an ill account of that country if a hard winter. I will with cheerfulness support the government, but it is reasonable that we pay not the price of other mens follies, while they pay not a farthing to the public charge. As for that law of the Test, the wit of man could not have found out a greater preservative against Popery, and will you let go that impudent action of taking offices without the Test, &c.? Have they deserved this? Were they put in for preservers of your liberties? They may pretend to be defenders of your faith too. You are not at the last end of your tether. I think it reasonable that you should raise these 500*l.* Forfeitures to be applied to the public.

Mr. Hawles. I am no friend to Popery; and I do not regard whether papist, or fanatic, break your laws: I would have the laws run upon them. But the proper question is, Whether the 500*l.* Forfeiture will yield what you think? If you run upon every man, I am sure you will never raise it, unless as in the Act of Conventicles, he that is, pays for him that is not, responsible. You must make a new law for persons not qualified, and who have got nothing by their offices.

end, by the intemperate use of spirituous liquors. Mr. Tindal adds concerning him, on the credit of sir Joseph Jekyll, late master of the rolls, who had it from the mouth of Dr. Scott himself, 'That while he (Jeffreys) continued a prisoner, he was visited by Dr. John Scott, the celebrated author of the 'Christian Life;' and being urged by him to improve his present situation by a serious review of his past life, he expressed great concern upon the occasion; but with regard to one part of his conduct, which had exposed him to most censure, his behaviour in the West after the defeat of the duke of Monmouth, he declared, that how cruel soever his proceedings might be thought, they had by no means come up to the severity which king James expected from him, his majesty being extremely displeased with him on that account.'" Ralph,

Sir Tho. Lee. It may happen, I think, that a Protestant who would make himself grateful to king James, has done more mischief in promoting the Popish Interest than Papists. Perhaps it will come so hard upon those in Corporations, that it may undo them who have little, and cannot speak for themselves; but how will you distinguish it? Those who had no Offices of Profit, and will now take the Test, I would have them excused, but such as refuse now should pay double.

Sir Edward Seymour. I do not understand the reason of that distinction of 'then' and 'now.' The thing they stood upon was not matter of conscience, which is the same now as it was then. Because they carried on the Suspending Power, that has brought us into all this misfortune; I am not for distinction.

Sir John Thompson. I wonder the gentleman can remember some and forget others. He speaks of 'the Dispensing Power.' I think they were as great enemies to the government who ruined us on the Prerogative side.—He was taken down to Order.

Mr. Sacheverell. I cannot agree to deceive the king, by getting nothing by poor men. You will punish them that did it, to save themselves from ruin. The Papists had another end in it. I do know persons that did come in at that time, that wish as well to the Church of England as any men, who would rather run the penalty than let the Corporation be ruined, and Corporations had been ruined that gave not up their Charters. I can go up to those that made no profit of it, and can freely come in. I mean not, by this, to excuse justices of peace, nor deputy-lieutenants, but poor men in corporations.

Sir Edward Seymour. I am sorry Thompson did not go on; but I call to his memory or any man's, to charge me with doing any thing against the interest of the nation, or for any foreign interest.

Sir William Pulteney. They were to be prosecuted within six months, who acted in Commissions without taking the Test, and there have been pardons already passed.

Mr. Brewer. Whoever transgressed against this law must be fools or knaves; therefore put the question as first moved.

Sir John Guise. For ought I see, we need not have put it so far as king James. If the prosecution must be within six months, I would willingly see that.

Mr. Sacheverell. If you would put it by a sum, let it be by a quantum of value upon the poor men. I do not except men of authority, as justices of the peace, and deputy-lieutenants, but poor men of corporations. I know not one justice not worth 100*l.* per ann. nor deputy-lieutenant. I know no way but to state it by the sum; put it upon men of 100*l.* per ann. or money in value to it.

Mr. Garraway. It is a hard matter to word this question, but I would put in 'privy-counsellors, sheriffs, mayors, deputy-lieutenants, and justices, and all offices of profit.'

Sir John Guise. There is one you will hardly come at, Charles Frines, recorder of Gloucester. Pray remember his Charge in print. If you go by offices of Profit, that may do.

Col. Birch. Do not forget them. I was most afraid of governors of castles, and those in the army; they were most dangerous.

Resolved, 1. "That it is the opinion of this committee, That toward the raising the Supply to be given to their majesties, for reducing of Ireland, and prosecution of the War against France, there be a review of the Poll-Bill: and that the house be moved, that a bill be brought in for that purpose. 2. That, in the same bill, there be a tax of 20s. laid upon every shop-keeper, tradesman, and artificer, worth 300*l.* clear personal estate. 3. That, towards the raising the said Supply, there be a Tax of 100,000*l.* laid upon the Jews: and that the house be moved, that a bill be brought in for that purpose."

Nov. 8. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, That, towards the raising the Supply to be given to their majesties, the pecuniary Penalties incurred by all privy-counsellors, lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, militia officers, justices of peace of counties and cities, mayors, bailiffs of corporations, sheriffs, recorders, town-clerks, and also by other persons who have accepted or exercised any Office or Place of Profit, either military or civil, other than such as are now officers in their majesties armies or fleet, contrary to an Act of the 25th Ch. 2. intituled, 'An Act for preventing Dan'gers which may happen from Popish Recu-
'sants,' be speedily levied and applied to that purpose: and that a Bill be brought in to that effect.—All which was agreed to by the house.

Nov. 9. The house went into a grand committee, on the Supply.

Col. Birch. I have seen an Irish Rebellion before this, in 1640. The Rebellion in Ireland was then quelled out of Irish money and Irish estates. What was then done was by a Bill for Subscription at Guild-hall for so many acres of land on the rebels estates, and other great persons. There was then 370,000*l.* raised upon it. When Charles 2. came in, a Committee of Claims was made. But if the estates of those in arms against the king and kingdom were offered to sale, I think they would raise some money. This I submit to your wisdom. It makes so many friends to the government, and it is their interest. Your enemies, by this, will see you are in good earnest, and that they are no friends to you, nor you to them.

Sir Tho. Clarges. In 1641 an Act passed for Proposals in such a province, and so much was given for so many acres. I am for a Committee to receive Proposals, before you make an Act; it is too early for that. At that time, in 1641, we were possessed of Dublin, and other places, and I think, if we do any thing, a Committee should view the former Act.

Mr. Hawles. I know no estate yet forfeited in Ireland. In Charles 1st's time, they attainted the persons before they forfeited their estates.
VOL. V.

Mr. Garroway. You have passed some votes which will not give satisfaction, to come up to your present necessity to raise two millions, by the several projects; we must go really to the thing, and resolve that the land must bear some. I care not which way, so it be done better or worse; therefore say what proportion the land must bear. I propose, that you will raise a certain sum upon the land 1,400,000*l.* by a pound rate, monthly assessment, and debate that.

Mr. Godolphin. You are not yet ripe for this question of laying 1,400,000*l.* upon land, but you may be presently; the returns being about making in the exchequer of the 12*d.* in the pound. By that you will know exactly what to do, when you see the duplicates. I believe you must lay 2s. in the pound for one year.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, 1. That the house be moved to appoint a Committee to receive and consider of Proposals for advancing Money upon the security of Estates forfeited by occasion of the present Rebellion in Ireland. 2. That, towards the raising the Supply, &c. a sum not exceeding 1,400,000*l.* be charged upon land. 3. That the sum charged upon land be raised by way of a pound rate. 4. That the said pound rate be 2s. in the pound for one year, &c. as also a farther charge of 2s. in the pound upon all such persons as shall refuse to take the Oaths which are appointed instead of the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy."—Which being reported, were agreed to by the house.

Debate on the State of Ireland.] Nov. 11. Sir Tho. Clarges. If the English army had intercepted king James, we might have had Dublin and Drogheda before they had it. I move, That some persons of trust may be employed to inspect the Army.

Mr. Garroway. I move to send into Ireland some persons, not upon recommendation, but persons of integrity, to inspect the Army. I would not have spoken now, but that the Fleet and Army are so out of order, that I know not what they are, nor where. I would have also a true State of the Army in England. I would know what we have to trust to.

Mr. Papillon. I move, That you will enquire what Wines and Brandies have been taken as prize, and judged by the Commissioners, that it may be sent into Ireland for relief of the Army there.

Sir John Guise. I know not whether the Army ought to be refreshed with that which ought to have been thrown upon the ground. Perhaps there may be some running contrivances to elude your act, but you may, if you please, have benefit by this; perhaps your Army would buy it. I shall not be satisfied to elude your law, but if it be distributed among the regiments that the common soldiers may have the benefit of it, and none else, I am for it.

Mr. Garroway. I desire that some of these gentlemen that tell us of this Wine and Brandy, would acquaint you how they came by it, whether by prize from us, or the Dutch? I can give no vote, till I know how they came by it.

Ordered, "That the commissioners of the customs, and the commissioners of the prize-office, do, upon Wednesday next, bring in an Account, what French wines and brandies, and other French goods, have been taken as Prizes, or have been seized upon by the officers of the custom-house; and where they are, and when taken, and by whom."

Mr. Sacheverell. I like the motion well, to inspect the Army in Ireland, which, I hear, is so low that I am ashamed to name them. Notwithstanding the accounts of 36,000, I believe they are not 14,000 men, and we pay for 36,000. I would have nothing wanting of our duty, and to take care that other persons do theirs, to do what we would all carry on, the reducing of Ireland. As for the Fleet, if we have such another summer, it will be in vain for us to be here. I move, That the king would send such persons to inspect the Army and the Fleet, as he does confide in.

Mr. Ettrick. Several of your members are in Ireland, men of quality. I move, that they may come over and give you account.

Col. Austen. If you have members there independent on all commands, I am for it, but I would understand the members there. If no more than common fame represents, you had as good have none.

Sir John Guise. I doubt not but it is absolutely necessary for your service to know the numbers of your forces in Ireland, the Army here, and the Fleet. I hope you will have a good account, as far as relates to England and the fleet, but you have an army in Flanders; that in Ireland is wholly in Mr. Harbord's, and that in Flanders in lord Churchill's, inspection, &c. As for a committee, it is impossible they should give you account, unless some such way be taken.

Sir Tho. Lee. The debate now stands, that the Army of Ireland is disproportionable to what you pay; it is proposed to see the musters sent up to the king. For the present, the king is a stranger to England; it is a wonder he knows so much already. It is for the king's service that you make him this Representation; by it he may know what otherwise he could not. He must see with other mens eyes. I see no doubt but the king will appoint commissioners; therefore put it off your hands.

Mr. Smith. I would have persons inspect the Army, that have no interest of command in it; they must incur the ill thoughts of the rest, and I think them not safe in their lives by their fellow-officers.

Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, &c. that he will please to appoint some fit persons to go over into Ireland, to take an Account of the number of the Army there, and the State and Condition of it."

Case of Lord Griffin.] The lord Griffin having been often required by letters and otherwise to attend the house of lords, and still refusing to appear, their lordships desired the king, by an Address, to summon him by his royal proclamation to render himself, (at such a day as his majesty should appoint) to their house, if then actually sitting, or to one of the secretaries of state. His lordship being accordingly summoned, surrendered himself to the lord Nottingham, and on the 19th of October, having made his appearance before the house of lords, the Speaker told him, That he knew what he had to do before his sitting in that house; whereupon his lordship desired time to consider of taking the Oaths, he not being prepared for it: which was readily granted.—The same day the parliament was prorogued, a Packet was intercepted, which plainly discovered how little the lord Griffin was inclined to own the present government. This discovery happened in the following manner. His lordship having caused a large tin bottle to be made with a double bottom, ordered his cook to go to a pewterer's at an unseasonable hour of the night, to get the false bottom soldered: the pewterer finding a Packet between the two bottoms of the bottle, began to suspect something; and the cook not giving him a satisfactory answer about its contents, he made bold to open it. The superscription of several letters directed to king James, the duke of Berwick, &c. justified the pewterer's suspicion, who immediately seized the lord Griffin's cook, and carried him to one of the secretaries of state; but he being gone to bed, and his servants refusing to admit the pewterer to their master's presence, the lord Griffin, who by this time began to apprehend what had befallen his messenger, took this opportunity to make his escape. Besides the Letters, there was found an Account of some private Resolutions of the Council, and an exact List of all the land and sea forces of England; whereupon the lord Griffin's house and papers were searched, his lady committed to the Tower, several suspected persons arrested, and the Custom-house officers ordered to stop all unknown persons, that offered to cross the seas without passes. Upon which his lordship, having absconded himself some few days, and finding it difficult to go out of the kingdom, surrendered himself to the earl of Shrewsbury, secretary of state, who having examined him, committed him to the custody of a messenger, from whence he was sent into the Tower. Thereupon the commons appointed a committee to enquire how the lord Griffin came to know a Resolution, which the king had communicated to four persons only; and the lords addressed his maj. to let him understand that the said lord being one of their members, they were consequently his proper judges. The king having left the cognizance of this affair to the peers, they began to examine the Papers intercepted in the pewter bottle, which were the only evidence against the lord Griffin; and because some few days before it had been resolved in that house, that colonel Algernon Sidney was unjustly condemned, nothing but writings, found in his closet, having been produced against him, the earl of Rochester argued from a parity of reason, in favour of the lord Griffin; who after several warm debates was set at liberty upon sufficient bail*.

Petition of the Lord Viscount Preston.] While the lord Griffin's affair was depending, the lord Preston, viscount of Scotland, having presented to the house of lords a patent from king James, dated from Versailles the 21st of January, whereby he was created baron of England, their lordships voted him guilty of high-treason; but however, they thought fit to refer the examination of that matter to the Judges, their assistants. My lord Preston pretended, that the patent being dated one day before the meeting of the Convocation, which had voted the Throne vacant, it ought therefore to be valid: to which it was answered, That the Vacancy was supposed to begin from the moment king James left the kingdom, whereby he abdicated the government. The next day the Judges brought in the lord Preston guilty of a high misdemeanour, for which he was committed to the Tower. Not long after, his lordship acknowledged, and begged pardon for his fault, by a Petition to the lords, which was rejected upon his subscribing himself, viscount Preston, without expressing of what kingdom; the next day he presented another, wherein he stiled himself viscount of Scotland; and moreover, it being alledged in his behalf, that by accepting a patent from king James, he never meant an affront to king William, but only to secure his own person from imprisonment, (being at that time prosecuted at law by the lord Montagu for a considerable sum of money) he was released from his confinement, without giving bail.*

Mr. Trenchard and Mr. Hampden sent for by the Lords, touching the Murder of the Lord Russel, &c.] Nov. 13. The lords sent down the following Message to the commons:—"Mr. Speaker, we are commanded by the lords to acquaint this honourable house with this Message, That a Committee being appointed to examine, who were the Advisers and Prosecutors of the Murders of the lord Russel, col. Sidney, sir Tho. Armstrong, Mr. Cornish, and others; and, who were the Advisers of issuing out of Writs of Quo Warranto's against Corporations; and, who were the Regulators; and also, who were the public Asserters of the Dispensing Power; that this house be desired, that Mr. Serjeant Trenchard, and John Hampden, esq.† and such other members of this house, as can inform the lords of the said committee, about those matters, may have leave to appear, when desired, to declare their knowledge therein."

* Life of William III. vol. ii. p. 152.

† These two gentlemen had been accused for being concerned with the duke of Mon-

Debate thereon.] Mr. Sacheverell. This is a precedent that is very new. I never saw any of the like nature before. It lays a hard charge on you, as if your members never mentioned this evidence to you. The naming these gentlemen in the Message, 'and such other members as can inform the lords, &c.'—To grant an unlimited power of we know not whom, is not parliamentary.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think, the thing is quite new, or out of my memory. I would rather take a day's time to consider of precedents. I cannot agree that it is an original thing (as said) but things of this nature are nice between both houses.

Mr. Boscawen. There was a member examined about lord Essex. He asked your leave, when called upon by the lords; and now it is much more reasonable that you should give leave.

Sir John Trevor. This is a matter of great importance. I would not deny the lords any thing in which they have a judicial power; if you can give them any assistance, in that you may. Enquire into lord Strafford's Case, and you will find that sir Henry Vane, a member, was examined by the lords; and some members now in lord Stafford's Case; but it was when the commons were prosecutors. As for proceeding by Bills of Attainder, there are but few precedents, but what have begun here, but those by the king's Attorney General, by the king. I would not have you give up your privilege; but I would give the lords satisfaction, and answer them by messengers of your own, and adjourn the debate till to-morrow.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I would willingly comply with the lords. I hear only of the precedent of the last session; and before you confirm that precedent, by adding another to it, I would consider.

Sir John Guise. I know my own ignorance in methods of parliament; but all desire to clear up the dust in this case. Rather than delay it, refer it to a committee, to see the manner of proceeding of the house, and inspect your Books, and we commend it to their dispatch.

Mr. Ch. Montagu. I am so far from hindering the information of the house, that I could wish we had begun the enquiry here. I believe the committee of the lords meet not till Friday, and you may consider of it.

Sir Robert Cotton. I desire to see a full prosecution of this business. Never were men so illegally prosecuted and executed. But you have had no precedents of this nature, but the sending for sir Christ. Musgrave, and he was named by the lords; and so far I would agree with the lords, to the persons they name; but, as for the other part of the Message, 'That persons at their lordships pleasure may be sent for,' there is no instance of precedents; and mouth and lord Russell in the Plot of 1683. Mr. Hampden had been tried and fined 40,000*l*.

* See vol. ii. p. 744.

seeing you have none, for the honour of the house you ought to consult methods of parliament, and to answer it to those that shall come after us. I move for a Committee.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I would not delay it so long as referring it to a committee. The former part of the lords request seems reasonable, and is far from claiming a jurisdiction; but, as for the other part, to examine whom they shall see cause, of your members, I am utterly against that jurisdiction.

Mr. Hampden. You are rationally moved, by Littleton, to send no Answer at all to the latter part of the Message.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I have a great difficulty upon me in this, concerning the lords jurisdiction. By the Statute of Hen. 4, 'There shall be no more Appeals of Treason of lords against one another in parliament.' But, admitting the lords had jurisdiction of themselves, they have none upon commoners, but, if this may tend to the accusation of commoners, it is against the right of the commons; but if they say it is against such a peer, and such, but to have your members neither to know, whether it is against a commoner, or a peer, I am against it.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I came in late, but I collect from the debate, that the lords desire Trenchard and Hampden to attend the lords, and give evidence of the authors of the murders of lord Russel, &c. the advisers of the Quo Warranto's and Regulators of Corporations and any other member to attend their lordships, when desired. I think this of that importance to the constitution of parliament, that you cannot find one instance of that kind. When an accusation has been from the commons, then you have permitted your members to give evidence to the lords, but upon an original cause from the lords.—If you examine upon the legislative, you are upon equal footing with the lords; but will you submit and subject yourselves a degree lower, having no precedents to warrant your proceedings? I hope you will be tender how you admit it.

Mr. Hawles. 'Tis said, 'There is no precedent of this Message from the lords;' and, indeed, there is no precedent of what has been done lately in the abominable Trials. It is certain that a member may accuse a lord, and certainly there is no manner of mischief in this, but to do a great deal of good.

Sir Tho. Lee. I desire gentlemen would think how little things draw great consequences; if gentlemen see what they are about to do, perhaps they will not do it. I think I have read, or heard, that, in former times, the lords sent to the commons to persuade them to the necessity of giving Money; the commons would not confer with the lords about it. You may remember Skinner's case.* The lords tell you, now, they are doing a thing that is the greatest matter in question, whether they can do it; and when you make yourselves a party, and consent to it, I know not how far it will go. It will be, or not be, as the lords shall think fit. In Fitzharris's Case, at Oxford, the lords would not accept your Impeachment.† I would keep gentlemen on the ancient foundation. This case is an enquiry into matters criminal. I know the consequence of the Quo Warranto's against Corporations, and no man is so brutish as not to abhor the murders of lord Russel, &c. but if the lords take upon them to make enquiry into that which you have power to do, and ought to do, they may, perhaps, bring a commoner summarily to be tried at their bar.

Mr. Hawles. Appeals were taken away by the statute Henry 4. of one lord against another in parliament, for Treason; but still there are for murder and felony. Appeals for treasons are always in parliament, and are to be tried by battail. If a man was antiquated, above sixty years of age, he was not bound to battail, nor a woman. But there is no colour that that statute took away Impeachments in parliament. I would have these persons, desired by the lords, have leave to go.

Sir Henry Capel. I know, whenever Privilege comes in debate, that it is a very tender and nice thing, but I hope it shall ever be for the preservation, and not destruction, of the government. I would not carry privilege to that excess to prevent common justice, that it may be obstructed. In this case, where you have reserved Attainder of these persons, I hope no Privilege will take place. I think this is no original cause from the lords. I think the peers, as part of the legislature, have power to enquire into these things, as well as the commons. Here have been charters and mens lives taken away, and ill returns of members designed, and your laws destroyed thereby, and no remedy. It is said, 'There is no precedent for this, &c.' but there is a precedent the last session: sir Christ. Musgrave, and sir Philip Howard, attended the lords, to give evidence in the case of lord Essex. As for a committee to consider this, it is a delay to the enquiry, and we ought to show our readiness to the lords in it.

Sir John Trevor. I would know the date of the Message; if it bears date now, it is a small delay for a committee to consider it till to-morrow morning. Is it not better to allow the small delay till to-morrow, than to divide the house upon it? And the Yeas must go out.

Sir Robert Howard. It has been said by some, 'We must agree to all the Message, or none.' Skinner's case was most foreign to this, for that was point of property, which might have had remedy in Westminster-Hall, and was an original cause from the lords. Can this be a prejudice to you? But this will be a deep one; when you will do nothing yourselves in it, and hinder the lords from doing it. 'You have heard a great deal of this matter, and let all pass, and the lords think they can do something in the discovery, and the commons delay contributing to it.' This will be said.

* See vol. iv. p. 422.

† See vol. iv. p. 1332.

Mr. Hampden. The question is not properly 'Agree or not,' but you may divide the question. I am for maintaining all the privileges of the house, but you have none for obstructing justice. Our common law is founded upon eternal maxims of reason of any municipal law in the world; the civil law, the municipal law of the Romans, was so. When your privilege stops justice, it is time to hinder it. In the Popish Plot, the lords sent for some of the commons to give evidence, and particularly in the case of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, the lords sent for witnesses perpetually. The thing is not judicially before you. In lord Bristol's Case, accusing lord Clarendon, the lords over-ruled it, 'That a lord could not accuse another in parliament.*' In such cases, when the lords desire evidence, and you plead privilege, I could wish privilege out of doors.

Resolved, "That leave be given to Mr. Serjeant Trenchard, and Mr. Hampden, jun. to attend the lords.†"

Mr. Sacheverell. Now you have given leave to your members, the lords will easily understand it, but leave it an indifference for any to go that will.

Debate on the Merchants' Petition against Captain Churchill.] Sir Robert Clayton. I

* See vol. iv. p. 283.

† "The commons gave their consent, and the said two members did give their attendance accordingly: but though they had both partaken so largely of the same persecution, and Mr. Hampden in particular had all the reason imaginable to contribute all the lights in his power, as having been chiefly brought within the reach of it, by the Artifices of the marquis of Halifax, (against whom, in the first place, the enquiry was intended) neither of them now appeared in a disposition to take the revenge which seemed to be in their power: of Trenchard's informations no memorial remains: and of Hampden it is only said, That he made a long speech, tending more to magnify his own concern in the Revolution, than to discover the advisers of lord Russell's Murder. Sir Peter Rich, col. Godfrey, and Mr. Anthony Row, all members, were also called upon by the lords, to declare what they knew concerning the several points, before the committee; nor was any other person omitted, who had either acted in, or suffered under, the violences of the late times: it was the business of the latter to accuse, and endeavours were used to make the former confess: but these were too much upon their guard, and those were so defective in their evidence, that, as bishop Burnet observes, though the enquiry lasted some weeks, and gave occasion to much heat, nothing appeared, that could be proved, upon which Votes and Addresses might be founded." Ralph.

am sorry for the occasion of this day's consideration. Lee has told you, 'That no complaints of captains misbehaving themselves had reached the Admiralty.' I could wish it had reached no other mens ears. Merchants are forced to hire Dutch capers, much cheaper than they can get our own, for convoys. The merchants tell me, 'They will give you proof, and produce receipts from captains of Convoy-money, of above 300*l*. I have a Petition from some merchants; they are ready to lay before you matters, with fair proof, of refusing convoys, without great reward, and are ready with evidence.'

Sir Robert Howard. Now we are come to a point, and a great one; therefore, I move, That the Speaker may take the Chair, to receive the Petition.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Whether we had ill conduct of deceit, I will not determine, but I am sure we are very unfortunate, when a great fleet is in harbour, and lies there, and consumes all its victuals, and no account of its service. Your men are debauched, and the captains come to London to riot, and never went out to cruise, and no advantage is taken of that Fleet. You have heard of want of convoys; though this of trade is the life of the land, yet we are over-reached in treaties. The Dutch are at a fifth less charge in men than we. I could wish our debate would tend to a remedy for the time to come. I have heard of ships that have lain a year for a voyage, and the captains have taken all their men, and the ships have been lost. Formerly we had men sufficient to carry on the war, and yet carry on our trade. The Dutch are our great competitors in trade, and we join with them in war. I think, at least, we ought to prevent these mischiefs for the future. There was a time when the government of England, though an usurpation, had the French, Spaniards, and Hollanders, all enemies. Their fleet was executed by commission, not by one admiral, but it had three, Blake, Deane, and Popham. As far as my prudence reaches, I would not commit the Fleet to one admiral, but to three.*—The Speaker resumed the Chair.

Sir Rob. Clayton. I have here a Petition from Merchants, who have had to the value of 600,000*l*. taken from them by pirates, and French capers. If you please to give the merchants a day, they will make out their complaints. Many have been taken within sight of land, betwixt Scilly and Plymouth, and the French have done it.

Mr. Garroway. When the Petition was opened, you were told of Convoy-Money: I would have the Petitioners called in, to aver the giving of Convoy-Money.

Sir Rob. Clayton. Give them time, and they will prove it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would have them called in,

* It was committed to three in 1690, viz. Delaval, Shovel, and Killigrew.

to inform you of getting Foreigners to convoy them, and giving money to our captains to convoy them.—They were called in.

The Speaker. What sums of money were given for Convoy, and to whom?

Answer. "Captain Churchill,* of the Pendennis, convoyed 20 ships; before he would take them they paid him, some ten, some eight guineas. Emanuel Hudson paid him 40*l.* for himself, and four more. I have showed the receipt of 40*l.* to sir Patience Ward, by captain Churchill, for Convoy."

Sir Patience Ward. Capt. Churchill would not undertake a Convoy without 300*l.* and because he could not have the money he pressed his men; and the ship, for want of men, was cast away.

Mr. Garroway. The convoy is only from the Land's End to the River. If there be but this one case, it is well; but if there be more, give them till Monday.

Mr. Hawles. To give a gratuity for a present, when the Convoy goes off, is ordinary; but this was paid first, by agreement.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Before you leave the chair, I have a short motion to make, which, I hope is for your service. By what I have heard, I find the state of the nation is in ill condition. It is a large field, but one thing is manifest and notorious, the loss of trade and treasure, by neglect of guarding the sea, whether by ignorance of the admirals in general, or by particular mismanagements.

Mr. Garroway. If you put it 'To enquire into the mismanagement at sea,' your order will be too narrow; but put it 'for want of due guarding the sea.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I do not know gentlemen's meaning, nor how far losses at sea, and due want of guard, will extend. Losses may be, and yet good fleets at sea, and you masters of the sea. Great numbers of ships were lost when the French fleet came not out. If merchants will go ship by ship, and not by company, all the fleet cannot protect them. For my own part, I will own my ignorance: gentlemen that know as little as myself, have got ten times more of the government than I have.

Admiral Russell † It being a question

* Member for St. Albans, and next brother to the earl (afterwards the illustrious duke) of Marlborough. He was many years a gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince George of Denmark, and this year (1689) had commanded a squadron on the coast of Ireland. After this he was appointed a lord of the Admiralty, and in the reign of queen Anne he was made admiral of the blue, and one of the council to prince George. He died in 1710.

† "One of the chief promoters of the Revolution, being sent over to the Hague, the May before, by many of great power and interest in England, to speak very freely to the prince, and to know positively of him what might be expected from him. He was a cousin german

Whether the fleets were sufficient to keep the French from coming out, they lay so long, that it was judged by seamen fit for us to go in. It is said, 'The fleet last summer was of no use; but you did not only keep the French Fleet in, but went to Ireland, a dangerous coast, and kept and prevented the French from landing men and money. I think that was service in your fleet. It is impossible to guard all places, but if your merchants will venture, they cannot be guarded. If it appears to be thus, I think the question better let alone.'

Sir Samuel Dashwood. I can justify it by persons that the Sugar-Fleet lost seven ships. The lords of the Admiralty were acquainted that the Fleet was in danger, that lord Berkeley might stay for Convoy, but the admiralty commanded Berkeley home: and I think the loss was for want of convoy.

Sir Tho. Lee. Every fault is great, till understood. I think I may agree with the gentleman in what he said. The thing, in plain English, was thus; such ships as were fit to keep the sea, and not sick, were ordered to cruise, to do some service of importance. The king commanded lord Berkeley to come in, and refit, and victual; these were to take more men on board, for some extraordinary service in Ireland.

Mr. Papillon. I hear it said, 'More service was done in keeping the French from Ireland than saving seven Sugar-Ships;' but I would know why provision was not made for both, trade preserved, and Ireland guarded? But it is demonstrable we lost our ships for want of guards.

to lord Russel. He had been bred at sea, and was bed-chamber-man to the king, when he was duke of York; but, upon lord Russel's death, he retired from the court. He was a man of much honour and great courage; he had good principles and was firm to them." Burnet.—He went over to the Hague again in September (accompanied by the earl of Shrewsbury) and came over to England with the prince. In 1690 he commanded the Fleet, and in 1692 obtained the memorable victory at La Hogue: notwithstanding which, and though his fidelity, courage, and conduct were justified and approved by the house of commons, the king was so prejudiced against him, by the earl of Nottingham, that he dismissed him, soon after, from his service. In 1694 he was restored to favour, and commanded a large fleet that year, and the next, in the Mediterranean; and in 1696 disappointed the French invasion. In 1697 he was created earl of Orford, and was, at the same time, both Treasurer of the Navy and first Lord of the Admiralty. Being impeached by the house of commons in 1701, he was unanimously acquitted by the lords, and his accounts, as Treasurer of the Navy, were justified in 1703. He was again placed at the head of the Admiralty in 1709, from which he withdrew the year after, and died without issue in 1727.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think myself as little concerned as any man. You are told, 'both, &c. might have been taken care of;' but I think it could not. It must be remembered, that the Streights Fleet are refitting, and Berkeley's in harbour, which make up twenty-seven or eight: so that number being added to Berkeley's and those designed for the Indies and Streights, I think the Admiralty not much asleep in the service.

The Petitioners being called in, were ordered to attend on Monday; and captain George Churchill, a member of the house, had notice to attend in his place at the same time.

Debate on the State of the Nation.] Nov. 14. The house went into a grand committee on the State of the Nation.

Mr. Howe. I think the question is, Whether the Merchants were lost for want of being kept, as the Chairman states it? I would consider every part by itself: 1. That the Miscarriages are faults, and not misfortunes: 2. How the Toulon Fleet came to join the Brest fleet, and, 3. How king James got into Ireland. Not guarding the seas has been a great fault. If the admirals are in fault, put them out; punish them. When the men were to go into Ireland, there was nothing to transport them, and no provision for them. Name the persons that are to blame; come to the root, and that is the way to cure the branches. Provisions were faulty, and, in some places, none to be had. No man can be angry with a man for getting a good place, or buying it cheap; enquire into those who put them in. Scotland is in ill hands; in Flanders we pay for 10,000 men, and have not 3000. These little things moved are below us. At the good spring in Hyde Park, if one pipe runs muddy, then cleanse it; but if the whole spring runs muddy, we shall think somebody stirs it with a dirty stick. I do not like shooting cannon at sparrows.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I think the Trade of the nation is no 'sparrow.' You are told of a 10*l.* convoy, &c. is that nothing? I know no greater offence in the government than raising money on the subject; it is an obstruction of trade, and a great Grievance, and we must look for a remedy. The great end of enquiry into these matters, is to prevent coming into them again. I move, That the question may be, 'That the not guarding the Seas, is an obstruction of Trade, and a Grievance to the Nation.'

Sir Joseph Tredenham. I think nothing will more satisfy the people, than to let them see that we do it for their benefit, that they may pay taxes more easily. I move that it may be represented what an ill state we are in.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If it be a Grievance that trade is obstructed for want of Convoys, you ought to declare it so. What else would you redress? I lay no imputation on gentlemen; I do not arraign the thing; but the loss of seven or eight vessels is an inconsiderable thing: and you will be at the same pass next year. Call it a Grievance, and put your stamp upon it.

Sir Tho. Littleton. If you can find out persons, punish them; but, in the mean time, find out the thing. When you have found out stations for Ships, as merchants can best inform you, if you apply to the king he will remedy it, but not to pick holes in the government.

Sir John Guise. Do you think this will make more discontent in the nation than is already? Every sea-port knows and speaks it. I have heard, and am afraid, that when the French came out, some of ours came in. If you believe that was so, that your Ships were called away, and your Merchants left, you may resolve it. I am afraid the removing those ships was the loss.

Col. Birch. We all agree, that one such a year's war more will make an end of you. In short, from one end to the other, there is no part of what we have done this year that will serve our turn the next year. It is not as formerly, when care was taken to suppress that debauchery that is now, both in the Navy and Army, and till you suppress damning and swearing: [He was called to name them.] He replied, Pray name them that do not—not to talk of spending 500,000*l.* in the tail of the year. Formerly, Merchants were hired and sent out, whose interest it was; they paid them well, and the sea was well guarded. They did not do as they did this year, pack them up like herrings in a barrel; they brought the nation to that greatness, that all the world durst not look us in the face. Then Money went out carefully and regularly. Sometimes the Commissioners went as low as Chatham, and then they did more in two months than now in twelve. If this is the thing, what do you enquire after? Part with your Money, and wait better luck. That 18 or 20 French ships should come from Toulon to Brest, and nobody hear of them! Pardon that piece of ill luck in our people, to be asleep all that while. It looks like something either to weaken you, or to bring you to a Treaty with the French. These men formerly would have been at Cork or Kinsale in all this time, and made it but an hour's work. As for the question, 'That the Sea has been ill-guarded,' it is part of our bad luck; but I care not much that you should put it, for they tell you, 'Those were called back by the king's command;' but to send none in their place,—I believe his majesty a prince of better conduct than to aver such a thing. If gentlemen agree with me, that neither our conduct nor way of fighting, are fit to be done again next year, we must have other hands next year, else the game is up; had you other hands, I would give my consent to hang good numbers. To have shoes made by a joiner! Men may be gallant, but not skilled in sea-matters till they know. You need not press Merchant-Ships; they will come in; but I will speak no more of men I do not know. Had we Tarpaulins to command, we should, next year, have something like something.

Admiral Russel. I know not well where to begin. I have had the honour to be long in the navy, which seems now charged with ignorance, cowardice, or corruption. I am willing to decline that service, and had I thought I could not have been serviceable to the government, my own condition is so easy that I might have declined it. It is said, 'When the French came out, we ran away.' These are hard things, and men will justify themselves from this hard imputation. We lay on the French coast six weeks, and, I believe, for the most part, not three leagues from Ushant. We lay there as long as weather would permit. We are accused of 'letting the Toulon squadron join the Brest.' We had no way to know it but by scouts. There are foggy nights, weather, and winds, that carry us eight or ten leagues from thence. Nobody that served in the Fleet but was desirous to prevent this, as any gentleman here. I attribute this to misfortune only. Unless we should pull the French out of port by the ears, I know not how to have fought. I do aver this, that fifteen days after we left Brest, no ship came in there. I desire that either these things may be proved, or these reflections laid aside.

Mr. Hampden. Nobody is more ready to redress Grievances than I, and I would have you take some way to redress your Grievances. I would have all persons speak without passion or reflections. In the Letters that were intercepted you find it said, 'That though it was a cold season, yet it was like to be hot weather in this house.' And nothing but personal reflections will do it. If you go and look back to Miscarriages, set your bounds how far you will go. I have never meddled with persons in this house for this 30 years. If you will look back, say how far. I know not whether the Fleet be weak or strong. That the French are too strong, is as much the cause as you too weak. Who would have thought of this formerly? I say, this greatness came from the Pensioner-Parliament that sold their country. Their greatness arose from our treachery. That there is treachery now at sea, is the complaint; the reason, because there are too many Votes on the other side. Can a house, and a family, and all, be removed on a sudden? There is something to be indulged in this. I never had employment nor money before. I have got nothing, only I desire quiet with my neighbours. I do not only serve the king as my prince, but (pardon the mean expression) as one whom I love. Be pleased to agree what you would have done, without personal reflection.

Col. Austen. It has been asked, 'To what time will you go back for enquiry into Miscarriages?' It has this answer—as far as the necessity of affairs will lead you. In a private family, if you entertain all those old servants that have ruined you before, what can you expect? I remember Howe told you of awls and bristles in a shop; you would not think a painter but a shoe-maker was there. If you hope for better management, these journeymen, and their tools too, must be laid aside.

Sir John Trevor. The State of the Nation you are now to consider. Great mismanagements have been, whether by mistakes, misfortunes, or corruptions. We can have no remedy but from the king; therefore I would have the house moved to represent to the king the State of the Nation; and then you may come to the Heads, and the first moved to be voted the first Head; and then whether any thing amiss in relation to the government, to bring it in, whether in the disposition of the Army, or the Fleet before Brest; and, in the last place, to offer your advice to the king how these things may be remedied. You need not call these things Grievances; they will be so manifest they will call themselves grievances. Howe would find something against these persons in the government; but to go back and ravel into, that will never have an end. I would not be hollowed off from one thing to another. It is 'the present State of the Nation' is our business. Though we go several ways, yet all are for regulating affairs to keep out the French and the Irish. Till you have Reports, from Committees, of the several branches, I would adjourn the debate, and make report to the house of what you have done.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am unwilling that these things which will naturally follow should be called Grievances. It is as natural that trade be obstructed, as that you make war; and all you can do cannot prevent ships being taken. You may say as well, the French war is a Grievance. I will not conceal faults, nor say there are none, but I think the nation cannot bear the expence long. That which I move you is to search the Admiralty-books, and compute all, and then you will see how the Money went away. I stand up only that I would not have any outcry against the government. That which is done could not be helped. You are at war with one kingdom, and have another to conquer. I desire, whatever censure you pass, do it as it deserves, when you have examined all; if you make men unable to serve the king, you stop the war. I move, That you will appoint a Committee to search the Admiralty-books for their orders, and numbers of ships, and see the state of the ships, and then give your judgment.

Mr. Elwill. It is a strange thing we should have so many ships at sea, and never meet any French ships; and it is strange doctrine to have so much loss by capers of six or ten guns; and if we cannot fortify ourselves against capers, how shall we against men of war? If the committee will enquire into the numbers of ships for stations, that will be your only way to secure trade.

Sir Edw. Seymour. By the debate of the committee it is difficult for me to know in what manner to apply my discourse. I know not what ill-luck there is without doors, but I am sure we have it within, when there are personal reflections. Our treasures are spent and turn to little account, and those Miscarriages are repeated. It is said, 'Our ships are taken by privateers, and not by men of war.' We had enough to have cleared our coasts, if they had been sent out to lie in a line of battle. We are told, 'We may repair to the Admiralty-books to be informed, &c.' If once we have loss of Trade for want of Convoy—You will see by the Admiralty-books what ships have been appointed for Guards. If we confirm these Miscarriages, we invite the same to be done next year. Because of the misfortune in another government, what did it occasion, but the loss of that government, and an abdication of a king, a thing never heard of before! But you will find that parliament called a 'Pensioner-Parliament,' were enemies to France and Popery. I hope there are no Pensioners in this parliament, but I am sure it is full of Officers, and an 'Officered-Parliament;' and now we speak of Miscarriages, we are told, 'That is branding the Government, and reflecting;' pay your Money, and that is omnia bene. I heard it once said in the Long Parliament, by sir Edw. Baynton, 'That he heard things that would make a cat speak;' but, before God, this makes me speak. I move, that you will vote, That the not guarding the Sea is the occasion of the decay of trade, and loss of treasure; and then in time you may look into the Admiralty-books. As for admiral Russel, I believe him the last man that would do ill in the Navy, and the last man that can be reflected on.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, That the want of a Guard, or Convoys, for the Merchants, for the last year, hath been an obstruction of Trade, and an occasion of great losses to the nation." Which was agreed to by the house.

Debate on disfranchising the Borough of Stockbridge for Bribery and Corruption †. Nov. 15. Sir Wm. Williams. For us to quarrel with our own elections, who serve for boroughs, and to add the boroughs to counties, is a matter of great weight, and deserves consideration. If the constitution had been so † It appeared, on the Report from the Committee, that both the sitting member, (Mr. Wm. Montagu) and the petitioner (Mr. Strode) had been guilty of Bribery; and thereupon the opinion of the Committee (with which the house agreed) was, 'That neither of them was duly elected, and that the election was void.' The bailiff of Stockbridge, and three more, for giving and taking of Bribes, were ordered into custody of the serjeant; but the question for disabling Mr. Montagu from being elected a burgess for that borough in the present parliament passed in the Negative, 158 to 135. The question that followed, and which occasioned the above debate, was, 'Whether the said Borough should be disfranchised for ever hereafter from sending burgesses to parliament; and, instead thereof, that two more knights for the shire be chosen for the county of Southampton.' See the Journal.

VOL. V.

from the beginning, much might be said for it. I hope, at this time of day we shall not alter the constitution of England. You are a wise parliament, and this is a thing of the first impression. You break the ice by this, and give a handle to throw boroughs into counties; and another parliament may throw counties into boroughs. I move, That you will adjourn the debate.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I am very tender in any new proposal, that changes the order of your constitution. The best way to preserve it is to put it upon a right foot. That one of the third parts of the state should alter any thing of the whole, is strange. But gentlemen forget their constitution of knights, citizens, and burgesses! Burgesses are for manufactures, and other advantages; they may present you with what may increase them. Instead of giving money to be chosen, you would find it otherwise, when boroughs shall give wages. Is that the guide of the legislature? The consequence of that will be, the other boroughs will be terrified. If men must buy to come hither, they will sell when they come here. This borough paid but nine pound, the last tax, to the government.

Mr. Hawles. They in this town that have taken Bribes have offended highly. When the Long Parliament made the government a Commonwealth, they disfranchised all boroughs, and diminished the numbers of parliament-men. I think doing that would alter the government. Therefore I would take some time to consider that before I would do it.

Mr. Foley. This case is of great consequence, and you ought to consider of it. The Records show, that towns have desired to be excused from sending up burgesses by reason of their poverty, not being able to pay wages. Suppose you suspend this town from sending burgesses till they have got a better body of men to elect. I would consider it.

Sir John Trevor. I never heard of boroughs dissolved before. I am afraid, if this question pass, you, Mr. Speaker, and I, shall sit no more in that chair. I have the honor to serve for a borough in Devonshire (Beeralston) for which I am obliged to a member of the house, (Maynard) and to the gentlemen of that country. If you break the ancient constitution of elections, I know not the consequence. If the offence of this borough be Corruption, it is the highest. That boroughs have, upon their own desire, been exempted, there are a great many precedents. In the Long Parliament many boroughs were revived. This house voted it a franchise, and not forfeited by disusage, being inherent in the body of the people, declared upon a contest betwixt the king and the parliament in 1641, and many wise men were in that parliament. The security of the nation was ever thought in the mixture of this house. What shall then become of merchants, to inform you of Trade? The house stands upon ancient constitutions, and I hope you will not remove old land-marks.

2 F

Mr. Finch. Though this is a poor borough, and Bribery has been found in the election of members, yet the disfranchising of it carries a great consequence. This is not the first poor borough guilty of Bribery; but it happens to be first questioned; and shall all the poor boroughs be disfranchised, because this poor borough has been guilty of corruption? At Westbury, formerly, there was Bribery, and the mayor was fined; had there been reason for it, it would have been disfranchised. Before you make this first step, pray consider of it till Monday.—Which was ordered. It does not appear by the Journals, that the matter was revived.

Debate on the Defect of Ordnance, &c.] Nov. 16. Sir Henry Goodrick. I am to acquaint you with that which admits no delay, and if not speedily taken care of, no man in England is safe. With the king's leave, (I durst not else) I must acquaint you, that there is a Petition to the Office of Ordnance from men of great quality and esteem, from all the powder-makers of England, (I do not charge this upon any particular person, but I hope you will not let the king want) from the gun-smiths, the ironmongers, the salt-petre men, gun-powder men, matchmakers, &c. desiring to be furnished with Moneys to support their credit. The Board of Ordnance has not been deficient, but the king's service cannot be pursued without your assistance. Those powder-makers who belong to the several counties have made 24,000 barrels, of which a great deal is lost and spent. You cannot depend upon more than 600 barrels, all the work standing still. They want but one single Vote of encouragement. You want all this to set out your men of war. I see an hon. gent. who can tell you how those guns have been directed. It is of great importance: the Petition is from men of great credit. The store is so low, there is not above 30 ton of brimstone. The Merchants have sent word to the Office of Ordnance, that they will have 20*l.* a ton; and now they refuse to enter into any contract at all; without something of your encouragement, it will be lost. I move you for a special Committee to enquire, and a Note for encouragement.

Sir John Guise. I now hear what I have seen a good while. You give Money for the war, and you know not whither it goes. If to the Navy you transfer credit, look where you will, you find it not disposed as you intend it. The best thing you can do, is not to see your Money diverted. I hope you will give some encouragement to these men, and appoint a Committee to know the State of the Account of the Nation, and you will see those that are honest.

Mr. Hampden. I agree with the premises of that gentleman, but not the conclusions. Your Money has not been diverted from the Navy, Army, nor Ordnance. The king has not received by 150,000*l.* of what you have appropriated. If you enter into a war, and your money does not answer, you cannot be served.

If you appropriate the money, I hope it will not be to all the uses, for then the offices must stand still. If it has been embezzled in Musters, enquire into it. Suppose now a great deal of money is wanted at the Ordnance, there is 25,000*l.* laid out upon salt-petre, if this money has been diverted; if soldiers had robbed and stole, and entered upon gentlemen's estates for want of money—I can make out that many a 10,000*l.* is come short of what you have given.

Mr. Garroway. I did not expect any thing of this, this day. When we computed the charge of the War, we did include the Office of Ordnance, and now they cannot carry on the war without more money. There were Stores in the office, and we have had no fight. I have heard of debts upon an old foot of account. I would know whether this is upon the new or old account.

Sir Henry Goodrick. The Office of Ordnance has avoided all manner of account of charge. All this now demanded is made within the compass of one year, there has been such extraordinary emption since. There is no old debt at all of sir Thomas Chichley's time, but this is for Stores actually since 'twas in this king's service. The Office of Ordnance has not failed in asking, nor the Treasury in giving.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I take the public Revenue to be 1,900,000*l.* per ann. You have passed a Vote for 600,000*l.* per ann. for the Civil List, but it cannot appear to be above 300,000*l.* in time of peace, understanding in time of war, all that can be spared out of the Revenue to the public interest of the kingdom. I think it very extraordinary that the Ordnance should make these Reports here: it is to the Treasury they ought to apply. Here is a bill for a goose, and a bill for a gander. Common fame says, the Army is not paid, nor the Fleet, only Subsistence-Money. They cannot at Plymouth ship above half the companies. It is said, the Dutch officers are paid, and the English not paid, and for some months behind-hand. This is making us Commissioners of Accounts, by bringing these Accounts to us. We have lost great opportunities in Ireland; I hope they will give you a better account.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Whether money has been diverted, or misapplied, this is matter of fact; the Seamen are not paid, and the Office of Ordnance is in a miserable condition. I will tell you this for matter of fact, and lay it before you, and I will undertake to make it out upon undeniable records; that in January last, all the Stores of the Ordnance and Navy were fully provided, yet remaining in the Office of the Ordnance to the value of a million. I would know where the expence has been; no occasion of consumption, there must be a fault somewhere.

Col. Austin. The point of fact before you is a defect of the Ordnance, and is there not a necessity to supply that defect, to give credit, and enquire into faults afterwards?

Sir Tho. Lee. I find one office draws on another. Gentlemen will see, by the accounts of the Treasury, that the Seamen cannot be paid. 400,000*l.* has been paid to the Navy, but that is from the last of Dec. I do not think it proper, as the king's officer, to complain without command, or direction, from the king; I am here as a member of parliament. You will find, upon enquiry, how little came in of the money you gave.

Sir Henry Capell. I know not well the drift of this debate. I would gladly have the Revenue made out 1,900,000*l.* per ann. The Excise is to pay a considerable sum of the prince of Orange's Money. Till you see the Accounts and the Vouchers, 'tis a hard thing to say, 'That my steward has embezzled my money.' How far Guise's abilities are in Accounts, I know not; but this may startle a man, till he sees the nature of the Accounts. I hope every body, hand in hand, will be as thrifty as they can.

Sir John Guise. If I am the man reflected on, I am as capable of reckoning 1, 2, 3, as another man. As for Money, I would give it as soon as any body.

Mr. Sacheverell. I am surprized at the motion. 1,900,000*l.* gone and neither the Army nor Navy paid? I must wonder how 900,000*l.* all comes under lord Ranelagh's care: the Fleet nor the Irish army is concerned. How can it come about that the armies of Holland and England come to 900,000*l.*? I do not understand it: I desire he would inform the house of it.

The Earl of *Ranelagh. 981,000*l.* has been paid me. I shall explain how that sum has been issued. There are four armies in being; the English army in Holland, the Dutch and the English in England, and the army in Ireland. I have nothing to do with the Dutch army, but all passed in my name, but was received by a Dutchman, paymaster to that army. An Account has been given to the committee; I cannot carry all the figures in my head, but when you require it, it shall be done. The king paid the Arrears of the Army that came over to him from king James; they were 22,230 men. They went from my care to Mr. Harbord: so that all paid me is about 360,000*l.* I am near the matter, clearing the Dutch and English armies. When the king came over, there was no standing privy-seal, and so no legal acquittances. Though you gave much the last session, yet not for the forces in England; for those in Holland and Ireland only.

Mr. Sacheverell. I hope Ranelagh will not take it ill if I ask him a question, or two. Whether an army of 40,000 men may not be maintained? If it can be made out, that there never were 50,000 men, I would know, if there was not 1,400,000*l.* spent, and no army paid? Suppose 35,000 foot. at 2*l.* a head pay, officers and soldiers, that is 700,000*l.* Suppose there are 15,000 horse and dragoons, paid them in 50*l.* a man, and that is not above 1,500,000*l.* The year is gone about, and the Army not paid; I would know how that comes about?

The Earl of Ranelagh. I hope, that, by virtue of my memory, you will not put me to give account of every foot of things. When, the last session, the Account was called for, the charge was 1,700,000*l.* per ann. Whether it was wrong cast up may be soon found out. Though we all know the Muster-rolls are not complete, nor the Army paid, yet all through my management, is paid the English and Holland.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You are told, the Charge was 50,000 men; that number, being never here, cannot come to 1,400,000*l.* In the time of Cromwell, and king Ch. 2. the establishment of a trooper's pay in Ireland was but 12*d.* a day, and the foot 8*d.* In Dublin it was more, because dear there. The grievance to me is this; the officers are not paid, and not clearing the Musters is a great damage to the king. Some reflections are made on what I said of the Revenue's being 1,900,000*l.* per ann. I told you that loss of Customs and defalcations were to be allowed. I will make it good upon my credit, that near that value is received. The Tax, &c. 800,000*l.*

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think this is a good Account that has been given, but I would have it brought into the house in writing. We have been upon a long debate, and are coming upon a dangerous question, upon a sudden motion in the house. I know not what times or necessities you are coming into, therefore I would be tender to engage in you know not what. If all things of this nature be brought hither, you will raise more Money than you will know how to pay. You have already voted credit, upon what you have given, for 300,000*l.* That may give some credit to the Ordnance, and your Bills depending may give more.

Mr. Garraway. I think it is well moved not to vote on a sudden motion. 'Tis a dangerous precedent to make ourselves accountants. You are here to compute the War in gross; mine has no other end but to give Money for the necessary defence of the kingdom. Let them compute the charge for so many men; if they mis-spend it, let them answer it in God's name. I would enter upon Accounts no farther than to supply the present occasion. The deeper we entered upon Accounts, the deeper was always the charge. I have ever found it.

Sir John Trevor. I had rather lose my estate in Ireland, than have that Vote. What does the king stand for? And the several Offices brought hither, must we be the Officers of every Commission?

Sir Edw. Seymour. You have appointed Monday for enquiries; I have a List in my hand of particulars, most from trading merchants. They may be in being, and the house not in being, and they feel the smart of it. I desire they may be here, by order of a summons from this house.—It was ordered accordingly.

* "One of the ablest men that Ireland has bred, capable of all affairs, even in the midst of a loose run of pleasure, and much riot. He had the art of pleasing masters of very different tempers and interests so much, that he continued above thirty years in great posts." Burnet.

Debate on the Charge against Captain Churchill for taking Money for Convoys.] Nov. 18. The Evidence of several Masters of Ships against capt. Churchill, for taking Money for Convoys, was heard at the Bar, viz. "That he would not stir without it; and as for those who would give no money, he took their men from aboard, and pressed them for his own ship."

Capt. Churchill. "I find a Complaint against me, &c. I deny that I ever refused to convoy. At the first meeting, they agreed to make a purse. If I have given offence, I am extremely sorry for it, and shall do it no more. As for pressing the men, I took none but what I had extreme necessity for. If I took so many as is said, they could not have sailed with me. I am sorry I have given offence, and I will never do any thing to displease this house. Convoy money has been anciently practised. I was forced from them by weather, and when I came to the Downs, the builders of the ship wondered she could swim."

Mr. Papillon. I would have capt. Paris called in, who would not tell you the truth. If a witness be dealt with, and minces the matter, you will never have truth.

Sir Robert Rich. I have heard the whole matter, and as for calling in the captain, you need not. Your member (Churchill) has owned the money.

Capt. Churchill. I confess, I convoyed 22 of 44, and if I had forced money from one, I might have done it from others, and it was a voluntary gift from them. I acknowledge I received 150 guineas as a voluntary gift from them; and I compelled no man.

Mr. Papillon. This is a thing of great consequence. I would not have this captain discouraged, nor the merchants abused; if they will give a gratuity, 'tis not extorted, but voluntary. Capt. Churchill told them, 'If you will make it worth my while, I will go with you;' of this there are three or four witnesses. If they had not made up this money, they must have lain by, ('twas a bargain,) their men were taken from them; if you do not something exemplary in this, you will ruin both seamen and merchants.

Admiral Russell. Nobody more desires that criminals should be punished than myself. I know capt. Churchill to be zealous for the government. The thing, as it is alleged, appears a heinous crime. If these Merchants will run presently, and make Subscriptions, indeed I do not think capt. Churchill so much to blame. If he does not appear to be a great criminal, for his desert, and what he may do for the future, I hope you will inflict as moderate a punishment as you can.

Mr. Smith. I am sensible this gentleman has done you very good service, and is hearty for the government. This seems to be so clear for your censure. He has made a modest confession of his fault, and if you can prevent this for the future, I would deal moderately with this gentleman.

Sir Wm. Williams. I cannot agree to pass this over without a question, nor would I deal severely with your member. The thing has been fully proved at the bar. Some call it 'a free-will offering, or present.' I would come to this Resolution, 'That taking of Money for Convoys, by men of war, is a Grievance.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think your honour is concerned, for capt. Paris has prevaricated with you, and you will lose your authority if you suffer it.

Captain Paris was called in.

Capt. Paris. "I have now recollected myself. I petitioned lord Torrington for a Convoy; who answered, 'If we would go to Torbay, he would take care of us.' Capt. Churchill came, in the Pendennis: I asked him, 'Whether he was ordered for our Convoy?' He said, 'He was bound for the Channel, but if it would be made worth his while, he would convoy us.'"

Capt. Hill. "Paris put the question to Churchill, who said, 'He had no order to convoy us.' Twenty-two sail of us subscribed 201*l.* which he had. If it was worth his while (he said) he would go to the Downs with us."

Capt. Churchill. "The offers from capt. Hill came a week after, 'That if I would leave the Fleet, and convoy them, they would make the 200*l.* 400 guineas.' This, I hope, will, in some measure, justify me to the house, that I am not so very covetous."

Mr. Coningsby. This is a fault, and a great one in Churchill, but I believe it an universal one; but because others have not been so modest as your member, I would prevent it for the future.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I do not at all approve that method to pass by your judgment upon those you have heard, and punish those you have not heard. You have heard the Examination, and an instance of your discipline and government of the Navy. I shall only say this, that this affair now coming before you, and influencing the whole matter of Trade, I do not wonder that it is not more plainly proved, but that it is so much proved. It is a hard thing to bring men before you with accusations of this kind, and if you leave them in a condition to be worried by those they accuse, you will never have more. These Miscarriages, arising from particular persons, endanger the government. They can get no Convoy from us, and they apply to the Dutch. When a gentleman came that had the reputation of a Convoy, he was asked, 'If he came to convoy them?' 'No, he had liberty to go where he pleased, but make it worth his while and he would go with them;' and you see what that 'while' was; it was 250*l.* Till then they could get no sailing orders. He was directed for Convoy, but he would not till it was for his advantage. Some of the ships would not subscribe, and he took their men from them; and after they had sent their money, they were returned them again. Taking money for Convoys has been a practice, but never came into this house before; and if now you take no notice of it, you authorise and allow it. First take notice, of those that informed you, and prevent the man from worrying. That others have done it, is no rule for you; neither this gentleman's merits, nor any other's, are so great that you should lose your Trade for them. After all, this is before you: if you make not persons tremble, and, when proved, let it pass away, nobody, hereafter, will be afraid to do the same again. If you reprimand capt. Churchill only, you confirm the thing; but, whatever Resolution you will take to prevent it for the future, you shall have my vote.

Col. Granville. I hope you will not punish a thing not declared a crime. I should have thought myself ill used if I had it not. I have never got by the sea so much as my pay. I move, That you will vote this illegal, and admonish the captain, in his place, that he will do so no more.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I hear, from under the gallery, what I heard not before, 'That all Convoys have taken Money, and thought themselves ill used if not gratified.' Presents have been given to captains after they have convoyed ships; but this gentleman was sent down for a Convoy. He tells you, 'That is a mistake of making it worth his while;' but one of the captains tells you, 'They could not have a Convoy without Money, and then they should have sailing orders.' I have not heard of such a thing; if this be the practice of the Fleet, you ought to remedy it. Taking money thus was ever a crime in this house; and why should this person, being a member of the house, fare better than those that are not? If you make a law for this, they will say there was no law before; persons will not come before you; they will be afraid. If you think this will give satisfaction to the nation—If not, I am for punishing.

Col. Birch. You are now upon giving judgment that may be exemplary to the nation. I do desire, in all these cases, that something within may not give me the lye. I am for the severest punishment. About nine years ago, in the Long Parliament, (a time supposed none of the best) that horrible imprecation was made use of in the house, of 'God damn me!' (Sir Robert Cann) to bring people to that degree of prophaneness to bring in popery at last. The case was proved with us then, and with you now. There wanted nothing but to smooth over this horrid oath; but, instead of that, the house thought fit to give a stop to that growing mischief; they brought that member on his knees, and sent him to the Tower. After some time he petitioned, and was brought hither, and expelled the house. I wonder how this complaint came so clearly before; but put a stop to this business. I challenge any man to give an instance where Convoy-money was paid before-hand; but for Convoys to contract before-hand! These things being so plain, I would do by this gentleman so as I hope you may never have occasion to hear of it in this place any more.

Mr. Garroway. I am sorry for this. I wish well to the nation, though I have but little time to enjoy it. You are pressed for a Vote of detestation of this crime; but first pass a vote. I remember a person (Ashburnham,) for pressing the king about a Petition, about French wine, which he treated for a small sum 400*l*. he was turned out of the house. I wish I had never heard of this here, but, now it is a thing before you, in judgment; but, if because it was not a crime before, you pass no judgment upon it, I look upon all these poor men that complain, as crucified. I have said before, to some of them on the like occasions, 'You will be turned out of your offices for it.' I know not what to move you, but some exemplary thing you ought to do.

Mr. Foley. This matter is of great moment to do justice home. You have two witnesses, that, on the composition, they returned the pressed men back again. If you pass this by, it is to no purpose to talk of Miscarriages in the Navy. I am sorry this gentleman is a member; because of the justice of the house, you are the more concerned, and you can do no less than send him to the Tower.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I am for proposing a question, seeing the Chair proposes none; viz. 'To declare that Money extorted from the Merchants for Convoy is illegal, and does obstruct Trade.' Next, 'Whether captain Churchill be guilty of extorting Money? And next, 'What punishment you will inflict on him?'

Resolved, "That the requiring or receiving Money for Convoys is illegal, oppressive to Merchants, and destructive to Trade."

Sir Wm. Williams. I cannot agree, as is moved, 'That Churchill only make submission.' It will require a great deal of Examination: if you will lay a severe punishment upon him, it will discourage him and many more. I would adjourn the debate for a week.

Resolved, "That capt. Churchill is guilty of requiring and receiving Money for Convoys."

Sir Wm. Leveson Gower. I will never make apologies for any man that has robbed by sea or land. I hope an ounce of misdemeanour will never weigh down a pound of merit. I would have him reprimanded only in his place.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Here is a person has broken your laws, oppressed your trade, and you are now going to apply punishment. It is proposed to give him a reprimand in his place, and the consequence will be, he will do so no more; and if he does, he will not give an acquittance for the money. You cannot, in justice, punish any man, more, if you punish not this man. It is said, 'He is a gentleman of great merit;' but no man of the Fleet can come before you, but as much may be said for him. But who would not for 200*l*. but have a reprimand here, and go do the same thing again? But you are to do something more, in consideration of your own justice, and the men that brought this before you. Will you leave these men to be worried by this man? Send him to the Tower, and declare him not capable to serve at sea again.

Mr. Papillon. As to restitution of the Money, it must be a greater sum than this 200*l.* It must be all that has been taken.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You were told by one, 'He was unwilling he should come upon his knees, and yet be sent to the Tower.' If sent to the Tower, he must be upon his knees at the bar. Lord Devonshire was sent to the Tower,* and not upon his knees. Will that sound well, to be reprimanded only in his place? I would send this gentleman to the Tower, and order him to make restitution. Else you will not give satisfaction to the people injured.

Sir Tho. Lee. There is nothing so essential as the reputation of the house, that you will do right to all people, and see that none have wrong. The exercise of your power should be so used, as not always to exert itself to extremity. As for presents, every body takes them, but you are doing this for a precedent, and I hope it will be remedied for the future. There are great expectations what you will do in this. For length of time in the Tower makes the punishment. There have been precedents, in these cases, of bringing to the bar; but I am for the new precedent of lord Devonshire, to commit this gentleman to the Tower, and not bring him to the bar. Neither would I encourage complaint by over-doing this. This gentleman would rather, I believe, fight three battles with the French, than one with the house of commons. I move, That he may be sent to the Tower.

Resolved, "That captain Churchill be committed to the Tower."

Dr. Walker receives the Thanks of the Commons for his gallant Defence of Londonderry. Nov. 19. Dr. Walker came to the house to receive their Thanks for the service he did at Londonderry.†

* When he was lord Cavendish. See vol. iv. p. 761.

† After col. Lundy, the governor, and the Council of War, had resolved to abandon the place, the townsmen chose this Mr. Walker, (who was rector of Donaghmore, and had raised a regiment for the defence of the Protestants) together with major Baker, joint-governors; and, though the place was very ill fortified, and their cannon, which did not exceed twenty pieces, were wretchedly mounted, though they had no engineer to direct their operations, and had a very few horse, with a garrison unacquainted with military operations, and so destitute of provisions, that, at last, even the most loathsome food began to fail, they defended the town against all the efforts of a formidable army, commanded by king James in person, till it was relieved with troops

The Speaker gives an account of a precedent, in 1607, of a Scotch gentleman that gave some Account to the house, sir W. Seaton, who had a chair set for him*.

Mr. Garroway. That was in respect to the Scotch nation, and king James, then newly come in. It is honour enough to come to your bar, to receive the thanks of the house, and I would do no more now, nor make any new precedent.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am afraid some gentlemen make too light of form; the dignity of the house must be preserved. You sit covered in a committee of lords and commons, but not a conference. Sir John Grenville, when he brought a very welcome Message to the house from Charles 2. from Breda, delivered it at the bar, and it was not thought below his dignity; and sir Samuel Barnardiston, when he defended the cause of the original Causes in the lords house, had your thanks given him at the bar. You must have respect to the dignity of the house, else you will bring it to nothing.

Dr. Walker, at the bar, standing.

The Speaker. Dr. Walker, the house has received a Petition from the Widows and Orphans of those that were slain, and died in the siege of Londonderry, and has thought fit to recommend their Petition to the king, that he would please to give them 10,000*l.* for the ease of their present sufferings. They likewise take notice of the extraordinary service you have done to their majesties, and to England and Ireland, in the defence of Londonderry; and especially in that you undertook it when those who should have done their duty deserted it; and they have commanded me to give you the Thanks of the house, and they would have you give the Thanks of the house to all those that were in that service.

Dr. Walker. "Those poor creatures, I am assured, will be very thankful for the honour you have done them. For the service we have done, we do not deserve the honour you have done us. We shall at all times be ready with our lives to maintain the Protestant Religion, and the Government."—And withdrew.

Debate on a Petition from the Jews.] A Petition from the Jews was delivered by Mr. Paul Foley†.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I remember a Protestant lady in France, who, being sick, and pestered by English priests, sent for one of our ministers, and he put them out. Our ambassador had audience of the French king, and told him, That they were subjects of the king and provisions, by gen. Kirk. Mr. Walker, on his coming to England, received from king William a reward of 5000*l.* and a promise of farther favour; but his military genius still prevailing, he attended his royal master to the battle of the Boyne, and there lost his life.

* This had been voted him the day before.

† There is no mention of this Petition, or Debate, in the Journal.

of England, and ought not to be molested, The French king replied, 'While they are here, they are my subjects, and under my protection.'

Mr. Hampden, jun. I hear some of these Jews are naturalized, but I would know how they come to be naturalized? If a Jew kill a man, or a man a Jew, he will be hanged. There is a great deal of difference betwixt being subject to the laws, and enjoying the benefit of the laws.

Sir Tho. Lee. Consider the consequence of receiving this Petition from the Jews. It is directly against an Aid; 'They desire not to be taxed, &c.' Pray let not such Petitions be received. You will not receive it from others, pray begin not with the Jews.

Mr. Hampden, jun. My knowledge reaches not to that doctrine of receiving no Petition against an Aid; it is not for the honour of the house to receive such a Petition; it is a new way to me, that Aid should be petitioned against in granting. I never saw such a petition, nor such reasons to the contrary. Those Jews are subjects, in a large sense, and since it is urged as the right of subjects to petition, let them not have more right than the rest of subjects.

Mr. Foley. I think, that, for the honour of the house, you are to hear what they will say. Where you lay a general tax on a whole kingdom, you can receive no Petition against it, because all are represented here, but when there is a particular tax on men, they may petition.

The Speaker. I never knew a Petition against a Bill before the house was seized of it.

Sir Rd. Temple. You have heard petitions against a tax on Sugar and Tobacco, but they must not take notice of every Vote to ground a Petition upon, that is not parliamentary.

Mr. Hampden. You have thought it necessary that the Money should be raised. I have a Bill in my hand; pray let it be read.

Resolutions on the Case of Sir T. Armstrong.

This day, the Case of sir Tho. Armstrong was again reported; upon which the house came to the following Resolutions, viz. 1. "That sir T. Armstrong's Plea on the statute 5 Edw. 6. ought to have been admitted; and that the executing him upon the Attainder by outlawry was illegal, and a murder by pretence of law. 2. That the executors and heirs of the said sir T. Armstrong, ought to have reparation of their Losses out of the Estates of the four Judges and two prosecutors. 3. That a Writ of Error for reversal of a judgment in felony or treason, is the Right of the subject, and ought to be granted at his desire; and is not an act of grace or favour, which may be denied or granted at pleasure."—The house was then informed by the Committee appointed to examine this iniquitous Affair, that sir T. Armstrong's real estate was 300*l.* per ann. and that his personal estate consisted of bonds, &c. for 4,800*l.* and 3270 guineas, and an annuity of 500*l.* per ann.—Ordered, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reverse the attainder of the said sir T. Armstrong, and to make Reparation to his widow and children out of the Estates of the Judges and Prosecutors, and that the Bill do pass without fees."

Debate on the State of the Nation.] Nov. 23. The house went into a grand committee, on the State of the Nation, Mr. Grey in the chair.

Mr. Papillon. Two things we are to consider; how the Money you have given has been spent, and how the Army and Navy have had no more. But of most effect is to consider the State of the Nation, to provide for the future. A great deal of Money has been given, but has not answered the charge. We have a war in Ireland, and the French upon our coast. I would provide suitable provision for all.

Sir Rob. Howard. I should be glad to be instructed by gentlemen to come to particulars. Melancholy complaints will do us no service, and, seconded with sighs, tend to no other effect, than that 'the Regency' was good advice. I will let generals pass, and offer particular remedy, which calls upon you for redress; that is, in the case of your Forces. As you have heard, on the muster-rolls, there has been 70 men in a company, and it is well if there be 40. Now Money must be considered, that it may be to save you. If 10,000 men be pretended in Holland, and there are not 4,000—the business is to make an end of the War, and not to teach the Irish to fight by land, as we have taught the French to fight by sea. Therefore I move you to make a present inspection into this, and a strict one. I would have members of the house employed, both in Ireland and here, and every where, that by this deceit we be not brought to ruin. If officers be underpaid, remedy that. What I move, is, to send presently into Ireland. The business of Popery is now out of doors. King William is 'king of this people, and this people's king.' This must be presently inspected.

Sir Tho. Clarges. A great part of this motion has been already answered, of sending persons into Ireland; so far, I think, we are on the way. I doubt not but the king, for his own preservation, as well as ours, will not pay men in chimæra, but certain; as you give Money to support the government, to save all unnecessary expence. Therefore I would address the king to take away that Charge in Holland of * a month. By the best enquiry I can make, we are under no obligation by Alliances.

Mr. Godolphin. What is offered, is proper in due time; but if the men step ashore before the ship be at anchor, she will be apt to run a-drift. Before I come to particulars, I shall offer something general abroad and at home. In respect to the government, and the people, there must be an Aid to carry on the war we are engaged in, not by a short Act to collect Money only, but something to rely on for your security. For home, I would consider Religion and Trade. The Courts of Justice are well filled, and that is one remedy. For trade, there is little but what supplies your enemies to your disadvantage. For Religion, I think there is more than enough. But upon all accounts, that concern Religion, I think the Church of England too much discountenanced, who have supported you by their learned writings. I would do something to enlarge on Protestant bottoms; but I will postpone this consideration till a more convenient season. For Trade, whilst you are defending yourselves, the common enemy runs away with your Trade. For Grievances, as the Charters, &c. I am of the same opinion I was of the last session, for an Act of Indemnity from the king, to give him all the grace of it, to unite against the common enemy. Your enemies are either of France, or from France. The French king's Revenue is 116,000,000 of livres, and he has 200,000 men in pay; his kingdom well fortified; his arsenals well stored, and a great force by sea; they have met the English and Dutch Fleets in conjunction. It behoves the house to think how we shall deal with such a formidable enemy, to consider our allies, and to know how far Holland, in particular, will go to suppress this Navy of France. I remember the Pyrenean Treaty; what will it signify to give up Burgundy, and Luxembourg, &c.? I think we are not secure unless we destroy the French Navy. I move, therefore, to know how far Holland will join in suppressing the power of France.

Sir John Guise. One of the Dutch ambassadors told me, 'That the Dutch would pawn their shirts to go on with the war.' I am not for going back therefore. Certainly it is natural for you to consider from whence the ill government came, and to prevent it for the future; and, I hope, we may raise the English nation, and the reputation of it, again. If there be ill management, it must be from those in employment. Either they must manage no more, and you must apply to the king to take care of it, or take care of it yourselves, by yourselves, by the king's permission. My motion is, to consider and report what is the occasion of these Miscarriages, and calculate what are the Charges of your Land-Forces, and that you will employ people of your own, if you see occasion, to depend upon.

Debate on Abuses in Victualling the Fleet.]
Sir Robert Napier gave the house an Account of a Letter he had received.*

Mr. Hampden, sen. This information is not impossible, in nature, to be true, but morally impossible. I cannot believe so much barba-

* This Letter was from Plymouth, to one Rice, from his son there, giving an account of great abuses discovered in the victuals and beer provided for the Fleet lying there, and ready to go forth. And the said Rice, being called in to the bar, to own the said Letter, owned the receipt of it accordingly. Several members likewise attested the same, &c. See the Journal.

rism in men, so formally to undertake to destroy so many lives. Now, whether you will call in these men? Pray go on. Is this worth your curiosity? Would you have people abroad make sport with you, with a story of garbage? I doubt this will be censured. Pray go on; chuse your point what you will, and let this Letter be for the enquiry of a private Committee, and leave not the consideration of the Nation.

Sir W. Leveson Gower. I would examine these men that gave this information; if they abuse the house, punish them for example's sake, but hear them.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is for your service, very much, to have these men called in. If they have told you matter of fact, and do not make it appear—Such false reports as these may be studiously raised; if they prove true, those that were the authors ought to have the last punishment. But I take not the Committee of the whole house to have power to send for persons, papers, and records. I do not remember that a grand committee, without power from the house, has sent for persons, papers, and records, in all my observation. I would have the Speaker take the chair.

Mr. Foley. As yet this is but hear say, but a Committee may enquire into it. The Victual that went with the Ships was good, but that sent afterwards, though some laughed at it, was given to dogs, and they died immediately. I believe there is something in this, and it ought to be examined; and I desire you will do it.

Col. Granville. The Beer, on board the Ships, proved very ill, and, upon enquiry, it stunk confoundedly. Lord Torrington said, 'If it was what used to be beer, if it was boiled, it would come to itself again, and turn into beer;' and it was so, but still stunk, and seemed to be garbage put in the vessels.

Sir Peter Colleton. I hope you will do something in this matter. One ship came into Torbay, out of the Indies; as soon as they used this victual out of these ships, all their men fell sick. I am fully convinced that your men have been ill-used by the Victuallers, and, unless it be remedied, you will have no Fleet next year.

Mr. Papillon. The purser of the ship knows from what brewer, and what victualler, they send in the Victuals, and so you may find it.

Col. Granville. From whence good victuals came I cannot tell, for the Fleet had it from every place, and pray let them all answer for it.

Mr. Hampden. The question is for sending for all the Victuallers in custody, who are, sir John Parsons, sir Rd. Haddock, alderman Stuart, and Mr. Nicholas Fern. It is not necessary for me to premise that I am no advocate for these Victuallers. I believe the Fleet is as ill victualled as if our enemies had done it; there are several ships now ready to go out, some are fully victualled, and some not; they have received money for that service, and it must be done immediately, and if not done by these hands that it is now in, your service must stand still. The new Victuallers cannot enter till they have account of the Stores that are left. There are orders that their Accounts be given up, and the keys and Stores delivered in; if you send for all these Victuallers in custody, all this service must now stand still.

Mr. Coningsby. You are told that lord Berkeley's squadron is ready to go for the East Indies; would you have them destroyed as the rest were? What better evidence would you have than what you have heard? I would send for them in custody.

Mr. Papillon. Not above a week ago I was sent for to the king to accept of this employment of Victualler of the Navy. I told the king, 'This affair had been neglected three months, and had been delayed so long that I durst not undertake it; therefore it was my humble request I might not be one of them.' But the king said, 'He would not excuse me.' I can but say I can do no more than I can; but this will be taken for a great discouragement, to be brought into custody, before particularly charged; for men may put tricks upon the Victuallers.

Col. Granville. The complaint is so general, and the seamen so cast down, that, if you value not these complaints, you may talk of raising money, but not of raising seamen. I would have them sent for in custody, to give account how they came by these ill victuals.

Sir Robert Rich. If I knew who put king James's Victuallers into office, I would send for them in custody also. Would any gentleman take arsenick of a brewer that would poison his family? Send for them in custody, and then enough will come in to inform you farther.

Sir Tho. Lee. I think it necessary to give you some account of this, because it is said, 'It is now too late to change the Victuallers, and that king James's officers do now victual the Fleet.' The matter is this; they have stayed so long, that it is known how late in the year the matter of the Victualling was thought of, and how late we came into the employment; before new men could be put in, the summer-season would be lost, and there would be no Fleet; so that had you then changed hands, you had no time to spare, and the service fell thicker and thicker every day; and, if the Victuallers had been changed, the necessity was such there was no time to do it. I would have gentlemen think that such changes but as these are not to be made at all times, when the Fleet is pretty full of victuals. Except buying pipe-staves, nothing is to be done in August, and it was then the king knew that what was in stores must be made use of, or else all must stand still. If you send for these in custody, none will undertake it.

Col. Austen. I have heard it said, 'There is a necessity to take men into employment that are versed in business.' If these men are the only people that are to be employed, whether will you go next? Whatever you do with these men, who are so versed in business, I hope you will take honest men in their stead.

Mr. For. I shall not be an advocate for these Victuallers. I am concerned only for one of them, sir Rd. Haddock. I will answer for his security; he will not run away. He gave Mr. Fenn 1700*l.* for that place.

Mr. Papillon. You have had sufficient security that these Victuallers will not run away. If any gentleman will engage that they shall appear to answer this Charge, I think that will answer your end.

Sir Edw. Seymour. On all accusations I shall be very tender in sending for men in custody. But as the nature of the question is, it is absolutely necessary to send for them in custody. The ill usage and abuse the seamen have had in their Victuals, has been represented to you. For your resentment of their ill usage you can do no less than send for them. I was in hopes, when Lee stood up, that he would have told you 'That there could not be such miscarriage in the Navy, and he, of the Admiralty, be ignorant of it, that should have prevented it.' But, I find, the Admiralty know as little of this as they know of the stations of the Convoys. Had they looked over the Journals of their office, they could not have been ignorant of this; but I fear the commissioners know no Journals, but of the house of commons, and what they sit there for.

Sir John Guise. I am against names in particular. I would rather send for them in gross. You cannot distinguish the Victuallers, whose provisions were amiss. I would at them all till they can clear themselves.

Sir Henry Capel. When I heard Parsons named one of the Victuallers, I was amazed; but, as for Haddock, he is an able seaman and a good protestant. He has an office in the Navy, but he was neither manager nor contractor, therefore put not him among the Brewers and Victuallers. I would be tender how we discourage a man that has commanded a squadron at sea.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I shall say nothing to the debate, but to preserve orders. When it is a complicated question then by order, you may divide it. When there are so many names, then you are to put them one by one. It was the practice lately upon the Pains and Penalties. Will you lump such a question as this?

Sir Wm. Williams. Will you put the question entirely, or upon the several persons? When the persons are distinguished in the debate, then the question is upon every single person. This charge I took to be a joint-charge, a breach of public trust; it arises not from an information at the bar, but the knowledge of your members. This is not to punish nor convict them, but to bring them to farther Examination, whether this was wilfully done, or by accident.

Sir Henry Johnson. I believe the Navy will stand still without sir Rd. Haddock, he is a man so conversant in the affairs of the Navy. You have been offered security for his appearance. He was against the Dispensing Power, and was turned out by king James.

Divers gentlemen offered Security for him, and affirmed the same.

Sir Edw. Seymour. You are on the question of sending for Haddock in custody. If any one of these comes before you with a title to recommend him to your favour, it is Haddock; yet I am for sending for him in custody. You are not now enquiring into men's merit, but into fact. He is Comptroller of the Navy, as well as Commissioner and Victualler, and can give you the best Account. But I observe, it is unusual for these offices to be in one person. I would send for him in custody.

Col. Austen. I cannot but believe him to be a person as worthy as he is named to be; if you cannot distinguish him here, you must send for him in custody.

Mr. Hawles. If you cannot distinguish him in guilt, I would distinguish him in punishment. I find no evidence against him; but a very ill thing has been done; here are ill things done, who did it? We do not know. No person that did ill in the other government can be fit to be in this. Ill things have been fully proved against Parsons, and it was ill done, after notice of this, to keep him still in employment. I move to have Haddock sent for in custody, for you cannot distinguish.

Sir Wm. Leveson Gower. Perhaps sending for him in custody may be a favour, when you discharge him without his fees, and perhaps with marks of honour too.

Mr. Cha. Montagu. I have a fair opinion of Haddock, but I think it injustice not to send for him. You send for him as a Victualler of the Navy, but not as a criminal. I offer what I wish may be done; that, though your Vote be to send for him in custody, he may be sent for till farther order.

Mr. Boscawen. I would do what in prudence may be done; instead of sending for him in custody, to summon him to appear.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I believe the great character of this man is deserved. I think, equality of justice is more in your consideration than any thing else. All the Victuallers are jointly accused, and he not in particular.

Mr. Hampden, jun. If you summon Haddock, it will be more for your service, and you will have him before you.

Resolved, "That sir John Parsons, sir Rd. Haddock, alderman Sturt, and Mr. Nicholas Fenn, Victuallers of the Navy, be sent for in custody of the serjeant."

Debate on Mr. Waller's Account of the State of the Army in Ireland.] Nov. 26. Mr. Waller, who came lately from Ireland, gave an Account, at the bar, of the State of the Army in Ireland, and the condition of Affairs there; and then withdrew.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This gentleman favoured me with a visit, and then said something more particular. He said, 'When he went first over, it was ten days before Londonderry was relieved. There were 10,000 Irish before it defeated, and the general taken prisoner; they were in so great fear, they all ran away, with few men of ours pursuing. He was in hopes we might march to Dublin to possess it. At Chester they left all their baggage-horses; the general wondered they came not; from which a great part of the misfortune came. When he came back to Chester, he asked, 'Why the horses staid so late?' They told him, 'It was for the best profit persons could make to put them to grass.' As for the sickness, it was wholly amongst the English foot. One regiment lay amongst the Dutch in their huts; their officers looked upon their soldiers as their children, and would see them make their huts, pave them, and lay fresh straw; in the whole Dutch camp scarce two died.' By what I apprehend from the discourse of this gentleman, we lost so many men from the negligence of the officers. There was great defect of clothes; all that were well cloathed were in health.

Col. Birch. I find this person has taken exact notice of things, and, I believe, can give you a farther account. I would know, at what set time the Soldiers are paid, whether weekly or monthly; whether paid upon muster, or how?

Mr. Garraway. I desire you would ask, when they were mustered? When they were paid? What money, and at what rates?

Sir Thomas Clarges. This gentleman was a volunteer; he had no pay. He says, 'A piece of eight of 4s. 4d. was paid them at 4s. 9d. Guineas here at 1l. 1s. 6d. there at 1l. 3s.'

Mr. Hampden. It was thought the best way for the king to take up the money current there, dollars; and it was ordered to go at the current price of Ireland. Perhaps some of that money did not go so high as it might do; what was over went to the king's profit.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. This gentleman gave you an account 'That he was at Chester, when the duke of Schomberg went over into Ireland.' I would ask him this question, Of what number every regiment did consist, horse, foot, and dragoons, when mustered at Chester; and when they arrived in Ireland, what number they were there? I would know what service the ships at High-lake were designed for, whether artillery, or baggage-horses? And why they were not shipped with the Army, how they came, and how long after?

Mr. Waller, being called in, said,—"The foot were paid every day; the horse once a month, with deduction for cloaths. Since the sickness, they muster often, once a fortnight. They are paid in pieces of eight at 4s. 9d. guineas at 1l. 5s. They found no provision of straw and corn where they were, but, in their winter-quarters, straw and oats, but no hay: the last three weeks the horses were at grass and oats in the field; the horse were at grass the 10th of Nov. For surgeons medicines, I have heard they were very ill provided. I saw none of them, and I have heard they had little, or none. It was reported they had 1700l. worth of medicines, but I know not where they were,

The foreigners were warmer cloathed than our men; in great coats over their close-coats; of which the English had none. The most healthy of the English regiments was the earl of Meath's, of which few died; the next was sir Tho. Gower's, who took great care. There was little mortality among the horse; I attribute it to their cloaks. The camp was very moist, and extraordinary wet weather. I was in a house at Dundalk, and followed duke Schomberg who was two or three days before me. I was told they mustered 7 or 800 in a regiment; they shewed very full. Duke Schomberg went over with 70 ships, and left at least 100 to bring over the artillery and the horse. The horse dropped in as they could. When they came together, there were two regiments of horse, and one of foot, with between 40 and 50 sail. There were not many deserters; but few on either side. No action passed whilst we lay, but skirmishes with the out-guards. They were not well furnished with shoes. Some came late; they were not consigned to any body."

Debate on the State of the Nation.] The house then went into a grand committee, on the State of the Nation. Mr. Grey in the chair.

Col. Sackville. We have raised a great deal of Money, and if we take no care to dispose of it, we encourage our enemies, instead of defending ourselves. If the French king had paid for his Expedition as we have done, he had drained his coffers of Money. Whilst we look after punishing others, our own will come upon ourselves. I will offer no methods, but what are easy, and what every man uses that has his head upon his shoulders, in his own family. Consider what force we have to maintain the State of the government. Several things have been moved, and nothing yet concluded. Consider the State of the Army, till you have made an actual Settlement of the Land Army, the Sea and Ordnance. There is no going back. When William the Norman conquered the nation, he set fire to his ships. I move, That you will pass a Vote to take into consideration the State of the Army in Ireland, England, and Holland; and, when you have settled the Army, then the Navy to have a certain Settlement; and then send men to oversee.

Sir William Leveson Gower. I would know, from these gentlemen concerned in the house, whence this ill management arises?

Sir Henry Goodrick. The Office of Ordnance is obliged to the duke of Schomberg, to put it into condition to show the proceeding—Never man thought of more in that Office than his experience dictated to him. As for buying 500 fresh horses for the carriages and train, the money that was assigned for that purpose was duly paid, and I hope, well employed. There was no delay in the horses; 26 pieces of cannon were drawn by those horses to Chester, but so it happened that the platforms were taken off, and applied to things more necessary at that time. It happens so pat that duke Schomberg desires this delay may be enquired into, that I shall, if you please, read his letter to that purpose. 'Nov. 15. I have dispatched warrants. 'I am glad the parliament is so unanimous to 'vote for the Navy. There were great abuses 'in the embarkation of the forces for Ireland. 'To answer that of the baggage horses, they 'were ready at Chester.'

Sir Henry Capel. To inform against a person I shall be tender, and I am not capable of it; but I think it fit to enquire into the bottom. The horses were not only stayed at Chester, but let out to hire. The Treasury had nothing to do, but to obey orders issued out to them.

Sir Tho. Clarges. From whom are we to enquire into the reasons of Miscarriages? There are four people were in all offices, who went through the Navy, Admiralty, Ireland, and were commissioners of the Army. Our business to-day is to consider the State of the Nation, all full of Miscarriages. I have lived many years, and in several forms of government; I hope I shall see no more changes: I never saw the like Miscarriages: We have lost a million by France at sea, and almost a kingdom for want of Supplies, if report be true. In great probability, Ireland might have been had in Jan. last for asking for. Mr. Waller seems to insinuate that the loss of the soldiers was for want of care of the officers. As for the Army we are to see what it is, and how many, that our Money may be employed to the honour of the government; and as for the officers, they are worthy gentlemen, but those may be thought fit in time of peace, when in time of war it is necessary that some few men of experience should be added. Perhaps, if some experienced men were added to the Treasury, it would do no hurt. Every day we have experience of fresh news of the ill success of the government, and people may doubt whether we can be protected, or not. If Trade be lost, land will fall. We shall hardly have success in Ireland unless the king employ some actual executive power in that affair, and in some emergency put the absolute executive power in some persons, that if they want a rope here, or there, they need not go to seek it in several offices, but may have power to use the Treasury to issue out money as occasion requires. We have heard of armies, and garrisons, and whole fleets, but where two or three commissioners are appointed to take care of affairs, these things are not done so easily. Upon the whole, I would make an humble Representation to the king, of the State of the Nation, and leave it to the king's wisdom.

Debate on Commissary Shales.] Mr. Foley. It was a wonder to me at first that Shales* was employed; that no man should be employed, but one so much in king James's interest. They knew this man to be faulty in August, and no care was taken. In former times, privy counsellors were the eyes and ears of the kingdom, and now all this must be put upon the house of commons, and we may sit here till Midsummer, at this rate. I would address the king, &c.

* Shales had been Purveyor to king James's Army on Hounslow-heath.

Mr. Smith. In plain English, knaves and villains are employed, and those who would not give their consent to take away the penal laws and Test could not get into their places, and others that did are got in. I would desire the king (in our Address) to tell us, who were the occasion of putting these men in. As long as you have the same councils, you will have the same things done.

Sir Henry Capel. I cannot tell how these comptrollers were sent into Ireland; but, I believe, since Shales came away, both those in king James's and Charles's time in employment are removed.

Sir John Thompson. One thing gives me comfort, that you have it manifest before you, that there is treachery. The generosity of king Ch. 2. who spent so much money, was the security of the nation; but in time of war the nation cannot bear it. I am against the motion for an Address to the king, &c. You are told of Councils, but you forget the primum mobile. You have been told it came from higher powers. You made an address for a lady of quality to be sent into France—(duchess of Mazarine.) Is she gone yet? I know not the reason. The king must know the sense of the house, let counsellors say what they please. I would address the king to know who advised him to employ this person, Shales.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You are not ripe for a question; you have not matter enough to ground such an Address. I think, before you proceed to that, you should know to whom Shales is accountable. If these Miscarriages are of so great a date as August last, you must know why this was never examined nor punished. It must rest upon these persons whom the king has intrusted. If this house examine all Miscarriages, you must be a perpetual parliament. I know, Shales's employment is Commissary of the Stores; certainly some persons are superintendants. When you know that, I think the committee will ask some questions; till then, I would not address the king.

Mr. Garroway. I question whether our pressures will admit those ceremonies in gradations. Certainly there are great Miscarriages. Perhaps he was recommended by such a man, as those who should call this to account dare not. I never heard Shales named for good in my life. I have heard that he has sent over his proper goods in those ships that should have transported the horse. I know not how you will examine him, unless you will send for him over. I think it no injustice to take such a man out of employment, so ill a man.

Sir Rob. Howard. I have great hopes that we shall make use of this debate, since no man has forbore to give his thoughts, if hopes do you any service. Here have been great Miscarriages. I never heard a man speak well of Shales, nor do I believe I ever shall. He was very gracious with king James, and I am sorry he is employed by king William. You may kill two birds with one stone; and, to do something very plain, I would have an Address to the king to have persons sent into Ireland to take account of the numbers of the Army, and the Provisions. I am plainly for members of this house to go, who know their duty to the nation; that Shales may be secured there; and the duke of Schomberg will inform them of all things, and Shales's books may be examined, that you may know the number of the Army: You will then have a just Account of it, and I move for an Address of this nature.

Col. Birch. I am pretty well encouraged this day. If ever you have the war carried on with honour and success, you must hang this man. As for displacing him, that is a minute thing with me. If he be a commissary, it is a great employment, and it is in his power to do all this. The space betwixt the regiments arrival in Ireland was six months. But I would fain have the life of the business looked into. Whoever put this man into this trust are friends to king James, and not to king William. I would address the king to see his commission, and by whom this gentleman was commissioned for this service. 'Tis by the same hands that you have had all this ill success. Find the source, and I doubt not but the king will tell you.

Sir Henry Goodrick. You have had informations, of several sorts, that the duke of Schomberg is extremely unsatisfied with some about him. If the duke thought the Army could be supplied by breaking this man, before the Army came into winter quarters, he would have done it. His title is 'Commissary General of all the Provisions.' If this be fit to be stirred in before the Army were in winter quarters (I intend to look farther,) the duke will do as a loyal and wise man; but since the matter was unsafe to be stirred in before now, I hope it will not reflect on the duke. I agree to an Address, as moved; and, 'That Shales having been employed, those who recommended him have been rather friends to king James than to king William.'

Sir Rob. Howard. You are moved to know of the king, who advised him to employ Shales; but take heed of doing one thing that may do a great deal of mischief, if you delay here, and let him go over to king James. Talk not of who advised this, and send him to his old friend king James.

Mr. Smith. If we had not questioned Shales here, he may stay another campaign in Ireland. I would know a reason, why on suspicion he was not clapped up first. We must attribute all the Miscarriages and misfortunes to the Committee for the Affairs of Ireland. I would have this man taken into custody, and have some other committee for Ireland.

Mr. Garroway. You were told, 'That he was suspected to go over to king James, when he went into Ireland first.' Do you think he can be safe there? He has done a great deal already. He knows all the secrets of the Army; a hundred things that no man can foresee; as where a garrison is that wants victuals, &c. I would not have a perplexed question, but still I insist on knowing him that first advised he should be employed, and I would address the king that the duke take him into custody.

Col. Birch. I am for hastening the question, and making it effectual immediately. I would wait on the king, and that will do it.

Mr. Garroway. I would leave it to the duke to put in another person. If he be recommended from hence, I look for as bad a man as he. The king knows nobody fit. We are the Great Council of the kingdom, and I think it is no intrenchment on the king's prerogative, why the king may not take the Advice of this house, as well as of the private ministers.

Sir Henry Capel. I agree that this is the Great Council, and are the best counsellors. It is a great honor to duke Schomberg, and for the good of that kingdom, to address the king to order him to present a person for this place. If you address that the duke name a person, I appeal, whether the duke will do it without the king?

Sir Wm. Williams. If the duke nominate a person, it will take up more time than the king can spare. It must be done presently.

Sir Henry Goodrick. The general is a check upon the commissary; he must be responsible for his commissary; that is, that you will not put upon him.

The Earl of Ranelagh. I spoke yesterday with col. Lumley, who says, 'that Shales is in Ireland, and two men were sent comptrollers, able and honest men, Robinson and Fielding.'

Mr. Hampden. Fielding is in Scotland, and Robinson in Ireland, but not suffered by Shales to act.

Mr. Garroway. I think your Vote will not have perfect effect, unless you address the king to remove the advisers of putting Shales into employment.

Resolved, by the Committee, 1. "That the house be moved, That an humble Address be made to his majesty, That Mr. John Shales, Commissary-General of the Provisions, be forthwith taken into custody; and all his Accounts, Papers, and Stores secured: and that a fit person, or persons, be put into his place: and that his majesty will be pleased to empower duke Schomberg to do the same. 2. That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, That his majesty will be pleased to let this house know, who recommended Commissary Shales to his majesty, and advised his being employed."—To the first of these Resolves the house agreed, nem. con. but, on the second a debate arising, the question for adjourning was carried in the affirmative, 89 to 80.

Nov. 27. The debate on commissary Shales was resumed.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I was, last night, for adjourning the debate. Then you had two ways proposed, either to acquaint the king, but that was not thought proper, and in hopes that the debate might be resumed, that another motion might not be so harsh as this motion of an Address to the king; and first to vote, 'That those persons were enemies to their king and country who advised him to employ Shales, and that he would remove them from his person and councils for ever.' I do not remember that the thing was ever done before. The king will be unwilling to deny you, but you put a great hardship upon him. I would rather mark such men out, and, I believe, the consequence will be, somebody will be removed from the king's councils. Suppose the king forbear any Answer at all, it would look like distrust. What effect can you have? The king will remove him, but he may also be prosecuted. The king can be no witness in law. If the consequence of your Address be, that somebody will be removed, many will be glad of that consequence.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I am for going none of these ways: I think we are out of the way. I think what we are about is as much as to say, the king shall be an informer to this house. He that knew that Shales bought his place, can tell you more (lord Castleton.) I would have him asked.

Lord Castleton. It was a vulgar report that Shales bought his place. I said, 'I believed Shales was no friend to king James, nor king William, but to himself.'

Mr. Hawles. I am for the Address. We must make use of extraordinary means. If, by a precedent, we must find out unprecedented things, we shall never do it. If king James was to come in again, he could not make a better choice of some persons in employment. The king is a stranger to us. Councils have recommended persons who did it. It must be in the dark, and this is the best way to discover him and other persons. The first employment was in the West-business, and no man fitter to be employed to betray us—That man who recommended him is not fit to be in employment.

Col. Austen. I am as unwilling to propose any indecency to the king, as any man. We have a wolf by the ears in this; we know not how to let him go. You only desire to know of the king who brought Shales thither, and humbly beg the question.

Sir Rob. Cotton. If the king nominates who recommended Shales to him, you have ground to proceed. Though the king be a stranger to the nation, he is not to point of honour. You cannot do it decently. But the king may remove him from his council, and that will be sufficient.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. 'We do nothing if we find out the men only, and not who put them into employment:' This is said, but to arrive at your end it may be answered, If a question be asked a private gentleman, 'Who gave you that advice?' It is not proper for him to answer. But if he advises him to trust that man no more, he shows his respect by it. If you make an unanimous Vote to desire the king not to trust that man, it will have great weight in it with the king. This is a kind of last remedy; a thing never put upon the king before, and a hardship! Do not you give great advantages to those about the king to tell him, 'That the commons go beyond the bounds of his dignity,' and give occasion to protect those persons? Admit the king should grant it, you must tell the king those are his enemies. Your ends may be answered by an Address, 'That the persons who gave this Advice may be removed.'

Sir Joseph Tredenham. We are told by every body that the king and we are upon one bottom; if so, there is no necessity to go upon this extraordinary course, but upon what we may, with confidence, assure ourselves of success in. I wish our condition were better, but is there no way to arrive at our end but by unbeaten paths, which our ancestors never found their end in? What effect can you propose to yourselves in this, by the king's Answer? Nobody can think there is a ground of an Impeachment, or Bill of Attainder. If he is guilty of other errors than this, you may reach him without this Address. I see no convenience, but many disadvantages, by it.

Sir John Lowther. I am one of those that agree with the committee; but to hang Shales, and to have all those punished that recommended him to the king, some men think a hardship put upon the king, and some not. I have delivered my opinion, to avoid the appearance of such a rock as hardship, by all possible means to prevent the least appearance of a misunderstanding with the king. Possibly the king may be mistaken in men and recommendations. Surely, the second time, he will be cautious what he does against the opinion of his Great Council, and better avoid this rock.

Sir Rob. Howard. All agree to the same thing in the main, but differ in the method. I have rather been too warm upon persons formerly; and, I say plainly, the way we are in, is, in effect, what you owe yourselves, and the nation. A question bluntly put, 'Who did such a thing?' Consider, whether in desiring the thing, something of your own reasons of dissatisfaction should not appear. This seems a hasty step. If you desire, in the same Address, to know the person, or persons, who advised, and say 'you live under dissatisfaction from men that advise this, as the interest of king James,' supported, perhaps, with reasons, it would come in a more proper way, and without a blunt question. But, 'that in the mean time, you have no great opinion of your condition whilst king James's friends are employed;' then it will come with more respect to the person you address to.

Mr. Palmes. I presume, adjourning the debate was intended for gentlemen to recollect some other way, and I hoped some gentlemen would have it to lead you off from this called 'hardship on the king.' I would know whether Shales has a Commission under the great or privy seal, or by a bare Letter from the king. This may lead us to the knowledge of it, and those about the king may put us into some way to screen this off from the king. We are upon this point singly, either to put a hardship upon the king, or betray the trust of the whole kingdom. If there be other propositions, I must join for the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Put the previous question first; if it be carried, the house will be unanimous in the main question afterwards, for the reputation of the house.

Sir Tho. Mompesson. It is not usual to put a previous question for agreeing with the committee, upon an adjourned debate.

Mr. Coningsby. At the Committee of Religion in king James's parliament, a report was made of an Address, and, upon an adjourned debate, the previous question was put, 'Whether the words 'Protestant Religion' should stand, &c.' and passed in the negative. Judge the consequence.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is a great mistake, that the previous question, if asked, must necessarily be put, neither at the time of the report, for you may do it all at one time, and not at another. There may be reason not to put it now, and yet it may come to it hereafter. This matter is now under the king's examination; let him have the honour of it: he expects letters out of Ireland.

Sir Wm. Williams. It is a monstrous thing to be upon your Books in king James's parliament, 'Whether the words 'Protestant Religion' should stand in the Address.' You are now upon a single head, Whether this is proper for an Address now? Therefore, I think, you should put the previous question.

The previous question for agreeing with the Committee was carried 183 to 142; and the main question then passed, 195 to 146.

Sir Rowland Gwynn. It is apparent we are on the brink of ruin. I am not against presenting the Address, in the words of the Vote, 'by the privy-counsellors;' but those about the king may make ill reflections upon what we do. If you had taken more care in other Messages, we might have fared better in the Answers, (the care of Religion, the Laws, and the Government,) by those about him.

Mr. Hampden. Something to the last business.—As I understand, something was said against privy-counsellors presenting this Address to the king, 'that they had represented things so hardly to the king.' I would have Gwynn explain. I appeal to the king how we have misrepresented things.

Sir Tho. Mompesson. What he said was not with reflection upon privy-counsellors, but upon what was said here.

Mr. Howe. As near as I can recollect the words, they were, 'That the privy-counsellors had spoken hardly of the Address here, and he had reason to believe they would do so to the king.'

Sir John Lowther. I would not misrepresent

Gwynn, but, on the other side, I hope those who have the honour to serve the king at the Board, will serve this house with their lives and fortunes. He said, 'He desired that the privy-counsellors should not present this Address; they who had spoken so hardly of it here, would not favour it there.' I am not so fond of my own opinion, as not only to relinquish it, but obey you contrary to my own sense. I would not only relinquish the service of the Council, but retire, if you think not well of me.

Sir Henry Capel. I will put that gentleman at ease presently. There shall be no misrepresentation from me. Witnesses do know the rule they go by. Whoever is of the parliament, and near the person of the king, represent with all tenderness, and put the best face of things from hence to the king. I hope this will be the rule of every man, and shall be mine whilst I live.

Col. Austen. Heat never does business well. Let a man's sense be what it will, he ought to deliver it as the sense of the house, and not his own. Go unanimously to the king, and let this debate fall.

Sir Francis Blake. A privy-counsellor told us, 'That what the king said in his closet, was sent to king James in brandy-bottles.' You ought to examine those who manage affairs, and are near business. I name Mr. Blaithwayte.

This debate went off, and a Committee was appointed to prepare the Address.

Major Wildman acquainted the house, That his majesty, having been attended with their Address for securing Commissary Shales, and his Accounts and Papers, was pleased to give this answer: "That he had some time since taken order therein, being informed of the said capt. Shales's Misdemeanors in his employment; and had written to duke Schomberg for that purpose." And that his majesty was pleased farther to add, "That he verily believed, what was desired was already effectually done; though, the wind being contrary, he had not, as yet, received any account thereof from Ireland."

Nov. 28. Capt. Churchill, in a Petition, acknowledged his Offence; and prayed to be restored to the favour of the house, and to be enlarged from the Tower, which was granted.

Debate on a Clause in the Bill of Indemnity.

Nov. 29. Sir Tho. Clarges. I ask your pardon if I speak against the liberty of the subject. I have contributed to this Revolution, and have suffered for it. I sent my son to the prince of Orange, at Exeter, at great expence. Those who sue for horses and arms taken from them, have done nothing but according to law. I discommend much their malice; but, upon pretence of service to the prince of Orange, some have plundered very honest men. To have their names brought hither that have prosecuted, will increase animosities, and may do hurt. Fortify yourselves as well as you can, but name no persons. But actions, in the former Act of Indemnity, were discharged. I desire you will do so now.

Sir Henry Capel. I cannot blame any man for seeking for right, when wrong has been done him. I am for the question. I take it to be a great imprudence, boldness, and insolence against the present government, now the house of commons is sitting, and making an Act of Indemnity, whilst this is depending, for men to bring actions, &c. I fear there are some ill spirits that countenance one another to do mischief. Since such a motion is made, I would not let it fall flat. I remember not such impatience nor complaint formerly, when Ch. 2. was restored; why should they not have the same respect to this parliament, as to others? We shall have them dispute the Militia, and dispute the Tax, and have the frame of government torn in pieces. We have enemies abroad and at home, and I hope you will put the question.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am sorry, and suspect myself, when I differ from a friend. The rights of the people, and the guardianship of the Indemnity is in king, lords, and commons; not in this house alone. When men see actions at law fruitless, they will not spend their money. Direct a Bill to be brought in, and that is better than a Vote. The rights of parliament are enough. Pray let us take no more jurisdiction upon us than our ancestors.

Mr. Howe. It seems strange to me, that those who have broken all your laws, and subverted religion in the Ecclesiastical Commission, should be on an equal foot. What has this king taken but from enemies? If they be pardoned here for what they have done, I believe they will not be pardoned in another world. The law and the sword grew luxurious in the West, and I heard not of any body in king James's government that stood up for an Act of Oblivion; and now to be placed amongst those men,—I know not what to trust to. Let us rather try it again.

Mr. Hampden. I am against the question. Suppose you had one of these men at the bar, and you ask him, 'Why he brought this action?' It may be a robbery. These inconveniences will happen in Revolutions; therefore I am not for a question.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I shall give you but short trouble. The merits of the question have debated it out of doors. The debate came on irregularly, and slipped itself in. Put the question, 'Whether the house shall proceed to the order of the day?'

Ordered, "That a Bill be brought in to indemnify all such persons from private Actions, that have acted in order to the bringing in their present majesties; or for their service, or the safety of the government."

Address against Commissary Shales.] Mr. Dolben reported the Address to his majesty against Commissary Shales, viz.:

"We your majesty's most dutiful subjects, the commons, in parliament assembled, being filled with the deepest and most sincere affection to your majesty's royal person, and out of the most tender regard to your majesty's and your people's safety, and the honour of your government, do most humbly represent to your majesty the extreme danger we conceive the nation and your majesty's affairs to be in, by the employment of persons in the greatest trust, who are so far from being faithful to your majesty's and your people's interest, that they have corruptly and treacherously endeavoured the destruction of both: especially Mr. John Shales, who was made Commissary-General of the Provisions for your majesty's Army in Ireland, notwithstanding he was notoriously known to be popishly affected, and to have served the late king James as his commissary. The mischiefs which have happened by the employment of this man are very great; and of such a nature, as, without God's infinite mercy to your majesty and this nation, might intirely have defeated their majesties good intentions, and the effect of the Resolutions of this house, in order to the reducing of Ireland to its due obedience to your majesty. In particular, when that experienced general duke Schomberg went, by your majesty's command, into Ireland; he left strict orders for the speedy transporting the Ordnance and Horse, designed for the service of that kingdom: and it pleased God to bless his first attempts to that degree, that, if the said orders had been executed, your majesty's Affairs in Ireland had been in a much better posture than now they are. But the said Commissary Shales, partly to satisfy his own covetousness, and partly out of disaffection to your majesty's service, did delay the execution of the said Orders for several weeks; by reason whereof your majesty's Forces were not only disabled for pursuing the advantages they had gained upon the enemy, but were also necessitated to encamp at Dundalk; which occasioned the loss of some thousands of your majesty's subjects. Wherefore we, &c. do most humbly desire, that your majesty would be graciously pleased to let this house know, who recommended Commissary Shales to your majesty, and advised his being employed; to the end that we may be the better enabled to offer to your majesty such humble advice, as may tend to the preservation of your majesty's royal person and government."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Howe. I doubt you cannot make this a good Address, or ever have good effect of it. If it must go, there is a word in it I would have good English; viz. 'by the Employment of Mr. Shales.' I would have it, 'Employ of Mr. Shales.'

Mr. Hampden, jun. I think myself obliged to speak something, being of the committee. I had rather not have been of the committee, and not have had a hand in drawing it. Nothing should have drawn consent from me to this Address, but the safety of the king. Some had scruples of conscience about going to the prince of Orange, but they were answered, when the danger was over. Nations were not made for kings, but kings for nations; and nations not by kings, but kings by nations. I take it to be for the king's interest to put you in mind of these things, as well as the nation's. In the late reigns we had good paper laws, if good men had been put in to execute them, against Popery, and for the preservation of property: yet the Judges declared, 'That the laws were the king's laws, and the king judge of the necessity of the government.' This will make the king as absolute as the Eastern princes. In your address you desire, 'That duke Schomberg should name a person fit for Shales's Employment.' He was thought to have skill in military affairs, and yet complained, 'That he could not put in a cornet.' If there be such men about the king, it is not safe, and to no end to give Money. I would remove them.

Sir John Guise. It is parliamentary to have the Address read, paragraph by paragraph. You have been told, 'That Shales is not the only man you are to remove, but in all places and offices.' Possibly, instead of making this singular, there is not only Shales, but all other people to be removed as well as Shales. It is what you must do one time or other. If there is any man here that does not wish for this, I shall tell him he is an enemy to the kingdom.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. I was not for this Address. I think, a good use may be made of what Guise has said. I wish this Address was laid aside; it is too narrow only for an inconsiderable fellow, a creeping worm. I could wish all were laid aside that can be found out. If the Address be laid aside, or recommended, you may have fruit of it.

Mr. Howe. I am never moved by fears, or hopes, to do contrary to the interest of my country. I thought there would be no good effect of this Address, therefore I was against it. These persons are near enough to the king to know, that this Shales is contrary to the interest of the nation to be employed any more. Many near the king thought it not for his interest to employ him. I wonder not that all honest men are not employed; they must have their tongues oiled and knees greased. I would find out great men that have been the occasion; name them, one by one, and I shall give my Vote as willingly as any body to remove them. [It was cried out, "Name them,"] If I do, you will all vote for them, as you did last time. I would recommend some marks for the king to avoid and chuse by, and leave this Address.

Col. Birch. I thought this Address was a plaister too narrow for the sore, but I submit always. Now, pray make the best of what is before you. It is thought 'this of Shales is too little a thing to lay so great a weight upon.' The Address tells you, before you name the man, of great inconvenience, and 'that we have had mischief from persons not fit to be put into employment.' I think it absolutely necessary, that all means be used to continue a good correspondence betwixt the king and his people. I confess, from the experience I have had, nothing is more mischievous than when things are represented hard and inconvenient to the king, and what we have offered not to be well received by him: insomuch, that, formerly, a person not liked by the parliament was sure to be preferred by the king, and every one must follow the ministry, or have an ill life. I have not the same advantage of speaking as other gentlemen, but you know my meaning. This is no hard thing upon the king; things taken in time are easily understood, and all is well when once those about the king represent them well. They may scramble for Money for the king, and we for our Privileges, as has been done formerly; but as for your Address, I would not lay it aside, but that half a dozen gentlemen wait on the king, and make not this little thing of Shales's too great a solemnity; but I would lay before the king the Miscarriages by land and sea. If the king would do nothing, it looks as if those about him would asperse the government, and do nothing to cure it. Unless Miscarriages be represented by land and sea, nothing, no, nothing, can cure it. Let, then, some gentlemen (not to come to the persons, but every one of them, not only the putting in these Officers) show what we have done at sea, and spent 1,300,000*l.* and what has been done in Ireland, how we have taught them to be soldiers, who were cowards before. I move for the Address.

Serjeant Maynard. That there are more than a Shales in this I doubt not, both a great and a tall man. But I am for going on upon this Shales, else we shall blow the deer, and he will go into the herd. They that besiege the king will oppose all Addresses. If you would break a faggot, break the sticks one by one; when a kingdom, nay, a king, is like to be lost, and make us all beggars. When this Address is presented, the king cannot but think it reasonable; a person that has so notoriously and wickedly demeaned himself! You have only Shales now; much more may be added hereafter. In the mean time go on with Shales. Shall we give our money to we know not whom? When Shales is gone, it may be another in his place as bad as he: therefore go to all you can find out.

Mr. Foley. It is said, 'Shales is a little man,' but we know not what great man recommended him. To say, 'We should stay till we had all our Grievances, to make a Remonstrance of them together,' that is much harder. I am dissatisfied to stay till all Grievances are enumerated; at that rate, we can never come to any body, and we shall be quite undone, till the king and we be all on a bottom.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I am for taking out all the deer in this king's park that were in king James's park. Since it must be a general Address, let it be a Remonstrance to take in every thing by land and sea. Be pleased to recommit this Address, and let none but a Protestant breed of deer be left, and recommit the Address upon the debate.

Sir Duncombe Colchester. If you turn out the deer, it will do you no good, unless you turn out the keeper too. (Said some, 'Does he mean the king?')

Sir Robert Rich. You were told, 'You have sat several days upon the State of the Nation to little effect more, than that you have found out the Navy and Army were betrayed;' if that be little, I know not what is greater. It is said, 'Shales is sent for out of Ireland;' but if you do not know who advised to take him into employment, you do nothing. A general Address is none at all. You are moved to commit the Address; in my opinion, that is to give it a decent interment. If the king know neither the keeper, nor the park, we must be plain with him.

Mr. Hawles. You find the nation betrayed, and you know not by whom. I believe, that, at common law, the suggestion why a person is employed is to be expressed in his patent. Ed. 3. c. i. because the king granted many pardons, the persons who suggested them were to be expressed. I think the common law was so. Now, instead of ex certâ scientiâ, it is ex mero motu. This could not be a ground unless with a Non obstante. But since this is not pursued, it is not an unusual thing to ask this question in the Address. I think it not a crime to recommend an ill man, but to know him an ill man, is. It is said, 'We should not do what one gentleman would not do to another.' It is not the end of governments to punish, but by misfortune they must do it. At Court-Leets they swear to discover all injuries done to the lord, &c. If my pocket be picked, it is not civil for me to enquire who did it! Is this a way of arguing? Here is no hardship on the king; it has been done so before; it has been put upon Ed. 3. and Hen. 4. Those were great men in that time, and this may make this king great in this.

Sir Rd. Temple. In what Hawles says of Pardons he may be in the right, but not in the Grants. I would follow the method of our ancestors, respondeat superior, when under the conduct of another man. In an Army a general must find whom he employs, &c. I would recommit the Address, and represent all Miscarriages.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I was one of those against the Address, but when you have resolved, it is not to be laid aside by art. A man of art is so near a man of something else, that I desire not to be the man. Gentlemen say they would have it recommitted, but I hear no reason given for it. That is against all methods. By the same argument, all other Addresses may be committed again and again, and that is, 'a decent interment,' as a gentleman called it. When we debate a thing over and over, I know not but that, instead of reforming Grievances, we shall be grievances to ourselves. This may be done, and grievances not left undone. If that be so hard upon you, not to remedy it, you will send your trade back to Amsterdam, and bring their religion instead of it. Assign any particular, &c. but it is an inexcusable levity to do all this against order. I would not (as has been moved) have the body of the house go with this Address: we can do no more when we present all our Grievances. This is but a pimple, but a scab of your disease. That one person should draw a whole house, never—Reserve yourselves for a greater occasion. And as it is too little for you to present in a body, so it is too big for a particular person, as has been moved.

The Address was agreed to, and the Committee who prepared it, was ordered to present it.

The King's Message for a Commission to be sent into Ireland.] Nov. 30. Mr. Comptroller Wharton delivered the following Message from his majesty:

“W. R. His majesty, having already declared his resolutions to prosecute the War in Ireland with the utmost vigour, and being desirous to use the means that may be most satisfactory and effectual in order to it, is graciously pleased, that this house do recommend a number of persons, not exceeding seven, to be commissioned by his majesty to take care of the Provisions, and such other preparations as shall be necessary for that service.—His majesty is farther pleased to let the house know, That upon consideration of the Address of Nov. 11, he gives them leave to nominate some persons to go over into Ireland, to take an Account of the number of the Army there, and the State and Condition of it; who shall receive his majesty's orders accordingly.”

Col. Austen. If ever thanks were due, it is now. The king grants before you ask, or if you had asked, you could not have mended it yourselves. A man in his state without asking; This is of so great consequence, that I would give particular Thanks, and that very signally, by the whole house.

Sir Rob. Howard. The motion for the whole house to return the king Thanks, is very just and very seasonable; and I second it.—Ordered accordingly.

Debate whether any Member should be put into the said Commission.] Dec. 2. Mr. Sacheverell. I desire you would consider the substance of the Message, and first know whether the house will order any Member to be put into the Commission. I speak not for myself; I have neither health nor reason to act in that honourable employment, that the king was pleased to put upon me. The thing is of mighty importance, and is it not too weighty to be put upon us? I speak truly, I thought it too weighty; impossible, very impossible, when we cannot know the state of things, and, by consequence, what is wanting to supply Ireland. If those employed are not supplied, you will disgrace your members. Consider the honour of every member, and put him not upon difficulties that he cannot extricate himself out of. I move, ‘That no member of the house be named for that employment.’

Sir Tho. Clarges. By the king's Message it is not expected that members should be named, but it is recommended to you to nominate some persons to him. I am much less able to be in such an employment, by my age and infirmities. It is not decent nor proper for us to recommend ourselves, and it is impossible for men not exercised in so great affairs, in so short a time, the nature of Ireland considered. It was thought formerly that multiplicity of offices, as well as pensions, was inconvenient in this house. I think it not fit that we recommend any of the house.

Mr. Garroway. Since this has been moved, I think it for your service to pass such a vote. It is said abroad, ‘We have too many Officers already here,’ and I would not take upon us to name any more; what employment we have had is enough. I would return Thanks to his majesty for his gracious favour, but this is too great for us. I speak for your honour; such a vote will be satisfactory without doors; and so leave it to the king.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think you will do great right to yourselves, to vote, ‘That none of this house shall be nominated to this employment.’ People do think we are labouring for places for ourselves. I think, if we can discharge what is before us, we are very happy. I would therefore vote, ‘That none of the house shall be nominated.’

Sir Tho. Littleton. I think the sense of the house is, not to meddle with this employment. I think it improper to pass a Vote, ‘That none of this house shall be named.’ I think it better moved, if you throw the compliment into the king's hand again; ‘That it is too weighty for us to meddle with;’ and if you will not meddle with it, it is an improper question to put, ‘That no persons of this house shall be nominated.’

Sir W. Williams. You have not only declared judgment on Shales, but you have addressed the king to know who advised him to employ him; but I doubt this will look abroad as if we find fault with all officers out of the house, and yet we will name none. Make a Vote not so much to satisfy yourselves as the world without doors.

Mr. Howe. I think you give the people occasion to say ‘You do little but go backward and forward, in your Address about Shales.’ I was against it. The king has very graciously gratified the house with a thing put into your hands for your advantage—and they get nothing by it; I am little concerned who are put into places, if for the public good. Without asking the king questions, he cannot answer us. If persons be put in, &c. from hence, we know of whom to ask questions.

Sir John Thompson. If the Miscarriages in Ireland be taken upon ourselves, I fear it will come to this, that if we recommend persons to take Shales's place, if no money be to act with, they cannot go on. We may thank the king for what we do not accept of, and I move for a Vote.

Sir John Lowther. Some think this business too great for them, and it is for me to speaking to. I would have this question with some explanation: 'That no member of the house be employed for Commissary of the Provisions,' may comprehend some employed already, and of the Irish committee. I desire this explanation, that it is your advice no members ought to be, so expressed that the king may do accordingly. It has been said, 'Perhaps there is no Money, and there may be Miscarriages, and a man will not take the load upon him;' but every body knows from whence money comes, and you may prevent those difficulties, that they have not a greater load than they can bear.

Mr. Foley. I am for putting the question, 'That no member be employed, &c.' and it needs no explanation. For the Irish committee I would not have nominated in the house. Though not fit for us to nominate; yet, as a state of the kingdom, you may advise the king with qualifications.

Mr. Howe. We are for removing persons, and yet put it into their hands to nominate more such, if we do not recommend.

Col. Birch. I have a place, and will keep it as long as I can, and shall give no man cause to complain, as I shall answer it at the great day; and in this matter, I take the words to be recommendation. I mistrust myself, and not them, &c. when I differ. The king does really intend what he has sent you in the Message. I believe really, as things are managed, both at land and sea, we cannot last long. Be pleased to lay this aside, as too heavy for us. But I see, Offices are pointed at. I never knew any thing got by such Offices, but paper, pen, and ink, and a room. If there had been Money stirring, I should have been smelling after it. Put the weight off from your shoulders in this house, on whom the main weight will hang—I speak not of the Stores, nor of mustering the Army; that may be cured without sending into Ireland; but, for the latter part of the Message, what is used to be done in this matter? Six or seven men sat close to examine things, and the Report was brought to the house. Perhaps the king, or some of his ministers, may sit in this committee: possibly this way may give the king some assistance. As to the first part, do as you please; but, as to the second part of the Message, do something to make it practicable.

Sir Henry Capel. I am for this house to have its liberty, and for the king to have his liberty too. Trusts are best put where there is most property, and there there are more riches, and the property of England is in the commons: Whom do they entrust? They think themselves safest in the hands of men of great estates, and great judgments; this will be the opinion of the counties and boroughs. It is said, 'It is not fit for us to recommend persons.' I am not read in records, but I have heard that, in former times, the thing has been done; will you not let the king go by such rules, that the counties have gone by? Will you put a negative upon him? To vote, 'That the commons will not meddle with capt. Shales,' a bad man, what advantage will you have of a negative? Suppose the king chuse a man to-morrow, that is able, shall he not come into parliament by reason of this Office? I hope this will awaken persons, so as to adjourn the debate.

Sir John Guise. I hear it said, 'These are questions usually put;' but I believe that in all reigns the kings have not had such care of the government. I think this very extraordinary. The Message has two parts; recommending persons, and settling a Commission. I think, the Victualling the Navy has orders to be undertaken without involving the commissioners in the Miscarriages of the former. The king says, 'I have been mistaken formerly; pray assist me.' If the house will do nothing in this, we must resolve to be ruined. You say you are betrayed; will you not remedy it? I hope that being a member of this house does not make a man so profligate that he may not accept of it. If you will not take it into your hands to support yourselves, it looks like giving up the cause. Pray adjourn the debate.

Sir Rob. Howard. The first part of the Message is to recommend, the next is to send persons into Ireland; and upon this you raise a third, 'That you will recommend none of your Members.' You first thank the king, and then you unthank him again, and will not nominate. This raises a suspicion that, as soon as you have any thing to do with the king, it raises a prejudice on it—and that a man in office has not behaved himself as he ought, and as for his place he would willingly resign to a person, to behave himself honester and abler than he. You give the king Thanks, but it includes neither. It is not proper to raise a negative upon a Message that gives you no occasion, and unthank the king again, and make no use of it at all. The consequence is, the king and the people may be separated in their opinion and choice. Pray leave it to the king, free, without a Vote.

Mr. Sacheverell. The gentleman's discourse totally differs from the question propounded. 'Tis moved no farther than not to recommend any persons to the king that are Members, not to bar the king at all, nor the house from examining the matter. The true single question is, 'Not to debar the king nor yourselves from examining the matter;' and pray put that question.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The question is not, Whether the king shall name any of your Members, but That you should not name your Members. I would not adjourn the debate, and leave it still upon the anvil.

Mr. Hampden. This is a previous Vote that will end all debates upon yourselves to preclude any of your members to be nominated by yourselves. Your Vote will go abroad, and the people are in expectation. Possibly provisions may stand still, and betwixt the new and old officers, nothing be done. This Vote is not intended for the king, but to make use of in future debates.

Sir Rob. Howard. You have voted the king Thanks, which seems to accept what the king proposes; you must explain your Thanks.

Mr. Papillon. I hope too sudden a Vote will not hinder you from the benefit of the first part of the Message. I offer to your consideration, whether there are not matters of greater weight before you, than to name persons for Provisions. This is a little thing in comparison of the great affair. I would adjourn the debate, and go to the bottom of the whole Message.

Sir Tho. Lee. Though I have an Office, yet I think it my duty to serve my prince when I can, I know not but the king may trust me as well as my country. I am not for adjourning the debate, for the next question will be for excusing yourselves.

Col. Austen. I think we are going to make the king an ill return for his gracious Message. He desires your advice, and you complain that the War was not carried on, &c. and, at the same time, you call yourselves the Great Council of the Nation; and now you will give him none. I would adjourn the debate.

Mr. Hawles. You have complained that some men have been put into office, and the king did not know them, therefore the king desires you should recommend persons to him. I think fit you should answer the king. I do not say all persons should be named in, or out of the house. If you pass a Vote not to recommend persons, you put a disgrace upon persons, as if they wanted integrity, or understanding, whom the house should recommend. There has been but one person recommended, viz. Mr. Johnson, and no notice taken of him in the midst of Preferments. Shall we imply, by such a Vote, that there is no person in the house fit to be trusted? I am against it.

Col. Birch. I speak now for fear I shall speak no more. I was never in my life under such thoughts. Now, in great haste, we pass this question; and I think it not sense when it is passed. Those that are for the question see some other way for their own safety than fighting it out to the last. For my part, I think of none. Can there be a lighter way than this? You will see the reason of all that has been done, and it will lead you, I hope, into something better; I am sure it cannot be worse. On a sudden you say, you will recommend nobody, and they will say abroad, 'Things have been long ill, and now the king offers it to you, you wash your hands of it, and shake hands with the whole.' This cannot be taken well by the king, nor those abroad. This requires an adjourned debate, and a consideration in this great cause two or three days; and I hope, God will direct us.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am for putting the question, for the reasons given against it. When you have done this, I hope you will wash your hands of the other too. This looks like taking the stone out of their foot, and putting it into yours. If those who are our own members be named, and there happen miscarriages, we shall make a faint prosecution of one another; and we shall have another advantage, to revive the ancient usage of parliament, that no man accept of an office, as sheriff, or any employment, without the consent of the house. I have heard of judges, and Attorney-Generals, making apologies for accepting their places till they have had your leave. In the late troubles, the parliament was involved in a great war with king Charles 1; then was made the Self-denying Ordinance, when they were brought low and worsted; they prospered upon it, and, I hope, so shall we, and I am not for adjourning the debate.

Mr. Foley. I wonder the house was so forward to give the king Thanks before in a Message. It is impossible the king and kingdom should be safe as long as persons are in council that have sat in king James's council.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Though I shall not recommend persons, yet I would give what advice we can for carrying on the War; but it was not the advice of your ancestors to recommend persons for the executive part. The king's council and generals are fittest, knowing the abilities and qualities of persons. I move for Thanks to the king, &c. and we cannot be safer than in the hands of persons that his majesty shall think fit.

The Commons resolve that no Member be put into the Commission for Ireland.] Resolved, "1. That this house doth not think to recommend any Member of this house to be employed in the Service of Ireland, for the purposes expressed in his majesty's gracious Message of Saturday last. 2. That this house doth humbly desire to be excused from recommending any Persons to his majesty to be employed in the Service of Ireland; but humbly leave it to his majesty's great wisdom to nominate fit persons for that Service."

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do acquaint his majesty with the said Resolutions, when he presents the Thanks of the house to his majesty.

Dec. 3. The Speaker acquainted the house that he had attended his majesty with the Thanks of the house, and likewise acquainted his majesty with the said Resolutions; who was pleased to return his Answer to this effect:

"Gentlemen; I shall take all the care that may be, to carry on the War in Ireland with vigour, and to employ such Persons as may be most proper for the service: and I doubt not but I shall have the assistance of the house of commons to carry it on in such a manner, as may be according to your desires and my Instructions."

Dec. 5. The Commissioners of the Victualling in custody of the serjeant at arms, petitioned the house to be admitted to Bail: and the house dividing upon the question, it passed in the affirmative. Yeas 117. Nocs 105; on the following terms, viz. That each of them should be bound in 5000*l.* penalty for his appearance, and find two sureties in 2500*l.* a piece more.

The Quakers exempted from double Taxes.]

Dec. 7. A Clause being reported from the committee on the Supply to be added to the Land-Tax bill, for exempting the Quakers from double Taxes on their subscribing a Declaration of Fidelity to their majesties; the house divided upon the question, and it passed in the affirmative. Yeas 170. Noes 78.

Dec. 9. The blanks in the Land-Tax bill of Sums to be appropriated for the use of the Navy, were filled up as follows:—Resolved, That the blank for the sum to be appropriated be filled up with 400,000*l.* To be thus employed. For paying the Seamen, 200,000*l.* for providing Victuals, 100,000*l.* and for providing Stores, 100,000*l.*—The same day, a Clause was proposed to be added to the said Bill, to empower the Commissioners to review the Assessments, and examine upon oath, and if they find any person omitted or under-rated, to reassess them, by such ways and means, and under such penalties as before provided; and the house dividing upon the question, it passed in the affirmative. Yeas 136. Noes 127.

Debate on the State of the Nation.] Dec. 14. The house went into a grand committee, on the State of the Nation.

Mr. Holt. The honour and safety of the king and kingdom depend on this day's resolution. The Miscarriage of the last year is recommended to your consideration. The present State of the Nation is a state of war; all conclude, that Money is the sinews of war; I fear there have been great embezzlements, and I hope you will enquire into it how it has been issued out. I have heard the Stores are empty, and I believe there is a great want of money, but I observe, there is catching at it. We have appropriated money for the Stores and Yards, &c. but it has been like boys scrambling for nuts, some get three or four, and others none at all. If we appropriate this Money, it seems by that we are jealous, and why should we not enquire? You have been told by an honourable person how little there is, and how much wanting.

Mr. Foley. You have ordered the committee, to day, 'to consider the State of the Nation.' I would enquire why Ireland was not relieved in proper time; it was a great mischief. There was a Fleet, and yet Ammunition was slipped from France, and no care of conveying relief to Londonderry; and all came to nothing, till almost all the people perished. It was neglected six months, and those officers that took care of their soldiers in Ireland, did well, but no enquiry into those that took no care. Horses were ready for the Artillery, but they stayed six weeks. As for the Fleet, no part of it but was under great Miscarriages, all in disorder—no care of Convoys for Merchants; they have done nothing to annoy our enemies; where to lay the blame, I cannot tell. As for the ministers, they have done the same things as in Charles 2's time, which makes me think them Pensioners to France still. We are not now in an ordinary case. If this government by any accident should miscarry, we are all like to fall with it, the Protestant Religion, and all. I move, 'That you will make an humble Representation to the king, that things may be managed more to the satisfaction of his people.'

Sir Robert Rich. What is said, gives me occasion to tell you something of my own knowledge. A captain who lived 20 or 30 miles from Londonderry, and who loved the place, had applied to the council of Scotland for the relief of it: they loaded him with meal; he sailed by our fleet, and was brought aboard to give an account why he did go by the fleet without calling, and he must give account to the general; he said, 'he knew no general.' They caused him to lie there five weeks; he asked them the reason: they told him, 'There was a prodigious boom cross the River, choaked up with sunk vessels, and a battery on the River, with small shot, on each side.' He asked, 'Whether, in five weeks, any long-boat was sent to view the boom?' The boy he sent, who swam in, gave a dismal account of the condition of the town. He was ordered to go up the River, and if he could not get up to the town, to fire his ship, to be useless. The man of war, and two more, stopped short of the Fort; the meal-ship was before. When he was near, he dropped anchor. The anchor drew, and the tide carried the ship's stern athwart the boom; and this dismal boom, only with the weight of this ship, broke in the middle, and no wind at all. I hear not of much punishing, nor much rewarding. This man has lain nine weeks to solicit for his reward for his pains, and no notice is taken of him.

Mr. Jephson. I did pay this captain 300*l.* and more. I think this captain was one Douglas: I think this is the man.

Sir Robert Rich. This sum was paid him for the freight of his ship; but for his recompence not one groat.

Sir John Guise. I shall speak of one head most natural to this debate, and that is of 'Money said to be the nerves of war,' the disposal whereof for your safety is to the best advantage. I know not whether it be regular, in a committee, to mention it. Instead of Money given to pay the Army, to have none paid! You must, to do this, state the Accounts of Money and Stores, when the prince of Orange came in, and then what is come in of that you granted, and how disposed of, and the Charge of the next year, whether two millions will do it.

Sir John Thompson. I take it for granted, that the Money you gave the last session has answered all the ends then proposed; and they have had more than could be employed. When persons still are in council, who have formerly managed, when there was a great army to enslave us, I can never expect good from such men. I offer you, Whether 50,000 men is not enough?

Sir Tho. Clarges. As for Accounts, they are referred to a committee already. When that is reported, you will know how they stand, from those of the Treasury, who give you account; I hope that will be satisfactory. I remember, in the Civil War, when the party of Ch. 1. were near overcoming the Parliament Party, they presently fell upon a new model of the Army and Affairs; the precedent may be made use of now; there is scarce a day but we hear of misfortunes. You have been told, 'That king James's false dice are still played with, and go about.' This access of Foreigners in the Army is another great discouragement; their way of fighting is from hedge to hedge, and from hill to hill: the English have another way; and king James, enquiring of gen. Morgan, why the Irish were so good soldiers abroad, and so ill at home? he replied, 'His majesty was mistaken, for when they have English to deal with, they charge close, and then fall in with butt-end of musket.' What infelicity we are under I cannot tell; what advice the king has I cannot imagine; but we may do our own work by our own countrymen. I moved, 'That 400,000*l.* might be applied to Ireland;' and that, I can rationally make appear, might have reduced the West of Ireland in three months: but that is passed now. The Fleet lay six weeks in the bay of Kinsale, and we might have had Cork for asking for. One Townshend, captain of a ship of 20 guns, was blown, by weather, into Castle-haven, and sent a boat ashore to enquire after his Protestant relations; they told him, 'They were prisoners in the castle:' up they went, and after a shot or two, the Irish thinking more followed, they took the Castle, and redeemed their friends: if 15 musketeers have done this, what might 500 men? But, I am told, the commanders had positive instructions not to set a man ashore. Here is 400,000*l.* a month, and no method was taken as in other councils. I know not whether it is by weakness of council. Formerly there were 100 in a company, now but 50: the use of this was, that men might be drawn out disciplined immediately for service, and this would put life into your business. As to this of Foreigners, I know not what security we have in them; but I am sure this king came in by the Church of England, their pens, sermons, and sufferings. When all things are to be feared, men will fear nothing. Some gentlemen, out of scruple of conscience, have not taken the Oaths; they acquiesce under it, without murmur against the laws. There is another sort of men that live under a constant breach of the law. By law no man can be in office, who takes not the Test and Oaths: it will be no answer to say, 'the chancellor and lord chief justice did not come to my house to tender me the Oaths.' I would have all former differences forgotten. The Dissenters are against monarchy, but it is the government that those men would have all in their hands. Having given my opinion of the general State of the Nation, I desire, 'That we may make a Representation of it to the king.'

Sir John Guise. I suppose this gentleman was not upon the spot when the change was, but, I assure you, the Church of England ran away from us, and the Dissenters stayed. I hear the word 'Monarchy' named; I would know who is against monarchy? I would not have these distinctions among us; but pray go on to the State of the Nation.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. If I do not mistake, I hear a project to reduce Ireland with 400,000*l.* If that can be, I would give him 100,000*l.* for his share. I think, if the nation be in ill condition, you would do well to make a Representation of it, to inform the king as well as ourselves. Your way is to look back to the Prince of Orange's coming to the administration of the government, to see what Money was then in the Exchequer, and what in the Stores: I would not skin the sore, but search it to the bottom. If you have a plain charge and discharge, that will satisfy you.

Mr. Howe. I think, the worst State of the Nation is, to throw the Fanatic and Papist at one another's heads. The Church of England have so well vindicated themselves from Popery, that I hope we shall show ourselves not the men we are represented, to ruin the Church, and ruin Monarchy. I know not what Religion does here; that is for the pulpit. Secure the government from king James's coming in, with Popery at his heels, and the French king riding on his back: and as for those who have been employed, faults are easily made and easily found, but rarely remedied. I would conceal our faults from our enemies, and mend them as soon as we can, and regulate where Money has been misapplied.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I desire to explain myself. Morally speaking, with 400,000*l.* Ireland might have been put into your hands in 3 months. I have no place of profit, and desire none, but I can make good what I say. I hope, when we have fears, we may have liberty to make discovery of them. When we have a sort of men against Monarchy—[He was called upon to name them.] I hope, all are free here, and all of the Church of England; there are a sort of people against the Penal Laws, and the Test, and, I am afraid, that now they will not take the Oaths, they have a loose foot to comply with some change.

Sir Henry Capel. I speak to Clarges's distinguishing persons. I have a feeling about me;—[They laughed] I mean, my family. Distinction in the Civil War, how ended it? Fatally. Though they could not bring in Popery, in Ch. 1's time, they brought it to pass, in a good measure, in his son's. The Long Parliament had a good natural disposition to do good for the country, and then we were told, 'It was coming to be like 1641.' Pray let us have no distinctions.

Sir Tho. Clarges. That gentleman and I sat near 18 years in that parliament; and he, I hope, will bear me witness that I was then against Popery. I say, in king James's parliament, who closed against the Test, and who closed for Liberty? I fear, there is some secret reason for it, and in it.

Sir Rob. Howard. There has been speaking, on all sides, of this, and that. I speak plainly, and will show plainly where this will end, and how unfortunate—When this began on either side—Not those that would take away the Penal Laws nor the charters, let their opinion be what it will on either side, and some in this house may yet be called upon. It is spoken of ‘Dissenters who complied with king James,’ and Whig and Tory revived—And then can we say, That any man is for the Government who was for the Regency? [He was interrupted, but went on] I only said, that those things would prove fatal, and, in the end, destruction. I am for understanding every thing; and what you did from the hour the prince of Orange came, to see that all has been received to this day, and disbursed, so exactly, shortly, and visibly; and this shall be done so just, that he is not worthy of the place he is in that opposes it. It is fit that you have it from the first day of Michaelmas, and so on.

Mr. Smith. I am not of Clarges’s opinion, ‘That we have none to fear but Sectaries, and Common-wealth’s men.’ I think, there are Church of England-men, and destroyers of the Church, who complied with king James, because they could have no Toleration under other reigns. I hope, the king will have such information of this day’s debate, that we shall have no more Foreigners; and I hope the English shall be paid, that the officers may not pick the soldiers pockets to subsist themselves; and, I fear, that is the occasion of false musters.

Sir John Lowther. Parties have had their faults on all sides; I hope we shall have no more distinctions for the future. If we consider the State of France, it is not so formidable as represented. Powder is now 10*l.* the barrel, which, before the war, was but 20*s.* The French king has melted his finest plate, which cost three times its worth in the fashion: he is in distress for naval stores from the north; and all the northern ports of the world are shut upon him: if you are masters of the Channel, and supported by the Confederates, he will soon fall. King James has neither money nor men but from him. I hear it said, ‘We have made soldiers of the Irish:’ but the little Fort of Newry drove away 1800 Irish, and it never was attacked again. Consider now, whether any thing is requisite in such a nation as this, but unanimity. When the Account is brought into order, you will know your state, what is past, and for the future. When you have found all out, I hope you will not leave a man criminal unpunished in the government. If you find any man who lies lurking for a change, or is unfit to be employed in the government, remove him.

Mr. Hampden. It seems a State of the Account is desired, from the time the prince of Orange took the administration of the government. I would have all the Accounts, and explained; they are not all in one hand, but you may deduce it to every man. Things may be obscure; though gentlemen understand Accounts, as the way of the Treasury, a man may be puzzled in a merchant’s book. There is an Abstract ready of the Accounts, when you desire it.

Mr. Garraway. I am very glad of this debate, ‘to consider the State of the Nation.’ I thought to have heard of foreign affairs, of Ireland, our Allies, and Scotland, and now all ends in Accounts. If you will do no more, let us consider in the house how to raise Money to conquer Ireland; but pray consider how we came into this ill condition, and how to get out of it. Consider Scotland: I have seen some papers why foreign Forces are there; and I have seen papers why the parliament of Scotland was put off: this confirms me what should defend us from France and Ireland. I am not against taking Accounts, as is moved; but, if you will, I will make you a motion; I will tune myself to give no offence. As for the Account of Ireland, I am sure it is a wild one. I would know when a muster was taken, and what Account was given to the king; and then consider what men have perished, and how the Muster-Rolls are filled up. It is said, ‘there are but 7000 men in England;’ I am so fond of the Church of England-men, that I would not spend one of them in a war. When you have fixed on a Head, I will do you the best service I can.

Mr. Hampden, jun. The business of parliament is not this of Accounts, where we can never come to the bottom. Two things a parliament can do; give Money, the great support, and persons to be employed next about it: I never saw a parliament do any thing else to purpose. I am afraid, if some of the persons continue, we shall not find people to lend money, nor know how to raise it. It is a man’s own fault to suffer men to ruin him that have ruined him before. Look into your books, and you will find those now employed, voted ‘enemies to the king and kingdom, and favourers of Popery.’ If those parliaments were mistaken, it is strange! And hindering this king, who was come to deliver us, and bantering this king—That these three men who came to Hungerford from king James,* should be the three greatest men in England, I leave the world to judge. When Portugal set up the duke of Braganza, and freed themselves from the Spaniard, did they employ the king of Spain’s ministers? Did Henry the 4th of France make use of those of the League for his ministers? The Hollanders, when they were redeemed from Popery and slavery, did not employ the duke of Alva’s ministers. If we must be ruined again, let it be by new men. I fear, the condition of the French king is not rightly represented to us; now he is providing stores for his ships, if we take wrong measures, and are mistaken, it may be of fatal consequence. The rebellion in Ireland might have been easily stopped at first. I am for the parliament doing what they can do to advise the king to take good men, and fresh men about him. I am not for naming any, but for such as have not ruined us already, and not Commissioners, who would persuade the prince of Orange to go out of England.*

* “The marquis of Halifax, the earl of Nottingham, and lord Godolphin, were ordered to go to the prince, and ask him, what it was that he demanded.” Burnet.

* "The member that spoke the loudest on this occasion was Mr. Hampden, jun. who, though his life had been in danger under the preceding reign, though both he and his father had much contributed to the late Revolution, and though both were in favour with the present king, yet made a long speech against those that had the management of affairs, by saying, he could not but wonder to see those very persons in the ministry whom the late king James had employed, even when his affairs were most desperate, to treat with the (then) prince of Orange. He alledged the example of William first prince of Orange, who never made use of the duke of Alva's ministers; of Hen. 4. of France, who never employed those of his competitor the duke of Mayenne, and of several other princes: and moved for an Address, to desire his majesty to remove the persons he had marked out, from his presence and councils. This speech might, perhaps, have made an impression on the minds of some members, but because at the same time he complained, that several Commonwealths-men were employed by the government, the house, who knew both him, his father, and their predecessors, to have ever adhered to the Republican party, broke out immediately into a general laughter. As soon as the commons had recovered their gravity, several members stood up in defence of the illustrious persons on whom Mr. Hampden had reflected, alledging, that the reason why they had been deputed to the prince of Orange was, not because they were in king James's interest, but rather, because they had all along disapproved his majesty's conduct, and as such, had the general approbation of the nation, and were most likely to be agreeable to his highness.—The same day sir Thomas Clarges represented to the commons, that it was dangerous to bring so many foreign troops into the kingdom, and that it was both safer and more expeditious to employ Englishmen in the reduction of Ireland. He supported his opinion by the example of Cromwell, whose English troops not only had a natural antipathy against the Irish, but likewise a constant ascendant over them; but somebody very justly replied, That Cromwell's army was composed of well-trained, weather-beaten soldiers, whereas the present English forces were made up of raw, undisciplined men. Sir Thomas Clarges made this motion, upon a false report that besides the 7000 Danes, the king had sent for 8000 more, either from Hanover or Sir Christ. Musgrave. I find, all this debate is contrary to your intent, and terminates in nothing but casting up Accounts, summa totalis, to give more Money. I am glad to hear from an honourable person, (Lowther) 'That the French king is not so great as represented, and cannot support the War a year.' I am glad our condition is so much mended; but it is worthy your consideration not to let the safety of the nation depend on Foreigners. We are in a state of war, and I would therefore see our allies, what they are we must trust to; but, notwithstanding this representation of France, I believe him a potent enemy, and therefore I would see our allies that we are to depend upon: and next, the condition of the Army, what it is, and then naturally will come before you the numbers, whether they are sufficient to protect you. As for the Accounts, upon any motion of the house, you may make a new Committee to inspect them. What our armies are, and what our allies, not what they are in paper, but what are dead, and how filled up:—pray keep us strictly to that debate.

Mr. Hampden, jun. When the stomach is well rectified, all the juices will be well rectified. I meddle not with the government. I am not for a Commonwealth, in the posture now of affairs we are in. I am for removing those who were of king James's council, and who would have persuaded the prince of Orange to return.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The motions are so general, that no question can be put. 'For those that came to treat with the prince of Orange, (without naming any persons, or what they have done) to be removed,' is a strange motion.

Mr. Foley. I would as willingly pass by what has been done, as any man; but the management has not been from ignorance, but treachery. I would let the king know what our fears are, leaving it to his wisdom and discretion, without naming persons.

Sir Edward Seymour. I shall preface my discourse with something of Order, which I find not well observed. When exception is taken at what falls from any gentleman, possibly the latter part of his discourse may explain the former. We are to consider 'the State of the Nation,' which I take to be very ill; whether by ignorance of those that manage affairs, or favour to king James, I shall not determine. Whether we look into Scotland, the Navy, the Army, or abroad, you will find it in ill condition. If the same hands still manage the government, either king James, or a worse thing, may come amongst us. We have no part of the executive authority of the government, but we may advise the king. To me it is all one whether we be undone by the disciples of Hugh, or the converts of father Peters; by the Counsellors of king James, or the Favourites of king William; I say, it is too well known, too bare-faced, that some are setting up for, Sweden." Life of king William, vol. ii. p. 163, 164.

‘The Keepers of the Liberties of England,’ rather than the Monarchy of England. The general scheme of the State of the Nation is as much as we can represent to the king. I will urge that part no farther; those who seem to avoid it have laboured to increase it. Does any man believe, that, if the War be carried on by the same hands, you will not have the same success? It is not in our power to remedy the Miscarriages, but it is to represent them to the king to be remedied. I know not what means ‘a Representation of persons to the king that went down to the prince of Orange:’ possibly, it was the best thing they ever did, to mediate peace. You have matters enough to represent, the matter of the Navy, the Army, &c. The king very well knows who have done it; who have lost his honour, and spent his treasure: and I move for a Representation of this kind.

Col. Tipping. I wonder any man should vindicate any persons that would mediate for king James; they cannot wish well to the present Government: and I move you to declare king James an irreconcilable enemy to the kingdom.

Sir John Trevor. I would leave all to the king’s wisdom. We come not here to give him rules whom to suspect, and whom not to suspect. He is not to give a reason for that suspicion.

Sir Tho. Lee. For the little share I have in management of affairs, I speak with no envy or fear; I can justify myself as an honest man. I have sat 30 years in parliament, and I ever thought ‘the keepers of the liberties of England,’ the best preservation of England; that is, the king, lords, and commons. When London was fired, balls were suspected to be thrown about; and those that cried ‘fire’ out loudest, threw fire-balls about. We are now making a representation of Miscarriages, a noise over the nation: I am concerned for the king; as if the kingdom was put into the last degree of despair, and we tell him not where it is, and will not tell him, and leave him to find it out. In Ch. 2’s time, this was said to be ‘Talking the Government out of doors.’ Show him the fault, and the persons, and not in generals, lest you throw out the king and the kingdom together.

Resolved, “That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, to lay before him the ill Conduct and Success of our Affairs, in reference to Ireland, the Armies, and Fleet; and humbly to desire his majesty, That he will please to take it into his consideration, and, in his wisdom, to find out the Authors of Miscarriages, and to appoint Affairs to be managed by persons unsuspected, and more to the safety of his majesty, and satisfaction of his subjects.”

Farther Proceedings on the Bill of Rights.] This Bill passed the commons without any opposition; and being sent to the lords, they justly considering how far king James had gone towards introducing the Popish Religion into the nation, took special care to prevent the like for the future, by adding a clause to the Bill, “That the kings and queens of England should be obliged, at their coming to the crown, to take the Test in the first parliament that should be called at the beginning of their reign; and that if any king or queen of England should embrace the Roman Catholic religion, or marry with a Roman Catholic prince or princess, their subjects should be absolved of their allegiance; and that the crown and government of these realms should from time to time descend to, and be enjoyed by such persons, being Protestants, as should have inherited the same, in case the said persons so reconciled to the Church of Rome, or marrying a Papist as aforesaid, were naturally dead.” This remarkable clause passed without any opposition or debate, which, considering the great importance of it, was very surprising*.

Upon the third reading of this Bill a Rider was offered to be added, “That all Pardons upon an Impeachment of the house of commons are hereby declared to be null and void, except it be with the consent of both houses of parliament.” After long debate, this question was put, Whether this Rider shall be made part of the bill? It was resolved in the negative, Content 17, Not content 50.

Protest thereon.] Before the putting the aforesaid question, the lords following desired leave to enter their Dissents, if it were carried in the negative, and accordingly do enter their Dissents in these Reasons following: “1. Because to impeach being the undoubted Right of the Commons of England, and by which alone justice can be had against offenders that are too big for the ordinary courts of justice, Impeachments would be rendered altogether ineffectual, if the king can pardon in such cases. 2. Because such a power of pardoning would cause a failure of justice, which the law of England will not allow of in any case. 3. Because the government becomes precarious, when there is wanting a sufficient power to punish evil ministers of state, the bringing of such ministers to justice being then a matter of grace, and not of right. 4. Because such evil ministers are in a much securer condition than any other offenders, it being the interest of ill-disposed kings to protect them from justice, since they are so much the more useful and necessary to such kings, by how much they have been instrumental in subverting the government. 5. Because the king can only pardon such offences as are against himself, but not in case of an appeal, nor wherever the wrong or injury is to a third person. 6. A fortiori, the king cannot pardon an Impeachment, because all the commons of England have an interest in it, and it is at their suit. 7. Because it is inconsistent with the government of England to vest a power any where, that may obstruct the public justice. 8. Because such a power of pardoning sets the king’s prerogative above the government, which is inconsistent with the reason and nature of this constitution. 9. Because the rejecting of the Rider, and the Vote of this house against the Dispensing Power in general, do not seem to be very consistent, since the power of pardoning upon Impeachments is altogether as great as that of a Dispensing Power. (Signed) Macclesfield, Ossulstone, Bolton, Delamer, Cornwallis, Bath, J. Lovelace, R. Montagu, Herbert, Stamford, Granville, Crewe."

* Tindal.

The Speaker's Speech to the King on presenting the Bill of Rights.] Dec. 16. This day the king came to the house of peers, and gave his consent to the Land Tax Bill, and the Bill of Rights and Succession. Upon which occasion, the Speaker of the house of commons addressed his majesty as follows:

"May it please your majesty, your dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons in this present parliament assembled, taking into consideration the great and necessary Expences your majesty will sustain in the prosecution of the War wherein your majesty is now engaged, did, at their first meeting in this present session, unanimously agree to present your majesty with a Supply of two millions, the greatest part of which they resolved to charge upon their lands, as the most speedy and effectual way of raising present money for this occasion; but, finding that great Abuses had been committed in assessing the late Supply of the like nature, they have endeavoured to provide against those abuses in raising of this present tax; the consideration whereof hath taken up much of their time, and produced a Bill of an unusual length, which I now offer to your majesty's gracious acceptance.—They have likewise agreed upon a Bill for declaring of their Rights and Liberties, which were so notoriously violated in the late reign; humbly desiring your majesty to give life to it by the royal assent, that so it may remain, not only as a security to them from the like attempts hereafter, but be a lasting monument to all posterity, of what they owe to your majesty for their Deliverance."

THE BILL OF RIGHTS.

The following is a copy of this memorable Bill:

An ACT declaring the RIGHTS and LIBERTIES of the SUBJECT, and settling the SUCCESSION of the CROWN.

"Whereas the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, assembled at Westminster lawfully, fully, and freely representing all the estates of the people of this realm, did upon the 13th of February, in the year of our Lord 1688, present unto their majesties, then called and known by the names and stile of William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, being present in their proper persons, a certain Declaration in writing, made by the said lords and commons, in the words following; viz.

"Whereas the late king James the 2nd by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, Judges and Ministers employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant Religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom. 1. By assuming and exercising a power of dispensing with and suspending of laws and the execution of laws, without consent of parliament. 2. By committing and prosecuting divers worthy prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excused from concurring to the said assumed power. 3. By issuing and causing to be executed a commission under the great seal for erecting a court called, The Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes. 4. By levying money for and to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the same was granted by parliament. 5. By raising and keeping a Standing Army within this kingdom in time of peace, without consent of parliament, and quartering soldiers, contrary to law. 6. By causing several good subjects, being Protestants, to be disarmed, at the same time when Papists were both armed and employed, contrary to law. 7. By violating the freedom of election of members to serve in parliament. 8. By prosecutions in the court of King's-bench, for matters and causes cognizable only in parliament; and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses. 9. And whereas of late years, partial, corrupt, and unqualified persons, have been returned and served on juries in trials, and particularly divers jurors in trials for High Treason, which were not freeholders. 10. And excessive bail hath been required of persons committed in criminal cases, to elude the benefit of the laws made for the liberty of the subjects. 11. And excessive fines have been imposed; and illegal and cruel punishments inflicted. 12. And several grants and promises made of fines and forfeitures, before any conviction or judgment against the persons, upon whom the same were to be levied. All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes, and freedom of this realm."

"And whereas the said late king James the 2nd having abdicated the government, and the throne being thereby vacant, his highness the prince of Orange (whom it hath pleased Almighty God to make the glorious instrument of delivering this kingdom from Popery and arbitrary power) did (by the advice of the lords spiritual and temporal, and divers principal persons of the commons) cause letters to be written to the lords spiritual and temporal, being Protestants; and other letters to the several counties, cities, universities, boroughs, and cinque-ports, for the choosing of such persons to represent them, as were of right to be sent to parliament, to meet and sit at Westminster upon the 22nd day of January in this year 1688, in order to such an establishment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties might not again be in danger of being subverted: Upon which letters, elections having been accordingly made, And thereupon the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, pursuant to their respective letters and elections, being now assembled in a full and free representative of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid; do in the first place (as their ancestors in like case have usually done) for the vindicating and asserting their antient rights and liberties, declare;

‘1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal. 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal. 3. That the Commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other Commissions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious. 4. That levying money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time, or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal. 5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal. 6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law. 7. That the subjects which are Protestants, may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law. 8. That election of members of parliament ought to be free. 9. That the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament. 10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. 11. That jurors ought to be duly impanelled and returned; and jurors which pass upon men in trials for High Treason ought to be freeholders. 12. That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction, are illegal and void. 13. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently.

“And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties; and that no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example. To which demand of their rights they are particularly encouraged by the declaration of his highness the prince of Orange, as being the only means for obtaining a full redress and remedy therein. Having therefore an entire confidence, that his said highness the prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve them from the violation of their rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties;

2. The said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons assembled at Westminster, do resolve, That William and Mary prince and princess of Orange be, and be declared, king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to them the said prince and princess during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the regal power be only in, and executed by the said prince of Orange, in the names of the said prince and princess, during their joint lives; and after their deceases, the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the said princess, and for default of such issue to the princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue to the heirs of the body of the said prince of Orange. And the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, do pray the said prince and princess to accept the same accordingly.

3. And that the oaths hereafter mentioned be taken by all persons of whom the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might be required by law, instead of them; and that the said Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy be abrogated.

‘I, A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance, to their majesties king William and queen Mary: So help me God.’

‘I, A. B. do swear, That I do from my heart, abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, “That princes excommunicated, or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever.” And I do declare, That no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm: So help me God.’

4. Upon which their said majesties did accept the crown and royal dignity of the kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, according to the resolution and desire of the said lords and commons contained in the said Declaration.

5. And thereupon their majesties were pleased, that the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, being the two houses of parliament, should continue to sit, and with their majesties royal concurrence make effectual provision for the settlement of the religion, laws, and liberties of this kingdom, so that the same for the future might not be in danger again of being subverted; to which the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, did agree, and proceed to act accordingly.

6. Now, in pursuance of the premises, the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, for the ratifying, confirming and establishing the said Declaration, and the articles, clauses, matters, and things therein contained, by the force of a law, made in due form by authority of parliament, do pray that it may be declared and enacted, that all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said Declaration, are the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom, and so shall be esteemed, allowed, adjudged, deemed, and taken to be, and that all and every the particulars aforesaid shall be firmly and strictly holden and observed, as they are expressed in the said Declaration; and all officers and ministers whatsoever shall serve their majesties and their successors according to the same in all times to come.

7. And the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, seriously considering how it hath pleased Almighty God, in his marvellous providence, and merciful goodness to this nation, to provide and preserve their said majesties royal persons most happily to reign over us upon the throne of their ancestors, for which they render unto him from the bottom of their hearts, their humblest thanks and praises, do truly, firmly, assuredly, and in the sincerity of their hearts, think, and do hereby recognize, acknowledge and declare, that king James the second having abdicated the government, and their majesties having accepted the crown and royal dignity as aforesaid, their said majesties did become, were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign leige lord and lady, king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whose princely persons the royal state, crown, and dignity of the said realms, with all honours, stiles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, are most fully, rightfully, and entirely invested and incorporated, united and annexed.

8. And for preventing all questions and divisions in this realm, by reason of any pretended titles to the crown, and for preserving a certainty in the Succession thereof, in and upon which the unity, peace, tranquillity, and safety of this nation doth, under God, wholly consist and depend, the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, do beseech their majesties that it may be enacted, established and declared, that the crown and regal government of the said kingdoms and dominions, with all and singular the premises thereunto belonging and appertaining, shall be and continue to their said majesties, and the survivor of them, during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them: and that the entire, perfect, and full exercise of the regal power and government be only in, and executed by his majesty, in the names of both their majesties during their joint lives; and after their deceases the said crown and premises shall be and remain to the heirs of the body of her majesty; and for default of such issue, to her royal highness the princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of his said majesty: and thereunto the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, do, in the name of all the people aforesaid, most humbly and faithfully submit themselves, their heirs and posterities for ever; and do faithfully promise, that they will stand to, maintain, and defend their said majesties, and also the limitation and succession of the crown herein specified and contained, to the utmost of their powers, with their lives and estates, against all persons whatsoever, that shall attempt any thing to the contrary.

9. And whereas it hath been found by experience, that it is inconsistent with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom, to be governed by a Popish prince, or by any king or queen marrying a Papist; the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, do further pray that it may be enacted, that all and every person and persons that is, are, or shall be reconciled to, or shall hold communion with, the see or church of Rome, or shall profess the Popish religion, or shall marry a Papist, shall be excluded, and be for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the crown and government of this realm, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, or any part of the same, or to have, use, or exercise any regal power, authority, or jurisdiction within the same; and in all and every such case or cases the people of these realms shall be, and are hereby absolved of their allegiance; and the said crown and government shall from time to time descend to, and be enjoyed by such person or persons, being Protestants, as should have inherited and enjoyed the same, in case the said person or persons so reconciled, holding communion, or professing, or marrying as aforesaid, were naturally dead.

10. And that every king and queen of this realm, who at any time hereafter shall come to and succeed in the imperial crown of this kingdom, shall on the first day of the meeting of the first parliament, next after his or her coming to the crown, sitting in his or her throne in the house of peers, in the presence of the lords and commons therein assembled, or at his or her coronation, before such person or persons who shall administer the coronation oath to him or her, at the time of his or her taking the said oath (which shall first happen) make, subscribe, and audibly repeat the Declaration mentioned in the statute made in the 30th year of the reign of king Charles 2, intituled, 'An act for the more effectual preserving the king's person and government, by disabling Papists from sitting in either house of parliament.' But if it shall happen, that such king or queen, upon his or her succession to the crown of this realm, shall be under the age of twelve years, then every such king or queen shall make, subscribe, and audibly repeat the said declaration at his or her coronation, or the first day of the meeting of the first parliament as aforesaid, which shall first happen after such king or queen shall have attained the said age of twelve years.

11. All which their majesties are contented and pleased shall be declared, enacted, and established by authority of this present parliament, and shall stand, remain, and be the law of this realm for ever; and the same are by their said majesties, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, declared, enacted, and established accordingly.

12. And be it further declared and enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after this present session of parliament, no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute, or any part thereof, shall be allowed, but that the same shall be held void and of no effect, except a dispensation be allowed of in such statute, and except in such cases as shall be specially provided for by one or more bill or bills to be passed during this present session of parliament.

13. Provided that no charter, or grant, or pardon, granted before the 23rd day of October in the year of our Lord 1689, shall be any ways impeached or invalidated by this act, but that the same shall be and remain of the same force and effect in law, and no other, than as if this act had never been made.*

Dec. 16. The Speaker of the commons acquainted the house, That he had received a packet from commissary Shales wherein was inclosed a Letter from him, giving an Account of his proceedings, since he came into that employment; together with a Petition to this house; praying, that he may be released from his confinement, and permitted to come over into England, to clear himself from those matters which he is charged with. Which Letter and Petition were delivered in, and read at the table.—Resolved, “That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, that commissary Shales may be sent for over in custody, with all convenient speed; and that all his Papers may be brought over with him: and that his majesty be acquainted with the said Letter and Petition.”

Debate on the Bill for continuing the Revenue for a Year.] Dec. 17. Mr. Hampden reports several Amendments to the Bill for continuing the collecting the public Revenue for a year.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. The matter before you is of great importance. I cannot agree, &c. to the Amendment of the Bill not to be determined by the ordinary rules of Westminster-Hall, but by the government. There is a known Hereditary Revenue, and settled by act of parliament. When king James abdicated the government, there was a cessure of the Revenue, and it abated; but when you filled the throne, such as had legal grants, they were not determined; I know not, whether they can receive the Revenue, but it is all the reason in the world that the crown should have a certain subsistence by revenue. I think, such a thing as the Revenue is not to be taken from the crown by implication. If the Chimney-Money must be gone by the Abdication, you needed not to have made an Act to take it away. If you continue the words ‘and no longer,’ I fear, they will not only affect the crown, but the subjects too, that have had Grants.

Sir Wm. Williams. To stop the mouths of people, we are providing laws against ill men, and for ill times, and therefore it was thought convenient to put in the words ‘and no longer.’ As to the new Revenue, the Customs and Excise, some part of the revenue follows the crown, as the shadow the body; but to say, therefore, all the revenue does so, is no consequence. Qualify that supposed Hereditary Revenue from the other, and I agree to it. Says Pulteney, ‘This may shake Grants;’ but if they be good grants by common-law, or statute-law, it shakes no more but what you would have shaken.

Mr. Finch. I rise up to acquaint you how I apprehended the Revenue to be in 1688. When you come to say, ‘That the Revenue shall be collected for one year, and no longer,’ you determine the Hereditary Revenue. I think we have declaration upon declaration, and that matter is pretty well at peace in you. If you put in the words ‘for one year, and no longer,’ you determine it. In the Chimney-Bill, if the Revenue had determined, you needed not that Act. If the Court of Wards was an hereditary revenue, then that granted in lieu of the Court of Wards, must be an hereditary revenue. Thompson says, ‘No man will say, the Court of Wards was part of the king’s revenue;’ but it is the king’s tenure, and

* “It was at this time suggested in all companies, that the present Settlement was illegal and unjustifiable: that king James would shortly return with a powerful army, and settle things on a right foundation: that the interest of the Church of England was involved with that of king James, and the one could not subsist without the restoration of the other. As these insinuations were countenanced by some of the clergy, bishop Burnet wrote a Pastoral Letter to those of his diocese, concerning the allegiance due to William and Mary, in which, among other topics, he uses that of the Right of Conquest, which had been always declined by the king, who chose to receive the crown by the determination of the people, as more agreeable to his Declaration. This Pastoral Letter (with another of Charles Blunt, more full to the same purpose) was burnt three years after, by order of the parliament then sitting. A little before the publication of the Bishop’s Letter, a Libel was dispersed by the disaffected, called, ‘A short history of the Convention, or new-christened Parliament,’ against which a proclamation was issued, May 7, promising the reward of 100*l.* for the discovery of the author, printer or publisher.” Tindal.

he has the profit of the lands and wards. For taking away the Grants upon the Revenue, he is for taking away the Revenue wholly.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would willingly have the long robe inform us, whether those Grants for Ch. 2.'s and James's life, continue for the king's life? If each of them subsist, this Act is wholly unnecessary. As to what Finch says of the Chimney Money, why did the parliament, 3 Ch. 1. mention 'Quartering of soldiers,' in the Petition of Right? I would make use of this debate. If any of them be out, all are out. The Court of Wards, which was exchanged, was ancient in the crown, but I question whether the crown had a right to dispose of wardships before they fall.

Mr. Finch. In the Petition of Right, one part is declaring an old law, and another is making a new. The king grants a wardship cum acciderit, and that answers Lee.

Sir George Treby. To these words 'No longer.' The operation of these two words is to take away all the inheritance of the crown. To answer Lee's question, the king might release the tenures of inheritance of profit, that he had by the tenure, as he did wardships to the town of Yarmouth. If the king can grant this, he may grant what is in lieu of it. In the former bill, which is the pattern of this, there was some scruple made, whether they could safely collect it, (as if it was a new thing that kings have abdicated, and given up their crown before death.) All the nicety was upon collecting the Customs and Excise 'during king James's life.' Some were for the political life, others for the natural; this had some doubt for the sake of the officers, and therefore the Act was entitled, 'For the better collecting the Public Revenue.' It was said, and with great approbation, 'We have Judges for life, and salaries, &c. how could that be, if it was not supposed the Revenue was not hereditary?' You go on, and say, 'The king had not only delivered you from Popery and slavery, but you yielded to give the king thanks, for releasing the Chimney Money.' The appropriating some of the Revenue to pay Ch. 2.'s servants, and the Money to the States General, by it you suppose the subsisting of the Revenue, and you applied it to these uses. All prerogatives and advantages whatsoever follow the crown, and if they have the crown, they have all that belong to the crown. I think it strange, when a bill is brought in to satisfy a doubt, when, indeed, there was none; but to grant a Revenue, and charge it when you have done—will you determine the whole Revenue without hearing counsel for the king?

Sir W. Williams. Certainly some part of the Revenue is not alienable, and, no doubt, on the other side, the king may extinguish his Wardships, by a release; but, whether the king may alien his inheritance of Wardships, is another subject: I doubt it much.

Sir John Trevor. The exception is a good exception, and I must apply something to the one and to the other. I do agree, that 'No longer,' extends to all the revenue; that part hereditary and temporary too: I hope you will not apply the same words to both. Under favour, this is a new government: I will not deny my opinion: It was so in all broken times. In Edw. 2.'s time, &c. Edw. 3. took all the revenue, being in possession of the crown. Hen. 4. and Edw. 4. took it; and the Revenue continues when the crown is upon any man's head. The opinion has been in Westminster-hall, 'That the Revenue continues,' and the Customs were paid after the death of Charles 2. Unless you put the words 'no longer' in negative words, and let it go so.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. If Trevor's doctrine be true, we do grant this away for ever, by the words of the Act. In the Customs, the Grant lasts for life, and no longer, and no doubt of it. Now, for the Revenue granted for king James's life, whether it lasts longer than his reign? The Revenue of the crown of England is granted as in the king's politic capacity as to an incorporation. This will be of so terrible a consequence, that, I hope, you will leave out the words 'No longer.'

Sir John Trevor. I did not broach that doctrine. I use not to broach doctrines. I said, 'That it was the opinion in Westminster-hall, in king James's time;' and, 'that unless you put negative words in the Grant—it was subsisting.' If the words were necessary then, they are as necessary now. The Revenue was collected in king James's and after Charles 2.'s time.

Mr. Garraway. I think Trevor in the right. There was a Grant of the Customs of the Currants in Ch. 1.'s time; several were imprisoned for not paying the duties, though granted for years only. The expedient may be in the end of the Bill, viz. 'That this shall last for one year, and no longer,' and so leave it as you found it, and you'll do no hurt.—The Amendments were rejected.

Debate on the Clause in the Revenue Bill for saving Princess Anne's Patent, or Grant, &c.]

Mr. Boscawen. I have as high an esteem for the prince and princess of Denmark, as any man; and I would be understood not to speak with reflection. For the first part of the Clause, the committee had no power to confirm the Patent. To confirm this, implies a diffidence in the king and queen. If the Hereditary Revenue be not fallen, it is still in being.

Mr. Hampden. Your instruction to the committee was nothing but 'To provide a Pension for princess Anne for a whole year;' and this Clause is not brought in according to that.

Sir Henry Capel. I hear there is a patent for this Pension, but to take notice of it here, is an extraordinary thing, and the improperest thing to be joined with this Bill; it is joining brass to clay, and not justifiable in the nature of it. There is an expression in the paper, which is an interdictive to the second clause of the Bill: What authority that honourable lord (Cornbury) has to bring it in, I know not; but I am sure he ought to have good warrants. If your hands are tied up to such a clause, where is the money to be received? In the Excise Office? I do not know more Exchequers than one. Have a care; by the course of the government of the Exchequer, any man may know what the receipts are, and see how money goes out; at the Excise Office they will not show their books. This may be a countenance to other Grants of king James, which, I hope, you will not allow. Upon the whole, I think it much better to lay this aside wholly. I would do that which should express respect and bounty, but this is not a proper time. In this great Revolution, this prince and princess were great instruments in delivering us from popery and slavery. 'Tis true, we are delivered from popery and slavery here, but there is another kingdom that lies under it: Now every body, the very farmer, retrenches in his family, and trade is grown low, but when it is a proper time, no man shall be more ready to increase the princess's revenue than myself; but I do say, there may be a time when the hearts of people will go more with such a thing, and, I believe, it will be more acceptable to this prince and princess. This is very surprizing: as to our constitution of the Exchequer, I would have it be more consonant to the government, that there may be no gift of money here but to the crown. Let the preamble mention all respect imaginable, that the arrears may be paid, and address the king for a Revenue for the prince and princess, for this year, such as the king shall judge necessary, this exigency of affairs of the kingdom considered; and hereafter it may be thought of; and, in the mean time, address to the king to this purpose.

Mr. Foley. I think here are two exceptions not to be answered. The first is, I think this Clause was not brought in according to order. This clause confirms the letters patent to the princess, and the heirs of her body, and that is against the order, the Bill being but temporary. Next, I hope, though the merits of this princess be great, yet that you will not break orders of parliament, when the letters patent were never read, which, by this Clause, you confirm, whether good, or no, and you know nothing that is contained in them.

Sir Tho. Clarges. There is little difference betwixt this grand committee and the house, only that in this the Speaker is not in the chair. Your order is, 'To provide for the prince and princess for one whole year,' and the patents are confirmed but for a year, and no more. I take it, this patent was possessed and legally invested in her. But 'that, without reading the patents, you cannot confirm them,' that is a mistake. In the parliament of Henry 8. and Edw. 6. where letters patent were granted from such and such a prince to such a time, it is impossible they should be all read. By the statute for confirmation of all cathedrals, and colleges, from Henry 3rd's time to Henry 8. they were all confirmed. It is said, 'That now it is not a seasonable time:' but is it not seasonable that the prince and princess, and the duke of Gloucester, should have meat, drink, and cloaths? This revenue is not very extraordinary, considering their quality. We are not to say here, 'That the king was not consulted in this.' I hope it will never be admitted, that we should take instructions from the king to pass bills here. There was 24,000*l.* a year charged on the post-office for the duke of York, in lieu of the charge upon the Excise, and the Exchequer never took fee of it. I think this is so just and so honourable to their merits, who forsook all their pomp, father and mother, for our laws and liberties, with their lives too, in this Revolution, that I would agree to the Clause.

Mr. Hampden. I think this very hard, to pay this 70,000*l.* this year: in the state you are in, it is a very great hardship to the king and kingdom. I shall deal as generously in the offices I am in, as any man that would be in office. I meddle not with this patent; I think it a good patent, but not regular to confirm it here. You charge this branch of the Revenue with this; will you say the king shall receive for his Civil List the other part? The queen then has not received this 70,000*l.* If it be looked into, you shall see what is done. You have granted 2*s.* per pound, &c. and the king has liberty, by that Act, to take up 300,000*l.* He has but betwixt this and Saturday next to take it up, and I guess very largely if there be 100,000*l.* and that is to pay Ireland, and Holland, and the Army here. How much will be left of your 2*s.* per pound? The Excise that goes out, suppose 14,000*l.* per week, that must go towards paying this. The Customs are 200,000*l.* per ann. less this year than formerly, and here is all to maintain what I have told you. This is a melancholy prospect. I move, to have the letters patent recited, and this Clause recommitted, and so much as they have by the patent to be received, and no more.

Mr. Ettrick. I know not that the methods of the Exchequer are more broken by this, than by privy seals; but the most weighty objection is, want of money. As for Capel's joining 'brass with clay,' I am sorry Capel's opinion is, that no part of it is hereditary; we should have gone a little farther, had it not been for the necessity, viz. the whole Revenue that was formerly the duke of York's.

Col. Birch. My affections at that time did, in a great measure, captivate my reason. Since that, we have had time to sleep, and my affections stand as high as ever they did. As to this Patent, the question is, Whether this debate, as the case stands, is seasonable? I cannot but admire at my own weakness when they all agree (and something gives them cause that I do not see.) I would do no prejudice to this Patent, but I would augment the princess's revenue; but can any body say, this is seasonable? Now our condition is low, will this turn to sense, to be so lavish to throw away 40,000*l.* per ann. when the king wants for his and our protection? Is this like to create a good understanding with the king? Give me leave to go a little farther: I would lay aside the whole Clause, and represent to the king the condition of the princess. The duchess of Cleveland had a pension on the Excise; I told her, 'It could not be, for it was contrary to law, and she must go to the Exchequer.' I never made up any Account from the Excise but to the Exchequer, neither can I. Our necessities are beyond expression. I cannot answer it, but to lay aside this Clause, and go to the king, &c.

Sir Robert Cotton. This debate is, as if 20 or 30,000*l.* would save, or lose, the kingdom. The duke of Schomberg was taken notice of in particular, and had 20,000*l.* paid him, for his great generosity in coming over. King James withdrew the princess's exhibition for some time, and now it would be hard to lessen it.

Mr. Hampden, jun. For want of union in royal families, ill men have made use of it, and have either ruined, or given a great shake to them. There was a good understanding betwixt Lewis 13, and his brother, the duke of Orleans, who had a great appanage: one abbot Rivier was about the duke of Orleans; what use made they of this? It proved the effusion of a great deal of blood in France. This king of France (a great politician) never gave his brother such a revenue, but a dependent revenue; and he has lived well and easily with him, but dependent upon him. I know no other way, but to compare the past with the present. We know how in England the contest was kept up between the houses of York and Lancaster. The princess has contributed very much to this Revolution; therefore I would put no difference in the royal family. There was a motion, 'That the queen might have 100,000*l.* per ann. distinct from the king;' but the queen was willing to be without it. This queen's revenue is anticipated, and yet she sits still without this. The duke of Schomberg had a considerable sum given him, and do you think that the king and the queen will not have more affection for their sister, than for duke Schomberg? I would lay aside the Clause.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. The proviso is of two parts; one to confirm letters patent, and the other for an additional Revenue for the princess. It is said, 'It was never the intention of the house that the letters patent should be declared good, and, therefore, not to be considered.' If they were not referred to the committee, no notice can be taken of them. I have heard of an attain, and men never answered to it, condemned unheard, and so of patents: I have heard the patents read, and, I believe, if they had been settled in the name of another man, they would have been much more for their advantage and satisfaction. Therefore that is one reason why I would not read them. It has been said, 'We are not to ask the king's mind what to do here;' but if any man take upon him to say, 'It is the king's mind,' we ought to enquire whether it be true. We have Messages from the king on other occasions, and why not on this? In the case of the duke of York's Grant, &c. there was a contract brought into the house betwixt the king and the duke. No man can more honour the prince and princess, or is more highly sensible of her quitting her king, and father, than I, when I consider she had heard so much of divine right from the clergy. Granting a revenue, by act of parliament, to a subject, is always dangerous in this house. Though that of the king and the duke was a contract expressly recited, 'Such letters patent as the king should hereafter grant;' yet it gave power in the act, to the king, to make that settlement; and I hope, it will be always done with the same security to the king, and satisfaction to the people. Here is a necessity of providing for the royal family. The crown has always taken care of the several branches of it, by offices, &c. and nothing can make all the royal branches depend upon the royal family more. The king must retrench, and so large a proportion to one of the royal family! I hope the princess may have many dukes, a large and a numerous issue, and that a revenue may be provided for them; but for so large a revenue to be granted now, by the precedent of the duke of York, is of dangerous consequence, and was the beginning of our miseries that we afterwards felt.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I wonder now, and it is matter of surprize to me, not to agree with the committee. The objection is, the irregularity of the Proviso; I say it is regular, and, if it was otherwise, it is irregular. How can we provide for the princess, and leave the patent doubtful? It is objected, 'It was never known that a patent was confirmed, and never read;' it was offered to be read, and now made use of as if he had an act of parliament for it, and it tumbled down the stairs. If you will lay the act of parliament, in the excise, a good payment, without the exchequer, it is good, and they dare not deny the payment. Having gone thus far, I have one argument, that if those who have done and suffered so much for the Protestant Religion, shall not have marks of your favour, I hope they shall of your justice.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I think, Seymour has spent so much time in the West, [He had been long absent] and as Speaker of the house, that he has not had time to read history.

Sir Edw. Seymour. At least, I hope to make better use of what I have read than that gentleman.

Mr. Finch. If the duke of York, the heir presumptive of the crown, engaged in an interest against the kingdom, should have such a Grant; sure that has greater force when persons support your laws and liberties. Which way should this Proviso have been brought in? Will you include or exclude these patents? If you exclude the patent, you must mention the patent. It was said, 'If they are not good, you ought to make them good by law;' and I desire this law may do it. It is said to be 'of dangerous consequence to provide for the king's children; if the parliament will not, and the king cannot, how shall they be provided for?

Mr. Hawles. When Charles 5, in his will, gave great portions to his children, cardinal Guimeni said, 'If you provide thus, your son may set up for himself.'

Mr. Godolphin. I am for agreeing to the Proviso. It is said, 'This is not agreeable to your order.' By rule, when you grant Money you are to go into a committee of the whole house; and that is an objection against the whole bill. The method proposed the last session was part of the Revenue for life, and part for years: I am sorry that was not then complied with, which will be looked on oddly abroad by your allies; will they be with you for your revenue for a year, and no longer? The greatest part of disturbance is usually for persons not at their ease: let the princess be at ease. I believe, the king will not give so great a sum as this, but at the recommendation of this house.

Mr. Attorney Treby. I would leave this to farther consideration, and recommit it. I find gentlemen, in the fashion, making confession of their faith. When the rights of monarchy are invaded, and the rights of the people, I think not fit for this company—If I call the princess's virtues apostolical, I am not amiss. She left her father, her beloved mother, and dear half-brother, for the Protestant religion. This may tend to lay a foundation of distrust between the king and the princess, and then that shakes what we must all be safe in. Under colour of a year's Revenue, by this you bring in a clause of perpetuity. I think the patent not invalidated by leaving out this clause.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. 'What is orderly is not against the order of the house, but the orders of the court!' [said by lord Falkland] I was never ordered by the court, and never will be.

Lord Falkland. I did not say, 'Any body was ordered by the court,' but 'If as agreeable to the orders of the house, as to the orders of the court, you had not had this debate.' I meant the order of 'the Exchequer-Court:' (I never followed the orders of the court in king James's time) nor gave my consent to bring a person into that parliament, though I was promised I should be a peer of England.

Mr. Godolphin. It is slyly insinuated by Treby, as if I was one for taking away charters: but to condemn a person whom the parliament have voted innocent!

Mr. Attorney Treby. I was so far from having him in my thoughts, that I heard him not. As to lord Russel, if my lord was here, he would declare I had lord Russel's case; and I had lord Russel's case, and his counsel's consent for what I did.

Mr. Garroway. If it were possible, I would have no question. The king will hear what we do. I fear, a question may make divisions.

VOL. V.

Hereafter, the king will take care of the princess, and pray adjourn the debate.

The Bill was recommitted on the above Clause, 190 to 127.

Dec. 18. The house went into a grand committee, on the recommitment of the Bill for the Revenue.

Col. Birch. I conceive you have order to debate, or lay aside, the whole Clause relating to the princess. I think it is far better to debate the whole Clause; it will prevent loss of time and misunderstanding—There may be honour to the princess, and no benefit. Let gentlemen consider the scope of the debate yesterday, viz. 'That it may be with honour to the king, and a noble subsistence for the princess.' I would rather lay it aside, or make an humble Address to the king, that her Arrears may be paid, and a continuation of her Pension.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think Birch has misled you; to debate it paragraph by paragraph, is the usual method: two have relation to one another, the others are distinct, and have none. Debates move regular if they are kept to the strict proposition: for that which relates to other Patents, it does not strengthen them, but rather weakens them, this patent being directly named, and no more confirmed. In private bills, you admit of saving rights, and much more should in this.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I move, that you will confirm the patent, in consideration of the Treaty between the two crowns of England and Denmark, for provision of younger children. Here is but 30,000*l.* per ann. on this consideration. The duke of Schomberg is general, and general of the ordnance, the best places in England: I grudge them not the duke; but shall we not confirm, now we have 10,000 Danes sent over to fight for us? I would know whether it was agreed, that this patent should be confirmed by act of parliament? I suppose, when the Articles of Marriage were made, they intended to rely upon the king and the patent; and, I think, it is as much reason now to do it, and they may have as good effect of it. It cannot be supposed but that the princess may have better effect of this patent, now she is of the same religion with her sister, than when she was of a different religion from her father. When you settle the king's Revenue, it will be the proper consideration, that she have subsistence for a year. I desire that it may run plain, free, and clear, that it may last no longer than that term; it is in proportion, what you intend for either king or queen. I move, 'That you will order the committee to draw up a Clause, or by Address to the king, that this Allowance to the princess may be free and clear, in such proportion, as large as it can go, for this year, the condition of the kingdom considered.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I am not for putting the patent in better condition than it was before, nor worse: if it be the same as it was before, I am not against it.

2 K

Mr. Garroway. I am one of those that would have the patent no better, and no worse. I desire only a saving the patent, and I shall offer some words to it, viz. 'That the patent remain in as full force as it was before, notwithstanding this Act.'

Sir Tho. Clarges. Since the Treasury may be streightened by this Proviso, as it is apprehended, I do not believe this Revenue was in the crown in 1688; and, since it is said not to be in the Treaty, I hope they may provide for themselves by proviso, as in private acts. These are letters patent upon valuable considerations. I know, a clause in an act of parliament may take away the benefit of any great seal—These patents are said to be 'a perpetuity,' and, I think, this Clause offered is a reasonable clause. Though the king has taken great care of the princess, yet others have not; she has not yet had Michaelmas quarter; and now it is within ten days of Christmas.

Mr. Sacheverell. I am surprized at what I heard this morning. Here are words offered neither to confirm nor invalidate the patent. It is said by another, 'He would confirm the patent,' but that is more than you intend; therefore it is necessary to know the next Clause, what this is, that gentlemen talk of a saving. If there be a good title to these patents, I cannot agree to confirming them, and there is no need of that nor the other. Let us know whether we shall confirm, or not confirm them.

Sir Henry Goodricke. I am against the salvo of Marriage-consideration, but if to be left in the state you found it in, what is the meaning of the saving? There is something in the grass. There are certain persons put in trustees for this patent, that are under illegal capacities, not qualified by the Test. There is one that is abroad (lord Sunderland) especially; will you put them in a capacity of this trust? I am not willing they should be taken notice of. I discover more; if this contract of marriage be allowed by you, every prince that treats marriage with you, will have it, as at Paris, registered in the court of parliament. By this, you will put the crown upon hardships.

Mr. Finch. I perceive, it is every body's opinion to do no advantage nor disadvantage to the patents. All men are of opinion that this Clause will do no hurt. If any of these trustees are in an incapacity, the others being not, you confirm such only as are capable by law. If trustees are attainted, it voids their trust, but it invalidates not the rest.

Sir Wm. Williams. I am clearly for saving the right of the Patents and let them stand or fall upon their own bottom. There may be a jealousy, but, I suppose, the design is, that the collection of the Revenue shall not hinder the Patent from its vigour and strength. I would postpone this Clause.

Sir Tho. Lee. According to the true rules of Order, you are out of the way. I take it, when it is recommitted, it is as when first brought to the committee. After all of it is gone over, gentlemen may present a Clause.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think you have nothing committed to you but the Clause. I move, to have it postponed.

Sir Tho. Lee. I will only justify point of order. Why was it recommitted? It was, because it went farther than the house ordered.

Sir Wm. Williams. The Clause provides more for the princess, than the king; therefore I would lay it aside.

Sir W. L. Gower. I offer these words to the Clause, 'That whereas the prince and princess have been highly instrumental in this happy Revolution, the sum of * be given them, &c.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I think an Address to the king as strong as any thing you have had proposed, but to enact this Clause is not leaving it to the king; he must do it, or part with the Bill. In the case of the duke of York, that was mentioned, the commons did not grant it to him, but desired the king to confirm such letters patent. Pray look over that grant, and make it so, as that the king makes the grant.

Mr. Garroway. I would have the Clause run in this Bill, 'That the king would order so much Money as we shall name in this house;' such a clause, I think, as obligatory as an enacting clause. Again, I would name a sum that the prince and princess may have so much for this year, that the king be enabled to appoint that sum you shall name, by quarterly payments.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. I am sorry for the debates and heats yesterday; I feared an ill consequence, but, I hope, there will be none to-day. As for the motion I made, I had not been at the court of exchequer, nor the court at Kensington, for it, but I heard the king say, 'He would be content that the prince and princess should have an allowance for their subsistence;' and I move for an Address accordingly. I have no orders to propose it, but, as from myself, I move, 'That they may have the addition of 20,000*l.* per ann.'

Resolved, "That an humble Address be made to his majesty, that he will be pleased to make a Provision for the prince and princess Anne of Denmark, of 50,000*l.* in the whole, for the year, beginning at Christmas next." Which was agreed to by the house. *

* "The Tories, who found themselves outnumbered by the Whigs, and who had as yet no great reason to expect, that the king would, on any terms, consent to turn the scale in their favour, made their court on all occasions to the princess of Denmark, and her favourite the countess of Marlborough; and at this crisis, in particular, resolved to give the nation another public proof of their seeming attachment to her interests. They had, in the former session, been the first movers for settling a Revenue on her highness for life, independent of the crown, and had so far prevailed, in the general com-

The King's Answer to the Address relating to Commissary Shales.] Dec. 20. Mr. Hampden informed the house, that in answer to their Address relating to the bringing over commissary Shales from Ireland, his majesty was pleased to acquaint them, That he had sent some orders of that kind; and had commanded him to attend lord Shrewsbury to be satisfied therein. Which he had done, and had seen the Letter sent to the duke of Schomberg: which imported, That the said Shales should be sent over in custody, if the duke did not find it necessary before he came, to make up his Accounts. And, that if his majesty had not given orders for his Papers, it should be done.

mittee, that 40,000*l.* was named and agreed to for that use: but it was postponed on the report, and in the end, defeated by the adjournment of the session. The same intrigue was now resumed: the princess's Friends, namely the lord and lady Marlborough, could not bear to think, that she should depend on the king's generosity, which, it seems, they had no opinion of, and therefore made a general muster of all who were willing to be adventurers in her service. No affair of this nature can long be a secret: the court had soon intimation of it, were alarmed, and endeavoured to stifle the bomb, before it should have time to burst. Lady Marlborough was attacked on all sides, and in all manners; threatened with ruin; wheedled with promises of favour; and, at last, told, that, instead of serving, she would undo, the princess: that she (the princess) could not hope to carry her point; and, if she did not, the king would not think himself obliged to do any thing for her, &c. Her ladyship, however, continued immoveable, and, instead of giving over her pursuits, doubled and redoubled all her efforts to render it successful. Finding her thus firm, a new expedient was put in practice: the duke of Shrewsbury was sent to make her highness an offer of 50,000*l.* a year, if she would desist from soliciting the settlement by parliament, and undertook of himself to be a sort of guarantee for his majesty's performance, by saying, 'That he was confident he would keep his word; and that, if he did not, he would not serve him an hour after he broke it.' This message, also, was brought to lady Marlborough, and as she had declared herself dissatisfied with it, and even insinuated, that his majesty's promise was not to be depended on, it may be fairly presumed, that when she reported it to the princess, she prevailed with her to return the following answer: 'That she could not think herself in the wrong to desire a security for what was to support her; and that the business was now gone so far, that she thought it reasonable to see what her Friends could do for her.' This was peremptory; and all that the king and his ministers had now to do was, to manage the matter as well as possible in the house of commons: now it is reasonable to think, that, before this message was sent, both

Address on the State of the Nation.] Dec. 21. Mr. Hampden reported, from the committee, the following Address:

"We your majesty's most dutiful subjects, the commons, in parliament assembled, having seriously taken into our consideration the State of the Nation, and being deeply sensible of the ill conduct of public Affairs, and the unhappy success of them, as well in reference to Ireland, as to your majesty's Armies and Feet, do think ourselves obliged, in duty to your majesty, and in discharge of the trust reposed in us by those we represent, most humbly to lay before your majesty the (inexpressible) wrong that hath been done to your majesty, and your people, and the present imminent danger of this kingdom, and of all your majesty's Protestant subjects, from the want of ability or integrity in those who have had the direction of the said affairs, and by whose advice not only the were convinced, that the princess had already made sure of a formidable party there; for sovereigns never stoop to such expedients, till all others have been found unsuccessful: instead therefore of making the princess popular, by rendering her the object of public pity, as the opposing her whole demand would scarce have failed of doing, they compounded the matter with her partisans: the latter demanded 70,000*l.* a year, and the former offered 50,000*l.*; 'which was at last accepted, rather than have any farther struggle, (says the duchess of Marlborough) considering the great power and influence of the crown, by reason of its dependants.' But though this compromise was the effect of private cabals, it seemed, without doors, to be the effect of fair and open deliberations: lord Eland, (the only son of the marquis of Halifax) Mr. Finch, and Mr. Godolphin, stickled in the house for 70,000*l.* and others, among whom was the younger Hampden, insisted, 'That it was dangerous to settle any Revenue on a princess who had so near a claim to the crown, independently of the king, whose very title was disputed by the malcontents: upon the result of all, it was resolved, 'That an humble Address be presented to his majesty, that he would be pleased to make a provision for the prince and princess of Denmark of 50,000*l.* in the whole, in the year, beginning at Christmas next.' And such an Address was accordingly presented by the whole house; to which his majesty was pleased to answer, 'Gentlemen, whatsoever comes from the house of commons is so agreeable to me, and particularly this Address, that I shall do what you desire of me.' It is however acknowledged on all hands, that the consequence of this struggle, was a breach between the two royal sisters, which never was made up: and it is observable, that the queen's particular complaint, mentioned by Burnet, namely, That such a motion should be made before the princess had tried, in a private way, what the king intended to assign her, has never been answered." Ralph.

reducing of Ireland has been obstructed, but the treasure of this kingdom wasted, and the lives of many brave soldiers, and able seamen, lost, without any such suitable effect as might reasonably have been expected.—We cannot but reflect, with the utmost grief, upon the neglect of relieving Ireland, during the first months of your majesty's administration, when your majesty's ministers did not use such effectual means as were apparently necessary to have prevented a war in the said kingdom: and, when the earl of Tyrconnel had levied forces to oppress and destroy your majesty's Protestant subjects, neither men, money, nor arms, were, for a long time, sent to enable them to defend themselves and their country; insomuch, that, without mentioning other particulars, several thousands of them perished miserably in the town of Londonderry, for want of timely succour. And when, after many neglects and delays, an army was appointed for Ireland, necessary provisions were wanting, and matters so ordered, that the endeavours of your parliament, and the Supplies granted for that service, proved ineffectual; at the same time that many such experienced officers, as were known to be enemies to your majesty and your government, were suffered to go beyond the seas, where they entered into the late king James's service, and have, since that time, been his chief instruments for carrying on the War in Ireland.—The Miscarriages in reference to the Fleet, have been as destructive to your majesty's and your people's interest, as those in the army; many of your majesty's subjects having been ruined, and others greatly damaged in their estates, by the want of station-ships and convoys; and some sea-officers, whose duty it was to have convoyed the ships of English subjects, exacted money, from merchants, and unnecessarily pressed their men; [p. 439.] by which means, trade was discouraged, your majesty's Customs diminished, and many of your loyal subjects impoverished: your majesty's Fleet was also served with unwholesome and corrupted Provisions, [p. 447.] which caused the death of many of your best seamen, and has deterred many others from the service.—It will be too tedious to multiply instances of Miscarriage and ill conduct in your majesty's affairs, through the ill advice of those who have undertaken the management of them, to which the success in all points, has been answerable.—Our remedy, under God, consists in your majesty's wisdom, and affection to your people; which, we doubt not, will incline your majesty to hearken to the advice of us, your dutiful commons, who do most humbly beseech your majesty to take the above-said matters into your consideration; and, in your great wisdom, to examine into, and find out, the authors of Miscarriages, and to appoint affairs to be managed by persons unsuspected, and more to the safety of your majesty, and the satisfaction of your subjects."

Debate thereon.] Mr. Howe. I find we are in many streights, and this Address is to remove suspected persons. I have not seen much success from addresses this session, especially when we addressed to know who recommended Shales, and the king 'cannot possibly give you an Answer.' This must be answered with another question; Who they are you suspect? Partly on one side, and partly on another, and a moderate party suspects them both. If you would remove all the fat and the lean, all fair and brown, then I shall know who you mean. All that were for king James, and all that are for himself, that those should be forced out and removed—Pray let the Address lie upon the table till it falls under the table: it is the best use you can make of it.

Serjeant Maynard. The prince of Orange's coming in was a miracle, and that those that helped him in were not destroyed. The Address about Shales came to nothing, and, as for the Money you have given, I know not what is become of it. When Henry 4 came in, upon Rd. 2's abdication, a parliament was in being, but the writ fell upon it; but that parliament sat, and laws were executed that they made, and are laws to this day. The commons addressed, 'That his Confessor might be removed quite from him;' the lords joined with them. The king answered, 'He knew no fault by him, but since the commons did suspect him, no man should abide in his house to the displeasure of his commons.' There were two Popes at one time, and Europe was divided upon it; the commons made a request to the king to acknowledge the Anti-Pope. Now I have told you this, make what use of it you please.

Sir Tho. Lee. About a week since, you ordered this Address, and the house was extraordinarily unanimous in so great a thing; but it seems to me now that there are more doubts in it than did arise at first. All this will require some consideration who you shall fasten upon; else, you will alarm the nation at the same time. If you change your minds in this Address, it will look like coldness; if the business of the day be retarded: you will hinder that great affair. I move, "That you will adjourn this till after Christmas."

Mr. Hawles. Some charters were granted by the late king. Some were very ill trustees in the management of the Revenue; if you continue them still, you ought to see first who the persons are. We have had no effects, this parliament, of our Addresses but one, and that was against Ludlow. Many preferments have been to bishoprics; Mr. Johnson has not been preferred. If you go on, on a general Address, I doubt you will have the same success. It was said by an old gentleman, 'It was one of the best acts one of the present ministers ever did, to endeavour a reconciliation between king James and the prince of Orange;' I think, those that did it ought to have no preferment; and you have some in Westminster-Hall, where honest men ought to be. I would not have ill men either in Westminster-Hall, or Whitehall. Do you think fit that Mr. Blaithwaite should be in office to govern all the Army? If there had been a reconciliation betwixt king James and the prince of Orange, what would have become of the people? They had been in worse condition than before, and the end of that would have been a common-wealth. The very papers in col. Sidney's closet, tending to that, judged him guilty of Treason. The people will find a head, or make a head. I am sure it is very natural, that those gentlemen so employed did what they could to obstruct the Bill of Exclusion; not a man of them can draw ten men after them. When the prince of Orange came in, by the good will of the people, they were for a regency, and that is a common-wealth. I am for removing those, for, I am sure, they are for a common-wealth.

Mr. Foley. The Address, by your vote, is to be considered to-day, and last night the votes went all over the nation, and shall we now put this off? I see no reason for it; the sooner it is done, the people will be better satisfied. Pray go on with it.

Mr. Hampden, jun. Though it has been moved to put this Address under the table, I know not the reason of it: it is incomprehensible to me: I would know the meaning of it.

Sir Rd. Temple. I fear, that, by this Address, you will make reflections on the government; you cannot cure it, now you have read it. Go to the order of the day, and read it when the house is full.

Sir Wm. Lev. Gower. If this be pursuant to your order, we reflect on ourselves not to proceed: read the Address, paragraph by paragraph: But let not such a reflection lie upon us, to let such a thing lie still: and now to go upon another thing.

Resolved, That the Address be read a second time, paragraph by paragraph. The first paragraph was read.

Sir John Guise. Now we are going to press hard upon all the counties of England, they should be satisfied that you put their Money into hands unsuspected. If the Address be not full enough to your opinion, recommit it.

Serjeant Wogan. I cannot call this an Address; it is a libel, in some part of it: pray recommit it.

Sir Robert Rich. I think, the gentleman calls it 'a Libel.' The commons now sit 'on the State of the Nation,' and a member calls it 'a Libel!' I move, that the standing orders of the house, in such cases, may be read.

Sir Wm. Williams. I am sure, freedom of debate is the life of this house. I must agree, that, if an act, or vote, of the house be called 'a libel,' it is a great offence: but when things are in fieri, (a doing) gentlemen may use sharp arguments in that case.

Serjeant Wogan proffering to speak,

Col. Birch. Pray keep to order. If the words be agreed by the house, then you hear him, but not till then.

Mr. Smith. I will not justify the words, but I would not be too severe upon the gentleman. I remember several expressions this session: I desire the gentleman may explain himself.

Sir John Guise. If Wogan cannot find wherein the order of the house is transgressed by the committee that drew the Address, it is a reflection upon the whole house. When within doors this is called 'a libel,' what will it be called without doors? I think there is so much weight in the Address, that it is, whether you will continue king William, or call in king James. I would not have it slight or light, but it cannot be valued without doors. I would have Wogan ask the pardon of the house in his place.

Serjeant Wogan. I humbly ask pardon of the house if I gave offence.—And so this went off.

Mr. Foley. I wonder gentlemen are for recommitting this Address, and yet find no fault with it. What has your committee to do to draw an Address without your instructions?

Sir Wm. Williams. The exception to it is, 'That it is not home enough.' I take it, it agrees with every particular of the debate. I took it for the sense of the house, that the committee should name no persons. If your committee had prepared you such an Address, it had been justly exceptionable.

Mr. Howe. I told you before, 'That the king would make no Answer to your former Address.' I suspect a sort of men about the king and queen that are not fit to be employed, who were for taking away the Test, and the Penal Laws, and for the Dispensing Power, and taking away Charters. They cannot be suspected to be for king William, for they have acted as if for king James. If these men are fit to be entrusted, say so; but if the king please to enquire, and turn them out, that is fit to be instructions to the committee.

Mr. Hawles. I reflect upon nobody in the house; but, if it be your opinion not to continue those about the king, that had a hand in murders, say so. If they have given money for their places, let them be rejected.

In the first Paragraph, the word 'inexpressible' was rejected. On the next, 'Direction of Affairs, &c.'

Mr. Hampden, jun. Lowther said, 'There was good counsel, but ill administration.' Was the king counselled to send men and provisions into Ireland timely? If so, then there was some counter-counsel.

Sir Rd. Temple. To what purpose should you put the king to examine it, when you have determined it already? To lay such a charge is not a necessary direction to the committee. Possibly, great miscarriages have been, but such as could not be avoided. Here you assert 'Want of integrity and ability;' you settle the matter of fact, without making any enquiry.

Mr. Foley. When the prince of Orange came to the administration of the government, there was great store of ammunition and provision that came from Holland; and ships at Plymouth were ready, but nothing must be done; so they suffered the poor people there to be lost, and, notwithstanding, all the Addresses, you had a Report that the provisions were bad, and, therefore, fit to be sold. I think the king has those about him that betray both king and people, and shall nobody be to blame? Lay the miscarriages before the king, and he can tell who were forward, and who were backward, in his service: and I think the Committee has done well.

Resolved, That the Address be recommitted, upon the debate of the house, to the same Committee *.

Dec. 23. Resolved, That the house be called over to morrow fortnight: and that all such members as shall not appear, without a reasonable excuse, to the satisfaction of the house, shall have their names printed, to the end the nation may know, who do attend, and who do neglect their duty.

Dec. 30. The Speaker reported, That he had attended his majesty with the Address relating to the prince and princess Anne of Denmark; and that his majesty was pleased to return this Answer: "Gentlemen, Whatever comes from the house of commons is so agreeable to me, and particularly this Address, that I shall do what you desire of me."†

Jan. 3, 1689-90. Resolved, That the farther sum of one shilling in the pound, for one year, be laid on all persons and estates, charged by the two shilling-Act.

Jan. 7. Upon a Call of the house, sir Jonathan Jennings being absent, and information being given, That he was lately made high-sheriff of Yorkshire, a debate arose, and it was Resolved, nem. con. That the nominating any member of this house, to the king, to be High-Sheriff, is a breach of the privileges of this house; and that an Address be made to his majesty, that he will be pleased to constitute

* "Mr. Hampden's Address was thought by some too long, by others too short; Mr. Hampden the father spoke against it, as entering too far into the detail of Miscarriages and Misfortunes, which too many of that assembly did not care to hear enumerated, not in hopes of having, but for fear things should, be amended." Oldmixon.

† "In December a question was put in the house of commons, 'Whether a person having a place at court, or any dependance on the king, should be a member of that house?' The debate was warm and obstinate; for, as it always happens on such occasions, the disgusted and disappointed joined with the enemies of the government, to keep others out of places, since they themselves could not get into them. The question was however carried for the place-men, and this reason given, 'because otherwise the fittest persons for public employments would remain excluded, and be debarred the opportunity of serving either the king or the country.' Tindal.

another Sheriff for Yorkshire, in the room of sir J. Jennings.

Jan. 9. Mr. Cholmondeley, a member, was ordered to be committed to the Tower, for a contempt, in refusing to take the Oaths.

Debate on the Corporation Bill.] Jan. 10. An ingrossed Bill for restoring of Corporations was read the third time.

Mr. Sacheverell. That this Bill is very necessary, no man but thinks. Surrenders of Charters are crimes notorious, but all are not equally guilty of it. I tendered one Clause the other day, 'That those that did it wilfully, maliciously, or for their own lucre, ought to have a mark set upon them,' but not to extend to all persons alike. When I drew the clause, I considered the times and circumstances they were done in; those that did it either to serve ends of their own, or those of the wicked times; I looked little farther, seeing London did defer their cause as far as they could: some men, through fear, surrendered what they could not withstand; therefore, to be liable to that small punishment, the house put out the word 'majority,' and made it general. I thought it too large; I have considered it since, that going so large is too far. My opinion is, to look back only on them who came voluntarily, without consent of the majority, and ought to have marks; and, after the City-Charter was taken away, it might induce the majority to surrender. I could be content to excuse those from this disability. I cannot suppose they did it maliciously: therefore, as a friend to the Bill, I proffer a Clause, "For incapacitating, for seven years, all such as had any ways acted in the surrender of Charters of Corporations, from bearing any office in the said corporations."*

* "In this situation of affairs, the Whigs discovered that the Tories were treating with the court about the dissolution of the parliament. Though the commons had granted the supplies that were demanded for the reduction of Ireland, and for the quota to which the king was obliged by his alliances, yet the remoteness of the funds making it necessary to offer great premiums to those who advanced the money upon a security that was thought so hazardous, since few believed the government would last so long, the Supplies, though seemingly great, brought not in the half of what they were estimated at. This the Tories perceived, and seeing the Whigs grow sullen, and that they would make no advance of money, they applied to the court, and promised great advances of money if the parliament might be dissolved, and a new one summoned. Upon this the commons prepared a bill, "for restoring Corporations to their antient rights and privileges," by which they hoped to have made sure of all future parliaments; for in it was inserted the following Clause, "That every mayor, recorder, sheriff, common council-man, town-clerk, magistrate, or officer, who did take upon him to consent to, or join in the surrender of any

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am against this Clause. This bill comes with a good prospect; in a great measure, it is a good bill; but this clause is destructive to the peace and quiet of the kingdom; instead of reconciliation, it lays the foundation of perpetual division. I think it will become the wisdom of this house to make this a Bill of peace and quietness. In Hackwell's Book, I find, 'Where proviso and clauses are contrary to the matter of a Bill, and altered, as in a Bill of Clothing, the house disliked a clause, and threw it out.' Upon these grounds and considerations, considering the fatality of it, if some expedients prevent it not, I desire the clause may not be read, but rejected.

Sir Walter Yonge. I am for the clause, for the reason Clarges gave, 'For the peace of the kingdom.' Where a clause is so fair as this, nobody can be against it, but such as approve of all the villainies of the surrenderers. Those who would have brought in popery and slavery if they had power, would do the same thing again. They abhorred parliaments, and petitions for their sitting, that only humble remedy. When such a clause is offered, that charters, or instrument purporting such surrender, did solicit, procure, prosecute, or did pay or contribute to the charge of prosecuting any Scire Facias, Quo Warranto, or information in the nature of Quo Warranto, by this act declared unlawful, shall be and is declared, adjudged, and enacted to be, for the space of seven years, incapable and disabled to all intents and purposes, to bear or execute any office, employment, or place of trust, as a member of such respective body corporate, or in or for such respective city, town, borough, or cinque-port, whereof or wherein he was member at or before the time of making such surrender, or instrument purporting such surrender, or the suing out, or prosecuting such Scire Facias, Quo Warranto, or information in the nature of Quo Warranto; any thing in this act contained, or any other case, statute, or any ordinance, charter, custom, or any thing to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding." This was opposed in the house by the whole strength of the Tory party; for they saw, that the carrying of it would be the total ruin of their interest through the whole kingdom. They said a great deal against the declaratory part of the Bill; but whatever there might be in that, they urged, that since the thing had been so universal, it seemed hard to punish it with such severity: and that by this means the party for the Church would be disgraced, and the corporations cast into the hands of dissenters. And now both parties made their court to the king. The Whigs promised every thing, that he desired, if he would help them to get this Bill passed; and the Tories were not wanting in their promises, if the bill should be stopped, and the parliament dissolved. The bill was carried in the house of commons by a great majority." Tindal.

Corporations be put into the hands of good and moderate men, I would not have it rejected.

Mr. Hampden. If we get into this way, we shall not have done till to-morrow. One moves, That the Clause shall not be read, and gets into the merits of the Bill: the proper question is, 'Whether this clause shall be read?'

Mr. Roberts. As this bill is now, it is a most pernicious bill. It came a good bill from the committee, but the additional Clause has spoiled it. It was brought in in a thin house, and, I hope, you will reject it in a full house.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Pray keep us to the question, Whether you will read the Clause? When in debate, gentlemen ought to conform themselves to modest expressions, and not to be told of 'justifying all the villainies that have been done.' I think, with submission, you ought, Mr. Speaker, to correct such expressions. I think this Proviso not capable of amendment. In opening the clause, Sacheverell told you, 'It must be proved that the majority made the surrender,' and yet there is a difficulty; for, he knows, whole books have been stolen away by the town-clerk; and a man runs the risque of proving himself qualified, without any record to show.

Lord Falkland. I think Sacheverell's Clause irregularly brought in, and, indeed, the whole Bill, when you had passed the body of the bill; and this clause is a contradiction to the whole bill. This clause takes away the rights of those you would save. The clause takes away the rights that were restored by the prince of Orange's circulary Letters. It is dangerous, now the king is going out of the kingdom,* to discontent such a body of people. I am more afraid of the consequence of this, now people are generally dissatisfied. This bill is a restoring of Corporations, and not a bill of pains and penalties. This clause is improper for this bill, and for the present circumstances of affairs, and I would have it rejected.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. I attended this bill the last session, and this, which, I must say, he brought in irregularly to take away free-holds, and disfranchise men, and this without leave of the house; a very extraordinary proceeding! As to the form, very angry and very naught! It is too general. You may punish thousands; dangerous at this time. The bill says, 'They shall be restored, &c.' and the Proviso says, 'They shall not be restored;' a contradictory clause! Whole shoals of men will be put out by this, many terrified, and no reason to punish this sort of men. Suppose an armed force come to my house, and say, 'Give us quarters, or else we will plunder and burn your house;' the terror upon these men justifies the thing. Twelve red coats in Westminster-Hall are as great a terror as an armed force. I am not fond of falling upon Addressers and Abhorrrers. This is not the way to make friends for the king nor the government. You have several precedents (though one cannot speak against the body of the bill) yet if a clause be not according to the intention of the bill, it may be thrown out; and I would reject this.

* His majesty had declared his intention of going in person to carry on the war in Ireland.

Mr. Hampden. I have heard of one parliament that has arraigned another, but never heard of one parliament that has complained of itself to its own face. Your bill says, 'All such and such shall be restored, except such and such;' and it is no contradiction certainly. Do you intend to restore all those to act the same thing again? You are told, 'It may be taken care of in the bill of pains and penalties;' but will you restore them to Corporations that have betrayed them, and let them do it again? The proviso cannot be rejected. Now you are told of precedents; if they are examined, they are not to this point. I do not remember a whole clause cut off in a whole Bill. What you have to mend in an ingrossed bill must be mended at the table. It is a strange sort of mending a garment to cut off a sleeve. It is said, 'This may be reserved for the bill of pains and penalties,' and there will be none. Pray pass the bill.

Serjeant Maynard. I have heard that to-day which makes my ears to tingle. The case is, here is a bill brought in to restore Corporations, and it is moved, to cast out this proviso. It has been committed, and ordered to be ingrossed, and a gentleman comes and prays that it may be thrown out; certainly he is but a young parliament-man. To move to cast out the whole clause, you put it on an everlasting debate; if there be no penalties, you had better like what king Charles and king James did. If those Surrenders stand, they may make what parliament they will at court; and, formerly, he that should have named such a thing, should not have come to the bar, but gone to the Tower. Why may they not as well move to cast out another and another clause, till they have left none in the bill?

Sir Henry Goodrick. You are told of 'making ears tingle,' and of 'the court making a parliament;' and by another, 'to justify all the villainies, &c.' It is a bill not good in itself to let in all mankind into Corporations; fanatics, &c. If all these must be left out of Corporations, whom avarice, force, and easiness have induced to surrender their Charters, if all these must be left out, whom will you leave to act; whom will you leave to chuse parliament-men? None. Harmony must save us; when this is a bill of heat, a bill of attainder, where will this end? No man knows. Till you let us debate freely in this house, I desire to withdraw from my attendance. I would have Yonge explain, or be called to the bar.

Mr. Garraway. It is moved, 'That Yonge should explain.' If the gentleman would have made exceptions, he should have done it immediately. The house has been divided since, and it is against all order.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Yonge is a young gentleman, and, I believe, what he reflected on me was passion; and I would desire you to pass it by. I have been told by Hampden, 'That I talked like a young parliament-man;' I could wish he could make his words good. I wonder at this from a gentleman conversant in records, for Hampden to say, 'It has not been done in his time,' when it has been done. In great emergencies it may be done. We sat from nine till four in the morning about Skinner's Case, and I remember what Mr. Vaughan said, 'That precedents cited without records were so many nothings.' I have not yet spoken to this Clause. What I said was only as to precedents. I know a corporation of 600*l.* per ann. advised by this lord chief justice to surrender, or else, if judged against them, the lands would go to the next heir of the granter, &c. Hundreds of innocent persons would have been involved. In the third session of the first parliament of king James 1, p. 64, &c. you will find the precedent I spoke of. I will make this use of it; if it appears that a whole proviso is taken out of a bill, it may be done again.

Sir Wm. Williams. The motion made is for rejecting the whole clause. It is one thing to reject, and another to correct a clause, to be mended by the clerk at the table. But if the whole clause ought to be recommitted, you consider whether any thing be good in it before you wholly reject it. This clause is an exception of some before 1685, and not to be restored. Do you restore them to their franchises? What are these franchises? Will you restore these men, who have been the worst of men, and betrayed their trust, into the plight of an innocent man, and restore them to their places again? Is there not a middle way? I agree to the wilful and malicious man—Will you put it again into the power of the greater? I would make them the lesser men, and take off the greater. By this day's work the world will see we are a divided people. This proviso sets only a mark upon such men. In some Corporations, of 600, who had a right to give consent to a surrender, not above 34 were for it; and they prevailed: and how came this about? This was a packed Common-Council by lord Jeffreys. There are 500 still in being at Chester against the surrender, but because a few in corporations are concerned, must you let the whole be lost for the sake of a few? Can we forget the law for regulating corporations? Can any thing be said for this, that cannot for that? Because dissenters, in the first regulation, were put out, and the church of England came in, can any man argue for that act of parliament that does not argue for this proviso? That act did good in Charles 1's time, and this may do good in king William's to put out those that would go back again. I would recommit the proviso.

The Clerk read some precedents of 1607.

'Ordered, That a clause be erased out of the 'ingrossed Bill for Cloathing. In the Bill for 'repealing the clause of the statute about 'Ferry-men, and Water-men, it was agreed, by 'the counsel on both sides, to be struck out; 'which was presently done at the table.'

Mr. Howe. I am almost afraid to speak; it is almost as hard to say what is talked, as to be of every man's opinion in this house. I hope all here speak their opinions candidly. I did hear a reflection that I wondered at, and that I would not have made, (Goodrick on Maynard.) I would have the church of England settled, without their passive obedience. I would never willingly part with any thing established by law in that church. But these men have delivered up their charters, depriving of their right children unborn. The question is, Whether you will let them in to all they have pretence to, or take away all we have pretence to. Corporations did chuse such as were for court purposes; I would secure it on that side, though I hope it will never be attempted there. Those who are sure to be subject to those passions, I would not trust to chuse parliament-men. How safe can we be, when such men are the originals of our misery? It was that party that the prince of Orange's Declaration principally made at. The point is not, Whether it is fit to do it, but whether now. I am sorry the expedients are refused, but if you put it to the question, 'Whether this Clause, or this Bill pass,' I cannot let so useful a clause be lost. I think this is no punishment; it takes off a great trouble from these men, and frees honest men from fears. The properest thing you can do, is to put them out of power. You may moderate this clause by punishing the principals.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. As for the precedents produced, they are not to this case; the case of the Ferries relating to a particular person where counsel was heard, and both parties agreed to leave the clause out. This proviso was offered in the house, received amendments, and the question was put, and it was voted part of the bill. If the question be, 'Whether this proviso shall be part of the question,' it is undoing what you have done, and I dare boldly say, there never was a precedent of such a thing. The house are obliged to answer the objection (and not I) to the irregularity, for they admitted it. To destroy corporations, and to make parliaments at the pleasure of the crown, this is the thing, and these persons are complained of for it. This is the worst means to arrive at the worst ends imaginable; they have broken their oaths and trust to subvert the government. Is there any thing more just and natural than that these offenders should be laid aside? And to put these men out of condition to play the same trick again! All you restore were the old members of the Church of England, but not that corrupt part of the Church of England who endeavoured to destroy the government. Honest men are now electors, to supply the place of those ill men. If they have a mind to betray you, they cannot, they must be qualified by the Test-Act. Are not these the ways you distinguish them from the Church of England? None others can come in. I am sorry it should be said, 'Nobody is fit to be trusted but such as are branded with this reproach.' And they will be as just to the government as they will be to the Church, true Church of England-men. All those men that were in the first part of this matter, were either for private ends, or worse ends: though I hope it was not for that end that this Clause was refused. I doubt not but Corporations will be supplied by Church of England-men; they can have no others. It is said, 'This is a bill of pains and penalties?' but you are not doing that; you are only laying them aside that, you have had experience, would have betrayed the government. There is no possible inconvenience in this proviso; you will have better men and unspotted men in their stead; therefore I would not reject the clause.

Mr. Foley. The question is, Whether this clause shall be rejected, or not? It was endeavoured, the two last reigns, to pack a parliament to subvert all our constitutions. There was a design for a clause in a bill, 'That all Corporations should surrender their Charters by such a time, or else they should be void, and justices of the county should act in all towns, &c.' Had that design succeeded, there had been no need of Quo Warrantos. Your Books will tell you, it was not in the power of that house to make such an alteration. It was part of this king's Declaration to restore all corporations to the condition they were in before the Quo Warrantos and surrenders. We have ill ministers, and they are concerned that the same thing may be done again. Men have done all they can to annihilate their corporations, and we must not annihilate, but restore these men. If there be any in corporations who are sorry for what they have done, they will take this for a very merciful proviso, that they may do no more mischief to corporations and to the king; therefore retain the proviso.

Mr. Ettrick. This proviso is a new law tacked to the bill. This bill is a substantive bill, and will stand without this clause. I think, this clause draws in the good and the bad together. What could any man advise in such a case, when Westminster-Hall had voided the Charter of the city of London? And, therefore, a great man, for the benefit of his country, advised Surrenders. As to the matter of prudence, if all have been guilty, I would not mingle the nocent and innocent together.

Mr. Finch. I conceive, you are to consider, whether, first, you can, and next, whether you ought to receive this proviso. It is said, 'It came by report from the committee upon the precedent spoken of;' but upon the Journal it appears, that the proviso was rejected, and the bill passed. The committee sent it back, and could do nothing, and the parliament leave it out, and pass the bill. It is not what the counsel at the bar agree, but what the parliament think fit, not because they agreed it, and no counsel at the bar can touch upon the power of this house. It is natural to make a slight amendment at the table. I will not say any thing to the method of bringing in this proviso; the house did receive this, and voted it to stand part of the bill. I could wish the house had been fuller then, but the house may reject it now, and I hope they will. I doubt it is not capable of amendment. It leaves men under the terror of the 500*l.* penalty, if they do not incapacitate themselves. It was a fault, but it was general. It is said, in the preamble of the bill, 'The design was to pack parliaments,' and it is said, 'This Clause is to incapacitate persons that they should not be guilty of the like again.' Most gentlemen are sensible that the multitude of surrenders were after the Quo Warrantos; 'upon this,' says the bill, 'there was a design to pack parliaments.' It was not this that put them upon taking away the penal laws and the Test; it required another regulation. It was after all the regulations, that these men stood in the gap. It puts corporations as they were in 1675. If these men be put out of the bill, you put out the men of estates, and the ancient corporations are put into the hands of men of little or no fortune, and some call them the mobile. There is a clause in the bill that declares all Surrenders void; where is the danger of these men doing the same thing again? The former are in their offices and employment again. Leave this clause out, and you put in the rich men of the Corporations, and if this stands part of the bill, you put those in of no estates, and that have given no testimony of their affections to the government.

Sir Robert Howard. Instead of punishing men that have done ill, we are here making eulogiums on them. I am not for the Church of England with that famous doctrine some maintain. In queen Elizabeth's time, when she protected those in arms in Holland for their religion, the Church of England contributed their opinion as well as their money, and thanked the queen when she acted according to the steps and method of Popery. Then the divine right of passive obedience without limitation—If ever so many tyrants were complicated in a king, he must be obeyed. It was then they began with Corporations; I say, these were given out for doctrines of the Church of England, and delivered over to the civil execution. This was setting up that false doctrine of the Church of England.

Sir Francis Winnington. To the orders of the house. This is foreign to the debate.

Sir Robert Howard. I arraign those that arraign the Church of England of such doctrines; these men prepared Corporations to deliver up their Charters. The false representations of the Church of England's doctrine made way for those misfortunes that followed. This was the first cause; whatever they did to sacrifice lives, and for the times, was sanctified by this doctrine of non-resistance. The question is now, Whether you will do any thing to these people, or no? What think you the nation will say to all this? In the beginning of the Bill such a thunder, and so hard characters put upon men, and to close the Bill with nothing! And now to fix not only an obligation, but a character, that they are all fit for these employments! I have abhorred what was done in the late times, but rather than no mark of incapacity shall be put upon these men, I would part with the whole bill.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I would have this incapacity extend to none but such as forcibly delivered up the Charters, without consent of the majority.

Sir Henry Capel. It is said, 'That something of fanaticism is in this bill, by taking away of that Clause of the unlawfulness of taking up arms, or resistance, &c.' I said then, 'If Marshal Turenne should come out of France to invade us, should we not resist him?' Why did they not do their duty before the prince of Orange came over? Did these gentlemen ever think to find justices of peace, and judges, papists? Lewis xi. had liberty to raise money till he called a parliament, and he never called one, and money has been arbitrarily raised without parliament in France ever since. You should have had parliaments, your bellies full, as Florence and Rome now have, the one to set the rates on chesnuts, and the other to regulate sick people.

Mr. Coningsby. Surrenderers were the scaffolds, and regulators were the builders; will you leave them out?—The Proviso was rejected, and the Bill passed.

Debate on sir Robert Sawyer's Prosecution of sir Tho. Armstrong. Jan. 13. Mr. Hawles. A writ of error is a writ of right; and I am sorry it was left out in the Bill of Rights. How scandalous is it, when a man guilty of the murder of sir Tho. Armstrong should be protected within these walls! Warrants were directed out of this house for attaching lord Stafford, and he complained of it in the lords house as a breach of privilege, but the lords would not hinder the proceeding. They said, 'They had no privilege in those cases.' If you say, 'You cannot name a member without order at a committee,' you must recommit this Bill for repeal of sir Tho. Armstrong's Attainder, to do right: I do not understand it to be satisfaction for the estate of this person, but for the blood of this person. I would have the money for those that suffered, and those that suffered not. Why is it enquired, what this gentleman is worth? An Appeal may be brought by an infant, and he had 1500*l.* for the blood of his ancestor. In the case of Sacheverell and Blackwell, a writ of error was brought, and there was damage given for the blood of the ancestor. They who destroy the king's subjects, act against the king. He that preserves most of his subjects does him most service. In his natural capacity, he may destroy whom he pleases; in his politic capacity, those who are most guilty only. Armstrong offered a plea, and it was not allowed, and you have voted it 'Wilful murder.' When the thing is so plain, (though I would not punish for mere error) and you have voted it 'Murder,' sure it must be in somebody. Armstrong did not murder himself, and afterwards quarter himself; indeed sir Edmund-bury Godfrey hanged himself, and afterwards stabbed himself! Were the judges and prosecutors guilty? They were all guilty. I am not for rigour, though blood cries for blood. Let them that require satisfaction have the money, and let all be reported to you.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Let all persons guilty suffer; but the question is, 'Whether I have been dealt withal by the committee as a member?' When the Bill was committed, a charge was brought against me, 'That I had proceeded against sir T. Armstrong arbitrarily and illegally.' It was said, 'it was ever the duty of an attorney-general to grant a writ of error;' but it was never done in any book of law. Application must be made to the king by petition, and he gives a warrant to the attorney-general to consent to it. The statute that gives the writ of error runs thus, 'Except in cases where the king is a party.' Ed. 3. The parties petitioned for error tam quam. It is a received opinion, that a writ of error lies not in those cases. Before the statute of Hen. 8, there was no writ of error but in the King's-bench, and all was by petition to the king. I did forbear to attend the committee because I opposed the Bill; they have waved that clause, but I am not exempted; you may hear it at the bar, and I am not exempted from it. It is the duty of every attorney-general upon an outlawry brought, and of course it is his duty to pray judgment of the court; which asks what he has to say. If he produces a plea, then the attorney replies. But that is an extraordinary thing to allege what Hawles says, &c. I desire there may be the strictest examination of my actions. No man can serve the crown, if he is an honest man, if he must be blamed for all the miscarriages of the Judges.

Mr. Hawles. Pray let it go back to the committee, with the directions of the house to find these men out, and spare me not if I be one. Upon the plea, the outlawry ought to be laid aside. It is the duty of the attorney to inform the court if running into an error.

Sir Wm. Williams. I shall speak to the recommitment. If you recommit this upon breach of privilege, for naming Sawyer at the committee, without acquainting the house, we go in a wheel; you only send it back to the committee to do nothing upon it. If it be your opinion, that is a breach of privilege upon Sawyer, he may be heard at the bar. It is fit that you put yourselves into some course. You cannot regularly send your member to a committee without instructions. Pray let us have plain dealing; will you recommit the bill with instructions? Else your member must be heard at the bar. You are told, 'There can be no writ of error in criminal cases where the king is a party, but by a warrant from the king;' but I take the law to be quite otherwise. He goes farther, and tells you, 'When the party brought either error, or a plea, he ought to have a warrant from the king, &c.' I drew the plea, though I was told, 'It was a snare for me,' and your Vote calls it, 'Murder, &c.' so you have justified that matter. When the plea was tendered, did any body move, that the plea should not be received? This is the answer of the attorney-general; all is put upon the dead (lord chief-justice Jeffreys) and the dead must answer for the dead, and 'the dead bury the dead.' If they had executed the part of an executioner, they had done all—I was asleep in the court. I heard not of it. Pray let us have it heard at the bar to-morrow.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would recommit the bill upon the point of satisfaction and reparation. You are told, 'A great part of the money (Armstrong's) remains to his heirs, and settled before the Attainder;' and if any satisfaction is to be paid by any of your members, recommit it upon that point.

Sir Robert Rich. Before you put any question, I move, that the Order by which your committee sat, may be read.—[It was read.]

Mr. Smith. I move, to recommit the bill upon that point of reparation. I am satisfied that Armstrong suffered illegally, and I am willing there should be consideration had of his family, which might have been proper in the Indemnity. I think it not reason that there should be reparation out of Sawyer's estate, nor is he concerned.

Sir John Lowther. As for reparation, it will be found a thing not preceded, and as for the writ of error, we are not clear in it, therefore I would have it committed again. Though several precedents have been quoted by Hawles, yet no precedents of parliament, but all of Westminster-hall; if those should be precedents, they may misguide Westminster-hall to do the same thing again. I would willingly have precedents of Bills of Repeal of Attainder signed by the king, and sent down from the lords. Lord Russel's was so. To take an estate, descended to the right heirs, to be forfeited, I never heard of that before. Should this make a difference with the lords, the bill is not worth that.

Sir John Guise. It surprizes me that the house is not of the same opinion they were formerly of. You may have a member in the case, and, it seems, to-day, a member is not to be named, but if a member comes in the same circumstances as others, did I think I sat in the house with a murderer, I would not sit till I had thrown him out. I would recommit it upon the debate of the house. You ought to do justice to yourselves, that a man, guilty of murder, should not sit with you: let it be heard at the bar.

Mr. Hampden. I saw a learned plea drawn in that business; but pray let not reflections go amongst us upon the profession of the law. Great persons are descended from the law, and it is a very honourable profession. Our common law is founded upon reason. What law may do in meum et tuum, and conscience is very much enlarged.—Formerly, at least, what a lawyer said, must be probable for his client, but let it be how it will in this. But will you allow a lawyer in point of argument betwixt the crown and the subject? Is he not plainly to say what the law is in that case? It is true, in a doubtful case, the counsel ought not to do it; but, as to restitution, suppose a man killed a very poor man, do you think he owes nothing to the wife and children? nothing to reparation? If not, I have mistaken all the rules of justice. I say this, because I see those things have not their true value; they are under-valued; therefore I would lay it aside.

Sir W. Williams. I am for enlarging your instructions to the committee. I am for naming persons, but whatever persons come by description, within your Order, I would have examined, besides the three Judges; for I believe more were guilty than Burton and Graham. What was their crime? They went only from Whitehall to Newgate, and so to Westminster, like porters of the business; these are solicitors, these are attorneys, the prosecutors are the most guilty. Let the committee have general instructions. Your committee will make no reflections, but according to the right and custom of parliament, and the laws of England. No cause can be just on both sides. As the law stands, the prisoner can have no counsel, and when he has none, he that does prosecute without law against him, is a betrayer of the law.

Lord Falkland. I crave leave to add one case to Williams's, that of the prosecution of the Bishops, wherein our laws and liberties were concerned, which he prosecuted.

Sir W. Williams. Where there was counsel on both sides, I might be counsel.

Sir Robert Cotton. What concerns your member, you ought to put to the question, Whether the committee shall have Instructions to enquire into that; and now you leave them to general enquiry!—[It was said privately, 'That all this fencing was not to save Sawyer, but Finch.']

Col. Birch. I am never more afraid of Mis-carriages than when it is our own concern. I know not what recommitment you mean, unless you tumble it to a committee to do nothing again. You named three or four, and your committee named a member, and you say, 'That is a fault.' This prosecution of Armstrong was more criminal in the solicitor and attorney general than in Burton and Graham to fetch and carry. But here is murder in the case, and you are going out of the way, unless you give leave, nay order, to read it at the bar. Solomon says, 'There is nothing new under the sun.' This may come again before you, for ought I know, therefore settle it now.

Mr. Boscawen. The committee ought to have made a special report. As to your member, you cannot do yourselves, nor your member, right, unless you give a day at the bar to hear it: and it is as necessary that the house justify themselves in their Vote as your member himself.

Sir John Trevor. Armstrong was my particular friend, and I am willing to do any thing for the satisfaction of his family. What will you do with it at the committee? Specially examine it? If your member be injured at the committee, then is your proper time to hear him at the bar: as it is just that the family should have reparation for their loss, particularly made out. It is true, you cannot make particular satisfaction for blood, but for his estate, if you recommit to enquire specially, and let them make a special report, then your member may justify himself.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I speak to your order; and what becomes of your committee's Report? I see, you cannot appoint a charge against your member, without a report, and the committee has given you none; therefore, I move, that if any charge arises at the committee, they may make a special report.

Mr. Hampden. When your member desires to be heard, I am ignorant why it should be denied. I must expect something singular, either that Armstrong was not murdered, or something to the ministerial matter, as he was a lawyer. Privately to give opinion that charters could not be delivered up without perjury, and yet to plead and use all the eloquence against the thing! If the profession of the law gives a man authority to murder a man at this rate, it is the interest of all men to rise and exterminate that profession. I would know what Sawyer can say.

Mr. Dolben. I find there is great stress laid upon Sawyer's being heard at the bar; but I cannot see how it can be, before the committee have reported special matter against him, without accusation of himself. It is plain, that Sawyer did not prosecute the whole indictment. He was indicted in Middlesex. If he that demanded execution be to be prosecuted, he that did the execution may be prosecuted too.

Mr. Hampden. Whether you will go to a committee for examination, and whether you will hear it at the bar, how your member is concerned, it is a question without a question. Nobody will be willing to be judged at a committee of 7 or 8 persons in a chamber to examine a member; or, in general, when a member has been concerned, it was never done, but if that arise, let it be reported specially. It is strange a committee should examine a member whether guilty, or not guilty. If you command the committee, before the Bill comes to perfection, you may hear your member answer in his place, and appoint a day for it. You yourselves cannot empower a committee to examine a member; it is the privilege of the house, and the privilege of every person in it. If a member falls in collaterally, if ever they hear a member named, they stand up and go no farther, but report it to the house. If they have done irregularly, will you do so too? Let it be recommitted, and your member may answer in his place.

Jan. 20. Mr. Christie reported the Bill re-committed for annulling sir Thomas Armstrong's Attainder, with some Amendments; and specially reports the above Information against sir Robert Sawyer.

Sir Tho. Clarges. In punishing persons, you may do a precedent of dangerous consequence for the future; therefore I would have Burton and Graham heard.

Sir John Guise. You have referred this to a private committee, and now they bring the Report to the house; is there any Objection that the committee have not done their duty? You had it once before you, and referred it to a committee.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Burton and Graham never made any application to the house to be heard, but the committee, that had power to send for persons, papers, and records, never sent for these persons.

Sir Wm. Williams. All cannot be heard; some are dead, and they cannot be heard, and by that consequence you cannot charge their estates. The judges are charged with giving a corrupt and illegal judgment; if these persons did it corruptly and maliciously, and these persons are in the Bill, it came naturally before the committee. Such persons as could be heard, were heard. I would do justice justly. I would hear them at the bar; but with what justice can you then hear Jeffreys's and Alibone's executors afterwards?

Col. Austen. As to the justness of it, they were summoned by the committee, and will not appear, and now they would be heard in the house. If, when you committed this Bill, and the committee named persons, you thought it not in their power, and these people would not appear there, I hope you will not receive their petition in the house. I hope you will begin with the special matter reported.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. A petition is offered, and you do not right unless you receive it. Armstrong was condemned without hearing, and will you do the same thing again? If nothing will appear on your books which was said in their defence, it is a dangerous precedent. Graham and Burton are in your custody; let us not go out of the common way of justice, but hear them.

Mr. Hampden. Some persons were prosecutors of Armstrong. I have observed, that all the arts of delay are used, and it is no strange thing for people to avoid punishment, and to take all legal advantages; but the question is, What you will do now in administration of your justice? One could not come, but Holloway and Wythens might, and now you are moved to hear them by counsel. I am of opinion they should be heard ore tenus; there is nothing to be heard upon the matter of fact. I think you will not hear them by counsel; they ought to answer for themselves. Here is nothing in the case but 'guilty, or not guilty.' I would have it brought to issue. If you will hear it, I would have no denial, for your justice will be as well in administration as execution. But if they come to be heard without counsel, every man answers for himself. You have declared already how the law stands: let your summons be short and peremptory, to appear at their peril.

Mr. Garroway. There is no need of counsel to trouble you. If the Judges, &c. appear, what they can say will do them little good; they will be in your Act of Indemnity; therefore hear them to-morrow morning, before you go on the Bill of Indemnity.

Mr. Smith. I agree to what is proposed, but you are told, 'The dead cannot be heard for themselves.' They have left executors, and order them to appear then.

Mr. Hampden. It is an odd thing to think of pains and penalties (as is moved) before you have found persons. If that be done, do you not look upon them as criminals? Suppose you say, 'Burton and Graham, &c. shall never act as attorneys in Westminster-hall, nor in the ecclesiastical courts.' Perhaps they are not guilty; therefore I think the Indemnity needs not stay for this. You need say no more, than that those who acted in Armstrong's prosecution shall make his family reparation, as well as to public justice.

Sir Wm. Whitlock. I do as much detest this murder of Armstrong, as any man, but I would give a reasonable time for hearing a man. Hearing a man suddenly is not hearing him. Pray let it be Saturday.

Sir Robert Rich. I am bound to believe, that every gentleman means cordially, and I shall be one of those to wipe blood off from this house. I have no malice, nor any relation concerned. I believe, those men are satisfied that they cannot justify themselves, but will be trifling with you. If you will do justice to the fatherless, tell them so; next to that, tell them that their cause is not good. But what consequence is there in hearing them all in a day; I never knew men without a contrivance; they may have the gout, or be sick. I watched your committee, and, according to order, your member, Sawyer, was named. Therefore pray go upon your member present.

Sir Wm. Williams. You have ordered the records of Armstrong's prosecution to be brought; pray let the officer be called in (sir S. Astrey,) to attend you, both with the records of the Outlawry, and the awards of execution. It may so fall out that matter of law may arise; therefore let it be indefinitely, not for bidding counsel.

Mr. Smith. The law says, 'A man shall not be executed in twelve months, &c.' and Armstrong appeared within that time; will you hear counsel as to that?

Ordered, "1. That sir R. Holloway, sir F. Wythens, the executors of the late lord Jeffreys, the executors of the late Mr. justice Walcott, Mr. R. Graham, and Mr. Philip Burton, do attend this house on Saturday next; to answer to such matters as are charged upon them, touching the proceedings against sir Tho. Armstrong. Ordered, 2. That sir Samuel Astrey do, at the same time, attend the house with the Records of the proceedings, both upon the Outlawry, and the awarding execution against sir Tho. Armstrong."

Then Mrs. Matthews, (sir Tho. Armstrong's daughter,) was called in, and asked, 'What she knew of the prosecution against her father; and, who were the prosecutors?'

Mrs. Matthews. "The judges were Jeffreys, Wythens, Holloway, and Walcott; Sawyer, Burton, and Graham, prosecutors. I was with Sawyer for a writ of error: He said, 'Your father must die, he must die; he is an ill man.' My mother was ready to pay him all his due fees, but he said, 'He must die, he must die.' When my father was brought to the bar, the chief justice asked Sawyer 'What he had to say?' Sawyer prayed an award of execution; which was done: My father desired that the statute of outlawries might be read. He said, 'He thought it was plain that he was come in within a year, &c.' Said Sawyer, 'sir Thomas Armstrong will not find any thing in the statute to his purpose; Possibly he will say, he surrendered himself to your lordship, but, sir Thomas, you should have surrendered yourself before you went out of England;' and he alleged Holloway's case. Said the chief justice, 'We have enough against him.' Said Sawyer, 'The king did indulge in Holloway's case, but Armstrong was active in the fire at Newmarket, and he has received dangerous letters,' whereas they were no more than a recommendation to the duke of Brandenburg."

Sir Robert Sawyer. Be pleased to ask her, if, when she came to me for a writ of error, I told her, 'It was not in my power; she must petition the king?' And whether I demanded execution till the court had declared their opinion? and whether, after he said 'He had surrendered himself,' I demanded execution?

Mrs. Matthews. "I believe Sawyer said, 'It was not in his power to grant a writ of error,' and did say, 'You must apply to the king, or lord keeper, by petition.' The king and the duke said, 'It was an impudent petition.' I cannot say, Sawyer demanded execution before the Judges had declared themselves."—She withdrew.

Sir Robert Rich. You will hear those in the house, sure, as long as those out of the house. Before you debate your member must answer, and then withdraw. If by law, the member can justify himself; if the contrary, he may say something in mitigation. If the warrant of execution was signed by that demand, let him tell you whether it was by himself, or any body else.

Sir Robert Sawyer. I shall only observe, that the person who informs you of this, is single, and a person interested, when they might have produced multitudes of persons; and that will appear. I did no more than my duty. She said, 'I told her Armstrong must die, and that he was an ill man.' I call God to witness, I said it not, nor used such language. I said, 'I had no power to give a writ of error; it must be obtained by petition to the king.' As for my management at the arraignment, it was according to my oath and duty to attend the court. Every tittle of what passed was printed in three days, and went all over England. It was not only lawful, but my duty, to put Armstrong upon trial, to hear what he could say to the record of the outlawry, and I prayed judgment: if he had nothing to say, it was my duty to pray execution; I went no farther, not a tittle in this business. Armstrong quoted such a statute, and it was read in court. 'Has he rendered himself to the chief-justice?' 'No.' Armstrong said, 'I now render myself to your lordship.' This is the fact. I never argued to incline the court one way or another. The king indulged Holloway, but he had that against Armstrong that he could not allow it. It was my duty to demand judgment of the outlawry. The clerk of the crown will satisfy you fully.—He withdrew.

Sir Robert Clayton. I observe, Sawyer, before he went out, excused himself by the forms of the court, 'That he asked for execution but once;' and that, after the statute was read, and Armstrong said, 'He surrendered himself,' he sat down and said no more. I take it not for his crime to do his duty, but he ought to have informed the king what was law; for asking the thing contrary to law, the crime was charged; he had direction from the king. I think he comes well off to make satisfaction to these poor creatures, his daughters.

Mr. Smith. Sawyer tells the king, 'Armstrong ought to have a trial;' but does it appear that he offered any thing before the court had declared? Unless there be farther matter than I see yet, I find him not criminal.

Mr. Hawles. I did persuade Sawyer to give these ladies some money, and prevent the matter from coming here.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I hope Sawyer may come off; but for a member to make bargains in point of blood, is a strange thing, and ought to be taken notice of.

Sir John Guise. We are all about giving them something for the blood of their father, and it is no strange thing.

Mr. Hawles. I formerly cited the case of Blackwell and Sacheverell. Some say, 'I encouraged this matter;' and I have had hard words given me for it. As for Burton and Graham, they only brought Armstrong up, &c. but for an attorney-general, when he has that office, how comes it to pass that he must leave all rules of common honesty? I wish this gentleman had been as nice in spilling blood, as we are in punishing it. This was error in fact, and when so, the attorney-general ought to consent to reversing the outlawry, or to the demurrer. The statute says that to him, 'If he comes in in a year and a day.' The attorney-general ought to consider whether the fact was true, or not; if not, it ought to be reversed. If you believe Mrs. Matthews, Armstrong was condemned before he came into court. He said, 'He is an ill man, and must die.' Suppose the king tells the attorney-general, 'That is an ill man, let him be hanged, right or wrong;' he is bound to pursue the interest of his client, and it was for the interest of the king to preserve his subjects. He ought to have retracted, and told the court, there was error, and he might have had his writ. If it goes upon the justice of the house, it goes hard with Sawyer, not only as to satisfaction, but something farther.

Sir Robert Cotton. As Sawyer did his duty to the king, so he did to the prisoner. He asked the court, 'Whether he did surrender himself?' which put both the court and the prisoner in mind of it. He pressed not execution. If that was his duty, he was not to blame for it. He put the court in mind that there was something in this surrender. What he said and what he did in court is only before you; and he did his duty to God, the king, and the prisoner.

Sir John Guise. Sawyer has confessed a worse thing than he has been charged with. He told Armstrong, 'He had more evidence against him than against Holloway.' If Cotton takes the evidence right from the bar, it is of another sort than he mentions it. Sawyer is not accused for prosecuting as attorney-general, but he might have advised the contrary. Are not prisoners condemned upon the whole, and not upon the half? The most abominable part of an attorney-general he has acted. It is a small recompence to the family to have a fine for the loss of a man that might have been considerable in the war. Pray let him be brought into the Bill of Indemnity.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. The demand of judgment was not Sawyer's crime. He opposed not the reading of the statute. I would put no hardships upon persons who serve you in the courts of justice.

Mr. Foley. If your member was not a prosecutor, I wonder how Burton and Graham came to be so. Did he demand execution before the 12 months were expired? That is his crime, and you are to judge Sawyer upon that. Armstrong desired the statute might be read; your member said, 'That will do you no good,' for Sawyer pressed execution; and that is his crime; and things will never be well, till some of that profession be made examples.

Mr. Hampden, jun. I wonder it should be insisted upon, 'That demanding judgment should be no crime.' I would demand, whether the Jews were criminal for demanding judgment against our Saviour? When king Charles 1 was tried, solicitor-general Cooke demanded judgment against him—(I make no comparison.) But I ask, 'Whether nobody can be murdered but a king?' We have a new sort of monsters in the world, haranguing a man to death; these I call blood-hounds, that make speeches as long as my stick. Sawyer is very criminal, and guilty of this murder.

Mr. Garroway. I speak to discharge my conscience: I will not have the blood of this man at my door. This gentleman fled, and was outlawed, and abroad was trepanned by one Everis, who decoyed and brought him off. They had designed his death before he ever came in. There was a year and a day for him to appear, and plead, to reverse the outlawry. Sawyer demanded judgment against him, and execution. I believe Sawyer not so ignorant a man as not to know all this. I believe him guilty of the death of this man; do what you will with him.

Mr. Boscawen. When Armstrong demanded the reading of the statute, Sawyer said, 'That will do you no good.' Was not that a perverting judgment? To have an eloquent attorney-general tell what is law! Whoever perverts judgment, I shall never excuse him.

Mr. Smith. This gentleman takes a thing for granted that was not so. Sawyer said, 'The statute would do Armstrong no good.' I suppose, you will take it for granted, the gentleman may be mistaken, and understand not law. Suppose I draw a sword to defend a man, and he be killed, must I be hanged for him? If Sawyer, after the statute was read, did demand Judgment, I shall pronounce him guilty.

Mr. Boscawen. I appeal to the long-robe, whether, on a murder, the wife and children are not good witnesses against a man?

Marquis of Winchester. As to the mistake, Sawyer said, 'He refers himself to the prints.' Pray let them be seen. Sawyer said, 'The statute would do him no good;' and made a long speech after. This person is not fit for the king's mercy.

Sir Wm. Williams reads all the passages in the print, after reading the statute in the court upon the trial.

Sir Wm. Whitlock. I am against all manner of tyrannical proceedings. No man detests this murder more than myself. When he heard the statute read, not to be convinced! Would the judges have been so headstrong to do it unless he had demanded judgment? I believe lord Lovelace had been destroyed if Sawyer had not been attorney-general. You cannot distinguish this without the judges, face to face.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I would know, whether a printed trial be evidence? If you read it, you will make a judgment. I think it not for the honour of the house to read it. If it be no evidence, why will you read it? You cannot ground a judgment upon what Westminster-Hall will not allow to be evidence. The person, Mrs. Matthews, who is evidence, is to have benefit by it. You may have persons of that court that can give you legal evidence. It is said, 'That Sawyer refers himself to the paper;' but the question is, Whether we can give judgment on it?

Sir Henry Capel. I desire that Westminster-Hall may not be a rule of evidence for this house. They are an inferior court; we, the great inquest of the nation. I will not appeal to the gentlemen of the long-robe; every man here has equally his judgment. I think, Sawyer referred himself to the print; if he himself appeals to it, read it.

Sir Wm. Williams. The question is, 'Whether the woman is in the right, or the print?' It is said by Trevor, 'He was by, and heard it not.' A hundred were by; that passes for nothing. The print is against Sawyer, the woman against him, and the fact against him; therefore put the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am satisfied that every one of these prints is true, for they are like parts in a play; every body pauses upon his own part, and they sign it. The main thing that affects your member is not yet touched. Mrs. Matthews came with her father's case to Sawyer, who said, 'He must die.' If that be really so, and if the witness speak true, it looks like a designed thing by his answer. The statute was perverted, and the court so indiscreet as to say, 'Holloway had the benefit of it, for there was evidence against him.' Armstrong was tried in a cabinet before-hand. The proper question is, 'Whether Sawyer shall be put into the Indemnity, or not?'

Sir R. Sawyer expelled.] Resolved, "That sir Robert Sawyer's name be put into the Bill of Indemnity, as one of the prosecutors of sir Thomas Armstrong." And the question being put, That he be expelled the house; it passed in the affirmative, 131 to 71.

Debate on the Bills of Indemnity.] Jan. 21. Mr. Sacheverell. I move, that there may be particular names, and not descriptions, for that will be setting them free that are dead, for all the ills they have done, be they dead or alive; and having raised their own fortunes, if they can go off so in that manner, and leave children so great as to be noblemen, I desire not such families to be great in England. You have given your judgment upon a member yesterday, and if there be any more you shall think fit to name in this house, first either declare that none here shall be named, or if there be, that he shall withdraw; for else it is not equal justice. In all Acts of Indemnity there are general Heads, and under them except all that shall be excepted. To bind up your committee, that there shall be no general Heads, is to bind up your own hands. But if any thing appear before you have done your bill, I would not be bound up by any binding rule.

Mr. Ettrick. I think you have been well moved to name persons. Of those that are offenders against the government you are at liberty to name a hundred, man by man. You spent a great deal of time, the last session, when you went upon heads. There were no ill effects in Charles 2's time. How many men were there whose bloods cried for vengeance? There was a temper of reconciliation and union; now it is otherwise; we have a war in Ireland and Scotland, and are not satisfied with one another. There is nothing better than a reconciliation.

Mr. Dolben. I am for an experiment, to try now whether we shall have better success in naming persons. I would name persons, but I had rather that things found out persons, but those things are so far from finding out persons, that you have been forced to seek for persons without doors, records and offices, and with much ado you have found out one of ten persons concerned. You are desired now to try another way more likely to effect your end than to name persons. Some, like Cain, bear their brands about them. You will find enough to satisfy the justice of the nation. I think, the honour of the house is concerned. Here has been a mighty Revolution, an Abdication of the Crown, &c. and still you find not out the persons who were the occasion of all this. Instances of the late malversations are numerous. If you go the same way, you will have no more success this session than you had last. The way proposed will be more successful, because more expeditious: I believe it, and move it.

Mr. Peregrine Bertie. I move, that sir Wm. Williams may be excepted in the Indemnity.

Sir Edw. Hussey. I second it.

Sir John Lowther. It is well moved, to proceed upon persons, and not crimes; the objection against it is material; it may be thought by it to excuse the dead; the greatest criminals you have are dead. There may be persons found hereafter not yet found. Sure you will set persons at ease at last! I hope you will put the question, and every gentleman will agree to it.

Mr. Howe. There is great expectation from abroad of what we shall do in the Indemnity. I hope you will not put revenge beyond your justice. If it appears that, in the last reign, there was nothing done illegal, and that men were not driven out of their places that would not comply with Popery, &c. and by taking away charters, to pack parliaments and juries to murder lord Russel, and acquit count Coningsmark; * from whence comes the choice of such men, to return juries and votes in chusing parliament-men, and from whence have proceeded all the murders and imprisonments? I know no man in the house that has occasion of an Indemnity, but I hope not to see as formerly that vitia in senatum veniunt.

Sir R. Cotton. I am for coming to an end, and that you cannot do till you have named persons you will except. But by this way of debating crimes at large, you will sit to little purpose to arrive at your end.

Sir R. Napier. Some do not like the taking away Charters; that came malum ab aquilone; nor regulators—But if you take particular persons that carry the mark of Cain upon them, name them. There were men that sailed with every wind; one has been named, and I desire he may withdraw.

Sir John Guise. Things are evidence. You have before you a motion for Williams to withdraw. I wonder that you name one, when there are more as well as he.

* For procuring ruffians to murder Mr. Thynne, in his coach, in Pall Mall.

Sir Henry Goodrick. If I have a mind to name them, I have courage and heart to do it, but I am not compelled to name them.

Sir John Guise. I hear of quieting mens minds, and that this punishment will quiet the minds of some people. You owe it to justice to punish great offenders. Here is that High Commission Court; let that enquiry be instructions to the committee; you will see who they are, and there you may select such as are fit to make examples. That of Corporations too, both prosecuting and betraying Charters. The thing has been thrown from one to another; let the things speak themselves. The lords have sent you evidence; I believe, it is in your hands, it is an evidence, a record, and I desire it may be read.

The Speaker. By order of the lords, their clerk delivered some papers to your clerk; there was a message expected with it, and therefore I acquainted not the house with it.

Sir Henry Goodrick. When Papists, nay a Jesuit, sat in council, and since, by form of law, they have cut mens throats, I cannot come to a determination till we have purged our own house. Where there is a full proof, and full evidence, I will spare no man. But if you go generally, it may raise such consternations, that possibly there may be no safety for us to sit here, and, if settled, it will make men easy.

Sir Tho. Lee. I would forget and forgive. But seducing and exposing all England to the rapine of the Jesuits, they cannot sit here who have betrayed the nation—The late king sat safely when his council told him it was law. I move, that that may be taken first into consideration. I do recommend heartily not to proceed in general terms. Where there are faults, and those evidently proved, I would have them punished, but not to involve all England.

Col. Birch. As to the work before you, if you will not let things find out persons, you will not have done in a year; but the thing is to purge your own house. I am against it, and I desire you will proceed according to the orders of the house. It is said, 'Every body knows whom he means;' but I do not. There was a member expelled yesterday, though but glanced at, and no proof—I have heard members charged, but then the person that charges, stands up and declares he will make it good; that being done, the accused stands up and makes his defence; but before proof he is not to withdraw. This is the ancient usage of parliament, and I am ready that any body take up the first stone, and throw it at me.

Mr. Foley. What moved this instruction to the committee of the whole house, I understand not, nor to what end this motion was made. Are you resolved that men should escape, because you know not their names? I am against the question, and I would have the committee proceed as they think fit.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. It is absolutely necessary that some should be punished, for vindicating the king's honour, and to justify without doors what we have done. The motion was made to except no other general crimes than what are already excepted; the reason was, because there is the same exception in this, as in other Pardons; but this turns quite another way. In the Bill of Rights, you did consider offences there enumerated, &c. Men will find out crimes to undo kingdoms by new ways; therefore, unless you make new punishments, how will they be met with? Murders and rapes are easily done, but it requires learning and invention to subvert laws and government? Is it only murders, felonies, rapes, &c. you are to prevent? You will make sorry work else with them that occasioned the Abdication of king James. Whenever you name persons, must not you name offences at last? You will spend as much time one way as the other, but it is of infinite consequence that the crimes be stated, else the next age will not know why you have punished, persons. Upon the whole, if you will have the world see the crimes you have punished, you ought to leave it entirely to the committee. State the Heads, and leave it to them to adapt persons to it.

Mr. Hawles. I have a great value for the common-law, which never enquires into murder till you find it a murder, nor a robbery, till it be found so. I am clearly of opinion, that else you will run into great absurdities; as in the Bill of Corporations, &c. the Judges ran up fines from 1000*l.* to 40,000*l.* Then you took other methods; as in Richard 2's time, there were judgments against judgments, and for some hundreds of years you heard no more of them. Go to that which is the most crying sin, the delivering up of every man. Persons have been irregularly executed. When a man is put into power, they make him do what they list. A person was kept out a good while that sat in your chair, (Williams;) at last they brought him in; he sat in your chair, and acted for you, and afterwards was fined 10,000*l.* for it, and was afraid that his life would have been taken away; if he owns that, I hope you will pass him by. Except as few as you can in the Bill, but it is the readiest way. Charters, and the Dispensing Power, were but the consequence of the former.

Mr. Garroway. I am against naming persons till you have agreed to things. I never heard of a person accused here, but he found somebody to excuse him. They that do not like the thing to be punished, let them go upon another Head. But since your last sitting, there has been such management, that if it be not punished upon another Head, I see a melancholy prospect of our safety; since the king does not know the persons that have abused him. Find out things, else you will never find out the persons, nor come at them as long as you live. If you will go upon prosecutors, go upon all, and find them out by what they have done.

Col. Austen. It seems to me a natural way to go upon things. Suppose I find who was most obnoxious, and has led you out of the way of the government, is there any difficulty then to name persons? Therefore, for the ease of the committee, give directions to come to persons by things, and then I am for as few as you please; and not from things to persons.

Sir R. Howard. I think an Act of Indemnity is expected, and I acknowledge that all Revolutions, (though this is one of the strangest) have been followed with an Indemnity. To propose a censure on persons, and not tell you why, is very strange.

Major Wildman. To me it seems strange, that any member should name a person that ought to be excepted, before crimes are stated. The matter is worthy of great consideration, what sorts of crimes you will make examples to all futurity, by naming a man for some sort of crimes where he may be involved in the usual way of mercy. But some are involved in one thing, some in another, that cannot be proved till we see crimes. It is not our business to consider an Act of Indemnity for crimes punished by ordinary course of justice, but of murders in form of law; to tell the king who must die, this crime the common courts of justice cannot punish. For subverting the law, &c. the gentlemen of the long robe of this house would be hard put to it to form an indictment against such a person. A parliament may judge common law treason; and an intention to subvert the government, endeavours to subvert the laws and liberties of England; the parliament declares what that crime is, and then you find out the persons that committed them. How can a man find out the occasion of the prince of Orange's coming hither to deliver us from arbitrary government and Popery? No man can take upon him to destroy the liberties of this house, and judge it in Westminster-hall. Let every one agree a crime to be excepted, and then you will easily bring persons under that Head. I do not intend (upon explanation of myself) that I would have you declare what crimes you will not except, for the Heads of offences are numerous.

Serjeant Maynard. I think, the less Instructions you give the committee, the better you will proceed. Those that would have perverted our souls and estates, have been against our religion, laws, and liberties. As for those that anciently did go to subvert and overthrow a government, a common judge had nothing to do with it, but it was referred to the senate of the people. The archbishop and the bishops were brought to trial by a jury, at the King's-bench bar, for a modest and dutiful petition to the king, to be made a libel. Some have made a matter of excuse for the Judges, 'That they were convened to tell the king what might be done by law, and made excuse, as in H. 4th's time, that it was for fear of death;' but a man ought not to save his life by subverting the laws, who is sworn to maintain them. But that served not their turns then for an excuse. As for the Charters, &c. no man can doubt but they are highly guilty that would have subverted law and parliament. There was a call of serjeants and judges for that purpose.

Whenever this comes to a committee, I would not give general Instructions, for you will bring in a multitude of persons. I concur to name persons with their crimes. The Trial Book is no evidence: God forbid any man should be hanged by a Book!

Mr. Harley. Upon the Instructions I confess my ignorance, therefore I desire to be informed, whether you will except persons without crimes? Will not you adjudge crimes for persons to be excepted out of the Indemnity? If you take persons at random, possibly you may not take them that are most guilty.

Mr. Attorney Treby. You are upon a strange motion, to my understanding, Instructions to a committee. I remember not that ever done to a committee of the whole house—I am not an advocate for the times of usurpation. The family I come of adhered to the crown. As I have suffered in Charles 1st's time, I abhor those on the scaffold with vizors, and those that sat in the Court of Justice. The more latitude you give your committee, the better you will do your work. I would rather except persons by name, but then you must do it by that way that some would preclude your committee from. You except them from pardon, and reserve them for hearing. Those who would establish Popery I would not name, because they are in the dark. Those urged the prosecution of the Bishops, and the dispensing with the Oaths and Test; they were great enormities, but destroying Corporations was the mother-treason that brought forth all these. If the Judges had not so much law, they had so much wit as would have told them the thing you fear; viz. 'Your judgment will destroy parliaments: you dispense with thirty or forty statutes.'—The most mercenary Judge in Westminster-hall would not have had the courage to do this, they would never have done it, but they thought themselves parliament-proof. 'It is but nominal, (they said) not real—only a number of packed malefactors, like yourselves, and no danger from them.' I can no more endure that these should be pardoned, than to set all the jails in England open, to let loose rogues and malefactors. He that would have these pardoned, let that gentleman stand up next after me, and say so. There have been ill things in court, but much worse out of court. They tried Holloway, because they had evidence; against Armstrong they had none. It is confessed, that we granted Holloway trial, there was enough against him: There was the virtue of that good man Sawyer. Against Armstrong we had nothing; therefore try him upon the Outlawry; and he was hanged without trial. Some are in the dark, no man knows their names; but except them upon that—It is reasonable that there should be no cramping a committee; let them go into it, without farther Instructions.

Mr. Sacheverell. Now it is manifest, that, if you go upon persons, and not things, you may as well say you will neither go upon persons nor things. If you put the question for general Instructions, that may be something, but if you put it as now, the whole house sees the meaning of it.

Mr. Hampden. We all mean very well. You had a question proposed. I never saw such an one go abroad before. If one questions for persons, and not things, then those persons are put to the question, Whether they shall be punished? For what? For nothing. Another desires it may be proved upon persons; for what? for crimes, sure. These kind of questions are strange. Were it not more clear to name your crimes? And then we may the more impartially give judgment. In all courts, in all judicatures, they say, 'Here is the law, and here is the fact, and then try if the persons be guilty of this fact.' A man to be tried, and to be guilty of a crime which is not defined? No question that has been proposed is fit to stand upon your Books. Every body means well, but not well expressed.

Mr. Smith. I take every gentleman's intentions to be sincere; but whether shall there be a general exemption, or not? I believe there are people in the dark that deserve exceptions. You have not yet found out the persons who advised these Ecclesiastical Commissions. You see only the actors. These things were done, and people never knew the authors, and, unless you prevent these private orders, you may have them for the future; and as long as persons sit in the lords' house that are accused of these things done in the dark (lord Halifax) I shall never think we are safe.—Upon exceptions taken at some words, Lord Falkland. I did say, that Arnold said, 'That from the abdication of king James, to the pardoning those rogues that gave up the Charters, they had always given ill Votes.' I should not have taken notice of this, if I had not too much reason to believe there has been too much notice taken of what has been said in this house abroad.

Mr. Arnold. If the gentleman had taken all I said, I applied it to those out of this house, perhaps to those of the Devil-Tavern Club, but I applied it not to members of the house.

Sir John Trevor. I am not for this; it is not the way, to be in heat; this is not Indemnity; at this rate, we shall want Indemnity here. Some things carry Pardons in themselves. I desire pardon and pity. In Hen. 6th's time, some great peers contended for precedence without doors, because it was so in the lords' house. They were ordered to shake hands, and be friends, and go on with the business of the kingdom. I would do so now.—The previous question for proceeding on the Bills, by nominating of particular persons, passed in the negative, 190 to 173.

Debate on a Petition from sir Thomas Pilkington, Lord Mayor of London, and others.]*

* "Pilkington was sheriff of London in the year 1682; an honest, but an indiscreet man, that gave himself great liberties in discourse. He being desired to go along with the mayor and aldermen to compliment the duke upon his return from Scotland, declined going, and reflected January 22. Sir Peter Rich attended in his place, according to the Order of the house, upon a Petition from sir Thomas Pilkington, lord mayor of London, and others, who were fined on pretence of a riot at the election of Sheriffs for the city of London in 1682.* The Petition was read; and sir Peter Rich was heard, what he had to say in his own defence. After which, a motion was made, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make reparation to the lord mayor, and the rest of the petitioners, out of the estates of the persons mentioned in the Petition.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I advise, that this judgment against my lord mayor, and others, may be reversed by writ of error. Where will this end, to bring these things into parliament, which may have remedy elsewhere? What a flood will you bring upon yourselves in these things? The troubles began not in the times of these gentlemen. I doubt, whether there have been any lawful sheriffs of London these seven years, ever since the Charter was taken away. We have had great revolutions, a king abdicated, great wars upon us, and why should these things be brought upon us to trouble the people? I cannot enumerate the consequences. This will be an occasion of great inconveniences upon us. In the late usurpation, lord Capel, lord Holland, col. Penruddock, and others, were murdered, and yet those who sat upon them were pardoned; only some few examples were made, of the most execrable, for quieting the minds of the people. At this rate, we shall be a court to give damages out of one man's estate to another. I would reject the Bill.

Sir Henry Capel. I observe, that arguments are used against this Bill from the Indemnity in 12 Ch. 2. which was occasioned by a time of great misery; but that was not this case; it was then a civil war, brother was against brother. That case is out of doors. It is said, these gentlemen may find remedy in Westminster-hall. If that was the case (as it is not) I think this house has the liberty, in such a case of importance, to take notice of it. You have been told what was done in the time of lord Shaftsbury, and in Mr. Bethel's, but it was lord Ruson him as one concerned in the burning of the city. Two aldermen said, they heard that, and swore it against him. Sir Patience Ward, the mayor of the former year, seeing him go into that discourse, had diverted him from it, but heard not the words which the other swore to: and he deposed, 'That, to the best of his remembrance, he said not those words.' Pilkington was cast in 100,000*l.* damages, the most excessive that had ever been given." Burnet.

* The above-mentioned pretended riot was at Guildhall the same year concerning the right of nominating Sheriffs, when the lord mayor, in opposition to the common hall, nominated North and Rich, who were accordingly returned and sworn Sheriffs; and Pilkington, and others who opposed it, were tried and fined the year after.

sel's case then, and now it is time to make an example.

Sir John Guise. You are told, 'We must be guided by the Indemnity in Ch. 2nd's time.' I hope we shall ever be at liberty of judging whether things are well or ill done. There has been something said by a member that a little surprizes me, 'That if you bring a bill to do right in this case, a court may be erected to give damages out of one man's estate to another.' There are crimes that excel others; do you know any thing of a greater degree than this? Where was there more violation of the laws, than in taking away charters? And where more of charters than London? If you will go upon matters, and not persons, must not this of charters be one? There are mixed cases in these things upon the public, and upon persons. This is an extraordinary case, and there must be such remedies applied, that no such thing shall be dared to be attempted for the future.

Mr. Hawles. I have some reason to understand this case. I had leave from this house to attend the lords in this case, to reverse this judgment by writ of error. If the king must give this damage, (at whose suit it was) you must give it him again. Will you make satisfaction in the Bishops case? I am for that too, to every person concerned. There is no remedy but here, and I am for retaining the bill. A parliament was anciently called every year, or oftener. The parliament then was a court of justice, to relieve on extraordinary occasions. There were juries over-awed by judges; Bethel and Cornish took another course, to find honest men; this was complained of, and they must have new juries and officers, and lord Russel suffered upon it. You have the Indemnity of Ch. 2. mentioned. This is not a bill of punishment, but a bill of satisfaction, to value wrongs they have done; and you may pardon them for the crimes. If you ask the value of the affection of father and children, they cannot tell what they are; go as far as you can, if these are faulty, and the petitioners may come for satisfaction. It is a reasonable bill, and I hope you will accept it. Would you have a return to what you are delivered from? It is a just bill.

Mr. Hampden. We have a great matter before us in debate, because it is so extraordinary. This matter, it is true, does relate to a common indemnity; but, I think, it is not promoted by justifying every thing that has been done, nor punishing, but to prevent, for the future, the same thing again; and that, if there be not this bill to deter men, they may fall into the same offences. Some men call this 'a punishment,' and some, 'a reparation,' but it is in a sense both. Some satisfaction and reparation ought to be made these persons according to natural justice, but it is one thing what a man in conscience ought to do, and what you compel him to do; it is one thing what a man in strict justice is bound to. To make men pay a sum by such a law, I cannot readily consent to it; I have heard nothing fully to satisfy me. This, truly, is an injury done, and, in conscience, they are bound to make reparation. That of Armstrong was a just judgment of reparation. Corruption is not taken in that limited sense of 'taking money:' corruption is taking a place of 1500*l.* per ann. In a common case, brave men, soldiers, condemn a man for delivering up a castle, or fort, because he is afraid to keep it; and they should have known that before he undertook to keep it. There needs not common-law, nor statute-law, in the matter; it is against common sense. If you say there is no other law, you will quickly be distinguished out of all your liberties. I am of opinion, therefore, 'That the Petition for leave to bring in a Bill, to make reparation to my lord mayor, and the rest of the petitioners, from sir Peter Rich, and others, do lie upon the table;' but not to go barely off so, for they have done notoriously, and I cannot believe that men, able to make a common bargain, should give up their sense and reason in that manner. This was not done only against the city of London, but against the whole kingdom, and if you are not bound to give particular reparation to the persons injured, you are to the public, and, in the mean time, to remove the person, sir Peter Rich, from your company.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. When a bill is brought in for satisfaction of injury done, it is strange that a gentleman should start another question. If you talk of removing people, it is a strange thing. Keep us to a question. This Petition sets out 'that the petitioners can have no remedy in the Exchequer,' and you are told of the prudence of it. Will it be an act of prudence to give reparation, when they may have it out of the exchequer? The question is, Whether they shall have a bill, or not a bill?

The Petition was read, and Musgrave was mistaken in the contents.

Sir Robert Rich. I see nothing in the petition as is alleged. I see, virtue is virtue still, though it wants encouragement. It is plain, the petitioners can have no remedy but here, but by an innuendo; therefore pray put the question.

Serjeant Maynard. If these gentlemen will thrust themselves into the office of sheriffs, and have made returns, they have meddled with what they had nothing to do. Whether rightfully sheriffs, or de facto only, that alters the case. Whenever you will have justice against the king, you must go to the exchequer for it. Never so much injury, and no remedy there! When they come there, the barons are bound to give judgment in restitution. Their only way is to send out a writ to the tally-office to pay the money. Upon the whole matter, leave them to have their liberty to have an action of law.

The question for bringing in a Bill to make reparation to the lord mayor, and the rest of the petitioners, out of the Estates of the persons mentioned in the Petition, was carried in the negative, 169 to 152.

An Amendment to the Corporation Bill carried in the Affirmative.] Jan. 23. The house of lords went into a committee to consider of the Bill, intituled, 'An Act to restore Corporations to their antient Rights and Privileges.'—The house was resumed, and the earl of Mulgrave reported, That the committee of the whole house have been upon the first enacting Clause in the Bill; and it is the opinion of the committee, that the words 'declared, and were and are illegal,' should not stand in the Bill.—Then this question was put, Whether to agree with the committee in leaving out those words? It was resolved in the affirmative, contents 38, proxies 13, in all 51; not content 39, proxies 4, in all 43*.

* "When it was brought up to the lords, the first point in debate was upon the declaratory part, Whether a corporation could be forfeited or surrendered. The lord chief justice Holt, and two other Judges were for the affirmative, but all the rest for the negative. No precedents for the affirmative were brought higher than the reign of Henry 8, in which the abbies were surrendered; which was at that time so great a point of state, that the authority of these precedents seemed not clear enough for regular times. The house was so equally divided, that it went for the bill only by one voice. After which, little doubt was made of the passing the act. But now the applications of the Tories were much quickened: they made the king all possible promises; and the promoters of the bill saw themselves exposed to the Corporations, which were to feel the effects of this bill so sensibly, that they made as great promises on their part. The matter was now at a critical issue: the passing the bill put the king and the nation in the hands of the Whigs; and the rejecting it, and dissolving the parliament upon it, was such a trusting to the Tories, and such a breaking with the Whigs, that the king was long in suspense what to do. He was once very near a desperate resolution, he thought he could not trust the Tories, and he resolved he would not trust the Whigs. He imagined, however, that the Tories would be true to the queen, and confide in her, though they would not in him. He therefore resolved to go over to Holland, and leave the government in the queen's hands.—Upon this he called together the marquis of Carmarthen, the earl of Shrewsbury, and some few more, and told them that he had a convoy ready, and was resolved to leave all in the queen's hands, since he did not see how he could extricate himself out of the difficulties into which the animosities of parties had brought him. They pressed him vehemently to lay aside all such resolutions, and to comply with the present necessity. Much passion appeared among them; and the debate was so warm, that many tears were shed. In conclusion, the king resolved to change his first design into another better resolution, of going over in person into Ireland, to put an end to the war there. The queen knew nothing of the first design, so reserved was the king to her in a matter, that concerned her so nearly. The king's intention Protest thereon.] Memorandum, That the lords following, before the putting of the above-said question, desired leave to enter their Dissents if the question was carried in the affirmative, and accordingly they do enter their dissents as follow:—"1. That there hath been only two cases cited, in all the law books, towards the maintaining the Surrender of Corporations, viz. Dyer 273, 282. The opinions in these cases are not upon argument, the first of them, as appears by the Book, needed, and had an act of parliament to confirm it, being denied to be law, in my lord Coke's third report, in the dean and chapter of Norwich's Case, 44 Eliz. The other of them denied to be law by the judges of the King's-bench in Fulcher and Heywood's Case in 2 Ch. 1. in Palmer's Reports; and by the express Resolution of the Judges in that case a Corporation cannot, by surrender, dissolve itself. 2. Because that Beda, in the time of Hen. 5. and the corporation of Newbury, did surrender to that king, which was not allowed; but the house of commons called upon them to send up members, notwithstanding the said surrender; and, until they petitioned the said house, setting forth their inability of supporting that charge, they were not excused; but the house allowed their petition, and they have sent none since. 3. The Surrenders in debate being for the intent and purpose of returning such parliamentmen whom the king should appoint, was for the subversion of the laws and liberties of England, and introducing of Popery and arbitrary government; and that the putting out these words seems to be the justifying of the most horrid action that king James was guilty of during his reign; and we humbly conceive, a denying the chiefest grievance mentioned in king William's Declaration when he was prince, and the greatest inducement for the people's taking up arms in defence of their liberties and properties, and Protestant religion, and the establishing this king upon the throne. (Signed) Bolton, Herbert, Macclesfield, Bedford, Ashburnham*, Montagu, Vaughan, Stamford, Sidney."

of going to Ireland, appeared by the preparations, that were ordered; but a great party was formed in both houses to oppose it. Some really apprehended, that the air of that country would be fatal to so weak a constitution; and the jacobites had no mind, that king James should be so much pressed, as he would probably be, if the king went against him in person. It was by concert proposed in both houses on the same day, to prepare an Address to the king against this voyage: so the king, to prevent the address, came to the parliament, and acquainted both houses with his resolution of going in person to Ireland, 'and as I have' says he, 'already ventured my life for the preservation of the religion, laws and liberties of this nation, so I am willing again to expose it, to secure you the quiet enjoyment of them.' Tindal.

* John Ashburnham, esq. created baron Ashburnham May 30, 1689.

The King's Speech at the Prorogation.] Jan. 27. The king came to the house of peers, and gave the royal assent to the Poll-bill; to the Bill to prevent 'vexatious Suits against such as acted in order to the bringing their majesties;' to the bill 'for the better security and relief of Irish Protestants;' and three private bills. After which he made the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am so sensible of the readiness you have shewed to supply me with Money for the carrying on the war I am engaged in, that I am glad of this occasion to give you thanks for your chearful dispatch of that matter, which was absolutely necessary for the common safety. The best return I can make to your kindness is, to assure you, that, as far as it will go, it shall all be employed to the purposes it was given.—It is a very sensible affliction to me, to see my good people burthened with heavy Taxes; but, since the speedy recovery of Ireland, is, in my opinion, the only means to ease them, and to preserve the peace and honour of the nation, I am resolved to go thither in person, and, with the blessing of God Almighty, endeavour to reduce that kingdom; that it may no longer be a charge to this. And, as I have already ventured my life for the preservation of the religion, laws, and liberties of this nation; so I am now willing again to expose it, to secure you the quiet enjoyment of them. The spring draws on; and it being requisite I should be early in the field, I must immediately apply my thoughts to the giving orders for the necessary preparations; which that I may have the more leisure to do, I have thought convenient now to put an end to this session."

The Parliament dissolved.] Then the Speaker (the lord chief baron Atkins) by his majesty's command prorogued the parliament to the 2nd of April; but on the 6th of Feb. it was dissolved by proclamation; and a new one was summoned to meet on the 20th of March.*

* "The king was now reduced to the necessity of taking a bold and decisive step. The hopes and fears of two contending factions rested upon his resolution. They vied with each other in the diligence of their applications, and the liberality of their promises. But the prizes for which they contended were unequal. The one sought only the chance of power, or to preserve the capacity of being admitted to it: the other, a monopoly, or exclusive possession of it. Nor was the alternative of equal consequence to the king. The question was not, whether he should prefer one party to another, but whether he should maintain the power of a preference or a choice. If he consented to the bill, he surrendered into the hands of the Whigs, one of the most important branches of his prerogative, the free election of his servants. He consulted with his confidential friends: he was perplexed and agitated: he pondered in his mind a desperate purpose. He thought of relinquishing a dignity which he found cumbersome and distressful." Somerville.

Proceedings on the General Election.] "The general Election" says Ralph, "became now the general concern. And such was the ferment of the two parties, that it disturbed the whole nation from the bottom to the surface. The press had full employment on both sides, as usual. In the State Tracts we yet see the names of Hampden and Wildman prefixed to a formal defence of the Convention-Parliament: * and as this contains the glosses of the Court-Whigs on the late proceedings, so there is another Paper still extant, which, though levelled at the very root of the Tory interest, very artfully upbraids the king with departing from his old friends and his old principles; and, at the same time, endeavours to persuade the public, that his majesty had dissolved the parliament, only to be in a better condition of observing the one, and of making up all breaches with the other. At the end was inserted a list of 150 Tory members, who had voted against the Abdication: and no care nor cost was wanting to circulate this inflammatory Paper all over the kingdom. The Tories also on their part circulated a list of those who had voted for the Corporation-Bill, who were stigmatized for Republicans, Fanatics, Latitudinarians, or Atheists, as the Tories had been for Jacobites: and under the influence of these mutual reproaches, and every other unfair and corrupt practice, the returns were made on both sides. As to the result of all, it is certain, that though many of the abovementioned list were thrown out, and Whigs were elected in their places, the majority was composed of Tories, as the latter had foretold, in case the Corporation-Bill was rejected. Even the city of London, alienated in affection to the king, by the artifices of the Whigs, as it is represented by bishop Burnet, fell into the court scheme, and returned sir Wm. Turner, sir Samuel Dashwood, sir Wm. Pritchard, and sir Thomas Vernon, who were on the Tory list, in opposition to sir Tho. Pilkington, lord mayor, sir Robert Clayton, sir Patience Ward, and sir Wm. Ashurst, the old members: and though the latter had pretensions to complain of an undue election, and did afterwards prefer a petition accordingly, they found it to no manner of purpose. In short, bp. Burnet makes no scruple to say, 'The Elections went generally for men, who probably would have declared for king James, if they could have known how to manage matters for him.'—The Whigs, however, though soon sensible of their inferiority, did not throw up the cards; but on the contrary, resolved to make their court to the king, at the expence of their adversaries; that is to say, either to oblige them to act as Whigs, and thereby bring them into disgrace and contempt with their party without doors, or from their refusing to do so, to infer they were Jacobites, and, by consequence, to break the new alliance which had been formed between them and the court: and, agreeable to this plan, when the New Parliament was on the point of meeting, they set forth a Paper in which they first affected to give a detail of the hopes and views of the disaffected, upon the late Dissolution, and to indicate the steps necessary to be taken, to disappoint them; which were, in substance, to recognize the authority of the late parliament, and the legality and equity of the king's title, and to make some examples of the many criminals in the two late reigns. But though this Paper was calculated to be a sort of Test of his majesty's own conduct, as well as that of his new allies, it was no farther considered at court than it favoured the court views. The Evil Counsellors, against whom the prince of Orange had declared and whom he came over to punish, king William had resolved to forgive; and the party on whose shoulders they stood, seemed now to stand foremost in his majesty's favour."

* See Appendix, No. iv.

Several Changes at Court.] "As if to mortify the Whigs yet farther, two days before the new parliament was to meet, his majesty dismissed the lords Monmouth and Warrington, and sir Henry Capel from the Treasury-Board, and made sir John Lowther first commissioner, who had risen thus high under the patronage of the marquis of Caermarthen. He also removed lord Godolphin; possibly on account of his attachment to the princess of Denmark, and her favourite, lady Marlborough: but continued Mr. Hampden, who had so much the less reason to rapine at Lowther's being placed above him, because he was made chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer. Sir Stephen Fox, and Mr. Thomas Pelham made up the rest of the board, which now consisted of two conformable Whigs, and two as conformable Tories. About the same time also, Herbert, lord Torrington, was removed from the head of the Admiralty, and the earl of Pembroke (who had been the king's ambassador extraordinary to the States) was appointed to succeed him. This drew on the resignation of sir Miles Wharton, and Mr. Sacheverel; and, instead of promoting two in their places, the commission was closed with the name of sir John Chichley only. Burnet adds, 'That other lesser changes were made in inferior places, so that Whig and Tory were now pretty equally mixed; and both studied to court the king, by making advances upon the Money bills.'"

FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF KING WILLIAM III.

List of the House of Commons.] March 20. This day the New Parliament met at Westminster. The following is a List of the Members of the House of Commons:

A LIST OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN THE SECOND PARLIAMENT OF KING WILLIAM, March 20, 1689.

Abington, Simon Harcourt.	St. Albans, Sir Samuel Grimston, George Churchill.
Agmondesham, Edmund Waller, William Montagu.	Aldborough, (Suffolk) Sir Henry Johnson,

William Johnson. Aldborough, (Yorkshire) Christopher Tancred, Sir Michael Wentworth. Allerton, North, Sir William Robinson, Thomas Lascels. Andover, Hon. Francis Pawlet, John Pollen. Anglessea, Richard visc. Bulkley. Appleby, Hon. William Cheyne, Charles Boyle. Arundel, James Butler, John Cook. Ashburton, Sir Richard Reynell, William Stawel. Aylsbury, Simon Maine, Sir Thomas Lee. Bambury, Sir Robert Dashwood. Barnstaple, Sir George Hutchins, Arthur Champneys. Bath City, Joseph Langton, William Blaithwayt. Beaumaris, Thomas Bulkley. Bedfordshire, Hon. Edward Russel, Thomas Brown. Bedford Town, Thomas Hillersden, Thomas Christie. Bedwin, Sir John Raymond, Francis Stonehouse. Berkshire, Sir Henry Winchcomb, Sir Humphrey Forster. Berwick, Sir Francis Blake, Samuel Ogle. Beverly, Sir Michael Wharton, Ralph Wharton. Bewdley, Henry Herbert, Lord Herbert. Bishops Castle, dble. ret. Walter Waring, Henry Newton, Robert More. Bletchingly, Thomas Howard, Sir Robert Clayton. Bodmin, Nicholas Glynn, Russel Roberts. Borlston, John Smith, Sir Henry Hobart. Boroughbridge, Sir Henry Goodrick, Sir Brian Stapleton. Bossiny, Samuel Travers,	Humphrey Nicholas. Boston, Hon. Peregrine Bertie, Sir William Yorke. Brackley, John Blencoe, Henry Mordaunt. Bramber, Nicholas Barbon, John Ratcliffe. Brecon County, Sir Rowland Gwyn. Brecon Town, Jeffrey Jeffreys. Bridgwater, Sir Francis Warre, Robert Balch. Bridport, John Michel, Sir Stephen Evans. Bristol, Sir Richard Hart, Sir John Knight. Bridgenorth, Sir Edward Acton, Sir William Whitmore. Bucks County, Hon. Thomas Wharton, Richard Hampden. Buckingham Town, Sir Richard Temple, Alexander Denton. Calne, Henry Chivers, William Wyndham. Cambridgeshire, Sir Robert Cotton, John lord Cutts. Cambridge Town, Sir John Cotton, Granado Pigot. Cambridge University, Edward Finch, Henry Boyle. Camelford, Ambrose Manaton, Henry Manaton. Canterbury, Sir William Honeywood, Henry Lee. Cardiff, Thomas Mansel. Cardigan County, John Vaughan. Cardigan Town, John Lewis. Carlisle, Christ. Musgrave, James Lowther. Caermarthen County, Sir Rice Rudd. Caermarthen Town, Richard Vaughan. Caernarvon County, Sir William Williams. Caernarvon Town, Sir Robert Owen. Castle-rising, Sir Robert Howard, Robert Walpole. Chester County, Sir John Manwaring, Sir Robert Cotton.
---	---

Chester City, Sir Thomas Grosvenor. Sir Richard Leving.	Droitwich, Rd. earl of Bellamont, Philip Foley.	Hastings, Hon. John Beaumont, Peter Gott.	Thomas Preston. Lancaster, Barnard Grenville,
Chichester, Sir Thomas Miller, Thomas May.	Dunwich, Sir Robert Rich, John Bence.	Haverford West, William Wogan.	Henry lord Hyde. Leicestershire, Bennet lord Sherrard,
Chippenham, Alexander Popham, Richard Long.	Durham County, Sir Robert Eden, William Lambton.	Helston, St. John St. Aubin, Charles Godolphin,	Sir Thomas Hasilrig. Leicester Town, Sir Edward Abney,
Chipping Wycombe, Charles Godfrey, Thomas Lewis.	Durham City, William Tempest, George Moreland.	Herefordshire, Sir Herbert Crofts, Sir Edward Harley.	Laurence Carter. Leominster, Thomas Coningsby,
Christ's Church, William Etterick, Francis Gwynn.	Eastlow, Charles Trelawney. Henry Trelawney.	Hereford City, Paul Foley, Henry Cornwall.	John Duttoncolt. Leskard, Sir Bouchier Wray,
Cirencester, Richard How, John How.	Edmunds Bury, Sir Robert Davers, John Harvey.	Hertfordshire, Sir Thomas Pope Blunt, Ralph Freeman.	Emanuel Piper. Lestwithiel, Sir Bevil Grenville,
Clifton, Sir Joseph Herne, William Hayne.	Essex, Sir Francis Masham, Sir Charles Barington.	Hertford Town, Sir William Cowper, Sir William Leman.	Walter Kendal. Lewes, Thomas Pelham,
Clithero, Roger Kenyon, Fitton Garrard.	Evesham, Sir James Rushout, Edward Rudge.	Heydon, Henry Guy, Matthew Appleyard.	Richard Bridger. Lincolnshire, Hon. G. visc. Castleton,
Cockermouth, Sir Orlando Gee, Sir Wilfrid Lawson.	Exeter, Sir Edward Seymour, Christopher Bale.	Heytesbury, William Ash, William Trenchard.	Sir Thomas Hussey. Lincoln City, Sir John Bolles,
Colchester, Sir Isaac Rebow, Sir Thomas Cook.	Eye, Henry Pooley, Thomas Davenant.	Higham Ferrers, Thomas Andrews.	Sir Edward Hussey. Litchfield, Robert Burdett,
Corf-Castle, Richard Fownes, William Culliford.	Flintshire, Sir R. Pulestone.	Hindon, Robert Hyde, John lord Fitzharding.	Richard Dyot. Liverpool, Jasper Mawdit,
Cornwall County, Hon. Francis Roberts, Hon. Hugh Boscawen.	Flint Town, Thomas Whitley.	Honiton, Sir William Drake, Sir Walter Yonge.	Thomas Norris. London, Sir William Pritchard,
Coventry, Richard Hopkins, John Stratford.	Fowey, Jonathan Rashleigh, Shadrach Vincent.	Horsham, John Mitchel, Thomas White.	Sir Samuel Dashwood, Sir Thomas Vernon, Sir William Turner.
Cricklade, Edmund Webb, Charles Fox.	Gatton, Sir John Thompson, Thomas Turgis.	Huntingdonshire, John Dryden, John Proby.	Litchfield, Robert Burdett, Richard Dyot.
Cumberland County, Sir George Fletcher, Sir John Lowther.	Germaines, (St.) Daniel Elliot, Henry Fleming.	Huntingdon Town, Sidney Wortley, Richard Montagu.	Liverpool, Jasper Mawdit, Thomas Norris.
Denbigh County, Sir Richard Middleton.	Glamorgan, Bussey Mansel.	Hythe, Sir Philip Boteler, William Brockman.	Ludgershall, Thomas Neale, John Webb.
Denbigh Town, Edward Brereton.	Gloucestershire, Sir John Guise, Sir Ralph Dutton.	Ilchester, Sir Edward Wyndham, John Hunt.	Lyme-Regis, Henry Henley, John Burridge.
Derbyshire, Sir Gilbert Clark, Henry Gilbert.	Gloucester City, William Cook, William Trye.	Ipswich, Sir John Barker, Sir Charles Blois.	Lymington, John Burrard, Thomas Done.
Derby Town, Anchitel Grey, Robert Wilmot.	Grampound, John Tanner, John Buller.	Ives, (St.) James Praed, William Harris.	Lynn-Regis, Sir John Turner, Daniel Beddingfield.
Devizes, Walter Grubb, John Methuen.	Grantham, Sir John Brownlow, Sir William Ellis.	Kellington, Francis Fulford, Jon. Prideaux.	Maidstone, Sir Thomas Taylor, Thomas Ryder.
Devonshire, Francis Courtney, Samuel Rolle.	Grimsby, Sir Edward Ayscough, John Chaplin.	Kent, Sir John Knatchbull, Sir Thomas Roberts.	Malden, Charles Montagu, Sir Eliab Harvey.
Dorsetshire, Thomas Strangeways, Thomas Freke.	Grimstead, Sir Thomas Dyke, Lionel earl of Orrery.	Kingston upon Hull, Charles Osborne, John Ramsden.	Malmsbury, Hon. Goodwyn Wharton, George Booth.
Dorchester, James Gould, Thomas Trenchard.	Guildford, Morgan Randell, Foot Onslow.	Knaresborough, T. Fawks, by one indent. Henry Slingsby, & C. Stockdale, by another	Malton, Sir William Strickland, William Palmes.
Dover, Thomas Papillon, James Chadwick.	Harwich, Hon. Charles Viscount Cheyne, Sir Thomas Middleton.	Lancaster County, James Stanley, Sir Ralph Ashton.	Marlborough, Sir John Ernley, Thomas Bennet.
Downton, Sir Chas. Rawley, Maurice Buckland.	Haslemere, George Bridges, Dennis Onslow.	Lancaster Town, Roger Kirkby,	Marlow, dble. ret. James Chase, Sir William Whitlock, James Chase,

Ralph Bucknel. Mawes, (St.) Sir J. Tredenham, John Tredenham. Melcomb Regis. Henry Henning, Thomas Freke. Merioneth, Sir John Wynne. Midhurst, Sir Wm. Morley. John Lukener. Middlesex, Sir Charles Garrard, Ralph Hawley. Milbourn-Port, Sir Thomas Travel, Sir Charles Carteret. Minehead, John Sandford, Alexander Lutterel. Michael, (St.) Francis Scobell, Humphrey Courtney. Monmouthshire, Ch. marq. of Worcester, Thomas Morgan. Monmouth Town, Sir Charles Keymis. Morpeth, George Fenwick, George Nicholas. Montgomeryshire, Edward Vaughan. Montgomery Town, Price Devereux. Newark upon Trent, Hon. Wm. lord Eland, Sir Francis Molineux. Newcastle under Line, Sir Thomas Bellot, Sir John Levison Gower. Newcastle upon Tine, Sir Ralph and Wm. Carr. Newport, (Cornwall) John Specott, John Morice. Newport, (Hants) Richard Leveson, Sir William Stevens. Newton, (Lancashire) George Cholmondley, John Bennet. Newton, (Hants) Rd. earl of Ranelagh, Thomas Done. Norfolk County, Sir Jacob Astley, Sir William Cooke. Northamptonshire, Sir Andrew St. John, John Parkhurst. Northampton Town, Sir Will. Langham, Sir Justinian Isham. Northumberland County, William Forster, Philip Bickerstaff. Norwich, Thomas Blofield, John Ward. Nottinghamshire, Sir Scroop How,	William Sacheverell. Nottingham Town, Charles Hutchinson, Richard Slater. Okehampton, William Carey, John Burrington. Orford, Thomas Glemham, Thomas Felton. Oxfordshire, Montagu lord Norris, Sir Robert Jenkinson. Oxford City, Hon. Henry Bertie, Sir Edward Harley. Oxford University, Hon. Heneage Finch, Sir Thomas Clarges. Pembrokeshire, Sir Hugh Owen. Pembroke Town, Arthur Owen. Penryn, Alexander Pendarvis, Sidney Godolphin. Peterborough, Gilbert Dolben, William Brownlow. Petersfield, Robert Mitchell, Richard Holt. Plymouth, John Grenville, John Trelawny. Plimpton, John Pollexfen, Sir John Trevor. Pool, Sir Nathaniel Napier, Anthony Lord Ashley. Pontefract, Hon. Henry Dawney, Sir John Bland. Portsmouth, Hon. Edward Russel, Nicholas Hedger. Preston, Sir Charles Greenfield, Sir Edward Chisenhall. Queenborough, Sir John Banks, Robert Crawford. Radnor County, John Jeffreys. Radnor Town, Robert Harley. Reading, Sir William Rich, Sir Henry Fane. Relford, John Thornhaugh, Richard Taylor. Richmond, Sir Mark Milbank, Theodore Bathurst. Rippon, Sir Jonathan Jennings, Jonathan Jennings. Rochester, Sir Joseph Williamson, Caleb Banks. Rumney,	Sir Charles Sedley, John Brewer. Rutland County, Bennet Sherrard, Sir Thomas Mackworth. Rye, Sir John Austin, Thomas Frewen. Ryegate, Sir Jn. and Jn. Parsons. Salop County, Hon. Rd. Lord Newport, Edw. Kynaston. Salop Town, Hon. Andrew Newport, Richard Mytton. Saltash, Narcissus Lutterel, Michael Hill. Sandwich, John Thurbane, Edward Brent. Sarum, New, Thomas Hoby, Thomas Pitt. Sarum Old, Sir Thomas Mompesson, William Harvey. Scarborough, Lord Irwyn, Sir Charles Hotham. Seaford, William Champion, Henry Pelham. Shaftsbury, Edward Nichols, Sir Matthew Andrews. Shoreham, Sir Edw. Hungerford, John Petty. Somersetshire, Sir Edward Philips, Nathaniel Palmer. Southampton County Ch. marq. of Winchester, Richard Norton. Southampton Town, Sir Charles Wyndham, Sir Benj. Newland. Southwark, Anthony Boyer, John Arnold. Staffordshire, John Gray, Walter Chetwynd. Stafford Town, John Chetwynd, Jonathan Cope. Stamford, Charles Bertie, William Hyde. Steyning, Sir John Fagg, Robert Fagg. Stockbridge, William Montagu, Richard Whitehead. Sudbury, Philip Gardon, John Robinson. Suffolk, Sir Jervis Elwys, Sir Samuel Barnardiston.	Surry, Sir Richard Onslow, Sir Francis Vincent. Sussex, Sir John Pelham, Sir William Thomas. Tamworth, Sir Henry Gough, Michael Biddulph. Tavistock, Robert lord Russel, Sir Francis Drake. Taunton, Edward Clarke, John Speake. Teakesbury, Richard Dowdeswell, Sir Francis Winnington. Thetford, Sir Francis Guybon, Baptist May. Thirsk, Thomas Frankland, Richard Staines. Tiverton, Thomas Bere, Sir Anthony Kecke. Tolness, Henry Seymour, Thomas Coulston. Tregony, Hugh Fortescue, Lord Kildare. Truro, Sir Henry Ashurst, Henry Vincent. Wallingford, William Jennings, John Wallis. Warwickshire, William Bromley, Andrew Archer. Warwick Town, Lord Digby, William Colemore. Wareham, Thomas Erle, Thomas Skinner. Wells, Hopton Wyndham, Edward Berkeley. Wendover, Richard Beke. John Blackwell. Wenlock, Sir William Forrester, George Weld. Weobly, Robert Price, Thomas Foley. Westbury, Peregrine Bertie, Richard Lewis. Westminster, Sir Walter Clarges, Sir Stephen Fox. Westmoreland, Sir John Lowther, Sir Christ. Musgrave. Weymouth, Sir John Morton, Michael Harvey.
--	--	--	---

Whitchurch,
James lord Russell,
Christopher Stokes.

Winchelsea,
Robert Austin,
Samuel Weston.
Winchester,
William lord Powlet,
Frederick Tilney.

Windsor,
Sir Charles Porter,
Sir William Scawen.

Wilton,
Sir Rd. Grabham Howe,
Thomas Wyndham.

Wiltshire,
Lord Cornbury,
Sir Walter St. John.

Woodstock,
Sir Thomas Littleton,
Thomas Wheate.

Wooton Bassett,
Henry St. John,
John Wildman.

Wygan,
Peter Shakerly,
John Byrom.
Worcestershire,
Sir John Packington,
Thomas Foley.

Worcester City,
Samuel Swift,
Charles Cocks.

Yarmouth, (Norfolk)
George England,
Samuel Fuller.

Yarmouth, (Hants)
Henry Holmes,
Charles Duncombe.

Yorkshire,
Lord Fairfax,
Sir John Kay.

York City,
Robert Waller,
Henry Thompson.

SPEAKER,
Sir John Trevor.

Sir John Trevor chosen Speaker.] His majesty, in the house of lords (by sir Robert Atkins, lord chief baron of the exchequer, and Speaker of the house of lords) commanded the commons to proceed to the choice of a Speaker; and the house being returned, sir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain to his majesty, humbly proposed to the house, "That he conceived sir John Trevor* both for his great experience in parliamentary affairs, and knowledge in the laws, was every way qualified for that employment;" and accordingly he was, on the question put, allowed of, and chosen for the Speaker, and immediately conducted to the chair by sir John Lowther and sir Henry Goodrick; where he acknowledged the great honour the house had done him; withall saying, "That he feared they had done themselves a great prejudice in making choice of him; and therefore he desired their leave to disable himself before the royal throne, that they might thereby have an opportunity of making a better choice."

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
Mar. 21. The house of commons attended the

* "Sir John Trevor was a bold and dextrous man, and knew the most effectual ways of recommending himself to every government. He had been in great favour in king James's time, and was made master of the rolls by him; and if lord Jeffreys had stuck at any thing, he was looked on as the man likeliest to have had the great seal. He now got himself to be chosen Speaker, and was made first commissioner of the great seal. Being a Tory in principle he undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money as might purchase some votes; and by him began the practice of buying off men, in which hitherto the king had kept to stricter rules." Burnet.

In March, 1694, he was expelled the house, for receiving a gratuity of 1000 guineas from the city of London, after passing the Orphan's Bill; and Mr. Foley succeeded him as Speaker.

king in the house of lords, where his majesty, after confirming sir John Trevor Speaker, and allowing of and granting their usual privileges, was pleased to make the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am resolved to leave nothing unattempted, on my part, which may contribute to the peace and prosperity of this nation; and finding my presence in Ireland will be absolutely necessary for the more speedy reducing of that kingdom, I continue my resolution of going thither as soon as may be; and I have now called you together for your assistance, to enable me to prosecute that war with speed and vigour; in which I assure myself of your cheerful concurrence, being a work so necessary for your own safeties.—In order to this, I desire you will forthwith make a settlement of the Revenue; and I cannot doubt but you will therein have as much regard for the honour and dignity of the monarchy in my hands, as hath been lately showed to others.* And I have so great a confidence in you, that if no quicker or more convenient way can be found for the raising of ready Money, (without which the service cannot be performed) I shall be very well content, for the present, to have it made such a Fund of Credit as may be useful to yourselves, as well as me, in this conjuncture: not having the least apprehensions, but that you will provide for the taking off all such Anticipations as it shall happen to fall under.—It is sufficiently known how earnestly I have endeavoured to extinguish, or at least compose, all differences amongst my subjects, and to that end, how often have I recommended an Act of Indemnity to the last parliament! But since that part of it which related to the preventing of private suits, is already enacted, and because debates of that nature must take up more of your time than can now be spared from the dispatch of those other things which are absolutely necessary for our common safety; I intend to send you an Act of Grace, with exceptions of some few persons only, but such as may be sufficient to show my great dislike of their crimes; and, at the same time, my readiness to extend protection to all my other subjects; who will thereby see that they can recommend themselves to me by no other methods, than what the laws prescribe; which shall always be the only rules of my government.—A farther reason, which induces me to send you the Act at this time, is, because I am desirous to have no colour to any of my subjects for the raising of disturbances in the government; and especially in the time of my absence; And I say this, both to inform you,

* "Sometimes the king would say, he would not stay and hold an empty name, unless he had a revenue for life. He said once to bishop Burnet, that he understood the good of a commonwealth as well as of a kingly government, and it was hard to determine which was the best; but he was sure, the worst of all governments was that of a king, without treasure and without power." Burnet.

Wm. Whitby
4th Mar 1689

and to let some ill-affected men see, that I am not unacquainted how busy they are in their present endeavours to alter it.—Amongst other encouragements which I find they give themselves, one of the ways by which they hope to compass their designs, is, by creating differences and disagreements in your councils; which I hope you will be very careful to prevent; for be assured, that our greatest enemies can have no better instruments for their purposes, than those who shall any ways endeavour to disturb or delay your speedy and unanimous proceeding upon these necessary matters.—I must recommend also to your consideration an Union with Scotland. I do not mean it should now be entered upon; but they having proposed this to me some time since, and the parliament there having nominated commissioners for that purpose, I should be glad that commissioners might also be nominated here, to treat with them, and to see if such terms could be agreed on, as might be for the benefit of both nations; so as to be ready to be presented you in some future session.—My Lords and Gentlemen; I have thought it most convenient to leave the administration of the government in the hands of the queen, during my absence; and, if it shall be judged necessary, to have an act of parliament for the better confirmation of it to her, I desire you would let such a one be prepared to be presented to me.—I have this only to add, that the season of the year, and my journey into Ireland, will admit but of a very short session; so that I must recommend to you the making such dispatch, that we may not be engaged in debates, when our enemies shall be in the field: for the success of the War, and the more thrifty management of it, will both principally depend upon your speedy resolutions; and I hope it will not be long before we shall meet again, to perfect what the time will not now allow to be done.”

The Speaker, and the house of commons being returned, the rest of the day was employed in taking the Oaths, &c.

Debate on the King's Speech.] March 22. The Speaker reported and read to the house his majesty's Speech, as above.

Sir John Lowther. I should be glad to be informed of the method by which you will proceed, in the consideration of the king's Speech: nothing is more certain, that not only the good of this nation, but of all Europe, depends upon your resolutions. I move, that the house may go into a committee, which is most proper for gentlemen to have liberty to speak as often as they please. No one man can comprehend what he has to say, at once.

Sir Tho. Lee. I should be glad to know the business of that committee, when we go into it. The Speech is of divers parts. One part is most necessary to be immediately thought of, and that is of Supply; the reason why you support the war, is to support the kingdom; that being so, you will but misspend your time on Supply. I thought you would have been moved to give the king Supply by a vote for it.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I observe, that, in part of the king's Speech, the king speaks of ‘the Revenue,’ and I think that is Supply.

Mr. Hampden. I am in some difficulty what to say. It is not the first time I have seen a committee have general directions. If a Supply be moved for, then you are to go into a committee, to consider the matter.

Sir Edw. Seymour. According to the ancient rules and orders of the house, you may consider all the other parts of the king's Speech, but of Supply, nothing. You are not to part with Money upon any consideration, without consideration. If you will go upon all the parts, except what relates to Supply, you may; but there is no consideration of such moment, as to take off your padlocks from Money, considering the poverty of the nation.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I agree with Seymour that, if Supply be first moved, then you go into a committee. The king desires ‘a settlement of the Revenue, as other monarchs have had;’ it is not immediately a Supply.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If you consider the granting a revenue, you go against the methods of the house. We are told, ‘this is not granting Money,’ but I take it to concern money as much as may be. It is giving money, and then you ought to appoint a day for the consideration of that motion: I hope you will not precipitate matters, so as to break the rules of the house. I am as ready to support the government as any man, and you are secure not to suffer by going according to the rules of the house. I would appoint a day.

Sir John Lowther. I would not have any body think, that I intended, by my motion, to surprize the house. I did not understand ‘a Bill for the Revenue’ to be a motion for Supply; but if that be the sense of the house, I am for a farther day; and I doubt not but, the necessity of the motion considered, you will appoint a speedy day. If those who understand the method of the house better than I, agree for a Bill, I move for to-morrow morning; but because I would not displease nor surprize any body, for my own part, though there be prudence on one part for a longer day, there are affections on the other side for a speedy day.

The Speaker. The reason of a grand committee is, that there should be no surprize. In the late king James's time, the house immediately entered into a grand committee, because the motion of Supply was not opposed. You may put the question for to-morrow.

Mr. Hampden. It is moved for ‘to-morrow to go into a grand committee, to settle the king's Revenue.’ The motion is said to be for raising Money. The house does ever religiously observe order every way. I ever shall be for it; but, in that question, I would not involve another question. Gentlemen say, ‘settling the Revenue is granting Supply;’ but let us hear why and why not. But keep to that first question, ‘That a motion being made for settling the king's Revenue, to appoint a day to consider of it.’

Sir Edw. Seymour. Your Books will direct you. Put your question in the words of your Order, and that will direct you.

Mr. Sacheverell. I would a little consider and open what is to-morrow's work. I have always been of opinion, that the French king is the most likely to trouble England, and I doubt not but gentlemen will not give a million in trade to support him. I have showed it formerly, as manifest as the sun shines. I can bring undeniable proofs of it out of the Custom-House books. But if you settle the Revenue before that be considered (which will be done in a day or two) till that be, I cannot give my consent to give away so great a sum.

Sir Henry Goodrick. This must be, in consequence, settling a new Book of Rates, but you cannot remedy this: unless you bring all others into the same prohibition, yours will signify little; but if the meaning be for a new Book of Rates, you have not time now to do it. All Europe will have a vast advantage by having that trade, and you will lose it. I would have gentlemen tell us, whether it be practicable in a month's time?

Mr. Sacheverell. I did not talk of a prohibition, only the consideration of so great an evil, and when the house has an account of it, I only lay it before you.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If he moves not for a new Book of Rates, he moves for nothing. How comes this to you? Now you are to consider of the Revenue, he tells you 'that the Trade with France is a million.' I believe, by the Book of Rates, of 27 or 28 years standing, comparing it when in war, there is a great over-balance. That Paper of the French Trade has walked this house long. But, as Sacheverell uses to say, 'he would have things above-board,' if you settle the Revenue on the king and queen, without the Book of Rates—I have heard say, that it may be done in a week's time. We may have peace with France, Par quaritur bello. I would so settle Trade as it may be for the future.

Mr. Papillon. I believe all gentlemen have the same dislike to France; but it was that Book of Rates he mentions, when the court favoured France. I have known the time, when the French trade was an advantage to England; but now we are in war with France; but when we come to peace, then it will be proper to make a settlement of the Rates; but if you make one now, you must make a new one then, when time is proper. Now we are at enmity with France, it will be of no advantage at all, but loss of time.

Sir John Knight. I was in hopes that Sacheverell, when he gave you an account of French Trade, would have told you how trade is now carried on with France. There is a ship at Bristol with all commodities for France. I desire it may be considered.

Resolved, nem. con. "1. That the humble and hearty Thanks of this house be presented to his majesty, for his gracious Speech. 2. That the house will assert and support the Government under their present majesties king William and queen Mary, both by their counsels and with their assistance, to the utmost of their power. 3. That the whole house do attend his majesty with the said Resolutions; and that this house will, on Wednesday next, take into consideration his majesty's gracious Speech."

March 25, 1690. The Speaker reported, That, in Answer to the Resolutions of the house, presented yesterday to his majesty, his majesty was pleased to express himself to this effect:

"Gentlemen; I thank you for your Address, and for your Resolution to assist and support me: and as I have ventured my life for the nation, so I am resolved always to do. I hope you will take my Speech into your speedy consideration, and that this may be a happy session."

This day, sir Thomas Mompesson, in his place, asked pardon of the house, and of Mr. Okeden, for assaulting Mr. Okeden in the lobby, an account thereof being given by Mr. Piper and col. Trelawney, members of the house, and the serjeant at arms, and door keepers; and the Speaker acquainted sir Thomas "That the house had considered that he was an ancient member, and therefore were very indulgent to him by their Resolution, which he acquainted him with, and required him to ask pardon accordingly," which he did do.

Debate on settling the Revenue.] March 27. The house went into a grand committee, on the Supply. Mr. Hampden, chancellor of the exchequer, in the chair.

Sir John Lowther. It was your Resolution yesterday to go to-day into a grand committee, to consider of Supply. The first paragraph of the king's Speech is about 'settling the Revenue,' and it is to that I stand up to move you. For rescuing you from arbitrary government, and restoring you to your religion and laws, the king has done his part; there remains our part to be done. The reducing Ireland is a great work to be done; the king is willing to go thither in person, to make your charge easy; and I hope the king's return will be victorious and speedy: and when he does expose his person, and we are at our ease at home, for expressing our gratitude I move you 'to settle the Revenue on king William and queen Mary for their lives.'

Serj. Maynard. If the king be necessitous, he will have necessitous counsellors about him. The Revenue of the crown-land is all gone, it is aliened from him; he can have nothing from his land, but from parliament. The question is, What and for how long you will give him? A king in want can never be quiet. As for the Revenue, I would not have it too much. Consider Quantum, quomodo, et quamdiu. I move, 'That it may be settled for three years.' As king of England, if all were quiet, I would have it for life; that the king may be a freeholder as well as we. As for the relief of Ireland, that is a distinct consideration by itself.

Sir John Thompson. You cannot put the question, 'for settling the Revenue for life,' without leave from the house. The Order is, 'to consider about Supply.'

Sir Tho. Lee. I always thought, that they that gave the crown of England 'a Revenue,' gave 'Supply.' I speak only to order. I think 'the matter of the Revenue' is the only debate before you.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I think you cannot put that question; before you come to that, you must go to the particular parts of the Revenue; you must tell us what you mean by 'Revenue.' As for the Excise, part of it is hereditary; it was so, and I know not what has made it otherwise. Before you put the question, I would know whether all the Customs and Excise be complicated in the question. Would you have all the Revenue for years turned into lives? First, consider whether any part be hereditary, and whether you will make it all so; when that is ordered, then consider Supply.

Mr. Paul Foley. I would know what the Revenue is, and what it is likely to prove, and not to settle a Revenue for life, as is necessary in war, but in time of peace. When Ch. 2. returned, it was generally agreed, that 1,200,000*l.* per ann. was a sufficient Revenue to support the government; in the next parliament, it was not pretended that more was requisite, but that, the Revenue came not up to so much. I know not what the Revenue is now; but I have heard, that in Ch. 2's time, it was two millions, and more in king James's time; therefore I would have you consider, and it is worth your while to consider: If you settle such a Revenue, as that the king should have no need of a parliament, I think we do not our duty to them that sent us hither. Therefore I would know what the Revenue is.

Sir Edmund Jennings. I remember the method in king James's parliament, and why now we should take other precedents, I know not. If you desire to preserve the Church and State, will you not settle such a Revenue as will do it, and why is not this king to be trusted as well as king James? Either we shall run back to Popery and Slavery on the one hand, or anarchy on the other. What will neighbouring princes say, if we do not do by this prince, as we have done by the former? I doubt we shall find ill effects afterwards. I have no court-employments to expect or lose, only I would save Religion and Property: therefore settle the Revenue upon this king, as upon king James.

Sir Robert Cotton. We cannot answer the king's ends, without doing as is moved. You must settle a Fund, and you must distinguish the Hereditary Revenue, and a Fund. I would express my gratitude to the king, but there must be some certain number of years to have a fund.

Mr. Hutchinson. You have been moved 'to settle a Revenue upon this king, as upon king James.' I would know whether that had so good effect, as to settle it so now, and whether so extravagant a Grant can be good either for a good or a bad prince? If you gave this Revenue to a bad prince, you cannot now decently take it away; if you give it to a good prince, he may be thrifty, and may have a Bank, and may presume upon it to destroy our Liberties. If a prince be prodigal, he is more safe than if thrifty; but it is an odd sort of safety, and to be given to Pensioners to betray their trust. I would have the Revenue known.

Mr. Pelham. You are told, 'that the Revenue came to two millions in king Charles's and king James's time; but, as to what is said of the ill effects of it in king James's time, none of that mischief came by that Revenue, but upon what was given him afterwards, which enabled him to raise his Army, and bring in Popery.'

Sir Joseph Williamson. By complication of several parts, the question becomes more difficult. The scope of the king's Speech being Supply, that is properly before you; but as to the other language of it, of settling a Revenue for a Supply, you must think well upon it before you come to a Resolution. In matter of Supply, the question is not strictly held to it by firsting, seconding, and thirding it, but it is to be opened, so as freely to give a judgment, whether we can make the one or the other. Till it can be showed, that settling the Revenue is the Supply, I cannot come up to the question. A Supply is necessary; we cannot sit here else. A Revenue, for the king to live with honour and comfort upon, every body is for, so as to provide for the monarchy, in whose hands soever it is, that parliaments may be frequent. There are some alive, that know all, and have felt, that, when princes have not needed Money, they have not needed us. I have seen princes undone by those methods, that they have been made believe would establish them. I drive at this: will gentlemen show us what part of the Revenue is a Fund to supply the present necessity practicable and effectual? In this case, wherein all our safeties are at stake, that that should be given for Money which is none! I have heard say, 'There is a great Revenue, 1,200,000*l.* a year.' I would ask, what can be taken up upon that uncertain Revenue? For that point so to give, that we may be still called to give—This way will be to anticipate the Revenue—For the pressing occasions, if there can be laid down a Fund for the present necessity to be anticipated, it will be a guard still for a parliament. I would give such a Supply as to prosecute the war with speed and vigour; and I leave the consideration of it to other persons.

Mr. Harbord. 'To supply the king' will be without contradiction: therefore I would put that question.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You tell us, 'That a question for Supply will answer the first article of the king's Speech.' But I would have it answer the second article, 'upon the Revenue.' I suppose it has been considered, that the Revenue must be a Fund; therefore I would have it; for with the Revenue there must be a security. I would have the way prescribed, before you can do the thing. The king is of opinion, that it may be a Fund; therefore I would have that question.

Sir John Lowther. It is my private opinion, that, for the present, the Revenue may supply the present occasion, by security; but God forbid you should confine yourselves, now you are in a war! The king desires this testimony of your affections for all he has done for us. As for the Revenue, he cannot live without it; but for Supply for these wars, I hope you will not confine yourselves. After you have voted a Supply, you may then take into consideration the Fund of Credit, and you may make this addition for both their lives, and for so many years after as to be a Fund of Credit. I am no lawyer, but believe it may be done.

Mr. Foley. I cannot say any thing, till we know what the Revenue is, nor till we have an account of what has been spent of what we have already given. In three fourths of a year, the treasury has received 1,500,000*l.* besides what we gave; six millions were received last year and this. Now, what account have we of all this? Therefore I would give no Supply till an account be first brought to us. I do not think that a good argument to give, because the king goes into Ireland; nor convenient for the king to have an exchequer full, if the king goes into Ireland. I would give this king money, but not by a rule, because we have given other kings. I stand upon it, to have more reason from the accounts before we give Supply.

Sir Henry Goodrick. If gentlemen come not prepared to support the monarchy, and establish good understanding—But when the king says, ‘He has that confidence in this house,’ I see no difficulty but that every man is prepared in his thoughts. You are upon the question of ‘settling the Revenue.’ It is that the king sets his heart upon. You may know what the Revenue is, and then you may consider the Fund: your second question settles not that, unless by way of implication.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Your motion for Supply is by order; your debates are on several things; of Supply, and the Revenue; and that is part of the Supply. When I consider we are come so lately from giving Money in one parliament, I wonder how we come to leap into that now, unless you make one parliament to vie with another ad infinitum; but if this continue, you will make the ministers independent. We that have placed the king on the throne, are those that will keep him in it. I have always seen it here, that hasty Resolutions in parliament never produced good consequences for England. We are told of former kings who had this Revenue, that from such easy concessions came our miseries; and seeing we are so well redeemed from them, let us prevent them for the future. The safest results are from hence, rather than from abroad. To settle the Revenue must be a work of time, and not to be in that inequality, useless in war, and not useful in time of peace. Had you not time little enough last parliament to consider it, and will you do it in less now? You will make things precarious. We shall make an ill bargain, to support the Church to destroy the State, and the Constitution of that must support us. Let us come to that point of the Revenue that is for life, to enable the king to carry on the war. If for security, I would consider how much is necessary to carry on the war, and then to have the power in your own hands; you that have the game in your hands, to put it into those hands that played for king James, that now play for king William! As this the last parliament, so another governs this. The white horse rides one stage, the black another. Can the properties of England be safe, when you yourselves are made properties? As for the Revenue, I would leave it like wise men, not like a horse in the mire. Have your allies left you, because you did only settle it for one year? Now you have done like wise men, I would leave the state-trap of the Revenue behind you.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Let us come to an end of our stage. If you must have neither ‘black horse nor white for our stage,’ must we ride upon an ass? And if we do not supply the king, we shall ride an ass. You settle it only for the lives of your Deliverers.

Sir John Lowther. I am sensible of the Miscarriages; and whilst there are governments, there will be miscarriages, whilst men are men. I would be glad to see men help, and not embroil. I would not willingly inflame this matter: I would with all content retire to my cottage, from my part of employment, rather than live always in such diffidence that I must be armed with head-piece and buff-coat. The Chimney-Money act, and that of Navigation, were great concessions. With what pleasure can our prince expose himself to an unhealthful country, to subject his ministers to reflections! What can man do in this case? Since I am morally assured, there can be no preservation of the Protestant Religion, not one spot of ground, not one spot of land free from Popery, not only this nation is the security of it, but this prince; and when once this single person shall be removed, it is not all the world can secure it. If they hear some few mouths that reflect upon him and his government, how can he support us? I hope there is no weight in it. Similies, without explaining, signify nothing without a meaning. I hope his government will not be reflected on in this house.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I appeal if I reflected on the integrity of that gentleman (Lowther), or the sufficiency of this (Goodrick)? I care neither for ‘the neighing of the horse,’ nor ‘the braying of the ass.’ The safety of England will be better supported here, than by any other hands. This will appear by the change his majesty has made of his Counsellors. If we may not here deliver our advice, certainly that is a very evil one.

Mr. Finch. Before you put the question, there is something absolutely necessary for you to declare, viz. As you go on to settle the Revenue, for the honour of the king, not to pass by one thing in relation to the hereditary Revenue. I remember the progress that question had in this [house last parliament; it was a question, What did subsist, and what not? They were silent in that; they went only upon that for life. The next thing was a Bill to authorize the collection of it for a definite time. In that Bill there was a Clause, 'That the Revenue be collected for one year, and no longer.' And it was taken notice of, that the word 'no longer' would determine the Revenue; and, that the crown had no subsistence, was a question, whether it had any or no? (p. 138.) Still that point remains undetermined; and will you leave that to be a question still? You see that question left undecided; it is still one, whether it was hereditary in king Charles's and king James's time, and if that Revenue be vested in king and queen, in right of the crown of the realm, then it will be seen, that though new persons are on the throne, the ancient monarchy is still on the throne.

Mr. Ettrick. As for what is said of 'the uncertainty of a Fund for life,' you may have a clause for Credit, in case the king and queen die before the debt is paid. I am sorry to hear it talked, as if we had not minded our condition since we changed our king. If we had a popish king, I should be more careful than under the king I am. I cannot, in justice and gratitude, do less for him than his predecessors. In king Charles 1's time, the not settling the Revenue upon him for life drew on us all the mischiefs that followed.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, That a Supply be given to their majesties, to enable his majesty to prosecute the war against France, and for reducing of Ireland with speed and vigour." Which was agreed to by the house, nem. con.

Col. Austen. I thought you had taken your first step, that you might walk forward. Does any gentleman undertake the quantum, or that this should be a Supply? pray let some gentleman move a quantum.

Sir Tho. Lee. The first part of your question is not for leave to bring in a Bill for the Revenue: I only offer on the word 'Supply;' that business of the Revenue comes in naturally, and you may offer what words you will, when the question is stated.

Sir John Guise. I am persuaded, that those who advised the king to go into Ireland, knew how to give him money in 50 days time. If you will say more, than 'towards carrying on the War,' say so; but let us have to-morrow to consider of it, to answer it to our country.

Col. Austen. I shall never be afraid of a post, to bring news of what is done here. I am not for tricks of any sort. Your question is, at this time, not so. I may give Money for a Revenue; but I may, or may not, give my consent for two lives in it. Therefore put the question 'for a Revenue.'

Sir Wm. Williams. When a question is unanimously carried, it is thought enough for one day. Some of the Revenue may be given for lives, and some for years; but none for such a time that the parliament may not come again; therefore leave the Chair.

March 28. The house again went into a grand committee, on the Supply.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I move, that you would take the Revenue by parts, and consider what is annexed to the Crown, and what for lives. I speak frankly, what hereditary Revenue is to be settled upon the crown, and then come to the other parts of the Revenue: for instance, half the Excise is hereditary; declare that annexed to the crown, and then come to the other parts of the Revenue; likewise the Post-Office, the First-Fruits, and Tenth, something of the old Customs, with the Wine-Licences, &c.

Sir John Lowther. No man is more of Musgrave's opinion than myself: The motion I will make shall not preclude that. I renew the motion, to take into consideration again what you have done yesterday. Yesterday's arguments are a fresh obligation to the king; if any thing relates to our Properties or Religion, all are relative to this. I know no arguments of distrust of the king; nothing can prevail against it. There were jealousies of the last reign; but no instance can be given of a prince who has done so much for his people, for so short a time as he has been here. I move, that the Revenue may be settled for life.

Mr. Ettrick. It is very plain, that what is to be raised is for your service. The king's Revenue is 240,000*l.* less than his predecessors. As if only this question is, whether you will show that countenance to the government, as to support the king, or keep him as it were a board-wages; as if only by this question to fetter it with forms to surprize gentlemen. [He was taken down to order by sir Wm. Strickland.]

Mr. Hampden. 'The house to be shackled with forms' is a strange expression. I know that forms must be kept.

Sir John Goodrick. I know of no 'shackles,' but what keeps us to order and decency.

Mr. Ettrick. What I said was not reflecting upon any thing to-day, but what happened formerly. The question is very plain, Whether you will give as formerly, for life, or for 3 years?

Sir John Thompson. We have been told 'of putting the king to board-wages.' I do not aggravate the thing; but certainly we should know what we do, when we give away our money; but, that we may speak our minds freely, I think the Liberties of England are in that question. You were told yesterday, 'What you shall give on the Revenue cannot answer your end.' Certainly, nothing is more prejudicial to the king, when it is demonstrable it cannot answer the end for which you give it. When you give this Supply, it must be wiped off by you. The standing Revenue is so great, that it is your danger in time of peace. Either you must keep a Standing Army, or the frugality will ruin you. The Revenue will keep 30,000 men. I should be loth to see so many foreigners in England in time of peace.

Earl of Ranelagh. The order is, 'To consider the Revenue.' The motion is, 'To consider the Revenue granted to king Charles and king James, that it may be granted to king William and queen Mary for their lives.' I find some gentlemen would know what this Revenue is, and what part to be granted to the king and queen. There is a Revenue for lives and years. The temporary Revenue is the imposition upon Wines and Brandy, &c. which determines in 1693. Sugars, &c. French and East India commodities determine at Midsummer. I would have it declared, 'That the Revenue, vested in the two last kings, is the Revenue of inheritance;' and have leave given to bring in a Bill to settle it.

Sir John Lowther. As near as I can, I will agree with the sense of every gentleman. If you will proceed in the method proposed, I am very well contented. I move, 'That the Revenue may be for the king and queen's lives, and the longest liver of them.'

Mr. Sacheverell. I move, 'That a Revenue may be settled on the Crown for time to come;' and I move, 'That what is now vested in the Crown may not be alienated from the crown.' Whenever 'tis granted away, always the subject must pay for it. Therefore, I desire gentlemen to consider if it once comes, whenever you grant away Impositions, granted by the subject to the crown, there is an end of your government. It will make it like the great men of Spain, they get all and the king nothing.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The question is now, what the Revenue of the Crown is to be in time of war; 'tis otherwise in time of peace. Now we must make use of all the branches of the Revenue, now we are in war. I hope the king will not take it ill, if we settle the Revenue for years; otherwise, if it is not for years, as well as for lives, it cannot be good security. If you settle it for lives, only, and not for years, it cannot be a Fund; if for both, pray declare your sense. I know not if 3 years, the number moved for, will be security or not; and if three millions will be found without a prospect of some time, moneyed men may lend, who understand security. That you may not be for a time uncertain, I move you to grant the Revenue for 4 years.

Mr. Eltrick. 'Tis something of a harsh proposition, the Revenue for lives and years too. I look upon the hereditary Revenue to be so far a Fund as for a present supply of Money. If we know what money is wanting, we may the better form the sum. I have heard of 'a million' wanting. You may make, in a clause of Credit, that no contingency may be in their lives to the lender of the money. I think we ought to have as much respect for their present majesties as the last parliament had. They proceeded so far as to move the Revenue to be settled for their lives.

Sir John Guise. Upon a supposition of what was done last session, I would have your Books searched before you go on. I find this king and queen extremely beholden to some people that would settle the Revenue for lives. In the king's Speech there is such a proposition, that, if we can find no other way, the Revenue then is to be a Fund. I should think the Revenue a very ordinary present to the king, so incumbered, by advices, from other persons, not from hence. I would take time to present the king with a free Gift, and worthy of him to receive. Then your business is to support the War. Do you intend this shall be out of the Revenue? If they intend no other Supply than the Revenue for the present or any other, let them speak. I have heard, that they who lend Money love to have it in their power once in six months. I would not dispose of the Revenue farther than becomes a prudent man, who may answer it to his country, 'Tis said, 'Put no distrust on the king;' but I would not have all ill management laid on the king, which ought to be laid on the ministers. Here have been particular grumblings against persons' ill management; and since, now the Revenue is in your hands, you cannot know these persons, how will you know them that have done amiss, when the Revenue is out of your hands? I think it ought not to reflect on any particular prince, when others have the keeping of his ears. I would have a Fund of Credit for 4 years, and no longer.

Col. Austen. I am against the question, for the king and queen's sake. I am against granting the Revenue for lives, for what the king (that now is) has declared in his Declaration, when prince. One of his businesses was, to secure us that no successor be able to bring us again into our misfortunes. The great mischief being the Revenue for lives, you will never do good in an ill prince's time—I am sure you will never tell him that he is an ill one. A parliament will secure you from other ill persons, as well as ill kings; I mean, the ministers. Granting it for life will prevent any ill ministers from being called in question, and you can never reach them. I hope the king will be as rich at the end of this time 4 years, as if he had the revenue for life.

Sir Joseph Williamson. It will certainly be for the king's service, that people may see themselves out of fear of not meeting the king frequently in parliament. In the close, I shall agree that the remaining part of the Excise be settled for life. The necessary expences of the crown must be supported, or else we fall—You will not at all be alarmed with the defect of a parliament.—That is the thing; the king's necessity will bring the king to the people, and the people to the king. I will only add this, besides growing extraordinary unforeseen accidents, though I hope we shall be soon out of this costly war. You were told yesterday, 'That the Revenue was clogged, and can bear nothing;'—and what you must now give will still necessitate parliaments—As, on the one hand, I would not give all for life, so I am for a reasonable security. If half the Excise be for life, there will remain still a Fund for Credit, and yet be secured from the common fear of wants of parliament.

Mr. Sacheverell. Before this question be put, of lives, I desire a little satisfaction, whether you intend to have any Fund of Credit, if you take away all indubitable security? What fund can you have in the Customs in time of war? They that had no regard to the last parliament, will have as little regard to you, when you are gone. You have settled the hereditary Revenue; now, what Fund of Credit have you on contingency of the Customs? Plainly, will you have a Fund of Credit or not? What can be borrowed on the Customs, suppose them 400,000*l.* to this year and the next; what sum can you propound upon this credit? Can any man believe they will lend? 400,000*l.* is all you can borrow in a year, and scarce that; few will lend upon the utmost value. I know no way of certainty but to leave the king 600,000*l.* an entire Fund of Credit to borrow upon. But if you leave the thing indefinite, you will have, I believe, little or no use of a parliament for the future.

Resolved, "1. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the hereditary Revenues, which the late king James 2. was, the 10th of Dec. 1688 entitled to, became and are vested in their present majesties, king William and queen Mary, in right of the crown of England, except the late Revenue arising by Fire-Hearths and Stoves. 2. That the house be moved for leave to bring in a Bill to declare, that the said Revenues are so vested; and that therein provision be made, that they shall not be aliened from the crown, nor chargeable with any Gift or Grant to be made for the future. 3. That the house be moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the settling that moiety of the Excise, which was granted to the late king Charles 2. and king James 2. or either of them, for their lives, upon their present majesties for their lives, and the life of the longest liver of them; with a clause to enable their majesties to make the said Revenue a security for raising money towards a Supply, not exceeding the sum of . . . 4. That the house be moved for leave to bring in a Bill to grant to their present majesties for the term of 4 years, from Christmas next, the Customs which were granted to the late king Charles 2. and king James 2. for their lives; with a Clause to enable their majesties to make the said Revenue a security for raising money towards a Supply, not exceeding the sum of . . ."—Which were all agreed to by the house.

* "But though these Votes were carried without a division, they were not carried without a debate: some thought they were too comprehensive, and some that they were too limited. The latter were for having the Customs for life, as well as the Excise: bishop Burnet says, 'This was much pressed; but,' continues he, 'it was taken up as a general maxim, that the Revenue for a certain and a short term, was the best security that the nation could have for frequent parliaments.' The bishop adds, 'The king did

VOL. V.

Debate on the Supply.] March 31. The house went into a grand committee on the Supply.

Sir John Lowther. Part of your great work is over. You have voted the Revenue to king William and queen Mary. I doubt not but to the satisfaction of all men, at least, good men. The next thing is to provide for your own security. This is a great task, a great work. No government can be supported, but within these walls. I am sorry to tell you, that the king is at an extraordinary charge, never felt before. I have known civil wars, and wars in Ireland, but never with so potent a prince as the French king. You have but part of Ireland in your hands, [and then giving an Account of the defects in the Customs, &c. towards the great Charge, concludes] There can be no Army, but upon free quarter, nor Ships, but in harbour, if Money be not taken up.

Sir Charles Sedley. * Mr. Speaker; we have provided for the Army; we have provided for the Navy: and now, at last, a new reckoning is brought us, we must likewise provide for the Lists. Truly, Mr. Speaker, it is a sad reflection, that some men should wallow in wealth and places, whilst others pay away, in taxes, the fourth part of their revenue, for the support of the same government. We are not upon equal terms, for his majesty's service: the Courtiers and Great Officers charge, as it were, in armour: they feel not the Taxes, by reason of their places, whilst the country gentlemen are shot through and through by them. The king is pleased to lay his Wants before us, and, I am confident, expects our advice upon it: we ought therefore to tell him what Pensions are too great; what Places may be extinguished, during the time of the War, and public calamity. His majesty sees nothing but coaches and six, and great tables, and therefore cannot imagine the want and misery of the rest of his subjects: he is a brave and generous prince, but he is a young king, encompassed and hemmed in by a company of crafty old courtiers. To say no more, some have Places of 3000*l.* some not like this, he said to myself, Why should they entertain a jealousy of him, who came to save their religion and liberties, when they trusted king James so much, who intended to destroy both? I answered, They were not jealous of him, but of those who might succeed him: and if he would accept the gift for a term of years, and settle the precedent, he would be reckoned the Deliverer of succeeding ages, as well as the present." Ralph.

* Somers Tracts, 1 coll. vol. ii. p. 487. Sir Charles was one of the most remarkable wits of king Charles 2d's reign, and father to the countess of Dorchester, who was mistress to king James 2, which occasioned him, after voting for the prince of Orange's succeeding to the crown, at the Revolution, merrily to say, 'That, in return for king James's having made his daughter a countess, he had given his Vote to make his daughter a queen.'

2 O

of 6000*l.* and others of 8600*l.* per annum, and I am told, the Commissioners of the Treasury have 1600*l.* per annum a-piece. Certainly, public Pensions, whatever they have been formerly, are much too great for the present want and calamity that reigns every where else: and it is a scandal, that a government so sick at heart, as ours is, should look so well in the face. We must save the king Money wherever we can, for I am afraid the War is too great for our purses, if things be not managed with all imaginable thrift. When the people of England see all things are saved, that can be saved; that there are no exorbitant Pensions, nor unnecessary Salaries, and all this applied to the use to which they are given; we shall give, and they shall pay whatever his majesty can want, to secure the Protestant religion, and to keep out the king of France, and king James too; whom, by the way, I have not heard named this session; whether out of fear, discretion, or respect, I cannot tell. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let us save the king what we can, and then let us proceed to give what we are able.

Sir Edw. Seymour. If I thought your enquiry would bring you to your end, I should be for it; but I would rather close with the other motion, of what is most necessary to be provided for. The stress of the question lies to give the Revenue for a Fund, and when given, no security. If you begin with enquiries after Mismanagements, and pass them over slightly, you establish them, and will never have a true one. Let us prevent them for the future. But when the Fleet is employed in every man's business but ours, no wonder that Ireland miscarry. Let us know what money remains of what was given the last parliament, and give what comes short of that sum for present Supply.

Sir John Guise. I must take it for granted, that, upon the dissolution of the last parliament, things were well weighed. What was wanting of the sum before? When a way was found out to supply the king, to cut all that off at a stroke by a prorogation! Who dares be the man, that will avow it?

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I must believe, that what is requisite for carrying on the War has been weighed before we came hither. Was it not the intention, that granting the Revenue, and settling it, was a Supply? If nobody will give us an Account, either borrow what you can, or the house must order it, as in all your bills you have borrowing clauses—Will you leave it to the king at large to borrow, or limit such a sum, not to exceed such a sum? Suppose you give credit 'not to exceed 500,000*l.*'

Sir John Lowther. If the meaning be a power of borrowing 500,000*l.* only, and no other Supply, I would ask that member, whether he will answer that to his country? And, as it is uncertain whether it can be borrowed, how can he go into his country, and the Army not paid, and the Fleet in harbour? I dare not undertake it. I am in the king's service, but have a fortune to support my condition. I can obey commands, but am not in a post to give counsel. Let the matter be how it will, if religion and laws will be safe, under such a motion; I am mistaken, unless other men have other prospects, than I have; and do not say but you are warned of the consequence.

Col. Austen. We are come into necessity and pressure of times for Money. Is it the fault of the commons of England? Were they the cause of that necessity? It will be found, that you have done your parts. The advice was very bold, and things were taken care for somewhere else, to send the parliament down. None tell us what will serve the king, and those near him yet do not tell us what is required.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I dare not love the name of 'undertaker,' so as to ruin my nation. I know not what Lowther means by 'a Prospect:' I have none but the support of monarchy, and the nation. We have settled the Revenue, and that was called 'Supply!' I said, 'it ought to be at the peril of any body, that undertakes what to borrow.' The necessity is not from us—We have no sums told us, and when we name them, we are reproached for it.

Sir Tho. Lee. The farther consideration of credit is come to 500,000*l.* and no more. I did not advise that the Revenue be charged, nor to run upon borrowing, but that every year might defray the charge. If it will not answer your end by security, it is as good as nothing at all. Still the king tells you, if no other way be to be found, then to charge the Revenue. If you go on with the War, and the whole be anticipated, you will make your enemies far from having inclination to peace. If there be not towards 500,000*l.* to pay off Seamen at Michaelmas, when they come up, you may possibly have 200,000*l.* more to pay. I believe, at the end of September, when they come in, 500,000*l.* will not pay Seamen's wages. What I say is only a short hint to consider how things are.

Sir Francis Blake. They prorogued us, and then dissolved us; surely they knew where Money was to be had. It is so hot from the mint, that it has dropped through our hats.

Sir Henry Goodrick. It is unhappy, that we have looked so far into things, as to have lost ourselves in the debate in reflections. The pressure is so great, that the Army and Ordnance, the safety and honour of the king's person, every thing that is dear to us, I fear, must be laid aside. Things have been fairly and candidly managed—I am an accomptant for great sums, and those about the king are willing to inform you—No man doubts the preservation of the public, but the way we dispute of. It is extremely pressed in the house, as if some slight of hand was in the last debate. There is nothing in the king's Speech, but what he will make good, as to the Revenue; but the question is, as to the quantum; so much as will bear the Charge goes towards it, but you are told 'it will come short,' it is a great and terrible sum at first to name, 'two millions;' but if this be exclusive of all other things, the very Ordnance comes to that sum. I do not verily know, that you cannot put the Ordnance into its ancient course without 300,000*l.* Do not let this preclude all other Supply.

Sir John Guise. After having heard some reflections on Musgrave's motion, I am concerned for the honour of the house; necessities you are brought to, and these not your own fault, and then to be asked, 'Whether we can answer this to our country?' But the question I would ask, is, 'How came the French to be landed in Ireland, and your Militia not settled in England?' I cannot answer that—Whether you will fill up the blanks, or put the sum moved, is the question?

Sir John Lowther. I hope, that, in this, I am rather transported with zeal for my country, than any particular reflections on any body. If I did not misunderstand the gentleman, he said, 'he hoped we should not grant two Supplies in one session.' I appeal, whether there is not a hazard of the security of the nation by it? I know not that the Militia of the kingdom is not settled, though I know not that it is settled; for orders were sent down to have them in readiness. When I said, 'Musgrave might have some other prospect,' I meant, that it is impossible but that this nation should be ruined, if this be not a Supply.

Sir Tho. Clarges. These Accounts of the Revenue are a little puzzling. It is a hard matter to be clear in it, in a committee of the whole house (and so reckons up what has been given, &c. and what is in Arrear, &c.) Certainly there has been great mismanagement, whether by unskilfulness of the managers, or otherwise, which has some resemblance to a private family: I must live, and have meat, drink, and cloaths: I should follow that, and postpone all other occasions. The fleet, army, and ordnance are appendixes—They should have minded those things in which all our safety is concerned, and have applied to that. (Perhaps it is so, but here are great outcries.) I think that 20,000 men, considering our alliance with Holland, are as many as we need. As to the greatest reckonings we can make, we know it was said 36,000 men, and now they say, 'Thank God, we have 16,000.' I have had the honour to be in the army, and have seen the establishment for 80,000 l. per mensem, for 40,000 foot, and 10,000 horse. God forbid we should cut the pattern too narrow! I would have all provided against. Enemies we have without, and enemies within. I cannot tell what to advise, but I would have it proposed, what sum will defend us till we meet again, and what they have towards it. Before we come to a sum, let the hon. persons explain what condition we are in, and what is necessary now. It is the common talk of the town, that the great occasion of these diminutions is ill management—Men cannot know these things by inspiration—Land and tide-waiters brag what they can smuggle and cheat—farmers were managers, but after they had made up their own pack, they cared not what become of the rest. Formerly, great care was taken, that all the officers of England were inspected. I am weary of finding fault. For the present, I move for what sum shall be necessary, and what we can have towards this out of the Revenue.

Sir R. Temple. The Customs, in time of peace, never rise to more than 600,000*l.* per annum. Michaelmas was greater than after; they heaped in great quantities of goods by prospect of a war. I believe they are not now 400,000*l.* per annum.

Mr. Paul Foley. It concerns us to give the king a Supply, but it concerns us as much not to give more than is necessary. We have strange Accounts of the Revenue (and so reckons up the Account given in by sir John Lowther). I hope our case is not so bad as is represented, and that we are not at a loss for so much money as is spoken of. Let us have a fair Account. The lowest Account amounts to more than what the Navy and Army want; but if not laid out upon the Army and Fleet, surely there is more reason to have things before us. I move, "That the house may be moved, that an Account be brought in of the Money, &c. and how disbursed." [To proceed the next day.]

April 1. In a grand committee, on the Supply,

Mr. Hampden. I hope this day will end to the satisfaction of every gentleman. The great end of this day, is the preservation of the government, and keeping it from ruin. I having the honour to serve the king in his Revenue, (as chancellor of the exchequer,) it is from thence the measures of the house are to be taken. If you do not supply the king, you will fall into the misfortune of tradesmen, to shut up their shops, and to make what we have omitted amongst our lamentations. There was a great debate yesterday about Accounts, but this I will say, that it is the king's desire, and all I have the honour to serve with, that you should know them. I have an Abstract of the Account, which I hope will give satisfaction. I have sent for all the auditors. I wish you would take the Account I have, and I say it is a true Account, and will be justified; three-fourths of it are ready to be justified by all the vouchers, to Christmas; but take the Account your own way, and direct your way. A man of better understanding than I may not understand my trade, but it may be explained to him by the officers, who shall attend upon any gentleman that please. Let it not run away, that the money is mis-spent; it is not so embarrassed as gentlemen have spoken of. Gentlemen say, 'What should we give Money for, before we know how it shall be spent?' But the true intent is to satisfy; and, though you cannot take the Accounts now, do it at your leisure in recess of parliament. Take them, and they shall be opened and explained to you. I blame nobody for making these objections; they do like good stewards for their country. If any officer be to blame, let him be named. Whether Money has been well employed, or no, I cannot answer that; but let not that be an objection. Name any body to enquire into the ill usage; but, as for the great charge of military affairs, I know nothing of that; but if you think persons undermine the government, and waste the treasury, you are to give the king counsel as well as money. This way of communication is the way to end all differences and jealousies, amongst friends. I have ever had a great reverence for the house of commons; so I have lived, and so I shall die, a faithful commoner of England. But, after all, will you support the government? I know you will support it. You have sent the king your Vote, and carried it solemnly; but, on the other side, if these objections be any thing, your government will fall of itself: If you say, you will support it, do support it. If any objection of Mismanagement remain, remove them that have been faulty. If you let it lie in suspense, none of these objections will save the government from falling. I humbly move, and desire all gentlemen to consider, that, seeing the calamities that will attend the loss of the government, which every gentleman may figure to himself—What will it avail to say, that you are cozened, and, if you give more, you shall be cozened? But are you the better for saving your Money, if Ireland be lost, perhaps England too? Popery, French, and Irish, to dwell among you, and govern you; and saving the Taxes will be but cold comfort at last, to say, ‘I have saved 100*l.* in taxes, and perhaps my estate will be sequestered, or worse; I must either renounce my religion, or lose it.’ What I aim at is this, that Money must be given, and speedily given, and by no way but by a Fund; and not any of the consequences, but you may prevent afterwards; else you will be too late, and have another distemper upon you to cure. When you go into a-committee, do it speedily; and, whatever Credit, give it a sound Credit. You will be here suddenly again, and may enquire into the management.

Sir John Lowther. I doubt not but gentlemen take into consideration the condition of their bleeding country. Under Heaven, there can be no assistance but from this house. I would to God, gentlemen would believe that some men intend sincerely, and tell you truth! As for the profits of my employment, they have not paid my house-rent, and I care not if they ever do more; and if my service be acceptable, I am more than over-rewarded. Gentlemen that have ventured their lives and estates, as I have done, upon a change, must suffer in the common calamity. There is no Money in the treasury, except the appropriated Money. I know not of one shilling in the treasury. Upon stating your Expences as near as I can, I freely own the establishment is greater than the nation can bear. This unhappiness might have been prevented by the last house of commons, if you had represented that the nation could not bear the establishment. I presume we did not think it so, and would have supplied it. I am of opinion, that it is too great an expence; but I believe no gentleman has retrenched one dish at his table, or one servant in his family. (Then he gave an account of the Charge of the Navy.) So formidable a sum is needful, that I dare not mention it; but I hope gentlemen will be so kind, in their advice, as to direct us in the retrenching, that they may approve of it when you meet next. Deductions must be allowed for all things, as Deserters, false Musters, &c. and I will hope that Forfeitures may do a great deal in Ireland; and the Fleet is not paid till they come home; but, in the mean time, stores must be supplied. I hope gentlemen, therefore, will assist in the retrenchments. I believe, in any country, they would first consider what must be necessary for their own preservation. In my poor opinion, I think it impossible to carry on the War without 1,500,000*l.* before Michaelmas.

Col. Granville. I have ever thought that Money-motions came best from rich mouths. The dangers have been well stated, and if they had not, they would have spoken for themselves; and I hope this wise assembly will get out of them, as well as enquire how they came into them. If there are any discontents, let us know what they are angry with, and with whom, and not complain in generals. I move, ‘That we may farther supply the king with Credit.’

Sir John Thompson. I look upon it, that, in the last year’s proceedings, the parliament did believe themselves ill used in the management. They were drawing an Address to the king; and when they had given their money, they were sent away; and so may this. As to what is said by Lowther, ‘Why did we not complain the last parliament?’ there was complaint; and the Lists did not appear to be 50,000 men; and for them was computed 1,400,000*l.* Now it comes in 1,500,000*l.* It is strange it should be so vast a debt, when we have supplied all that was demanded! That with the Revenue makes three millions. All the Navy did not go out in a day; that, and the other things, will make a considerable deduction. We shall never come to a right state of things, till we know what Forces we have; for still, the more you give, the more you are in debt: and I would ask those who tell you, ‘That half Ireland is lost, and England may be too,’ why was not Ireland secured first?

Sir Rob. Cotton. No gentleman here but is sensible of the treasure given, and the little effects of it. It is reason to consider, not what we might have been, but what we are. The only question before you is, to consider how this Supply may be raised, and what Fund; therefore, first consider the State of the Revenue, and what may be laid upon it for a Fund.

Col. Austen. I think two things are under consideration; Supply, and, which is as necessary, that it go to right purposes. If under management of those who have led you out of the way, what probable reason can be given? If there be necessity, there is as great necessity to see it well employed. I would not ask account of actions last year, but I wish we might have a prospect how they will be managed better.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. Every body here, I believe, has the same zeal to serve the king, and the government. I move, that you will hold us to one question, 'What is necessary to carry on the War?' I could not know what to move, but from a gentleman (Lowther) whose calculation I believe to be true. I confess, it is a great sum proposed, and since it must be raised, 1,500,000*l.* has been named, it has not been seconded, but I do. It is a great sum I must confess, but I know not how it can be less.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You state that right which was named; but I will put you in mind, that there was a sum named under the gallery, 700,000*l.* and, by order, the least sum is to be put first. I would gladly know, when you have voted it, how it must be raised? I know no other way but by the Revenue, or Land-Tax. Land is already charged till Christmas. If you charge it with a million more, how long will that be, and we expect at Michaelmas another debt, and you will be put to new methods of raising, viz. by home excise. You are told, and I find it is taken for granted, 'That the expence of the War is greater than the nation can bear.' I know it is not seasonable now to take notice of mismanagement, by an Address; but, if you take no notice at all, you confirm what was omitted the last parliament. Do you intend that artificers shall have assignments for their debts, and pay 7 per cent. interest? and then consider how interest eats out; and, besides, by great rates for wares; and in this method, who knows how to support the government? Therefore, before you grant the money, consider the ways of raising it.

Sir Joseph Williamson. The gentleman under the gallery, speaking of the Revenue, seemed to say, 'That the Revenue might bear it;' but made no direct motion. 1,400,000*l.* after so much money given, is a great sum; but, whatever the sum, it is to make all the rest good, our religion and properties, &c. Far be it from us to think that sum will undo us. He that you have to do with, will be brought to reason sooner by this house, than by all the money you can raise. This is a great sum, and it is hard to lay it, yet it is not impossible. If that of the Revenue had been a little better opened, you might have gone on more easily: I must give all my help to that question moved. Perhaps I should not refuse to give my consent to this; but it has been scarce seen that so much expence has brought so little honour and advantage to the nation. I look back with astonishment! I have served near the throne, where there have been cross biasses in affairs; but when we have a prince who will think it for his service to enquire into managements, I hope they will be put in such a way that we shall not do it again. Put the enquiry into some way, and when you come back, go through it. As to my way of absolving myself in my own duty, I shall give my affirmative to the question of 700,000*l.*

Mr. Ettrick. I would give what will do the work: If not done this year, it will not be the next. I propose 1,200,000*l.*

Sir John Guise. We see the word 'towards' is come to something more. You are now come to a sum of Money proposed. I speak plainly: If there be any gentleman who has denied to-day, that things have been driven to a necessity, I'll tell you from whence this Grievance does proceed; that people do not own the counsels they have given; the visible part of the privy council. Is any about the king that had a hand in the Charters? If by that way our misfortunes have come, it ought to be rectified. In queen Elizabeth's time, no man was ashamed to own his own counsels; she had the privy council's advice and consent in all things; and if we give to supply what Mismanagements have cost us, we do our duty to our country.

Sir W. L. Gower. I hope we shall not only empty their pockets that have cheated us, but squeeze their veins of their blood, for the ill things they have done. I move for the greatest sum.

Sir John Thompson. A million is as much as you can raise, give what you will; therefore I move for it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I agree with the gentleman that moved for a million; but I would be satisfied how it can answer the occasion; that is all the difficulty with me. Land is already taxed largely. Don't give less, that you may live upon credit. I would not have the whole security of England be at the pleasure of a few men, whom you borrow from. The Army is to be paid monthly, and that will take up all the first money: the poor seamen will be unpaid. Parliaments do not desire to come much before Michaelmas.

The committee divided, and 'the million,' passed in the negative.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that a sum not exceeding 1,200,000*l.* be the Supply to be given to their majesties, for the public occasions, between this and Michaelmas, in prosecuting the War against France, and reducing of Ireland with speed and vigour."—Which was agreed to by the house.

April 2. Sir W. Strickland moves for instructions to the committee, 'That the Supply be not raised upon Land Tax.'

Col. Austen, on Mr. Hampden's setting forth the necessity of Supply, said, You have now two necessities, Money and Land; and give me leave to offer a third, the people's living. He that does not faithfully advise the king, is not a good subject.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I am of opinion, and do not doubt, but what has been said is true. All new experiments are uncertain. This only I desire, before we enter into a hasty Resolution, to propose some ways to raise this money. The gentleman that moved it, I believe, can tell you ways; therefore I beseech you, at least, to weigh this, and not, by a vote, to expose the nation to ruin. Before you put such a question, pray let us debate it.

Sir Tho. Lee. I take it, the debate is upon 'Instructions to the committee, that no part of the Supply shall be upon Land.' I think it irregular in the house; but, if moved at the committee, it will be as strong as in the house. In the house you are confined to debate, not as in a committee. I remember, in the Long Parliament, a great sum was to be raised, and Home Excise was proposed; those against Land-Tax would have had a negative—You have so much money to raise; you have said you will do it. I know no way considerable but home excise. I assure you, I am not for land-tax, which is absolutely destructive to you. You must keep yourselves in a condition to raise it upon land hereafter. I am neither for a land tax, nor a 12d. Subsidy. I speak plainly; if you bring this course of a negative into parliament, the practice will be extremely inconvenient.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I have declared myself all along; I will deal fairly: I think the Revenue ought to bear a great share of this; but to lay a negative upon land, customs, or excise, there is an equal latitude upon all these to put a negative. You were told of 'three necessities' from the bar; perhaps the same necessity may be on other things; and, at last, necessity upon nothing. If this pass once in the negative, you lay such a baffle upon the committee, that they cannot get through it.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. The business of parliament is best done, by preserving methods of parliament. Departing from what is always considered of, at a committee, may be very prejudicial; the variety of opinions you have heard, requires debate. That being the case, and method of parliament, pray leave the chair.

Sir John Guise. Suppose you should lay this tax upon land, you know not the success of the war, and would you have no resort to make new recruit of money? Can you answer this to your country? It looks to me as an extremity, the utmost shock, and the way to bring in king James, if you go first to the dernier resort.

Sir Robert Cotton. Nothing but great necessity yesterday brought us to vote so great a sum of money, but have a care lest we put ourselves on greater necessity. We have an army in England, as well as in Ireland, and I know not whether we are safe without such a guard, and home excise to maintain that army. These things, so natural, we may expect may follow. I doubt not but the kingdom of England may raise money without burdening land. I hope gentlemen are so disposed, as not to be willing to bring the nation into necessity of such fatal consequences. Pray put the question. Let us keep England, whatever becomes of Ireland.

Sir Robert Rich. You have been upon a long debate, upon a negative upon land-tax. I would willingly go into a committee freely, but I own I am against all home-excises.

Mr. Swynfin. As to the arguments against land-tax, I have been here the best part of 20 years, and all the projects would never do. The way of our ancestors has always been upon land, and they abhorred excise, and all other projects. I wish we prove wiser than they. We had a war with the Dutch, as now we have with the French, and it was carried on no other way but by land-tax. I am not for saving our lands to enslave our persons by excise. You have pitched upon a Fund, and must have a security to raise it. If there should be a miscarriage in Ireland, it will be laid upon the house by the managers of that war. Let them have no pretence to lay the blame upon this house. I would fain see the tax laid upon something less vexatious, and that will not, in the end, come upon land. If you find other proposals less grievous to the people, you will deal best with yourselves, and the business is to leave it to the committee.

Mr. Harcourt.* If you give the tax on land now, I fear you will lose as many men as you give pounds. The goodness of the prince, and his greatness too, is shown by the easiness of the government.

Resolved, That it be an Instruction to the committee, That the Supply to be given to their majesties be not laid upon Land, without leave from the house.

The house then went into a grand committee.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I cannot but take notice, that we are come into an extraordinary method of argument. The only answer to it is, 'If those without doors had done their parts as well as they within, these Miscarriages had never been.' I was one of those for the lesser sum, as it might have been raised out of the Revenue. The king's resolution for going into Ireland was taken before any thought of enabling him, in parliament, in all respects that would enable him to do it. Some gentlemen tell us, 'The Revenue will not prove sufficient security, because those without doors dare not lend upon it.' But pray tell me, if I ask those without doors, will they not tell me, the land is charged already? The affections of the people are not to be hazarded. People I see already mention 'the goodness of their princes, and their greatness too, by the easiness of their government.' We are to secure ourselves from the whole, Popery, Ireland, and the French king. I could have been glad that your sums might come up to the whole Revenue, but, with that caution, if it does not secure it, to make it good when you come again. All I drive at, is, to go on with such a consideration, in what we give, as not to lose what we have already given by land-tax. Those persons that serve you in commodities, will think themselves better secured by the Revenue in the Exchequer, that every one in his order is duly paid.

* Son of sir Philip Harcourt, and afterwards distinguished by his eminence at the bar. In 1702, he was appointed Solicitor-General, and in 1707, Attorney-General to queen Anne, which office he quitted by a voluntary surrender a few months after, but was recalled to it in 1710; and was the same year made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and created lord Harcourt. In 1712, he was declared Lord Chancellor, and in 1721, he was created a viscount. He died in 1727.

I think it not intended to put this money for Ireland in the king's pocket; so give the best funds and security known by experience. I would not take care, whether the officers can bear it in the Civil List; they ought to pay their part: though Lowther tells you, 'He has not got to pay his house-rent.' If people pay as much as they are worth, they will think themselves as easy under any government as this.

Mr. Godolphin.* It seems to be the general disposition of the house, that the Revenue be a Fund. The question is the Quantum, how much the Revenue is a Fund for. You voted, the last parliament, two millions with the Revenue, for carrying on the war; which came short. Therefore I hope 1,400,000*l.* besides the Revenue—fill up the Temporary Excise not exceeding 300,000*l.*

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that, towards the Supply to be given to their majesties for prosecuting the War against France, and for reducing of Ireland, with speed and vigour, his majesty be enabled, by a Clause in the Bill or Bills, for settling the Revenue, to raise a Credit for the sum of one million, upon the Revenue." Which was agreed to by the house, with the Amendment of 'ten hundred thousand pounds,' instead of 'one million.'

April 3. The house went into a grand committee, on the Supply.

Col. Birch. I cannot easily swallow how we are brought into this necessity of Money. I shall touch it very tenderly. Here is another year lost; but let us do what we can. Last year, by God's blessing, with hay and oats, you might have done your work. But it is more reasonable to provide the money, than talk of things now; and nothing was so unseasonable as the prorogation of the last parliament; that undid your business, and not only lost opportunity, but set you a year backward. I am not only for the Money, but to have it ready money. You might have done it in a seasonable time, and now you might do it in an unseasonable: you will find it on your Books the last session proposed, 'Every ale-house to pay 10*s.* and brandy-cellar 20*s.*' Let it be read; it is in lieu of a licence from the Justice, and I appeal, if the poorest will leave off the trade for it? Not five in England will. It is now the time of year for licensing; this will signify little to the people; and pray entertain no more motions till this be off your hands.

Sir Charles Sedley. We stand as if we had one foot in one boat and another in another. Let us serve them in Ireland as they have served us, and worse, if you will. I would not put the present service upon dispute, or contingency; but, however, seize their lands here, that they may no longer go into Ireland to support the war.

* Youngest brother to lord Godolphin, and one of the Commissioners of the Customs. He died in 1720.

Mr. Harbord. Oliver took other steps to reduce Ireland than we; he followed the advice given him, in the confiscation of estates, of the estates of all against him; which saved him a great sum. It will not only ease this nation, but people Ireland with English. In the two last kings reigns, there were as much pains taken to destroy the Protestant interest, as in Oliver's time to support it. You will not only have the advantage to the payment of the officers, but raise considerable sums. They have wholly divorced themselves from the kingdom of England, and taken away the Act of Settlement relating to Ireland, both Settlement and Dependence, and I would have them attainted.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that, for the raising of the sum of 200,000*l.* being the residue of the 1,200,000*l.* to be given to their majesties, the house be moved for leave to bring in a Bill for a Poll." Which, being reported to the house, was agreed to.*

Proceedings in the House of Lords on the Bill of Recognition.†] April 5. On the 26th

* "These were the only public measures in which the distinction of parties was less obvious and regular. Other subjects of debate, in both houses, though often important to national interest, were evidently blended with the views of parties, and the issue of them afforded an exact criterion of their comparative strength, and of their various success. Accommodated to their peculiar circumstances, were the different plans and weapons with which they waged their political warfare. The Whigs, inferior in numbers, and declining in the favour of the court, relied chiefly upon the fortune of incidents, and endeavoured, by stratagem or surprise, to turn their enemies out of the strong holds of power: the Tories, confiding in the strength of numbers, and elated with recent victory, openly proclaimed the attacks which they intended, and seemed to wish, not only to conquer, but to affront and humble their antagonists. Thus the Whigs, under the cover of zeal for the new settlement, introduced such Bills into parliament, as reduced their opponents to the necessity, either of contradicting the principles they had formerly maintained, or of defending them at the hazard of losing the favour of the court. The latter, irritated by attacks from which they did not escape unhurt, availed themselves of their superiority to carry many resolutions and votes, evidently contrived to mortify their opponents." Somerville.

† "The first great debate arose in the house of lords, upon a bill that was brought in, acknowledging the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful sovereigns, and declaring all the acts of the Convention-Parliament to be good and valid. The first part passed with little contradiction, though some excepted to the words 'rightful', and 'lawful,' as not at all necessary. But the other article, declaring the acts of the last parliament to be good and valid, bore a long of March a Bill was brought into the house of lords, 'For declaring the Acts of the late parliament to be of full force and effect by the laws of this realm, and for recognizing their now majesties king William and queen Mary to be, by the laws of the realm, our rightful and lawful liege lord and lady king and queen of these realms.' This day a report was made from the Committee to the whole house of the Amendments upon the said Bill, viz. In the second sheet in the first line, after 'declared' they have added 'adjudged,' and in the twelfth line they have left out the word 'adjudged' and they desired the concurrence of the house therein.—Then the question was put, Whether this house agrees with the committee in this report? It was resolved in the negative, Contents 30. Not content 36.

Protests thereon.] Leave having been given to any lords to enter their Dissents, if the question was carried in the negative, we whose names are hereafter written do enter our Dissents for these Reasons following:

1. "Because there appears to us no reason to doubt of the validity of the last parliament, the great objection insisted upon being the want of writs of summons, which we take to be fully answered by the state the nation was in at that time, which made that form impossible, such exigencies of affairs having been always looked upon by our ancestors (however careful of parliamentary forms) to be a sufficient reason to allow the authority of parliament, notwithstanding the same, or other defects in point of form; as the parliament which set Henry 1. and king Stephen on the throne; the parliament held 28 Edw. 1. the parliament summoned by the prince of Wales 20 Edw. 2.

and warm debate. The Tories offered to enact, that these should be all good laws for the time to come, but opposed the doing it in the declaratory way. They said, that it was one of the fundamentals of our constitution, that no assembly could be called a parliament unless it was called and chosen upon the king's writ. On the other hand it was said, that whatsoever tended to the calling the authority of that parliament in question, tended likewise to the weakening of the present government, and brought the king's title into question. That a real necessity, upon such extraordinary occasions, must supersede forms of law; otherwise the present government was under the same nullity. That forms were only rules for peaceable times; but in such a juncture, when all that had a right to come, either in person, or by their representatives, were summoned and freely elected; and when, by the king's consent, the Convention was turned into a parliament, the essentials, both with relation to the king and people, were still maintained in the constitution of that parliament. After a long debate the act passed in the house of lords with this temper, declaring and enacting that the acts of the Convention-Parliament were and are good and valid." Tindal.

the parliament summoned 23 R. 2. the parliament held 1 Henry 6. and the parliament held 28 Henry 6. the acts of which parliaments have been held for law. 2. Because the rejecting this Clause must necessarily disturb the minds of the greatest part of the kingdom, for if those be not good laws, all commissioners, assessors, collectors and receivers of the late taxes, are not only subject to private actions, but to be criminally prosecuted for one of the highest offences against the constitution of the English government, viz. the levying Money on the subject without lawful authority; all persons who have lent money, upon the credit of those laws, will be in dread of their security, and impatient to get in their money; all persons concerned in levying the present taxes will be fearful to proceed; all persons who have accepted any offices or employments ecclesiastical, civil or military, will be under the apprehension of having incurred all the terrible forfeitures and disabilities of the Act of 25 Ch. 2. c. 2. and all who have any way concurred to the condemnation or execution of any person upon any act of the late parliament, will think themselves in danger of being called to an account for murder. 3. Because to leave a doubt touching the validity of the last parliament, is to shake all the judgments and decrees given in the house of peers, or in Westminster-Hall, during this reign; and to bring a question upon the whole course of judicial proceedings. 4. Because if the authority of the last parliament be not put out of the question, the authority of the present parliament can never be defended, for the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 1. makes the election of every member of the house of commons absolutely void, if he enters into the house without taking the Oath of Supremacy, which no one person having done, there is an end of this house of commons: and by the statute made 30 Car. 2. if any peer or member of the house of commons presume to sit and vote without first taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, before the Speaker of the respective houses, he does not only forfeit 500*l.* and become a Popish Recusant, and disabled to take a legacy, to hold any office or place of trust, to prosecute any suit, to be a guardian, executor or administrator, but is made for ever incapable to sit and vote in either house of parliament; and consequently this can be no parliament, nor any who have sat in either house be capable of sitting in parliament hereafter. 5. Because to leave room to doubt of the authority of the last parliament, is to shake the Succession of the crown established by it, and the credit and authority of all Treaties made with foreign princes and states by king William, as the undoubted king of these realms; so that if the last was no parliament, and their acts no law, this is our case: The nation is engaged in a war without the consent of parliament, the old Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance remain in force, and the nation forced under colour of law, to swear fidelity to king William, though they can never act as a lawful parliament without taking the Oaths of Allegiance to king James: All judgments and decrees in the house of lords, during the late parliament, are of no force; great sums of money have been levied, without consent of parliament, and men have been put to death, not only without, but against law; which is the worst sort of murder: Lastly, the king upon the throne, the peerage of England, and the commons freely elected by the people, have been parties to all this: the peers and commons now assembled are under a perpetual disability, and the nation is involved in endless doubts and confusions, without any legal settlement or possibility to arrive at it, unless a parliament be summoned by king James's writ, and the Oaths of Allegiance taken to him. (Signed) Bolton, Macclesfield, Stamford, Newport, Bedford, Herbert, Suffolk, Monmouth, Delamer, Oxford."

April 8. The Bill was read a third time, and the question was put, Whether this Bill shall pass? It was resolved in the affirmative. Before the question was put, several lords desired leave to enter their Dissents, if the question was carried in the affirmative. "1. Because we conceive, that saying, 'It is enacted by the authority of the present parliament, that all and singular the acts made in the last parliament were laws,' is neither good English nor good sense. 2. If it were good sense to enact for the time past, it must be understood, on this subject, to be the declaring of laws to be good which were passed in a parliament not called by writ in due form of law, which is destructive of the legal constitution of this monarchy, and may be of evil and pernicious consequence to our present government under this king and queen. (Signed) Somerset, Rochester, J. Jermyn, Westmoreland, H. London, W. Landaffe, Huntingdon, Abingdon, Tho. Menev', Feversham, P. Winchester, W. Asaph, Scarsdale, Weymouth, Dartmouth, Nottingham, Wigorn'."

April 10. The Reasons in the Protestation made the 8th instant against some words in the said Bill being read, were, upon the question, severally ordered to be expunged out of the Journal.—Leave having been asked and given for entering Dissents, if the questions were carried in the affirmative:

"Dissentient, Whereas the questions for expunging the Reasons of our Protestation April the 8th, were carried in the affirmative; and whereas these Reasons were only against some words in one clause in the Bill entitled, An act, &c.—And leave being given to enter our Dissents to those Reasons, we do so accordingly for these Reasons:—1. Because it is the privilege of the peers to enter their Dissent, and it has been the antient practice to enter also the reasons of such dissent, of which the lords, that so protest, are the most proper judges, as well knowing what arguments persuaded them to be of that opinion; and no reasons can be more proper than such as they conceive are founded upon matter of fact and the law of the land. 2. Because there is no other precedent of expunging the reasons of any Protestation. 3. Because the Protestation was not against the whole Bill, but some particular words of it; but by expunging the Reasons of that Protestation, it appears that we have protested against the whole Bill, which is contrary to our sense and intentions. (Signed) Nottingham, J. Jermyn, H. London, Tho. Menev', Ed. Wigorn', P. Winchester, Hum. Bangor, Westmoreland, Chandos, Abingdon, W. Asaph."

VOL. V.

Debate on reversing the Judgment in a Quo Warranto against the City of London.] April 8.*

* "The violence and injustice with which the election of Sheriffs (in 1682) was carried by the court, shewed that they were resolved, by fair or foul means, to have the government of the city in their own hands. But, because they would not be at this trouble, nor run this hazard every year, it was resolved, that the Charter of the City must either be given up, or be adjudged to the king. The former was much the easier way; so great pains were taken to manage the next election of the Common Council, so as that they might be tractable in this point. But after all the practices of the court, in the returns of the Common Council of the City, they could not bring it near an equality for delivering up their Charter. The court, finding that the city could not be wrought on to surrender their Charter, resolved to have it condemned, by a judgment in the King's-bench. Jones had died in May; so now Pollexfen and Treby were chiefly relied on by the city in this matter. Sawyer was the attorney general, a dull hot man, and he undertook, by the advice of Saunders, a learned but a very immoral man, to overthrow the Charter. The two points upon which they rested the cause were, 'That the Common Council had petitioned the king, upon a prorogation of parliament, that it might meet on the day to which it was prorogued, and had taxed the prorogation as that which had occasioned a delay of justice.' This was construed to be the raising sedition, and the possessing the people with an ill opinion of the king and his government. The other point was, 'That the City had imposed new taxes on their wharfs and markets; which was an invasion of the liberty of the subject, and contrary to law.'—After long pleadings, on both sides, when the matter was brought near Judgment, Saunders, who had laid the whole thing, was made chief justice; Pemberton, who was not satisfied in the point, being removed to the Common Pleas, upon North's advancement. Dolben, a judge of the King's-bench, was found not to be clear; so he was turned out, and Wythens came in his room. When Sentence was to be given, Saunders was struck with an apoplexy; so he could not come into court; but he sent his Judgment in writing, and died a few days after. The Sentence, which was given without the solemnity that was usual on great occasions, was, 'That a city might forfeit its Charter; that the malversations of the Common Council were the acts of the whole city; and that the two points set forth in the pleadings were just grounds for the forfeiting

2 P

Sir Edw. Seymour. You have been moved by the members for London to reverse what is not, and to restore what they have. I apprehend, you ought to remove a doubt first, what are their privileges, and not leave it to the judgment of this or that learned serjeant: trace it to its original. I have heard no man say, that the crown has not a right to a Quo Warranto. If so, there may be Judgments, and not to be reversed but by a superior power. What signifies any man's telling you it is no Judgment; and therefore there is no room to scruple whether reverse, or no? If you reverse it, then leave them in the same right they had before. They have acted by another power, by a commission; I will not say, whether legal or no; but you are told by an honourable person (Hampden) 'That something has been done by the city of London, which he does not approve.' If both old and new were put out, and better put in, it would be more for their advantage.

Mr. Hampden. I did say, 'That some things had been done in the city of London, which I could wish had not been done.' I do not like every thing that has been done in the city; but I would be repeated when things are fresh in memory.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. A void judgment may be given, as well as an erroneous judgment. I will never give my consent to countenance such illegal and cursed judgments, to bring in Popery and arbitrary power.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am for the first part of the question, because I would have it sufficiently damned. I would have the Judgment reversed and voided from the beginning, and so understood and expressed too; else it will be from the first day of the parliament only. I shall never give countenance to any, to thrust themselves into offices to pack juries. They may crowd in the water-bailiffs, and markets, if you divide not the question.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I presume, no man doubts but that Hampden can form a question [reflecting] to the advantage of the thing he proposes; we have every day's experience of it. I did not expect to have had this question of a Charter.' Upon which premises, the proper conclusion seemed to be, 'That therefore the city of London had forfeited their Charter:' but the consequences of that were so much apprehended, that they did not think fit to venture on it: so they judged, 'That the king might seize the liberties of the city.' Upon this, the king sent a new Message to the city of London, requiring the Common Council to deliver up their Charter, threatening them, that, otherwise, he would order the Judgment to be entered; and, upon their refusal, the Judgment was entered, and the king seized on their liberties. Many of the aldermen, and other officers, were turned out, and others were put in their places. So they continued, for some time, a city without a Charter, or a Common Council; and the king named the magistrates." Burnet.

so laboured; truly, I did not. I love not artifices without doors; but I hear of a Bill already framed by members of the city, (not your members to be trusted with it,) to make the city a Commonwealth; and, Ordered by the Common-Council, 'That in case their own members shall not move the parliament, then the mayor and aldermen to deliver it to others; and the Bill prepared by their committee shall be presented; and if not, some other members of parliament are to do it.' Thus you see what work is cut out for you, that even in the work they have cut out they dare not trust their own members. The Bill makes the city independent from monarchy. I have not seen the bill; but those that have, inform me of this; and it is shrewdly to be suspected, when they dare not trust their own members.

Sir John Lowther. I hope this house will not be prevailed upon to have an ill opinion of the city, upon common hearsays. If ever such a Bill be brought in, I believe it will be thrown out with indignation. I hope never to see a common-wealth established here.

Mr. Powle, Master of the Rolls. You are engaged in a dispute on the words of the question. I take it to be a ground, that this Judgment against the city Charter be declared void. If a court give a judgment illegal and erroneous, it is good till it be reversed; but when the court has no jurisdiction, it is void in itself: I take it with that distinction. I take this to be a void judgment, and that the court had no jurisdiction, because it intrenches upon the jurisdiction of this house. The judgment was a dissolving and annihilating the corporation of London. Those bodies dissolved, of what shall this house consist? Dissolve old ones, and send new ones, as you please—If it be admitted, that this judgment was ever good, it shall bind as long as it is not reversed. This strikes at the root and foundation of the government; therefore we can do no better than declare, that the court had no jurisdiction. The words, 'To restore the rights and privileges, &c.' carry as much force as 'reversed;' which pre-supposes, that the Judgment had some validity, as being from a legal court.

Resolved, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reverse the Judgment in a Quo Warranto against the city of London, as arbitrary and illegal; and thereby to restore the city of London to its ancient privileges."

Debate in the Commons, on the Recognition Bill.] April 9. An ingrossed Bill, from the lords, for recognizing king William and queen Mary, and for avoiding all questions touching the Acts made in the parliament assembled at Westminster the 13th of Feb. 1688, was read the second time.

Lord Falkland. I am as much for the interest of this Bill as any body, but not for so hasty proceeding as is moved, 'to read it a third time now.' There have been great debates in the lords house about this bill: statutes and laws are mentioned in it. I would have them read. When that is done, I would go into a committee of the whole house.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I would observe the same words you did in the Abdication, when you did present the Address to the king and queen, to take the crown and dignity upon them; and I do concur and consent, that they 'are' so by the laws of the land, consonant to all laws practised in this nation; but that they 'were,' and 'are.' 'Were' they before they 'were in being?' I think it worth the consideration of this house—The nearest to this was the Convention, 12 Charles 2. An act was for confirming those acts, with this Clause, 'That, nevertheless, the king might prorogue that parliament, for, if the people may assemble a parliament, the king cannot dissolve it;' therefore that clause was put in, that the king might prorogue it, &c. We sit not here from the last Convention, but by oaths framed from the original contract, by which the king and queen took the government upon them. Here are acts for Money; I care not how soon they are confirmed, nor that of Ease to Dissenters. I would give them all the authority that may be; but I cannot declare, 'That they are and were king and queen, &c.' Therefore I move, that you will go into a committee.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Until an objection be made against the Bill, you are not to go into a committee; but when we come to a point to consider that objection, that of the Recognition is the first part. It is agreed by all, that we are bound in conscience to recognize the king and queen. The next, why those laws made, are not laws? That they 'were' and 'are,' must be taken from Feb. 25. If that be matter of dispute, it will involve us in great hardships. What are the laws that men cannot come up to? The Act for Money, or the Act for Ease to tender consciences? Is it for those bishops that will not come up to the government, and take the oaths? If you vary that, or make that a scruple, whither will you launch? If you make a doubt of what you have done, if they were good laws, and not good laws, where will that distinction end? If any thing in the Bill struck at the fundamentals of the government, you might debate it. We ought all to lay hands to the government: it is not the noise in the lords house that should weigh with us, but we should think of the preservation of the government, and our own safeties; which cannot be without this bill.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I did not except against the particulars of the Bill: I can come up to confirming all the laws; but, I think, to say, they 'were' and 'are,' not proper for a bill.

Mr. Palmes. Gentlemen that have made objections, I think, have not begun at the right end. You recognize, that the king and queen 'were' and 'are,' &c. Will you have it in those general words? I would have it qualified from the time, some time limited.

Sir John Lowther. Perhaps I am one of those that wish this bill had never been brought in. I am satisfied with what the last parliament did: I acquiesce in their authority, as the whole nation has done. I hope none will call the right of the king and queen in question. As here, so elsewhere, disputes ought to be avoided. I never knew, but distinctions occasioned disputes. I think 'were' and 'are,' must relate to the time the king and queen received their royal sanction, and were king and queen from the time they accepted the crown. The last parliament had power to alter the old laws, and substituted new oaths instead of the old. This being so, I cannot imagine that this should be a dispute. We have the consent of the people to remove all disputes and difficulties. In the 1st of Henry 4, there were laws enacted, and in force to this day, though they had not all the formalities of laws. I move that you will not go to particular distinctions. The words are plain, and all would submit to the true intent of the bill, and I move for a third reading to-morrow.

Sir Robert Sawyer. For the reason given, I am for committing the bill. I did recognize the king and queen, and for ever shall do so. But as for such general laws as this—The council of Trent made canons that every one might make his construction of—It ought to have some words of reference. The law of conquest is the law of all nations. First, these are the words of the Crown's Settlement, and then of Recognition, though those are the same words. 'Interest vested in the king and queen' are legal words, and therefore I would have it in such words as are limited by that act. The Judges must judge according to the laws of the land. If you make no limitation of the crown, it is in the king for ever; it is therefore proper and fit; and, I believe, no man, that has taken the oaths, but acknowledges the government, and I would have it in the words of the late Act of Rights.

Mr. Harcourt. I have some doubt that these words may destroy those in the Bill of Rights. I have ever thought the monarchy hereditary; and by this, what becomes of your entail? I am not satisfied that those of 1660 were acts of parliament; they needed confirmation. These are my doubts, that at present I am under. I second the motion for commitment of the bill.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I am for reading the bill to-morrow, notwithstanding what I have heard to the contrary, plainly, that we may be satisfied, that the last parliament was a legal one; and I stand by it, and declare it so. I am not for confirmation of it, for that strongly implies that it was not so before. If you express it no farther than the act mentioned, you raise a doubt whether that was an act or no. I would not raise more scruples than necessary.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Without taking the Tests in the act, no man can sit here. The word excepted against is, 'were.' I say again, that nothing ever was, but what had a beginning. I speak of sublunary things. I should be loth to give occasion in the next age, to be still in doubt by an ambiguous word. I am for confirming most acts of the last parliament, but the grammar of the expression I understand not; to enact a thing that 'was.'

Mr. Hampden. You have had several motions to go into a committee grounded regularly upon exceptions, or pretended exceptions. The first question is, Whether the bill shall be committed, or not? The next, Whether it shall be read a third time? I see, all gentlemen intend the bill should take effect, except one, that questions, whether those were acts, or no, in the last parliament. I cannot comprehend how this is against grammar, 'Were and are king and queen of England;' where is the hurt, when they were before the last parliament? Will you say that those, before this parliament met, were not laws from the time that the parliament met, unless they were excepted in another act to the contrary? I say, they were laws, and if it pass, as moved, a great many distinctions must be in this act. I see not what reason there is for committing it. It may occasion great debates. All you agree is, that they 'have been' so, as well as 'are so.' If you go into a committee, time will be spent, and if the king resolves to go into Ireland, before this bill pass, and leave it upon the table, I should be very loth to leave things so.

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. If we sit to hear all the objections that lawyers will make, we may sit till king James comes in again. You do not stand by your government, if you declare it not as in the bill, and if your last laws were none, you are no parliament, and it is no government.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. It is no reason against the commitment, 'Because it may occasion debate;' it is the natural reason for commitment, and for that reason it ought to be. I would not only have it clear to my own understanding, but to those without doors. I see no reason why these words 'were' and 'are,' should be in the bill. I should be unwilling to leave it to Westminster-Hall, to explain it. I know not what the lords mean by 'were' and 'are.' I am for explaining it. It is far from my thoughts not to have the laws of the last parliament confirmed. By the same reason, they may question how you came to be a parliament. We ought to make it so clear, as without doors to make a reasonable answer to a question. Says a gentleman, 'I would not explain it, because it may occasion debate at a Committee;' and for that reason I would commit it.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. I have observed the objections as well as I can. If there be no weight in them, there is no reason that the Bill should be committed. It is said, 'enacting that they were laws, seems not a proper expression.' In legislative capacity, 'enacting' is declaring 'it was.' It is said, by a person, 'That he agreed to the first part, because agreeable to the Bill of Rights.' You are told by a gentleman, 'That he is willing to confirm all the last parliament did.' If the laws of the last parliament want confirmation, it is impossible for you to give it. The validity of what they did, depends upon the validity of this parliament; and if so, it is impossible that should ever be a parliament, and this none. Queen Elizabeth enacted 'the members taking the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, otherwise their election should be void;' then I am sure there is an end of this parliament, for we have not taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, 'and incapable of ever being a member of either house;' so this puts an end to both houses of parliament. In the Convention of 1660, there was a king in being, and the next parliament was legally called by writs. This parliament depends entirely on the foundation of the last, and if they want a confirmation, neither this, nor the last parliament, can confirm it. It is said by Sawyer, 'conquest is a law.' It is the first time I ever heard it. I have heard that conquest supercedes all laws. It is said, 'To the time of the landing of the prince of Orange, according to the laws and statutes, they are king and queen.' Does not the Act of Settlement declare it? And you may very well refer to that law, when they had their royal sanction; I think there is nothing against the reason of the thing.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. I hope we all agree that they are king and queen; if we do not, we are forsworn. The only thing that sticks with me, is, I do not think that you intend that that Act about the Succession should be left any way uncertain, that what we all mean should be clear. Why then should it not be declared, 'That they are king and queen, according to the Bill of Succession?'

Sir Tho. Lee. It is the natural question, when exceptions are taken to a bill, to have it committed, and of bad consequence if any other question be put. I will trouble you now, only to offer an expedient how the matter may be solved, and the bill not committed. There is nothing of worse consequence, than to explain what right we sit here by, or upon what government we stand, lest we should make farther limitation of the crown than we have done. Possibly a rider, to declare nothing in this act against the Bill of Rights, &c. For that reason I am against committing it.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I second the motion for a rider, and you may soon order it to be drawn to the effect moved by Lee.

Mr. Hampden. As for the expedient offered by my countryman, Lee, I gave no encouragement to it. I neither did oppose it, nor approve it. It tends to the great prejudice of the crown. Such a motion for a rider is irregular. A rider is proper to be added to an ingrossed bill, but not against so great and substantial a clause of the bill as is opened.

Mr. Godolphin. It is dangerous to recognize the government upon such terms as to endanger the government. Some may interpret, 'From the king's landing, &c.' some conquest. —I would have it in plain words, that every one may understand; and it might be mended in three words. 'Be,' and 'be reputed,' looks as if the case of the kingdom was like the gentleman that rode over Rochester-bridge upon a single plank, and was so struck with astonishment afterwards, that he fell down dead—We have gone over a precipice, and we ought to walk warily.—He was called to order, by Sir Tho. Lee. It is proper to debate now the time of reading of the bill, but not the words of the bill.

Mr. Godolphin. I desire leave to bring in that rider mentioned by Lee.

The Speaker. 'Leave to bring in a rider' I never heard of before. Every one is at liberty to do it without leave.

Sir John Lowther. I own myself convinced that the bill ought to be read to-day; and as for the expedient, if you give time for a rider, you will have all the ill consequences that can be, as if the king had another title by conquest. This clause is no more than what was done the last parliament, and has destroyed all supposition by conquest.

Sir Tho. Lee. As I told you before, I am always for preserving order. Neither now, nor to-morrow, ought to be the question, but whether you will read it, or not. [He mistook.] I am sorry that any thing I said, by reason of arguing, should be taken for a motion. I thought I spoke plainly to orders and methods. What I did say, was, 'That it is in every gentleman's power to offer you a rider, if he pleases.' Mine was only an argument, what any gentleman might offer you.

The Bill was read a third time, and passed, the question for committing it being carried in the negative.*

* "On the very day that the Bill passed the lords, it was sent down to the commons, and on the morrow it was taken into consideration by that house. Great and long debates were expected. 'But to the wonder of all people,' says our lord of Salisbury, 'it passed in two days, without any debate or opposition.' His lordship adds, 'The truth was, the Tories had resolved to commit the bill, and, in order to that, some trifling exceptions were made to some words, that might want correction: for bills are not committed, unless some amendments are offered: and when it was committed, it was then resolved to oppose it. But one of them discovered this too early; for he questioned the legality of the Convention, since it was not summoned by writ: Somers, then solicitor general, answered this with great spirit. He said, if that was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and who had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament were guilty of high treason: The laws repealed by it were still in force; so they must presently return to king James: All the Money levied, collected and paid, by virtue of the acts of that parliament, made every one that was concerned in it highly criminal. This he spoke with much zeal, and such an ascendancy of authority, that none were prepared to answer it. So the Bill passed without any more opposition. This was a great Debate on the Sheriffs of London being called in.] April 17. The house was informed, that the Sheriffs of the city of London attended at the door, to present a Petition to the house.

Col. Birch. I move that they may be called in; it is a respect that was never denied to the city of London, which has been so useful to the government.

Sir Edw. Seymour. According to usage of parliament, they ought not to be called in. Have they not their representatives here? If it be a private business, you ought not.

Mr. Sacheverell. I am not of opinion that there are any such practices in the city as gentlemen talk of. Though I like not very well the change that has been lately made there in the Militia, nor the Bill to vacate the Judgment against their Charter. I will never be for them that would not stand with them for justifying their liberties. You do the corporation no good by reversal of their judgments. Instead of relieving them, you put them in a worse state than before their charters. I am for giving them their just rights, and no more.

Sir John Lowther. The debate is wholly irregular. To talk of Bills not brought in—I never heard that a Petition was delivered to the house, but was first opened, to see whether it was fit for you to receive; for sometimes you have rejected petitions. The last time you refused one from the city of London, because it was not opened. This is a matter that may create heats by dividing us, of the most dangerous consequence. In all companies, they talk of our divisions, that they will ruin us. If it be as people talk, it is a Petition for a bill to establish their own rights. No act enjoins the mayor and aldermen to petition, and nobody else. Consider the consequence of such a petition to the nation. Who shall you gratify by this but your enemies? Pray go to the order of the day.

Sir Henry Capel. A bill has been prepared, and read, about their privileges, and they may take notice of it. If the change of the lieutenancy in the city has been a misfortune, this is the place for it to be heard in, composed, and reconciled. I will not interfere in the order of the day, but beg all encouragement possible to the city. We know not where to have the Money, but in the compass of the city of London; therefore, pray, put no discouragement upon them, but call them in.

Sir Tho. Clarges. It is proper, now the Petition is opened, to consider whether you will receive it, or no? Pray let me put you in mind how you are used in this matter. The moservice done, in a very critical time, and contributed not a little to raise Somers's character.' It farther appears, by the Journals, that a motion was actually made for committing the Bill, which was over-ruled without a division: whence it follows, that the Tories were divided among themselves upon this subject; for, as they were the majority, had they been unanimous, they might have rejected it at the first reading." Ralph.

tion is, to restore the city to its ancient liberties, but you order a Bill to vacate the Judgment, and it is ordered to be read a second time. When you were at your devotions (the Fast-Day) no day would serve their turn for a Common Council, but that day. You were told of a great change in the city Militia; but I think, the king could not go with any security out of London, without that change of the lieutenancy. I remember, and sadly, what they did in Charles 1st's time, and the consequences. I am loth to give the Petition the name it deserves, and I would not have it read.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am one of those who were always of opinion, that just so much is due to London, and no more, as to every little corporation in England; 'That they have a right to petition, either by themselves, or their members, at this house;' and we cannot deny them, if they come in that due measure, and decency, as they ought. If the matter be what they ought not to petition, they are in your hands. I know nothing of the alterations in London; but I take it for very fortunate, that the Judges have their places now Quamdiu se bene gesserint; I should be afraid else the old ones would come in. I hope those who are the advisers of the king's change of the officers will take care, if this change be not good, that it shall be altered; if those judges should come into their places that have done ill. If the county of Buckingham should send a Petition, I hope you will receive it.

Mr. Harcourt. It seems that this Petition is framed rather at a cabal, than from the city; and not only brought in by the sheriffs, but against the very act of the members of the house.

Sir Robert Howard. I shall not enter upon complimenting the city, nor upon particular respects, but your duty in respect of yourselves. I know not how the Common Council is become a cabal now; it was a good cabal, when the king desired 100,000*l.* and they sent him 200,000*l.* I have a respect for those put in, and for those put out; but you must not be led on thus: since some of Mr. Cornish's and lord Russel's jury, murderers, had the power of the sword in their hands; those put out, I believe, are remote from a commonwealth—To refuse this Petition is one of the sharpest things that ever was. Was not Oxford Petition, between the first and second reading of a Bill, read! This would be a favour to encourage the city to assist; and these very people are not so inconsiderable a cabal, if it be one. If a member be so affixed to a town, or a place, what does he here, if he be not for the public? Pray be pleased to admit the Petition; if it be not fit for you, throw it out. Nobody knows yet what it is; and it will be strange to receive Oxford Petition, and throw out this.

Sir John Parsons. I will not call it a cabal; but several aldermen were not called to the common-council, and particularly I was one.

Col. Austen. I tell you why I would not be too strict in observing days. Deeds of charity may be done on that day as well as others. When you have occasion to use those gentlemen of the city, do not anger them. (Some laughed.) I cast my eye upon those that carry their pleasure of ridiculousness upon me, which I despise. Pray consider, whether you will not have occasion for money.

Mr. Coningsby. That question puts me upon another; whether those gentlemen will lend? I hope there are no murderers in the lieutenancy of London; and I hope those that will not qualify themselves, will be turned out.

The Petition was then opened by Sir Robert Clayton. (But he had not the Petition in his hand; which was against order.) I am not versed in the laws, but I know none 'That my lord mayor and the aldermen should bring the Petition themselves to the parliament.' They ought to be delivered by members of the house. Every member here serves for all England.

Sir Edmund Jennings. I know none put in nor out of the lieutenancy, but, I believe, on good consideration. The Gazettes were stuffed with Addresses to king James, to stand by him in the Dispensing Power with lives and fortunes: Quakers, Anabaptists, Presbyterians, and other sects; they either stood by king James, or assisted him. If they did it, or did not assist the present king, what security can the government have from them, that either opposed this king, or forsook king James? They are fit to be put out not only of civil but military employment. The king did not understand the constitution of the government, when he came in; but, since, he knows who are fit to be employed, and that these men put in are fit.

The question being put, That the Sheriffs of the city of London he called in, it passed in the negative, 215 to 166.

Debate on the Bill for reversing the Judgment against the City of London.] April 22. The Bill for reversing the Judgment, in a Quo Warranto, against the City of London, was read a second time.

Sir Robert Clayton. I am of opinion, with those that think this to be of great concern to be settled, in order to that, to lay our hands and heads to work. I would obviate all scandal laid on the city of London, by this Petition, that you have rejected, as not well obtained. The common-council ordered a Bill to be proposed to present to the house; they did this on Tuesday in the afternoon. They summoned a council, by which a committee was empowered to draw a Petition to present to the house. As to summoning the council, the lord mayor assures the house they had due summons. Sir John Parsons told you, 'he had no summons:' another, Mr. Perry, tells you of a nephew of his that had no summons. Parsons orders all his summonses to be left at a goldsmith's, and his summons was left accordingly; and the officer made oath that Parsons never called for it. The wards were summoned by printed tickets, and there are witnesses at the door, to prove a regular summons to every man. I cannot discover the least in their intention of surprize. If the house will have farther satisfaction, the witnesses are at the door. The committee would have gone farther, if they had had power. I take leave to offer you my thoughts, where the Bill is defective: There is no provision, that the companies shall be restored; nor provision to indemnify those that acted under the new charter; nor any for the magistracy of the city. I hope the prudence of the house will take care of that. If the magistrates that were before, take the same place as formerly, you must have the same sheriffs you had before. If all be restored that were before, you may see king James here again, if the king go into Ireland.

Mr. Papillon. The Bill is so far from the title, that it is against the thing. There were great endeavours to take away all the privileges of the city: soldiers were drawn up in Guildhall. This was before the Judgment upon the Quo Warranto. As this Bill is penned, you confirm all that was done before, instead of restoring the privileges. I move that you will enquire into what ancient privileges the city had before by the Judgment and Quo Warranto they were taken away.

Sir John Guise. I would know, whether you do not confirm that election of sheriffs, by which they lost all their liberties? Will you confirm all these actions? You are told, 'This was a cabal that framed the Petition;' but we do not find but that they had legal summons. They desire one thing, and you do another: They desire to be heard by counsel to the Bill; and that is made a ridiculous thing. You deny nobody counsel to be heard in the like case. I am not against the commitment of the Bill; but a great many things are to be thought of; and I hope you will take such consideration and steps, as wise men ought to think of, and not lay imputations upon people of a commonwealth. Those who spread such reports betwixt the king and his people, are criminal.

Sir Tho. Vernon. There is one thing to be provided for, that all freemen may be confirmed, livery-men paid, some 20, some 25*l.* for it. That that may be confirmed, I would have part of the instructions to the committee.

Mr. Foley. I suppose it is not the design of the house to restore those to their places, who have lost them because they would not swear to the government: that is not for the king's interest, nor the city's. It is intimated, that this bill will restore sir Dudley North and sir Peter Rich to be sheriffs. I know not how the house will come up to that, I think Rich has lost his alderman's place; and, notwithstanding disability of places, by this bill they are restored. I would have them restored to the rights they had before the Judgment against the Charter.

Resolved, That the Bill be committed to a committee of the whole house; and that Counsel be heard upon the said Bill, to such points as the house shall direct.

*Debate on the King's Change of the Lieutenancy of London.] April 24. Sir Tho. Clarges. By this example of the change of the lieutenancy of London, the king has a great care of us; and I hope he will do the same all England over; and I move you to thank him.

Mr. Papillon. I must not jest with myself, though I am a citizen, but I know not who these persons are that you thank him for. I know not the names of a fourth, or a half of them; they may be obnoxious to the church of England, and the government. Such a motion as this, after two o'clock, is not for your honour.

Mr. Campion. I am for the church of England-men to be employed in this lieutenancy. I know not whether it be true or no, but I have heard, that several of them would not take the oaths to the government. I would know what this lieutenancy is, before I give my consent to thank the king.

Mr. Finch. I think the gentleman mistakes the motion; for the Address to the king is for those in the lieutenancy; and those that would not take the oaths, are not by law of the lieutenancy.

Sir Robert Clayton. I should be glad to understand the question, and the reason of it, (and so gives an account of the Change of the Lieutenancy in the last Commission.) But it is worth your examination, neither the ablest nor best men are added. I would examine, whether these persons are worth the favour of this Address to the king. You will find, that many have had a hand in the worst things. I am for cementing, not for dividing. Divisions and

* "The Corporation Bill did so highly provoke all those whom it was to have disgraced, that the Tories were by far the greatest number in the new parliament. One thing was a part of the bargain that the Tories had made, that the lieutenancy of London should be changed. For upon the king's coming to the crown he had given a commission, out of which they were all excluded; which was such a mortification to them, that they said, they could not live in the city with credit, unless some of them were again brought into that commission. The king recommended it to the bishop of London to prepare a list of those who were known to be churchmen, but of the more moderate and of such as were liable to no just exceptions; that the two parties in the city might be kept in balance. The bishop brought in a List of the most violent Tories in the city, who had been engaged in some of the worst things that passed at the end of king Charles's reign. A committee of council was appointed to examine the List, but it was so named that they approved of it. This was done to the great grief of the Whigs, who said, 'That the king was now putting himself in his enemies hand, and that the arms of the city were now put into a set of officers, who, if there was a possibility of doing it without hazard, would certainly use them for king James.' Burnet.

parties never did good, nor ever will, of any church or party whatsoever. If you will give liberty to enquire further into the lieutenancy, I believe you will not pass this vote.

Sir John Lowther. I am for this, because it will take away our divisions. If the king remove me, I am so conscious to my own abilities, that I shall agree that I am justly removed; and if they have not given satisfaction to the government, I hope they will comply for the future. We have had talk of ill management of Addresses for removal of persons, and catechising the king. I hope that is gone. I hope he will have success and encouragement in the farther methods he shall please to use, and take away all dangerous and factious people, to the full satisfaction of the government. If there are such men, they are fit for removal, and I hope they will be turned out; and that it will extend to both sides, one as well as the other, and take away all divisions for the future.

Mr. Foley. I am afraid we are under a mistake in this. Some said, they were Church of England-men, and some not. I have seen a List, and I must observe many in the lieutenancy that have had their hands in blood several times over. 'Tis not for the service of the nation to condemn a man upon one witness, and one that contradicted himself. Some are there, who went to congratulate king James after his return, and the landing of the prince of Orange. I know not why you will take so much notice as to give the king Thanks for these men. They have chosen one for colonel, who would not qualify himself to be an alderman, and has appeared, by force, to controul elections in the city. I believe, when you examine, many things will be proved upon these persons; and, I hope, when the house has a full information of these things, they will not think it for the interest of the king and kingdom, that these men should be continued.

Sir Samuel Dashwood. I find, great stress is laid upon one particular, of persons unqualified. The matter of fact is this: sir James Smith happened to be in the country; and I have heard him solemnly declare, 'That he never heard of that act.' Though the court of aldermen did not admit him, yet they admitted another under the same circumstances. Sir Tho. Allen omitted it solely upon ignorance of the act. I know many, of great reputation and honour, of the city, (if I may call it so) and their loyalty did manifestly appear by the great sums they sent the king. Be they Churchmen, or not, this particular person is as honest to the king's interest as any man in the lieutenancy.

Sir Robert Howard. I am of his mind. I would not shut a man out of the government, that is willing to come in, both clergy and others: I am so far from taking advantage of omissions, that I would restore all. To the honour of the privy-council, it was said once, 'That you were beholden to the lower end of the table for taking away the Chimney-money.' I had no share in that advice; it was from the king.—But, for an Address to thank the king in general, there I must say a word. I speak under the shelter of an act of parliament—To ingross Thanks for such men, for actions you have marked and judged criminal! If you go on the method of thanks for the men of the Church of England, I am for that; but, for men that have committed murders (the king not knowing it); and you thank alderman Cornish's and lord Russel's Jury—King James took down Cornish's rotten quarters, set up there by as rotten a power—Pray let this be examined. Let us not ask the king for that, but for the Church of England—For acts, that we ourselves have condemned, that an act of parliament has condemned, and all mankind!

Mr. Finch. Most gentlemen mean the same thing, in this debate; It is not, that the house will thank the king for 20 or 40 people, but for those who, by their principles and practice, are for the Church of England. I would have a question that will thus take the sense of all men, I would have the king thanked, 'For the great care he has taken of the Church of England, in the alteration he has made in the Militia of London.'

Col. Birch. I did never think, after the experience I have had, ever to have heard this, and that we are all agreed to serve the king and kingdom. In the parliament of 1660, none abroad durst look the king in the face, when the king said, 'Let this be called the healing and blessed parliament.' Not long after this, one sort of people, who acted in a corner (I know who they were) made men criminated in most corners of the kingdom; this brought us into a low condition. We were taught that prayers and tears would cure us; but they brought Declarations and the government to tyranny. Pray let this Address alone, till we have beaten our enemies. I protest, if I would give advice from the other side of the water, it should be this; for gentlemen to give Thanks for they know not what. Let us see these gentlemen (we thank for) who they are first. I know what they are that stuck to the king, from Dan to Beersheba. To put the king into other hands, I am not for it. Examine who these are, and do not give Thanks hand over head for these men.

Sir Henry Capel. If I am not for the Church of England, I have much forgot whom I am descended from, that suffered for that church in the Palace-yard*. Is it a reasonable thing that the whole body of the parliament should address the king, &c. without satisfaction? Suppose you make this Address, and you find those put in are not of the Church of England, and have been of the bloody juries? When you address the king, do you not take every part of his Speech into consideration, before you draw up your Address? I never saw the List of this lieutenancy, but I have heard an ill character of some of them. I have seen the Church of England set forwards and backwards, by lord Clifford, who did head the Declaration; and here we are set one against another, and all for the interest of the Papists. We cannot justify ourselves to our country, in this Declaration, if any of these things alledged happen. Another parliament will find fault with this Address, as not consistent with reason. Unless there be some other design in it, I move, that a committee may make a fair report of these persons in the Lieutenancy, that we may be all unanimous.

* Lord Capel, his father.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. All unanimously agree for Thanks to the king, for his encouragement of the Church of England. Plainly, that is the sole bottom of his security, to establish the crown, to countenance it, and shall not this house take notice of it? It has given great satisfaction, in the country, that the king has made this alteration; and shall not the king know of it? I hope those of the council will advise the king of the sense of so considerable a part of the nation. What do the Dissenters terminate in, but a commonwealth?

Sir Tho. Littleton. It is strange to return Thanks to the king for this alteration, before we know whether it be an alteration or no. We are told, 'That the Dissenters are left in the lieutenancy.' I am one of those that would not make the king a king of a party. The misunderstanding in the nation, is not from Church of England-men and Dissenters, but betwixt Church-men and Church-men, that would ingross the name of Church-men, to bring in tyranny, and persecute all Protestant churches abroad. Those that are for having the king universal king of all his people, will support him in any trial; and I doubt that trial is nearer than we are aware of. The house is not yet so much satisfied as to know the names of this Lieutenancy of London. I am not for the question, till we know what we are doing.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I made you the motion that occasioned this debate. I hope now I shall propose something to all your satisfactions. I would address the king, with Thanks 'for his care of the Church of England, expressed in the alteration of the Lieutenancy of England.'

Col. Birch. In all these debates, something starts of use to the king and kingdom. I know not who is for king James, or who for king William. It grieved my heart to see a thousand at church last Sunday, and not forty at the Sacrament. He that is unworthy of the one, I think, is unfit for the other: it is a fund of confidence upon one another. Let us abjure him on the other side of the water; and, instead of this endless, sleeveless Address, draw up that abjuration.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I approve much what has been moved, that the Address be in general. I hope we shall avoid going from one extreme to another.

Col. Austen. I believe the Church of England all very good men; and those tools, or that made themselves so, who congratulated king James's return to Whitehall, and wept for joy, will you thank the king in general for these men? But, as to thanking the king for any general kindness done to the Church of England, I am for it.

Sir John Lowther. I would neither take notice of these mens merits nor crimes. But the interest is changed; and their morals are good, whatever their principles are. If you stay till all are of a mind, you will never have alterations; but if things are comparatively better, 'tis that which we give thanks for.

Sir Henry Capel. It seems to me, that every one is zealous for the Church of England well established for this particular place, for London only. The executive part is always in the crown; to put out, and put in, as it pleases: therefore it will be more safe, and more for the honour of the Church, and this house, that there be no negative for the whole kingdom. For the king's care of the Church of England, carry it as far as you will. Let the question be general, and leave out 'the Lieutenancy of London.'

Resolved, "That the humble Thanks of this house be presented to his majesty, for the great care he has expressed of the Church of England, in the late Alterations he has made in the Lieutenancy of the city of London." The words, "in the Lieutenancy of the city of London," were retained, 185 to 136.

Debate on the Abjuration Bill.] Mr. Harbord. Pray let us not lose our question, 'That they that will not make renunciation of king James's title, shall not have the benefit of the Habeas Corpus act, nor be capable to bear any office.' We have been told of 'Overloading the cart;' (by Birch) but I had rather have nothing in the cart, than leave the main load behind. And I move, that the word 'Ecclesiastical Offices' may be put into the question.

Sir John Lowther. 'Tis absolutely necessary, that this motion of the Habeas Corpus be put into the Bill of Abjuration. I know that designs are carried on, to the destruction of the government: therefore I would have it part of the instructions to the committee.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The Habeas Corpus act went backward and forward; and we had 16 years time to get it; and now to make a law to be deprived of that law! Make what penalties you will; but, in one act to repeal another, I know not where the consequence may rest. I value liberty more than life, or estate: that's my passive obedience; I cannot consent to it.

Mr. Wharton. We differ only about words. I say, 'Imprison,' as serjeant Wogan says, 'with-out bail or mainprize,' or to be deprived of the Habeas Corpus act, is the same thing.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am as fond of the Habeas Corpus act as any body. The bill against foreign imprisonment was lost once, in the lords house, by one vote. It was, when the liberty of the subject was inconsistent with what was to be then done. But this is only instruction to a committee, for direction to draw a Bill. I do it now, upon this particular occasion, now the king goes away, for the security of the government. But for those that will give no security, till Ireland be conquered, 'tis no hurt to your Act of Habeas Corpus.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I did not give my consent to repeal the Habeas Corpus act then: but to give instructions to a committee to repeal a law, I never knew; nor is it the usual way, nor method of parliament. The blank for the Oath of Allegiance was filled up by a committee of the whole house.

Mr. Harbord. If you give a private member leave to bring in a Bill to repeal a law, you may surely trust a committee with it.

Resolved, "1. That a committee be appointed to prepare and draw up an Oath of Abjuration of the late king James, that all persons, in any employment or trust, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, shall be obliged to take: and that the committee do prepare and bring in a Bill for that purpose. 2. That it be an Instruction to the said committee, that such persons as will not take the said Oath, shall be committed, without bail or mainprize."

April 26. The Abjuration-Bill was read a second time.

Lord Digby. It is a tender point that I am going to speak to; and, before I enter into the debate, I desire I may speak freely, without prejudice. Whatsoever concerns the constitution of the present government, I would not be thought to speak against; nor for king James, if I speak against the Bill. The foundation of the government is the Bill of Rights; wherein the king promises his part, &c. and we swear fealty. This is our original contract; if there be any, I am of opinion that is it. This Oath I took with a good conscience, and will keep it. Till the king enlarges his part of the contract, I think we should not enlarge ours. I have heard of enemies against kingly government, and I fear this will create many more. This will not distinguish the enemies from the friends of the government. If this be, now the king is going into Ireland, it may be of dangerous consequence. These considerations weigh with me against the bill.

Mr. Cary. I am so much a friend to the government, that, when this was first proposed, I was for it, and ready to take any engagement; but the reason then for it, makes me now against it. To distinguish friends and enemies, supposes a need to support the government. Now you doubt your weakness, and prove it too. Do you not discover the weakness of the government, when you find it? The Oath of Allegiance has this Oath of Abjuration in it. Oaths lose their value, when they lose their necessity. Excommunication lost its force, when made too cheap, in the Romish Church. I shall proceed to show, that this is no security to the government. They that will evade one oath, will another. Those men that abjured king Charles 2, did not they bring him in? May not men that will evade these oaths, come into employment, and easily break through, and have advantage of betraying the government? They have taken the Oath of Allegiance; and if they have a mind to get off by evasion, they may do this of Abjuration. I am against a committee, &c. because it is against the government.

Col. Granville. I stand up to move for commitment, and really I cannot understand the reason of those that oppose it. This only obliges us to what we all have done. In that oath, I did heartily renounce all allegiance and kindness to king James. The duty to religion obliged us to displace a Popish prince: a Protestant title is the best title to the crown of England. If we discover our weakness upon an ill bottom, it will only discover our enemies. I have heard exceptions against ecclesiastics, &c. I cannot believe it, unless they have some secret reserve. If such men be in England, this bill is absolutely necessary. From treachery and false-heartedness is our ruin. Those who scrupled the former oaths, will these; and your great tenderness, in the last parliament, makes them scorn to owe any obligation to your mercy, because, they say, you durst not do otherwise: they are not to be led by arguments of clemency and good-nature. I am for the bill.

Lord Falkland. I am an advocate for the present government; and, for the same reason, I was for the Abdication of king James, and for the settling of king William upon the throne. The design of this bill is to distinguish your enemies: at home, they are too few to be feared, or too many to be provoked. When your enemies see you reduced to the last extremity, how will they value you? When Augustus Cæsar had a list given him of those who conspired against him, he burnt that list; which made those and their families his friends. If such think themselves bound in conscience to bring in king James, they will take this oath to bring him in. Those who brought in king Charles 2, valued themselves upon their abjuration of him. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that this bill is destructive to the government: I am against it. I have taken the oath of allegiance to king William, and will keep it; and I did in that abjure king James. I have suffered too much in the last government, ever to desire it to come back.

Sir John Thompson. One thing is missing in the bill, that all the lawyers in England swear to it, and then the divines will not scruple it.

Mr. Harcourt. I will support the dignity of the monarchy under the government: could I believe this bill would conduce to it, I should be as forward for it as any man; for, that person that will equivocate with the oath of allegiance, there is no security in it, and but little in this. I have often heard, that we have a powerful enemy abroad, and a necessity to unite at home. This will endanger fomenting and increasing jealousies. What we have done already does encourage our allies, and deter our enemies, and testify our firmness to the government, by the great sums of money we have given to support it. I will discharge my conscience, however I am mistaken. Such an unprecedented oath will give occasion to think there is some defect in the government, when such an oath was never required in this government to support it. Can we gain more friends? Those who quietly obey it, naturally, if they suffer by it, will find means to redress themselves. You will make no friends by it; you will make enemies. I hope there will be no reflection upon me, as against the government, because I am against the bill.

Sir John Mainwaring. I will give you my private reason, why I am for this bill. Suppose you have a member within these walls, that should say, 'If you will do as I would have you, send away king William, and send back for king James.' I have an attested copy of this information of one of your members.

Sir John Guise. When I see a gentleman give you this account, who is not likely to run away, I would have it heard on Monday; and I doubt not but you will think it worthy your care to know who this member was. If he does not make this out, he is under your censure, and you may send him to the Tower.

Sir Ch. Kemys. I know not whether the member that said the words, may be here to-morrow; though, I believe, Mainwaring may be here.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This is an aspersion upon the whole house. For your own honour, if there be such a rotten limb, let him be named and cut off.

Col. Birch. It is not to say, 'name him, name him:' but things of this consequence are determined by a question.

Sir John Mainwaring. Now I am commanded by the house to name the person that said the words, I shall do it. The reason why I did not name him was, because persons have sworn it. I cannot assert the truth of it; but the gentleman is Sir Thomas Grosvenor.

Sir Tho. Grosvenor. There was a bricklayer in Chester, who said, 'He heard me say some words, when I stood for parliament-man.' Alderman Streete took the examination of the man: he was privately examined. On Sunday morning I heard of it, and came to Chester in the afternoon; and several citizens proffered to testify, upon oath, what this fellow was. He was bound apprentice to a person in Chester, whom he robbed, and another at London, and then turned fortune-teller. He came to Chester, and nobody would employ him, he was such a lying fellow. I caned this fellow for ill work he had done for me, and he swore he would be revenged of me. Alderman Streete threatened to lay this man by the heels, if he would not swear against me. He sent the Examination to lord Shrewsbury. Col. Cholmondeley carried the letter to my lord, and the Examination, which attested the villainy of this fellow. I entered into a recognizance of 5000*l.* to clear myself.

*Col. Cholmondeley. I am sorry this thing has been mentioned. Lord Shrewsbury told me, 'That sir Tho. Grosvenor need not trouble himself; for this was some quarrel only about elections.'

Mr. Shackerley. I must justify this person. Because he would not take the Test, he was turned out of the army. A letter was sent from captain Middleton, to cast bullets, for the army, out of the lead-mines; and this Streete made use of the letter for casting of bullets for king James.

Sir Robert Cotton. I know this Streete did promote the business, when the city of Chester declared for the prince of Orange.

Mr. Wharton. I am sorry when there are any personal reflections in this house; but if you cannot get off from it at present, appoint a day. The gentleman is not accused by Mainwaring; but, for his justification, hearing this thing, he thought it his duty to acquaint you with it*.

Sir Henry Goodrick. My opinion is, that this bill is dangerous. This began the Barons wars; but in those great changes none of these cures were ever attempted. The possessor of the crown ought to be obeyed. When you abjure a government, you abjure your lands. A man cannot say, he will abjure against God's will. I am as free to serve this government, as I was forward to bring it in. This is an abjuration that I cannot say I can maintain: abjuration is a renunciation of all protection that can come to me. Though some men will swallow abjuration of the royal family, under a branch whereof we sit, those of the church of England will not do it. The utmost necessity made me break my oath to king James: it was utmost necessity, and those are terrible things. Upon the Revolution, gentlemen could not dispossess themselves of the obligations of former oaths. I will come closer, net of horse in 1685; and on king William's accession, appointed a groom of his bed-chamber. He served in all the wars of that reign; and, at the battle of the Boyne, commanded the horse-grenadier guards. Also at the battle of Steenkirk, in 1692, when the king attacked the French army in their camp, he particularly distinguished himself, and was wounded. In 1697, he was appointed brigadier general. In 1702, he was constituted major-general, and governor of Tilbury Fort and Gravesend; and the next year he was declared lieutenant-general of horse. On the accession of George 1, he was continued in his posts, and soon afterwards he was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of lord Newburgh; as he was, in 1716, of England, by the same title. In 1724, on his brother's death, he succeeded to the title of earl of Cholmondeley, and, soon after, was appointed governor of Hull, &c. In 1727, he was made general of horse; and, in 1732, governor of Guernsey. He died in 1733.

* No mention is made of this in the Journal.

* Brother to lord Cholmondeley, made cor-this Oath is to renounce and abjure all allegiance to king James. The Oath of Allegiance to king William was generally taken all over England; and, of ten thousand in holy orders, not above 80 have refused it. Those who were for a regency, I did not join with. As Christians, we ought to bear with one another; but two of your members refused the Oath†; one whereof was a man of great integrity, and known honour in his country. That was a positive oath; but when it is a negation, the case is altered. In the Revolutions of Naples and Sicily, there was no oath given. It never took place among Christians, to make an Oath of Abjuration. This being so, what necessity is there of this oath for us, more than all the world besides? Is not your Oath of Allegiance sufficient? I cannot answer how a negative oath may garble the nation. I am a counsellor, and am bound by my oath to die for the honour and safety of the government. In so near a post to the king, I must do for his honour and safety, and the kingdom's. To give power to a justice of peace (as by this Bill) to send a man to jail, without bail, is the highest point of tyranny. Let it not be in our power to tyrannize over one another. I would take it into consideration to secure the government; but, in the mean time, to reject this bill.

Sir John Guise. You are told, 'That, in the Revolutions of Naples and Sicily, there was no Oath of Abjuration given.' None but have heard what the Sicilian Vespers were—Augustus Cæsar had a list of those who conspired against him. He would know, whether Lentulus and Antony were against him—Or whether a king James in Ireland. His business was, who had no right to the crown, to oblige people to join with him to enslave the rest. I have heard a lord speak of 'an original contract.' What have you done in this? If no contract be broken by king James, you know the consequence. If king James's going into France is in the nature of a demise, you know who must be king. If that come to be debated over again here, you may lay such stumbling blocks, that you may see enemies rise, with swords in their hands, before you know you have an enemy. It is said, they will submit; but it is because they see a greater power, when the Oaths come to be published. When I come to abjure, I will abjure; I have not forsworn myself. I am absolved from my oath, when it cannot be maintained. You will keep a reserve for king James, if he get the better; but I will either live or die with this government. If you will not own yourselves, will people own you?

Sir Tho. Lee. There are many things in the Bill fit to be altered and mended, that I do not like indeed; and I think it too large in putting in 'Ecclesiastical persons.' I think it fit, that those in employment and offices give security to the government. I am sorry there should be such an expectation of king James that men should not renounce him. We used to say that allegiance follows protection. As to the reverend clergy that took the Oaths, it seems to me but a repetition of the oaths; and I wonder that gentlemen, by the same reason, are not against the Oaths and the Test to be taken in every new office. The Oath of Abjuration was tendered to general Monk; he would not take it—It was imposed by a little party here, and a few crept in together, but was not imposed upon the generality of the kingdom. What was that Diana of the Covenant-Renunciation but a kind of abjuration? This is not so now in England, as gentlemen would seem to have it. I would have it so understood and declared, that we may provide against them and him by renouncing such obligation. This debate seems to me to be more necessary, by what I have heard, when I am told, that men in employment drink king James's health. As for new distinctions, what else were the Tests for, after the Oaths of Allegiance, whilst great men in power drew men into power? But their power sunk by the discountenance they gave to their old friends the Cavaliers, who might have been useful to them afterwards. What security can persons have, that obliging will not tie? The king shows you, that he is not ignorant of designs on foot of secret enemies. The way to have fewest enemies is the speediest discoveries; and that those in employment and trust in the government declare they have no expectation, no desire, of change in the government.

Mr. Roberts. There is a third thing, called interest, makes men stick to a government. I am attainted in Ireland. I came in with no opinion of this bill, and I am now confirmed, that you reject the bill.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The 27th of Dec. 1688 you attended on the prince of Orange, and thanked him for his Expedition. And then we asserted all our rights, and then made a tender of the crown, and the Oath of Allegiance we have all taken, which is a renunciation of king James; and it bears a just interpretation. Do you think the government is yet insecure? In your Act of Rights, you did declare him king, and swore allegiance, &c. and I think the Act of Recognition did rather weaken. Where you put a buttress, there the building is weak. What say the Jesuits? 'Let them alone, and they will fall out among themselves; and king James will come in:' and nothing will tend more to bring in king James than this bill. I am for the government, and I did take the Oaths conscientiously, and will. No ambiguous oath was ever taken; but when we come once to distinguish a title, then we have bill after bill, to explain we know not what. The short Oath of Allegiance was a good and a wise oath. The bills for Money are depending, and this comes to interrupt them! I humbly conclude, that this Bill may be rejected.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It had been a great deal more ingenuous to have brought these objections upon the bringing in of the bill. The government being crazy, I would have buttresses to support it. The government was never asserted by the Churchmen, till Magdalen-College was touched. They have a notion in their heads of the Great Turk, that if they may be bashaws, they will swear allegiance to the Great Turk. If this bill will bring in a commonwealth, I am against it, and I cannot believe such a man (as Clarges) is in earnest, when he says so. We have had one Revolution, and, that we may not have another, I am for this bill.

† Lord Fanshaw, and sir Henry Monson. See p. 253.

Sir John Lowther. I speak now with great difficulty. My heart and judgment goes along with most part of this bill, and I am content to be a martyr for it: but I have a great deference to unity. Totally to reject this bill, after our votes are gone abroad of the first reading, may have no good effect. On the other side, to go against the grain of so many worthy gentlemen, who would live and die with the king, is inconvenient. We have the example of a man of great authority (lord Carmarthen). I would have it fortified with such authority. There are conspiracies among Protestants as well as Papists. I fear the oath taken to abjure king James is not for love of this king, but to abjure all kings. I would not put so great discouragement as totally to reject this bill, but you may model it. It may lie upon the table, or be referred to a private committee; but I would not instantly commit it to the whole house. Change the Abjuration into 'Not assisting king James.' He that agrees not to keep him out is not fit to be in the government; but I do not desire that to be imposed upon every body, but to own the government, and promise not to bring in king James. Consider the condition you will be left in; the king in Ireland; and, worse than all the rest, the government will be left precarious in the hands of people, whether they will lend Money for the Army or Fleet, and all may be lost; and they descant, 'That the parliament would never reject this bill, but for some uncertainty in the government; and we will never lend our money;' and the consequence may be, the Army will be upon free quarter, and the Navy not go out. Take it thus far into consideration; try if you can moderate the Bill to satisfy; and possibly, with a little pains, it may satisfy all persons.

Sir Robert Howard. I shall speak with all the deference to every body that differs from me, that is fit. I know not what Lowther means by his 'deference to a great man,' whom he names not. You are told, 'This renunciation is a new thing;' but church and state can never be safe without it. What is your religion, your allegiance, but a renunciation? The old thing you ever have done. What are your penal laws, and Test, but a renunciation? It is the whole government, and protection of church and state. I believe it in the peoples hearts already; and they may else renounce you, and go into a commonwealth. I would not try whether we have enemies too many, and friends too few. I would rather know my fate, than silently live under I know not what. Consider what renunciation is; you remove a king, and one may be king again. This being so, you have more cause now than ever to think of a renunciation. The king goes into Ireland; and if king James should come here, and take possession, this will take that off from those that think themselves yet free to join with him. The people who generally lend money in the Exchequer, are not people who expect that king James will pay them again. A renunciation of all hopes of king James is the subject of the Bill.

Mr. Ettrick. When this bill is laid aside, you may order another; but not for justices of the peace to imprison when they please. I can readily come up to this. I hear the Church mentioned: I fear it may be a Church-trap. I should have been glad to see 'the king's heirs and successors' in the bill, that monarchy may be supported by it. When the Rump-Parliament came to be in the feeblest condition, then came the Abjuration of Charles 2.

Mr. Powle, Master of the Rolls. Nothing is more natural among private persons, and the government is to take the most natural way to preserve itself; and this is nothing but a zealous support with vigour; and therefore not only by punishments, but the way has been taken by oaths to preserve the government. This oath is to no other end than to respect those who are to be employed in the government: It is not universal, to peep into mens consciences that live peaceably, but that they who are to act ought to be zealous in it. I will not go so far back as the wars of York and Lancaster. The Oath of Supremacy and Allegiance was perfectly an abjuration of the pope, and all his power, in Henry 8th's Reformation, when there was no prospect of opposition; but when there are pretended titles against the present government, it is reasonable to make men renounce them. 'A king de facto, and a king de jure'—whoever mentions that de facto implies another de jure. There are two allegiances in that case, and therefore fit to stick to one. To obey the king de facto, is no other than to obey till I have power to rebel. To let them go abroad, and scatter this fire, you will restrain! I should be very sparing to impose this oath on any but in offices, but to have a discretionary power to give it. All governments do it; and you must do this, if you will preserve it.

Sir Joseph Williamson. It has been long known to many gentlemen, that I have as much zeal for the Protestant religion as any body. It is unfortunate, when things are brought on suddenly, by surprize. The question for this bill came in in an angry time of day, when you were about the City Address. I shall ever be for keeping off from heats and parties. I cannot but observe, that it came in upon resentment. I went out for the Address, and against this Bill; but I see plainly, it resents matter of party and distinction; and, however well intended, it seems to be designed against one sort of persons. I take it, the Church of England is as sure to this government as any other part of it. It is their interest and preservation to despair of possibility of living under a popish king. None did their duties with more courage than that body of men, nor suffered more deeply. The Popish party supported the lowest sort of men (the Quakers) to take them into their party against the Church of England. I say to this bill, the scope in consequence of it may weaken hands; it is not necessary, and therefore not advisable. I would have a day set to secure the government against all ill-affected persons. Now the king is going for Ireland, we have no account of the Militia. Seeing it is not done elsewhere, I move for a day to consider it, 'to secure the Government against all ill-affected persons.'

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. What fell from Williamson calls me up. It must touch upon me. This Bill was moved for by one and another; and I thought fit to follow it; and you might have rejected it upon the first motion. We are in an actual war against one that was king, and some hope may be. This bill is not against the Church of England. If any be against the government, and this king, it is that party, be it where it will, against which the bill is intended. If it be left on your books, that this bill is rejected, I hope those against it will not be ashamed to let their names go abroad.

The question for committing the Bill passed in the negative, 192 to 178: and the question for rejecting it passed in the affirmative, 192 to 165.*

* "The greatest debate in this session was concerning a Bill, that was brought into the house of commons, requiring all their majesties subjects to abjure the late king James, under pain of imprisonment. Some of the Tories were at first for it, as were all the Whigs. The clergy were excepted out of it, to soften the opposition that might be made. But still the main body of the Tories declared, they would never take any such oath; and therefore opposed every step that was made in it with a great vehemence: they insisted much on this, that when the government was settled, oaths were made to be the ties of the subject to it; and that all new impositions were a breach made on that, which might be called the original contract of the present settlement. That things of that kind ought to be fixed and certain, and not mutable and endless. That by the same reason, that the abjuration was now proposed, another oath might be prepared every year; and every party, that prevailed in parliament, would bring in some discriminating oath or test, such as could only be taken by those of their own side; and thus the largeness and equality of a government would be lost, and contracted into a faction. On the Debate on securing the Government, and on suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.] April 28. Sir Joseph Williamson. That power I move for now, was formerly used and exercised in the government; and if there be not some extraordinary provision made, on extraordinary other side it was urged, that this was only intended to be a security to the government during the war; for in such a time it seemed necessary, that all, who were employed by the government, should give it all possible security. That it was apparent, that the comprehensive words in the oaths of allegiance had given occasion to much equivocation; many, who had taken them, having declared, as some had done in print, that they considered themselves as bound by the oaths only while the king continued in peaceable possession; but not to assist or support his title, if it was attacked or shaken. That it was therefore necessary, that men in public trusts should be brought under stricter ties. The Abjuration was debated in both houses at the same time. The Whigs pressed the king to set it forward; alledging, that every one, who took it, would look on himself as unpardonable, and so would serve him with the more zeal and fidelity; whereas those, who thought the right to the crown to be still in king James, might perhaps serve faithfully as long as the government stood firm; but as they still kept measures with the other side, to whom they knew they would be always welcome, so they would never act with that life and zeal, which the present state of affairs required. At the same time the Tories were as earnest in pressing the king to stop the farther progress of those debates; that much time was already lost in them; and it was evident, that much more must be lost, if it was intended to carry it on; since so many branches of this bill, and so many incidents that arose upon the subject of it, would give occasion to much heat and contest; that it was a doubt, whether it would be carried, after all the time which was bestowed upon it, or not: that those who opposed it, would grow sullen, and oppose every thing else that was moved for the king's service; and that, if it should be carried, it would put the king again into the hands of the Whigs, who would immediately return to their old practices against the prerogative; and that it would drive many into king James's party, who might otherwise adhere firmly to his majesty, or at least be neutral. These reasons prevailed with the king to order an intimation to be given in the house of commons, that he desired they would let that debate fall, and go to other matters, that were more pressing. This gave a new disgust to the Whigs, but was very acceptable to the Tories; and it quickened the advances of money upon the funds that were given. It had indeed a very ill effect abroad; for both friends and enemies looked on it as a sign of a great declension of the king's interest with his people. And his majesty's interposing to stop further occasions, to lodge such a trust, for some few months, against such persons as shall be justly suspected to conspire against the government, to support the government that has redeemed us from the danger of all our rights, secular and divine, we are to despair for tolerable terms to live and breathe in, without such helps. No man will use that for his constant diet, that is his physic when indisposed; and I foresee that such a censure may be made upon this. In all parliaments, they have found it necessary to lodge a trust in the crown: as when in Henry 8th's time there was a power pro interim, by proclamation, &c. and a disposing of the whole succession of the crown, in the recognition of queen Elizabeth, it is taken notice of, 'That that law of Henry 8 shall be a law in the government for ever.' Let no gentleman think hardly of this motion: I do not doubt but you will have a return suitable to the trust. My motion is, (and perfectly for righting myself, and the gentlemen that voted with me on Saturday, that we lie under no misconstruction without doors,) debates in the matter, was represented as an artifice only, to save the affront of its being rejected. The earl of Shrewsbury was at the head of those, who pressed the Abjuration most; and therefore, upon this change of counsels, thought he could not serve the king longer with reputation or success. He saw the Whigs, by using his majesty ill, were driving him into the hands of the Tories; and he thought, that these would serve the king with more zeal, if he left his post. Besides, the credit that the marquis of Carmarthen had gained, was not easy to him. For these reasons he resolved to deliver up the seals as secretary of state. The king sent Dr. Tillotson, and all those who had most credit with the earl, to divert him from his resolution; but all was to no purpose. The agitation of mind which this gave his lordship, threw him into a fever, that almost cost him his life. The king pressed him to keep the seals till his return from Ireland, though he should not act as secretary; but he could not be prevailed upon.—The debate upon the Abjuration lasted longer in the house of lords. It had some variation from that which was proposed in the commons, and was properly an oath of a special fidelity to the king in opposition to king James. The Tories offered, in bar to this, a negative engagement against assisting king James, or any of his instruments, knowing them to be such, with severe penalties on such as should refuse it. In opposition to this, it was said, that this was only an expedient to secure all king James's party, whatever should happen, since it left them the intire merit of being still in his interests, and only restrained them from putting any thing to hazard for him. The house was so near an equality in every division, that what was gained in one day, was lost in the next; and by the heat and length of those debates the session continued till June." Tindal,

'That a power, for some few months, be in the Crown to commit persons for treasonable correspondence against king William with king James, without bail.'

Sir John Thompson. If nothing but the danger of the people will be the security of the crown, I fear we are in an ill condition. You did not give power in the privy-counsel for six to commit without bail: yet they had the confidence, the parliament sitting, to imprison one of your members (lord Danby.) Give me time, and my family, to go out of England, and pass this Act moved for with all my heart.

Sir Edw. Hussey. If there be such counsellors about the king, as to advise him to bring over lord Dunbarton's regiment;* and if there be such lords about the king, as say, 'The Act of Recognition is neither good-sense nor reason:' I desire not to trust such with so great a power as is moved for.

Sir Wm. Whitlock. I never thought of such a motion to be made; and I hope that no Englishman will give his consent to it. I will not trust the government with six privy-counsellors, nor six-score. It is strange that the government of England should be brought to that pass, to be inconsistent with the safety of the people.

Sir Henry Goodrick. There was a bill brought in to secure the government, by an Oath of Abjuration, &c. It is now proposed that, after all the informations of caballing against the government, both by Papists, and worse, there seems something wanting in the law to secure them. Let gentlemen, who were engaged in the last Revolution, consider, if king James had pursued the advice, to have sent for the heads of parties against him, and clapped them up, where had the Revolution been? We have informations out of Lancashire, a chain of intelligence of persons plotting against the government; but they are all gone, the birds are flown: and the king going now upon a hazardous expedition, there will be a great check upon proceedings, without this bill, for the queen to govern in his absence. If your Militia be in so ill a condition, that they have no arms nor ammunition, what remedy is there but this motion for suspension of the Habeas Corpus act, but for a few months, not perpetual, nor final? My request to the house is, as you tender the safety of all that is dear to you, that such a power may be vested. I, as an Englishman, ask it, and dare ask it.

Mr. Harcourt. As we are sent here to preserve the liberties of England, so there is no greater security for them than this Act, and I think I have acquitted my trust very ill, if I give it up; a 'security,' a member told you (Clarges) you had struggled many years for, and it is that now we contend for. It has been already suspended three times, and now you will do it a fourth! Suspending it thus upon every occasion will, at last, amount to a repeal. At this particular time, now we have an Army of Foreigners in our bowels, we should rather increase our liberties than diminish them.

* This regiment had been sent over to Holland, for being concerned in a mutiny.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. There was a time when the subject was removed from one prison to another, and the act evaded, though at the last he obtained this act, which makes a penalty upon the government that refused it. Are we entrusted with the people's liberties, and shall we thus part with them? If there be a suspicion upon any man of disturbing the government, the law justifies clapping him up. There is no end of this; the nation in fear of one man, and another that is disaffected to the government, is clapped up in prison to endanger his health, and ruin his fortune, and destroy his reputation in the government—Who will deal with them? I will not, I assure you. We have laid a load upon our estates, and now to lay a weight upon our liberties! No; I am not for that. That government is precarious that must be supported by taking away the liberty of the subject.

Sir Robert Rich. I was one that vowed never to give my consent to the suspending that Act; while I live, I shall ever make it my darling. It was thought then necessary when we parted with it, but those that were to be clapped up by it, walked in the court of Requests, and nothing was said to them. I am subject to the law, but would have no law strained upon me.

Col. Granville. I am surprised to hear a gentleman so forward, t'other day, to lodge a power in two justices of the peace to give the Oath of Abjuration, and now not to give this power to the king's privy-council. If men will not renounce king James, there ought to be a power to secure us from known enemies, and because I would not put arbitrary power into any man's hand, I shall propose an Oath now, which no man will refuse; 'To swear to king William and queen Mary, their heirs and successors, according to the Act of Settlement the last parliament, against king James, and his adherents.' We have found the name and effect of tyrannical king James, and I hope we shall defend ourselves from the return of it.

Sir Robert Rich. I am one of those who make no difference to swear allegiance to this king, and to renounce king James; but as to imprisonment without bail, I intended not to come up to that then, nor ever will.

Sir John Lowther. I hope you will believe that I will do nothing to destroy the liberties of the nation; but am for suspending any law, when the safety of the nation depends upon it. I will not say where the fault lies, that the nation is under these exigencies, but one reason is, that Judgments are not united, and, where there are divisions, it is impossible the public service can go on. Where a man is willing to sacrifice all, he is never so secure but he may have the censure of one or other, though I am satisfied in my conscience I do not deserve it.

The government is in necessity, and at a stop. There is Credit given, but, after all, when we do that which destroys it, that Credit will be ineffectual. What I told you before was, that whether they judge right or wrong, if there be designs, and if any thing here seems to countenance the designs of king James, they will not lend Money, and it will be impossible to defend ourselves. The Oath of Abjuration is too extensive, and might have been mended, and since, nothing comes to supply it, and the Vote is gone over all England. Every body abroad makes not the judgment of it that you do; and, if you tell them you had no such meaning, but to support the government, and tell them all the arguments; that the house of commons wanted precedents to do this, &c. but by their representatives in the house of commons, that goes abroad as the honest meaning of the gentlemen here—This being your case, and as the government must be carried on with Credit, I shall offer to propose something for your security; that something may be done to those we represent abroad, as well as our own safety within these walls. Every man ought to swear to be true to the government, and not to take up arms against it. Time, place, and circumstances, give the force to actions. All this considered, I desire you will give leave for such a Bill, to empower the king to imprison such as he suspects, and an Oath to all in authority, not to aid king James.

Sir Edmund Jennings. I was of king James's parliament, and the first that took exceptions against his Speech. I was against the Bill of Abjuration on Saturday, and for one reason, though not mentioned, and it was for the sake of the Dissenters. How could it be supposed that they should take such an oath, quite contrary to their Address to king James before? And they will be as ready to take an oath against king William upon occasion. It is the monarchy that is aimed at. I am for a bill of this nature, and an Oath, as has been moved.

Sir Edw. Seymour. The debate now is the effect of that on Saturday. I did not like the proposition then, and do as little affect this now. I shall be glad to return their kindness, and speak, some of their arguments to-day. One would repeal the Habeas Corpus Act, and have another Oath—I take it only to be a way to make way for dispensing with the Habeas Corpus Act. You have been presented with several reasons for it; though gentlemen did so mistrust themselves, that they did not name them. The liberty of the subject is always under the care of the law, not to be imprisoned without a cause. A lord antiently could not imprison his bondman without cause, and our ancestors were very improvident, if they left others the liberty of our persons; for the same necessity opens a door for my goods and lands, as for my person—Here is an expedient to prevent assisting king James. Can it be imagined either of Papists, or those of particular dependencies? As for the Papists, the law against them already is so far from persecution, that they are under the favour of the laws: and as for those of dependencies under that unfortunate prince, it is strange they should now, that are under no reward but a halter. You must like the security where it is—I am glad sending us to jail is an Abdication of that misfortune. What has risen from it, but a necessity of taking up salt-petre at their own rates; to pass through mens grounds with the guards, &c. against their consent, to London, and the next to go to prison? We are for Abjuration one day, and prepare Heads for it, and give our Votes against it the next. Can I have any mercy from king James for entering into the Exeter Association? Yet now I can scarce be cleared from being a Jacobite. Either a Sheerness Plot, or a Cheshire accusation (Maynwaring, see p. 597.) It may happen, that a privy-counsellor may owe me ill will, and imprison me by this power. Is this the way to pay debts, or to get security? I think, by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, all our liberties have been lain with three times already: make her not a common strumpet.

Col. Birch. I am an ancient man, and I believe you will think me subject to jealousy. I had many a thought in my head on Saturday, and you shall hear some of them presently. This power (moved for) is for the king, and some choice counsellors. How has this grown a hard game before you, by some of great wisdom at the beginning of this game, else things could never go as they did in Ireland and at sea! I waited, and knew the conclusion would unriddle this business to you and myself. Some, when we parted last, were of my opinion, that if things were managed a second year, as we had done the first, we should not have a third. If we had gone in time into Ireland, it had been reduced without fighting; there was no way to bring in king James; and presently then, in the midst of this great business, to prorogue the parliament! Then, as to the dissolution, this was done by the choice council; and what is to be done now? There is a great deal of tenderness and earnestness for the king to go into Ireland, and we are as ready for king James to come hither, as for king William to go thither. It must be the fidelity of the privy council that you must trust, and pray how has it been showed? The Army is to come out of Flanders, and those white boys are to be our security, and those that will, let them take it—I do not doubt, but the gentlemen that make you this motion, will propose something more to your satisfaction. I shall never be brought to an opinion to trust those counsellors who have so ill acquitted themselves. Pray throw out this motion by a question.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The truth is, the nation is in a sad condition, but I think not such a dissatisfaction in it, as to have no money lent. They in London have offered to lend as far as your Fund will bear. I do think the unsuccessful measures in the government will make despondency in lenders. I made a proposition in the last parliament (it was made ridiculous, but it was approved afterwards) to be in the field before king James, and then we had been masters of Dublin. I do not believe we are in such security, as not to make provision for some such thing as this Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Our distraction is so great, and our condition so doubtful, I know not what to move. In queen Elizabeth's time, the Pope's Bulls were set up, and the queen of Scots' party were conspiring—Secure the government, and by that example do something for the preservation of the government.

Sir Tho. Lee. I am afraid we are going out of the way of parliament. Let a gentleman move what he will, when the debate grows to a head, out of that you must collect a question; all are desirous that you should state a question, but you may have liberty to alter it. I am sorry to hear the Funds will bear no more than 220,000*l.* That the Funds are not full! I could wish there are no worse reasons why men should not lend money.

Mr. Hampden. I am sorry for these heats. Once an unhappy nation, the Jews, were cutting one another's throats, when their enemies were at their gates. Sometimes we are for swearing, at other times not, and in confusion. I could not be against the effect of the motion, for some security to the government: 'No, we will not do that, but we will throw this question out of doors, and have no Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.' I think that Act the most sacred we have; but I have seen great infringements of that act, and there have been ways to evade it; as, a man to be bailed at 4,000*l.* and I ask 40,000*l.* These have been ways found out to break it. I would have none of these: I am for the thing; but what will be the meaning of your vote? I know, letters have been taken of treasonable Correspondence; but it is against my conscience, for men to be put to death, for what they might in another reign, some time ago. Had you not better be at liberty to propose any thing, than have a thing lie in the way upon every debate? Before you adjourn, pray consider of securing the government under the king and queen.

Mr. Ettrick. In the last parliament, I bore my testimony against this Suspension, and expressed myself against it. Your first vote was, not to suspend the Habeas Corpus; therefore put a question that no man can differ from, and I do not doubt but your liberty may be preserved, and the nation's.

Col. Granville. That the refusal of the Renunciation, &c. may not be resented abroad, I hope nobody will be so angry as to let the government fall. If it be preserved, I care not in whose hands, if I shall reap the benefit, though I had not the honour to contribute to it.

April 28, p. m. The house attended his majesty, and presented their humble Thanks for the great care he has expressed of the Church of England, in the late Alterations he has made in the Lieutenancy of the city of London. To which his majesty was pleased to answer (as reported next day by the Speaker,) "Genlemen, It shall be always my endeavour to employ such persons as shall be most serviceable to the Church and State."

April 29. The house went into a grand committee, on securing the Government under king William and queen Mary against the late king James, and all his Adherents.

Sir Edm. Jennings. I would have the Militia considered, that there may be some way to call them together for some farther time; and as to the papists, that they stir not from their houses.

Serjeant Maynard. If you would defend yourselves from danger, consider what that danger is, and the cause of that danger. The Militia is in very bad condition. You have a great enemy, the French king, and all the malice imaginable against you from a potent adversary. The Oath is but security to perform our duty; but, when conquered, it is no more our duty; it would make a mad world, if otherwise. I would have an Oath, 'not to hear or know any thing prejudicial to the present king or government, without discovering it to some privy-counsellor, and to have no correspondence or pension from the French king.'

Col. Granville. When I heard the order of the day read, I thought our safety so much concerned, that, instead of breaking a jest, (Napier) every body would rather contribute to the general security. The order of the day tells you of one of your enemies, your chiefest, king James. The business of the day is to find out his adherents. For ought I know, they are here, and there, and amongst us; perhaps in the very Militia. These two or three days debates convince me, that there is no Test great enough, but wherein king James is named; and those that will not declare against him, I shall always think enemies; and I hope, now we are rid of him, to keep ourselves upon a protestant foundation. Let this be tendered to people suspected, not with that latitude, that justices of the peace may tender it to whom they please; but that the queen, in the king's absence, may cause it to be tendered where there is just cause to suspect. When a man has once given security to the government, he cares not how often he repeats it. The business of the day is, to fortify ourselves against our enemies, that papists give security to the government, and that protestants go not about the streets to corrupt people against the government. I therefore move 'for a Test against king James.'

Sir John Thompson. My motion was, 'To take the State of the Nation into consideration;' 90,000 men, that are their own masters, will make every body afraid of them.

Sir Joseph Williamson. This day looks melancholy; many worthy and judicious members sit silent, and are not helpful. It is moved 'To consider the State of the Nation,' which is not only the greatest, but most powerful; but the greatest of all misfortunes is, to be divided at home. If we do not discover before they begin insurrections, it will be too late to suppress them. I hope for better effects abroad, if we do something of this nature, a tie between sovereign and people suitable to the great Revolution. I wonder that the Oaths of Allegiance we take to the crown, did not tie people to defend the crown, and that might answer the intention of the government. I would take in the Quakers; they were in with king James, and are factors for him still. I would have them protest and declare, subscribe and renounce all correspondence with the king's enemies, and particularly with king James, and the French king, and all their adherents; and I wonder how this was left out in the last Oath. Do something of this in the first place, and then in the Militia.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, That as one Head of a Bill for securing the Government, &c. by order from their majesties, the lord-lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants be empowered to draw together the Militia with a month's pay notwithstanding the month's pay already advanced to the Militia be not yet reimbursed; and for a longer time than the law already allows. 2. That as another Head, all Papists, or reputed Papists, be obliged forthwith to repair to and continue at their respective dwellings; and not to depart from thence above the distance of miles, without licence; and that, if they be found at a greater distance, they be taken to be Papists convict, to all intents and purposes whatsoever. 3. That, as another Head, a Test, or Declaration of Fidelity to the Government under their present majesties, against the late king James, and all his adherents, and all other enemies to the present government, as it is now established in Church and State, be enjoined to be made, repeated, and subscribed by all persons above 16 years of age."—Which being reported, were agreed to by the house; and a Bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly*.

Debate on the Regency Bill.] April 30. An ingrossed Bill from the lords, for the exercise of the Government by her majesty, in the king's absence, commonly called "the Regency-Bill," was read the second time.

Mr. Hampden. This bill is of great importance, and of great necessity. Something, and something of this purpose, must be. This is to be done, and very hard to be done. If the bill go away as it is, I doubt it will be a little troublesome. The king gives out the Commissions to the justices of the peace. If the administration of the government be solely in the queen, will those old commissions stand in force? Will it not be in the nature of a demise, a kind of interregnum, till all the commissions of England be renewed? They are not signed by the king and queen, but signed only by the king. I know not which way to offer it to you, but I doubt it will make a chasm in your affairs. If this be worthy your consideration, I hope gentlemen will speak to it.

* "The Tories, aware that the rejection of the Oath of Abjuration would be made a pretext for infusing suspicions of their loyalty into the minds of the people, embraced the first opportunity to avert them, by proposing other measures for the security of the present government. The Suspension of the Habeas Corpus, the most obvious and effectual plan for this end, afforded their opponents advantages of argument, which they were unable to defeat by influence alone; they therefore had recourse to such moderate resolutions as were carried by the approbation of every party." Somerville.

Serjeant Maynard. It is worthy our consideration, what council the king will leave with the queen. If the Bill pass as it is, all the justices of the peace in England are none. I think, for my part, that they are determined. There must be some provision, that those commissioners do not determine. All the regal power now is acted in the name of the king and queen; as this Act is now penned, how can any man distinguish those in the whole regal government? Another thing;—in the king's absence, do you take all power from the king, that he can do nothing but by commission from the queen? This is of vast consequence, in a hot war with a mighty power, and all that is done in the name of king James. This makes the king no king, and queen no queen.

Serjeant Tremaine. I have looked upon this Bill to be of great consequence; and great care must be taken that we have some security in the king's absence. There are some objections against it. I find the Bill says, 'The regal government of England, and dominions thereunto belonging, shall be in the queen.' By this it is a great doubt, when the king comes into Ireland, whether he has any power at all in Ireland. Ireland is but an appendage to England, and no other person can have it but the queen; so that if the king comes into Ireland, that he may be in a capacity to do something, it will be your wisdom to put it out of all doubt. The Bill says, 'The administration shall be in the queen;' if she dies what then shall become of the government? Here will be a failure, and a stop.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. All that objection may be easily obviated, leaving out the word 'Territories;' when it comes to England and the plantations, 'Territories' make it very doubtful. Then there is another objection, 'What if the queen die?' But that runs to whomsoever is made Custos Regni; and, no doubt, there is a ceasure of the administration. A Custos Regni has been settled by act of parliament; and the same objection made then as now. Another objection is made, 'That the commissions in the king's name are all determined;' of that there is no colour. All commissions are from the king and queen; if once under the seal, it is a sufficient authority for all persons to act. The Custos Regni never removed any commissions; they all run in the king's name. The administration is nothing but to make the great seal speak. If you make that alteration I mentioned, I believe there will be no dispute.

Sir John Guise. It is absolutely necessary, that this bill be committed. I think Sawyer does not take it right; and possibly I may think as well of some, as of some others. I should be glad to hear, from the learned counsel, whether these commissions cease, or not?

Earl of Ranelagh. When the king is in Ireland, he gives commissions as king of England, not as general of the army, surely.

Col. Birch. To my mean capacity, this is a most dangerous bill, and I do not know who is safe under it. The king's going to Ireland is another thing than if he had gone the 10th of March. The difficulty and danger is greater, and such an one, as we stand in relation to our own differences, and the power against us. We have a brave army, a gallant army; but so disappointed, that I fear the consequence: and should the king be in Ireland, and cannot come over to us, upon occasion, what condition are we in! Your commissions voided all in a lump; and who shall those commissioners be that must turn the whole in the king's absence? From what has been done, you may guess what will be done. By what has passed already, I am of opinion, that the Bill is impracticable, and I would lay it aside.

Serjeant Blencoe. It is said, 'The king leaving the kingdom, all commissions cease.' In answer to voiding the commissions, it is said, 'That those commissions continue.' But when the king is gone, it determines that power. All those authorities derived from those commissions cease, because the authorities cease.

Mr. Finch. I stand up for commitment of the bill. I desire those gentlemen to declare, whether the queen be declared a subject by this bill.

Sir Rob. Howard. I think you may declare the king as well no king, by the bill.

Sir Tho. Lee. All agree, that it will be a great difficulty. I consider this law of transferring the administration; it is a new word, but will carry all the rights along with it, as if the crown had descended. You are told of a saving for Ireland; but there must be another saving; for if Ireland be not reduced this summer, we are all miserable. If the king can find it expedient not to go, it would be very happy; but to reduce him to the necessity not to go, nor to stay! I think, if the king should have advice of things from France and England, when in Ireland, I see no power, by the bill, that he has of one ship. I would see, whether the long robe can bring this to the ancient custom of Regency. What if this bill had been turned to enable the king to make a Custos by parliament? This is a hint to the long robe that I dare not venture upon. I would not interfere with the king's measures, which, I believe, are taken with great deliberation; therefore go into a committee to-morrow.—The Bill was ordered to be committed.

Ordered, "That Mr. Rowe (member for St.

Michael's) have notice to attend this house, in his place, on Friday the 2d of May."*

May 1. The house went into a grand committee on the Regency Bill.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. 12 Edw. 3, the duke of Cornwall was Custos Regni—The duke of Bedford, the king's brother, was Custos, and left till farther order. 33 Henry 6, Custos by act of parliament, with several other precedents. 15 Edw. 4, in his expedition into France, Edward, prince of Wales, was Custos during his absence, and till farther order. 13 Henry 7, the king constitutes, in his absence, queen Catherine Gubernatrix Regni. 14 James 1, in his absence, till farther order, the privy-council were constituted, and no name given in the commission, but to take care of the king's children and affairs. In Ch. 1's time, the council were impowered much as in king James's time, all determinable in absentia nostrâ in partibus transmarinis, et donec redier: all those powers to be exercised by a particular council. In Edw. 3's time, three counsellors mentioned. In Henry 8, Gubernatrix Regni, it was expressly appointed what act she shall do by her own power, and what by her council. These I lay before you, and make what use of them you please. This is a new case, and like none of those I have mentioned; and we are in a government not a year old. Any thing you do of this nature will be of great consequence; and, as this case is, to consider extreme well what is done. It is discoursed of abroad, of a Commonwealth, and we should be very considerate in divesting and divesting. The necessity of a change should be obvious and apparent to the world; so suitable and invincible, that it should always carry its own excuse along with it. I heard it mentioned yesterday, 'That all commissions do determine upon this Regency:' but if it be a doubt, it is your great concern to obviate it. If some, in the king's absence, should refuse to act, and others to obey, it will be of great consequence to the government; and some question will lie as to the continuation of the parliament: but, as to the king's exclusion of all power, during this regency, it was proposed, if you leave out some words, 'it would be a cure, if the words ended there at dominions, &c.' Does it not carry all the places annexed to England? Suppose any exemption to Ireland, that it should not extend to it, yet all doubts are not obviated. The king in Ireland, and the whole administration of the queen here.—Whatever necessity, or orders, are but letters of intimation from one to another. If the king send ships from Ireland, they have no sort of authority to serve out of Ireland. These are difficulties. Give me leave to hint some things: the bill says, 'As often as the king shall be out of England, &c.' I will suppose they go to be crowned in Scotland, all their power ceases; they are no sooner on Scotch ground, but all regal power ceases; there should be some express Clause for resuming their authority. It is a nice distinction to separate regal power from authority; and since there are some opinions in the world, that the king is only de facto—You have declared him king of right—But if you look on printed books abroad, he is made only king de facto, and king in possession—I took the oath in another sense, whatever others did. Perhaps some disaffected persons may not yet appear. If you place it in the queen, place it so clear, that there may be no doubt.

Sir John Lowther. After the difficulties you have heard from the learned gentlemen, no wonder I should doubt; but when we are in a plain, to run round and miss the way we may wonder. We are misled by the Bill, so far mistaken by the lords, that if we pursue it, we shall be led into invincible difficulties. You are told, 'That as this bill is penned, commissions of the peace cease.' I offer, that, instead of the enacting part, you will declare that all the queen does, in absence of the king, shall be in the same force as if the king executed it—That by the government beyond the sea, the ships are not restrained in port, as well as in Ireland—One difficulty only, of several commands; but there will be such a deference to the king's resolutions, that he will always be obeyed. And that, on the king's return, the queen's power ceases, I think will be no doubt—All acts done by her majesty to be of equal force as if done by the king.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. The more I have thought of this bill, the less I have understood it. I will not dispute what an act of parliament can do. It may have some resemblance of the great power of the world; it may create, and uncreate. It may make the moon shine, for ought I know—But we have the case of lieutenants, guardians, and Custodes Regni, but that is not our case. It was never before in the world. Here are a king and queen, and a king invested with regal power, and you divest him, and put it into the queen. The king can take no notice of what she does here. In the queen is the regal power, as our queen can or could do; she may dissolve this parliament, raise an army, set out a fleet. I know not how to qualify these things, but I see terrible consequences. When an act of parliament comes to terminate his power, I know not how that will operate on all commissions. I know not but some men may have a strange notion, when the king is gone, that it is a resignation of the crown. A king and queen of England, and not in England, will be a strange composition. What authority will there be to send ships out of Ireland? Though I think it of mighty advantage that the king go into Ireland, yet this bill is of so strange a composition to come from the lords, and the judges there, that this will have many more consequences than I can enumerate. My motion must be this, to take three or four days time to consider of it.

* On a complaint of sir Edward Seymour. See the day, p. 619.

Sir Robert Sawyer. That it is necessary that the government be left somewhere, all agree; and I cannot think any way but by something in the queen's hands. You have been told of precedents. That of Hen. 6. is not of this nature; for the power of Custos Regni is well known. In some acts of parliament, their power was limited. The Custos was but a delegate of the king's; though he might do acts as king in such exigencies, yet he was excluded the king's power. The king cannot delegate his power, because the king and queen must not give this power away, but by act of parliament. It is not designed to exclude the exercise from the king, either in Ireland or France, but that there must not be a defect of the administration, during the king's absence. The crown and regal authority are vested in the king and queen. Though the king issues out the proclamation, they are in the name of the king and queen.

Mr. Pelham. Seeing the long robe are so full of doubts, we may very well, and they will not inform us. I move to let the bill lie upon the table till this day sevensnight.

Serjeant Maynard. This noble lady, the queen, has so demeaned herself, that there is not one man nor woman but will trust her. By the former act, the administration of the government was solely in the king, and now by this in another, exclusive. No wise man will trust where he cannot remedy. The precedents spoken of are like making a map of a country which we have never seen. There was a Custos, but limited to some things, not without counsellors, and they named; but as for the learned gentleman (Sawyer) I am sorry I seldom agree with him in the house. Thomas Aquinas brought religion to nothing by distinctions. If this commission be granted by authority, does not the former authority determine? Being derivative from it, the king has it no more, it is in the queen. All that is done to us for our religion and properties to be put upon a moot point on a sudden! Let us consider of it, and God direct us! We are fallen into a wilderness entangled by our enemies; God send us well out of it! Many hold themselves not at all bound to king William. Queen Elizabeth was a young woman, yet conquered the greatest prince in Europe. No man can wish better to the common-wealth than I do; if that stand, I care not what becomes of me. The king to have power in Ireland, and none here! The thing is so great, that I am upon my knees lest we should be swallowed up by enemies, or betrayed by our friends.

Mr. Harcourt. The king having declared his resolution to go into Ireland, it is our duty to help him thither. The king has chosen the queen for the administration of the government in his absence. I am not for putting her under guardianship, nor for putting her under council. She may sway the sceptre, and I know not why she should not have the power.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It is possible that you are not so ready to determine a thing of this consequence. You have heard a great many objections made; I cannot pretend to answer them. You have had a motion to adjourn the debate till a farther time; but if you consider, it will make a great alteration, the government being but very young, and not very strong.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If report be true, the difficulties in Ireland are not so great as apprehended. I hope, that, if there be a necessity of the king's going, that necessity may be explained. The bill is conditional, if the king should go. I would not be left here without some provision for the public peace. I would not have the debate put off, till I know not when, nor for I know not what. If the objections be not cured, the king has no power when in Ireland. But the great difficulty is, if the king be not master of Ireland this summer, we shall not hope to keep England long. If the French king once gets the ports of Ireland, we shall not send out a cock-boat. Let us not, by putting the debate off, make the difficulty so great, that the king cannot go at all, but sit de diem in diem, till we have settled the thing.

Mr. Harbord. I am amazed to see us handle such indifferent things, and let the government sink. I will lay it open plainly to you; though, I confess, the maxims of king Charles 2's government are still apt to be misrepresented, for what a man shall say here, as I have been. But for an Account of Ireland, why in such a condition? The troops are not able to march; officers are not paid since the 1st of Sept. last; most are behind-hand of subsistence money; to the Army 80,000*l.* due. I have laid it open to the commissioners of the treasury, and they cannot do it. If they have not suddenly 200,000*l.* in Ireland, nothing can be done there. If you do nothing now, it will be too late to think on it.

Sir Edw. Hussey. I take the king to be no king after this bill is passed. It is no man's intention to have the king put upon another Abdication; if he has a mind to another abdication, those near him, I hope, will acquaint the house, for the preservation of the monarchy and church. I would have a week's time at least to consider of it.

Sir Edw. Norris. If the king should die in this expedition, and the queen be regent, what if, out of duty to her father, if he land, she should not oppose him?

Sir Edw. Seymour. The methods of this debate confirm me in what I thought, when we first entered into it; that there would be so many difficulties in it, as would not easily be digestible. You find, by the debate, how little the thing is intelligible. If it be no more, when it has passed both houses, I need not tell you the consequence. These considerations are sufficient to put it off for some time. I would not have it too long, but put it off to Monday.—Which was ordered.

Debate on sir E. Seymour's Charge against Mr. Rowe for dispersing a Libel.] May 2. Mr. Anthony Rowe, member for St. Michael's, attending in his place, being charged, by sir Edward Seymour, with dispersing a Paper reflecting on their majesties Government, and on several members of the last parliament, the same was brought up to the table, and read; being entitled, 'A Letter to a Friend, upon the Dissolution of the Parliament, and the calling of a new one; together with the List of those that were against making the prince and princess of Orange king and queen.'*

Sir Edw. Seymour. I shall not say much now. You have heard the gentleman. When you have passed your censure on the Libel, I shall tell you my thoughts of the person who published it.

Col. Austen. I am as much against these sort of practices as any body; but may I not name a member guilty of the same crime? It was col. Beaumont, who brought a Libel, and out of it named clauses, and persons that brought them in. Pray accept of this Libel, and read it, and pass your censure upon it.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I humbly speak to your order, and nothing else. You have ordered Mr. Rowe to be here, and you have read the Libel, and, before you proceed, I beg your determination in that; and let this gentleman have the censure. This has been kept long. Mr. Rowe was charged in his place, and had time, and I presume that gentleman (Beaumont) will require the same time that the other had. If both belong to one thing, I hope you will send them both to one place.

Col. Austen. I thought you were bringing things of the same nature to the same trial. I must take leave not to answer mens laughing, till I am answered in another nature.

The Speaker. They are several crimes, if they are crimes, and severally to be answered. When you call for it, it shall be ready.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You have read that Paper; one and the other paper are gone all over England, not only into Cornwall. It is injurious both to king and subject; but since you have read that paper, and it appears so notoriously scandalous, you ought to pass your censure, and declare the paper 'scandalous, and prejudicial to the peace of the nation.'

Sir John Guise. I would have us all agree in moderation: it has been a consideration that you should not proceed farther for fear of sharpening humours. If those arguments have prevailed on you then, why not now? I would know whether every county, and every borough in England, has not had hard words and sharp censures. I know no country (but our own) that has had these excesses; reproached with being commonwealth's men, and no Church of England men; these are notorious before you in the printed papers dispersed. I would have equal justice done in these things. If you think it convenient, go on. I have something to say of other men, and I am sure nobody can say any thing of me.

Mr. Godolphin. I never gave my vote nec ad aulam, nec ad populum, but ad liberandum animum meum.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Hearing my name, in that Libel, calls me not up. I am the same without doors as within. Seeing there are reflections upon the king, you must pass judgment upon it. The other Libel relates to the constitution of the house; since it is come before you, you must pass judgment upon this paper before you. It is a violation of the constitution of parliament. If persons be exposed for their votes here, it may work upon the mobile. (I fear it not, I am not considerable). First, take care to support the government, and vote this Libel, 'A high reflection on his majesty and his government,' and pass a judgment next by itself.

Mr. Harbord. A libel was seized by Mr. Frazer, and brought into council. The tenderness of the king was such, when it was brought before him, that the person was warned of it at his peril, if he did disperse any more. Though his be a great fault, I know not how things may revive. I would condemn this Paper, and so let us be at peace with one another.

Sir Tho. Lee. The steps of this matter were thus. Some days since, a gentleman was accused of dispersing this Paper, who was absent, and a day given him to appear. When that day came, the gentleman was not so early here at his time; afterwards he came, but you deferred it; you then thought fit to adjourn it. The gentleman is now in the house; you must next have him heard, and then he ought to withdraw, he cannot be here; and you then declare the punishment, when you see how far your member is guilty; and then proceed to censure of the Libel. This before you is but a copy of the print, and the person attesting it is not brought to the bar.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Harbord has given you an account of what was done in council; I believe he has licence from the king to do it, or else he has broken his oath. When Mr. Rowe had dispersed these libels in great numbers, and with malice prepense, he said he would print them. If you take no care of this, in the next election of a parliament, you will have enough to do.

Mr. Harbord. I understand my oath as a privy-counsellor, and will keep it. In what I informed you, counsel was heard on both sides, and the thing was public.

Sir John Lowther. I am one of those that are of opinion, that there is nothing more dangerous, nor of worse consequence, than libels. As to this, of dispersing libels at elections, we need nothing now to divide, we have enemies enough abroad. I believe, if there be a scrutiny into this matter, it may tend to unite us. There is no proof, who penned this Libel, or who dispersed it, nor does it appear, that this is the libel he did disperse. I know not how a court of judicature will take this libel to be proved. I desire the gentleman may be reprimanded; but not to widen the gap, I move, that gentlemen defer the business till some other time, and put off the examination till another day. If you hear them all, you will employ your time in little else. I would adjourn it to this day fortnight.

* See Ralph, vol. ii. p. 129.

Col. Austen. I am no great lawyer, but I think the fact proves the malice, not the malice, the fact. It must be malice prepense, let the person be who it will. Whatever is said on the one side, will be proved on the other. I am as willing to throw them both away as any body.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I have not told you one word of my own knowledge of this libel; but Mr. Rowe is not to answer his accusation till it be proved. To vote this a libel, and to let Rowe sit to vote whether it be a libel or not, you will have work enough. If you go on, let witnesses be called in. Here is a copy of a printed Paper; the information is, 'that Mr. Rowe had dispersed copies of it, and was sorry he had no more; and, before it was printed, Rowe said he would print it.' I would not bring a trifle before you; this is worthy your censure; if not, you will have enough.

The Speaker. This is a copy of a printed Paper, and the attestation of the mayor.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It does not appear to me to be so proved, as to put a question upon it. It may be proved, and I believe it as much a libel as any body, but it spread very universally. You may go upon both the libels, but I believe, in your prudence, you will lay them aside. At the beginning of this session, two were produced, and both referred to the consideration of a committee, but you have had no report; perhaps the committee in prudence would not do it. I hope the prudence of the house will lay this aside.

Sir John Bowles. I wonder Seymour should call this copy an original.

Sir Edw. Seymour. It was this very Paper that was dispersed. I confess myself 'a very ill copy, and full of errata;' but I take Bowles to be 'a great original.'

Sir John Bowles. I know not why he should call me 'an original;' but I would not go after his original.

Col. Birch. I know not how many of these may come before you. Since the wisdom of the house sees that this tends to division, pray adjourn the house, as has been moved.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You say 'the Paper reflects upon the king and the government.' A gentleman tells you, 'this very Paper was dispersed.' You must propose a question before you adjourn this debate. No expedient can be, but sending for the witnesses at the door.

Mr. Hampden. I see the debate is like to beget great heats. I have a libel of infamous queries charged upon the other gentleman. I hope all will be called scandalous papers, as well as others. A thing read in a noise cannot be strictly examined and censured. To say one numerical Paper was dispersed, this copy, or original, of many printed, dispersed—I would consider whether this is to be cooled, or thoroughly prosecuted. The issue of all debates is a question, and put it, Whether you will adjourn the debate.

Sir Thomas Clarges. I would know upon what question the debate is adjourned? I will do my duty, let gentlemen be as ridiculous as they please (some laughing). First, state the question, what shall be on the Journal. Will you make no censure upon it? Collect the question upon the Paper, and then put the question for adjourning.

Mr. Finch. I speak to wording of the question. If the house be inclinable to adjourn the debate, I would never have the question worded so, as if possible the house did ever consider this to be a Libel. If the question be to adjourn, I offer it thus; 'That a debate arising about a scandalous Libel, the house adjourned the debate of it to such a time.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I take this to be a Libel upon the government, and if witnesses be at the door, and you will not hear them, to say you will adjourn the debate, is to call for it when the witnesses are gone, after long attendance. When our duty to the king, and the honour of the house are concerned, it is agreeable to justice that you deny no man.

Col. Austen. Several things must be debated before this comes to issue. I can never think a deliberate thing to be a reflection upon the house; therefore adjourn the debate.

Lord Eland.* I think the kindest motion for Rowe is, to call the witnesses in; either the thing will be justified, or your member sorry for the accusation.

Sir Tho. Lee. The first question is, Whether you will adjourn the debate, but not next, calling them in; you must not be starved because witnesses are at the door. To order only I speak. I would plainly understand—I am for vindicating the king's honour, for if this had touched the king's honour, some of his officers would have taken notice of it. Stafford's was a treasonable Paper, from a man under some distraction, and you discharged him. Some things in themselves are better laid asleep, and this is one.

The question being put, That the debate be adjourned, it passed in the negative, 180 to 156.

Resolved, "That the Paper entitled, &c. (as above) is a false and scandalous Libel, reflecting upon their majesties and their government, and the rights and privileges of parliament."

Debate on the Regency Bill.] May 5. The house went into a grand committee, on the Regency Bill.

Sir Charles Sedley. The objection the other day was, 'That all Commissions determine, if you lodge the power in the queen, in the king's absence.' If he be in Ireland, he is not here. I cannot see any hurt for so short a time, by authority of the king, and consent of parliament.

* Son of the marquis of Halifax, to which title he succeeded on his father's death in 1694, and died in 1699.

Sir Wm. Whitlock. I find that every body believes the king intends to go into Ireland, and that it is necessary the administration power, in his absence, be in the queen. The objection made is, the danger of the trust in the queen; but you may trust either, or both, in the power you have conferred upon them. If the parliament have trusted them with the powers, you may trust them with the administration of them. Leave out the words, 'and territories.' The king may by act of parliament exercise regal power in Ireland, and the queen in England; and when the king returns, he returns to the former administration.

Serjeant Maynard. The reasons of this Bill are, 'That the king going out of England into Ireland, there is a necessity somebody should do what the king should do here.' You are moved, 'That the administration should be put into the queen, but not out of the king, to advise in the politics.' It is well known, what turbulences and great disturbances there are in Scotland, and as much in Ireland, if what I hear be true: with whom have we war? It is said with king James, but it is with France. King James is but his tool; with whose money, whose advice, and whose men? All French; can any man be so simple as to set up any body, but himself? Consider, if this Army prevail, it is not king James, but the French, that will have these kingdoms. Will the French king, out of kindness and compliment, part with three kingdoms conquered with his own money? I would have the Bishops consider (where so much right is laid) either the new ones, or those that are out; and I would have the Popish lords consider, who live quietly: will the French king let the English have great estates here, when he can have the French? Will the French king, in compliment to the Papists of England, put by his own subjects? Will you have the same Council about the queen, when the king is gone, that never could find out where our miscarriage lay? Londonderry was not relieved, the provisions were all corrupted; we sent to know, from whence this came: Shales was found out, but we could never know who recommended him to that service; and from whence comes this neglect? From those that acted or advised? I propound this, not only to the queen's councils, but in the government. Unless he would change his religion, a great man, the duke of Schomberg, must have no employment in France. We must give our souls to him, and he will take our estates. I did not say we should name a Council to the queen. The administration is in the queen, but it is the Council that does all. Those that would keep king William out, and keep king James in, now king William is in, it is strange they should be trusted. The alterations in the Militia of London have ever influenced England, and we give the king Thanks for the best put out, and the worst put in! Confirmations of the Liberties of the Church to the Church, and we apply them to the churchmen.

Sir Tho. Lee. If you will have only the counsellors now well spoken of, and never ill spoken of, you will have but a few of either. I am afraid, if a man pass away a manor, and the appurtenances are left out, the chancery will judge it for the purchaser; and Ireland will go away with England. Regal power, by serjeant Wogan, is distinguished from executive. I am afraid I cannot distinguish them, to make them separable and different. To turn regal power out of possession, I am not very fond of it in parliament. Let men tell plainly their minds, whether they will leave him no power, or leave him only king of Ireland. Such power of disposition of the crown being taken up by the people, I think this Bill necessary, and I hope the long robe will find out such a way to invest the queen with the Regency, as not to dispossess the king. I would have it plainly understood, whether, whilst the king is in Ireland, he loses the executive power in England, and whether he is not less than he is already.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I do not undertake to be wise enough to solve all these doubts; it is plain we are in great exigency, and the king, as now advised, resolves to go for Ireland. I would not be hasty in advising. I would not raise such a heap of difficulties, that we know not which way to turn. The French king has committed such great cruelties; scarce such since the Roman persecutions. I would rather endure any thing than that. Is Ireland in such a condition, that his presence is so necessary there, or Ireland will be lost? What if the king does not go, and we advise him to it, and Ireland be lost, and he tells you, 'By your advice I did not go!' You are moved to give the queen more power, the administration jointly in king and queen, and to the queen in the king's absence; shall the queen's hand be enough to warrants in the king's absence? There are perplexities every way, all will be of no effect. If the king goes not out of England, or if the king goes into Scotland, it relates to both purposes. I wish we apply the debates to amend the Bill as well as we can; if he does go, that he may go. I see no great hurt of adding 'Administration' to it. Something must be done, that the king may be in a possibility of saving that kingdom.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You have a difficult thing before you. Our duty is to make the Bill so as to reduce it to the service of the king and kingdom. I suppose it is not any body's design to divest the king of any part of his royal power, but to consider, how to let the queen into some of that regal power, now in the king; and I should be glad to be informed, how to let the queen into more than she has already. The sole executive power is now vested in the king. I would not take away power out of the king; but, suppose you should say, whatever order shall be sent by the king, out of Ireland, shall be obligatory here.

Mr. Foley. To prevent two co-ordinate powers, let the queen have the administration till farther orders may be received from the king.

Sir Joseph Williamson. The difficulties to me are not so great, but the inconveniences may be such, as may dissolve the frame of the government that you have taken so much pains to settle. This is the case of all our kings that went into France. I know of nothing to be now done, but what was then done. What extent of powers, and, on what terms they left such powers behind them, we know. Now is a joint sovereignty, which cannot dispute, one which is impracticable—So there is nothing called upon from you, but to do, by the legislative authority, what the king cannot do by commission. I think there is difficulty in leaving power with the queen, both the way and manner of it. See what that power was then within the kingdom of England; in the whole course of the government these powers were left, and let no more be now in the queen, in the absence of the king.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. All agree, that it is your intention not to divest either king or queen of any thing in the Act of Recognition. As this bill is drawn, we are under great difficulties; but I think a short bill may be drawn for the king to transfer so much of the executive power to the queen, to take away all ambiguities.

Lord Commissioner Hutchins.* If I have had many various thoughts upon the voyage, I have had none upon the bill. This doubt, whether the queen is not so amply and fully queen as in the Act of Settlement, may be of dangerous consequence, and how far the commissions of justices of the peace will be void. This may affect our alliances abroad. The king may see more in Ireland than can be seen here. I humbly propose, that this may not so pass, as totally to divest the king of his executive power. No precedent did ever reach this case, and, in that we mispend our time. Possibly there may be many inconveniences for the administration of the government in two persons, and to divest the king of it is not to be thought of. I move, That the Government may be executed in the name of the king and queen.

Mr. Hampden. I observe, most gentlemen speak very doubtfully. The more I hear of this bill, the more doubtful I am; and the more I hear the debate, the less am I able to resolve myself. You are got into a labyrinth by this discourse. If there were a precedent, it would help us greatly; but no precedent can be quoted that will reach your case. I am afraid to bring your constitution to a school-point. A videtur quod sic, probatur quod non. The government is settled, and I desire to continue it so. The breaches we make in it, neither we nor our posterity can ever repair. The king is going abroad, and you are finding a way to be safe when he is gone; but I doubt, by this act, you can never be so. This will not come together by a concurrence of atoms, according to the new philosophy; but when you come to explain this act at length, you will find so many difficulties, that you will not know how to reconcile distinctions without differences. I have some other thoughts. You adjourned it propter difficultatem, as the Judges do in Westminster-Hall, and still you are no forwarder. You have had good Reasons, and yet they come not up to it. If the king goes into Ireland, without this law, he may act his executive power, (the sea-hazard excepted)—I would have gentlemen consider, whether, if the king do this without act of parliament, (which is wild-fire, if he does otherwise than you intend) it may not unsettle what may never be settled. Let the Act lie, till you have considered if some other thing may be thought of. An act is a dangerous application in such a thing as this. What work has a word in an act of parliament done? And now, to break into your government in its infancy! I doubt you cannot see how far an act passed may work. I desire it may be considered, whether a way may not be found to arrive at your end, without this Act.

Col. Birch. By all I have heard, by this debate, there is more and more difficulty; and nothing is offered in order to satisfaction. It has been offered to be effected without this act; if it can be sure, it is the safest. I would not refer it to any body in particular; but that the king's learned counsel may bring in something to-morrow.

Sir John Lowther. You have had a proposition, whether to do this without an act, either intimated by way of Address to the king, or Advice. This expedient will take up a great debate to find out a model for it, and the lords concurrence must be had to the matter and manner of the project, and then to present it to the king. But, when all is done, will this satisfy the people? And will it not constrain the obedience of the subject? Unless it be a law, it will be laid aside: though the intimation of both houses will carry great authority, yet not to the satisfaction of the people: therefore propose something that the house may go upon. You are told, 'If it were thought the king's power determined in Ireland, all would be against it, but for a concurrent power in the queen.' Propose such a question; if not practicable, go to some other expedient. If it be practicable, I have not heard of a better. It is objected, 'That the two powers may clash, and a question, which of the orders shall be obeyed;' but I cannot easily imagine that the government should so misunderstand one another, as that this should not be known. But, admitting there should be clashing, you may, in a few words, help it: thus, 'That the king's orders take place;' and the government may be resumed as easily as you make an act. It is agreed by all, that the queen be so let into the government, as to return to what it was.

* One of the Commissioners of the Great Seal, together with sir John Trevor, the Speaker, and sir Wm. Rawlinson.

Mr. Hampden. I am of opinion, if you require the concurrence of the lords, and then send to the king, that it will be an act according to the old form. The king gives his consent in pleno parlamento, and it is a law. In the case of Lambert and Vane,* both houses petitioned the king for their lives, and the king consented; not that I intend to introduce a form of concession without act of parliament. You give the king advice not always by act of parliament. You told the king, 'You would give him assistance, not only by Money, but Advice;' and this may be brought into such a form, without act of parliament. It may succeed well, but is a dangerous expedient.

Mr. Finch. If the king goes into Ireland (otherwise we are debating upon nothing) the government is in the king and queen; the administration in the king alone: what do men understand by that? Every direction of regal power is by the king alone; his will and pleasure gives the sanction to obey. Royal assent is both in the king and queen; but the king's assent gives the authority, not from the king's only command, but regal power and authority from them both. The Act took care, that, if they should not agree; or give contrary command, though regal power is in both, yet the exercise should be in one, else it could not be obeyed. It is but one regal power, invested and determined in one. As for Commissions, &c. that is no objection, for the regal power is from both. But the king being in Ireland, the defect of immediate administration requires that this must be by act of parliament. I think it cannot be otherwise. Regal power in the king and queen, to whom given?—Every commission to a Custos Regni, upon return of the king, immediately vanished, and the power ceased. It could not enter into any man's thoughts, that regal power should be in two persons. She cannot give it to herself, and no person ought to have it. If regal power be in her alone, Ireland is annexed; when you vest it in her, and her alone, the king is divested of the administration of regal power; he must write for directions from hence, which is absurd; somebody must be in, and nobody but the queen can be in. The king being in Ireland, regal power in both, warrants the immediate administration here. You may declare, 'That, during the king's absence, every act of administration by the queen alone shall be good, when the king directs not the contrary;' and, in that, you affirm the administration to be in him, and upon his return this ceases. This may solve the difficulty; if there be more, it may be solved upon debate. If there be contrary commands in any warrant from the king, all subordinate officers are to obey them. In the commissions from Custos Regni, they never excluded the king from direction of the administration: this makes no alteration in the regal power, nor disaffirms the king's.

Serjeant Tremaine. We all wish that there was no occasion for the king's going. The question is, Whether it is not a greater good, his going, than staying here? (Sir Wm. Leveson Gower's motion, to know who advised the king to go, and that we should advise him to stay.) This bill, besides the Act of Settlement and Recognition, says, 'The regal power is in the king and queen; the exercise in the king alone.' This bill will quite turn it to regal power in the queen. What effect may this have in Ireland? I desire it may be considered, what influence Scotland may have, when we give a precedent to shift and change the government here. I cannot tell what the construction may be there, whether it may not be said, 'That the king has parted with the government of England, and is gone into Ireland.' I would consider, whether this may not be done without an act of parliament.

Sir Tho. Littleton. All I have heard proposed, tends to unsettle the government, every one of them. Your government is not strong enough to try experiments upon; you have too many already. As to the queen, &c. in this Bill, it does downright depose the king. I am sorry it was no better considered before it came from the lords. If then it be every body's intention, that the administration shall not be out of the king, I ask, to what purpose is the bill? It is as easy to send to the king for orders, as for the king to come over to do it. All the provision you make, the king must be concurrent in. It is said, 'If the king give no directions to the contrary, the queen's orders shall be obeyed.' Can the king know a thing before it be done? And if done, and the king direct not the contrary, it shall be good, though the king never knew it, and it is done; it is good, whether the king direct it, or not direct it, factum valeat—The queen cannot give and take, unless you say the king and queen shall join quoad particular purposes. If, by commission, she be Custos Regni, how far may it be for her honour to stay here! A thousand things may be said, able to make a man's head ach.

Sir Henry Goodrick. We have heard a great deal of learning on this occasion; and, I am confident, good affection. The safety of the king's person, and England, are the main considerations. Whoever gave the king this advice, if the utmost necessity did not justify it, no gentleman dares own it. It is too bold a thing for a man to countenance the king in it. God directed his glorious expedition. I take it for granted, that the king will go into Ireland, and now we are upon negative Resolutions. The question is now, Whether to divide the regal authority? If one go out, where will you place it? If, by commission, in Custos, or Custodes; if you go by any former precedent, I doubt you will be mistaken; but for the power so reversed, and the king to resume it at his return. I hope you will come to some conclusion, and neither advise nor dissuade the king. (And so reads a question.)

* See vol. iv. p. 119.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I am persuaded that the king has taken a resolution to go; but I must as boldly say, the king did not apprehend that he must leave his regal power behind him; and I would address to inform him so. I am not for chopping and changing regal power, to go a king from England, and be but a gentleman in Ireland; and am as much against a Custos Regni. If the king thinks fit, let the queen have it alone, and address, by the privy-council, to inform the king so, and to stick to the Act of Settlement. Either part with it entirely, or keep it entirely; and do not make him a king, and unmake him again.

Sir Henry Goodrick. The king, in his Speech, said, 'He was willing to leave the queen the administration of regal authority in his absence.' There will be no action, and, I fear, nothing likely to be, till the king comes into Ireland. I look upon the king's resolution for Ireland as an inspiration from God, who has blessed his generous thoughts to go into Ireland. I would willingly take longer time to consider; but I look upon the king's resolution to be steadfast.

Col. Austen. I would defer proceeding any farther, till the king gives intimation how far he is willing to divest himself of regal power; volenti non sit injuria. If your minds alter so soon, none knows without doors how soon it may alter again. I move for some modest question to the king, to know how far he would be divested of his regal power.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If the king had not said it, in his Speech, you might have done so; but, in plain English, it is you that have no mind to let him go; I dare not say so. Some are against an Act; but, if not by act, what way can it be done but by commission? And that is much more liable to exception than an act of parliament. When by commission, may not people say, 'The power is in both; and I am not, by law, obliged to obey without act of parliament?' The king abroad, and the commission disobeyed, what will be the consequence? Read some of the propositions.

Sir Thomas Lee. I am of opinion with Austen, that you had better have no Bill than that Clause. So few are for its standing in the bill, that it cannot, till other words be put in the place of it. I observe, the king said, in his Speech, 'If you thought it necessary, he should go, &c.' It has been said 'The king had considered it by his council.' If it had been considered, you had not had so much debate. If they did not consider it, will not you? This use may be made of the debate; the house may give order to compose a Clause, so as not to deprive the king of regal authority, and not know how to give it him again. If you once take away regal authority, there remains little to be obeyed. I have said nothing to-day to hinder the king's going, or to promote his staying; from all these difficulties you may have a Clause to answer your ends.

Mr. Godolphin. That there may not be indecent jealousies betwixt the king and queen, in the administration of the government, in the king's absence, I proffer Finch's Clause.

Mr. Harbord. Perhaps, if the king had thought of the inconveniences, he would not have said what he did, in his Speech, of Ireland; and I wonder at it, when I hear men in the best posts in England in such doubt.

The Speaker. It was said by Harbord, 'He stood astonished, he acknowledged, at what a man in the greatest post in England said.' Let us know it, that we may be astonished too.

Mr. Harbord. I am not only astonished at that, but at what you have done here too; when I hear that, in the lords' house, some called the king de facto only.*

Mr. Finch. I am not fond of any thing that I have delivered to you; my proposal was, 'That the queen's act, in the king's absence, should be valid in all cases, except where the king directs the contrary.' My meaning was only this, whether it solved not that difficulty of not leaving the king in the administration. In peace, the government of Ireland, by a lord lieutenant, or deputy, is directed by the king. The queen provides for the immediate necessities of the government, and the king has the controul of all, and she is subject to the king's orders in his absence. The king cannot exercise the government here in all emergencies in peace and war: it is impracticable, unless he could be sure of winds, and could direct his enemies where they should be.—To proceed to-morrow.

May 6. The house went into a grand committee, on the Amendments to the Regency Bill.

Mr. Powle. When I heard this opened, I did not well understand it. The words of the Clause do expressly vest the power in the queen, as in the king. Then comes the Proviso, and says, 'It shall, notwithstanding, be in the queen.'

Mr. Finch. The first proposition divests the king; but by making it lawful for the queen, it does not say it is unlawful for the king to do it. There is a great deal of difference; the king is resolved to trust the queen.

Sir John Guise. I am dissatisfied with what fell from Finch. If 'the king has resolved it,' and we must not debate it, I think the freedom of parliament is gone. If the king has said, 'He will trust the queen,' and that is not a thing to be talked of here, I have done.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. The distinction offered by Finch, if it be a distinction, is a wonderful nice one. Whatever the queen does, if it is lawful for him to do, does divest the king of power. I would not have the government depend upon such nice distinctions. If it puts the executive power in the king and queen to act differently, they may act differently. Perhaps all these objections may not happen; but when we do it, we must be able to satisfy the world as rational men. I appeal, whether ever regency of lieutenantcy, or Custos Regni, was pro hac vice? This may, perhaps, as it is penned in the bill, be for 20 years. If the king will go, he must go; but I would not leave it upon such nice distinctions.

* The Earl of Nottingham.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I conceive we are in a miserable condition, and the king must go for our safety; and if we do not provide for his absence, we are in a miserable condition. Pulteney says, 'He never knew a Custos, &c. for 20 years, &c.' But he must consider, that he never knew any Custos, &c. but subjects.

Sir Wm. Pulteney. He totally mistakes me in what I said; the meaning was this: whatever Custos you have, when the king goes into Scotland, or France, there must be a law for the administration of the government.

Mr. Finch. I should be loth that the government should depend upon nice distinctions. Not any thing came from me that did occasion this. As for a Custos, &c. it is impossible there should be one so long as the queen is here. This Clause is for the administration of the queen, and the king may take it when he pleases. If ever execution of power be so much in diminution of the king's power, then Pulteney is in the right. Every act the queen does is supported by this Clause.

Mr. Solicitor Somers. No man should make objections, but should likewise propose expedients. If supposed, or afraid, that it is absurd to have two co-operative powers, or any mistrust of the queen. I believe her the best woman in the world, and she has showed herself so ever since she came hither. But I ask if any good law was ever proposed, that it is a mistrusting the king? I say, there are difficulties. You may suppose absolute power in two together; but separate, all writers agree, and I am as far from mistrusting the queen as any body.

Sir Rob. Howard. This is as green a motion as any. I believe Finch intended no infringement of debates; but, perhaps, might mention some innuendoes to fortify his reasons. For a thing to be made use of when bad, because it cannot be made good, is a strange argument to confirm many an ill thing that cannot be made good. We are told, 'That it is inconvenient for the government to be in two, and therefore the administration should be in one.' Two Czars of Muscovy at a time! (some laughing). Sure they can argue better in their reasons than in their noise. Let me ask how this is practicable? You must suppose the king will never act by this power, or act nothing contradictory to it. If this be so, if you can allow that communication, it may be as sure to you without a contradiction. This Act is not only for this expedition into Ireland, but as often as he goes out of the kingdom, during his life. I think the Clause is full of contradictions.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We are told, 'The Bill is impracticable,' and of 'two Czars of Muscovy.' I find no contradiction in the first Clause, at least. If there be any in the rest, I hope the wisdom of the house will mend them. For decision, pray put the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I have heard so many objections, that I believe you cannot mend the Clause. Suppose the king and queen go into Scotland, shall not the government be provided for? When the Bill of Rights passed, it was not out of disrespect to the queen that the sole government was in the king; it was because it was absolutely necessary the government should be in one hand: why not so still? Now the Clause is, first in the king, and then in the king and queen too. It is an easier matter to give an opinion, whether it goes with one's judgment, than to say how it shall be mended. They have said, 'Mend it,' but nobody proposes to answer objections, but by calling for the question. I agree that it is debasing her authority to have the queen in commission to disparage her. If the authority be in both, suppose the queen should think fit to dissolve this parliament, and the king dislike it, yet he must call another.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I take this Clause to be no less than, as Napier called it, Transubstantiation; regal power in England, and regal power in Ireland. I am against the Clause, and against the bill, and all you can do in it; not that I distrust the queen any more than I did the king at first. I would not have the king go into Ireland. When gentlemen shewed a necessity for the king to go into Ireland, they must say that Ireland is of more consideration than England, and they had rather lose England. Another want is, Money; that Army is ill paid. I would not have the king go into Ireland to head a mutinous army. I would not be left in possession of a government, that punishes nobody, and pardons nobody. I had rather Ireland was lost than England, if it must be so.

Sir John Lowther. Gower has dealt sincerely with you: he is not for the king's going into Ireland. If the debate must turn upon that hinge, I am ready for it; but if the house will offer advice to the king, I am willing to join. Some gentlemen seem to agree, that a Proclamation may do as effectually as an act of parliament, but the objections are stronger against a proclamation than an act. How shall they obey the queen, exclusive of the king, or jointly with the king? I see no way for the thing to be done by proclamation, that may not be by act. It is strange not to suffer the king to go out of England be the exigency ever so great. Kings have gone into France and Scotland, and then there was no difficulty in a Custos Regni, and now we have a person, and no difficulty in the choice of a person, only in the manner how to be invested with this authority! State it thus, that it is absolutely necessary that the king go, and that there was no queen in the case, then there must be a Custos; if a means is to be found out, then it is as absolutely necessary to be the queen as any person. The only clashing is about the orders which shall stand in force, that they do not interfere; but then the king's are to be executed first. His general instructions will he observed, and emergencies be supplied by the queen. I see no difficulty in the thing.

Col. Austen. I have not yet seen it made out absolutely, that there is a necessity for the king to go into Ireland to hazard himself. I would present to the king the sorrow and great apprehensions we are under.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I am sorry we have nothing but apprehensions upon us. I would not trust so much to ourselves as to be divided. I would trust in nothing but in God above, and our sovereign below. It would be strange for us to break such measures, under such an auspicious government. I am sorry to hear mention of 'the Czars of Muscovy;' it is foreign language, and becomes not an Englishman. I look upon Austen's motion to be like a senate's Address to a doge of Venice, as much as the Czars. There is nothing left but that immediate way of the queen, and I would acquiesce in that. I do it as to an English princess; we may place our trust in her. I am not jealous, frightened, nor have apprehensions of it. No man can answer for this or that man's doubt. There is a necessity not to act by a Custos, but by a regent. If you put in a Proviso, do you not leave it to the king, and in the king's power to pass the Act, or not? Will you say, he shall not go, and run all the risk of it? That is so choquant (shocking!) I will quote a precedent, and a full precedent in this case. I will fetch it from the flourishing kingdom of Spain, under Ferdinand and Isabella. The king, in their Cortes (parliament) of Arragon, did propose to go against the Moors; and that of Philip and Mary here from that precedent. It suits extremely with your sense. I cannot say, I will advise the king to go or stay, but the safety of England depends on the immediate finishing the conquest of Ireland.

Col. Austen. I know not how the comparison of 'the Doge of Venice' can be applied to us. It would be unmannerly for us to advise, now the king has declared his resolution, and this will make him 'a Doge of Venice;' it would then be proper to have a table of what advice we should give, and what not.

Sir Robert Rich. Whether it appears 'a Venetian advice,' or whatever it is, I shall speak my mind. I am convinced the Bill is impracticable, because to conquer Ireland is too high a flight. There is no powder, no stores, no money; and to send the king into Ireland to call for any of these, and not to be obeyed! The Army of Ireland is in a great general's hand, and Goodrick knows his merits better than I. Is it the king's resolution to go, and no one's else? Where did this scheme and resolution first rise? If it be good, they will own it; if not, it is in the dark. I doubt we shall bring one of the greatest princes upon earth into the greatest difficulties upon earth. We have a right to address the king (and it is not so unmannerly done) to stay; but you may leave the chair, go into debate, and lay all these difficulties before the king.

Col. Granville. It is not with respect to the king, if you address him to stay. He has so often published that he will go, that I fear his honour, as well as your safety, is engaged. If you enable him, I hope he will have victory, and after that peace. I should be glad the queen might have the power in his absence any way, but by bill; but rather than Ireland should be lost, put the question.

Sir Charles Sedley. The king has not advised with us, but told us, 'he will go.' His foot is in the stirrup, and you catch him upon the shoulder, and say, 'he shall not go.' Whether the king go, or stay, leave it to his choice. If you do not pass the Bill, it is impossible for him to go.

Sir Edw. Seymour. We have been two days on this subject, and done little, and, in the method we are going on, shall do as little to-day. I have seen how the debate has been carried on, and by whom. Yesterday you were under some perplexities. If we jogg our constitution out of rules, of the two evils, the least is to be chosen. The question is, Whether you will trust the government in the queen's hands, or not at all? Several projects have been offered, as a Proclamation, &c. It has been said, 'As the Bill is penned, the queen may dissolve this parliament.' But I would explain; as Thompson said, he cared not which side was uppermost, that is our uneasiness: but shall we sit still, and do nothing for your security and safety? It is not proper to give advice, till asked of us. The king has told you, he will go into Ireland. What is the reason of borrowing on all our Money, but our belief that we are safe in the resolution he has taken? If our advice is not mannerly, sure it is not prudent, and if not other vigour put into hands* than was last year, we shall not be long here. When the king is gone, the government must be somewhere. Will you have it in other hands than the queen's? You have a good clause before you; there is no objection against it that is solid; put the question for that clause.

Sir John Guise. It is said, 'The king resolves to go into Ireland.' I had thought, that, by the laws and customs of the realm, the king could do no wrong, because he takes the advice of others. The thing had better take up a quarter of an hour's debating now, than a year's fighting it out afterwards. Have you not any thing to regard but Ireland? I think you have England and Scotland. Should the king go and fail, or a greater misfortune happen, his death, what a posture are we then in, in relation to England! I hope the Army is paid, and no parties in England; but I fear, should there be any ill management or disorders here, the French will make their advantages of it. As to Scotland, I have heard dismal accounts from thence. Who then is the person most proper to countervail all these difficulties? If the king go, have you any such thing as a general in his absence? If any misfortune happen, I have done my part, and I tell you, I will go as far for the good of the nation as I can.—The Amendments, reported by the committee, were then agreed to by the house, and the Proviso was ordered to be engrossed.

* Sic Orig.

May 7. The Regency Bill was read the third time.

Mr. Foley. I suppose it is the intention of the house, that the king have the administration of the government when he comes back. I proffer a Proviso to assert whose orders shall be obeyed; viz. 'That the king's shall be obeyed.'

Sir Christ. Musgrave. This proviso supposes, that the queen will not obey the king's orders. I would lay it aside.

Sir Tho. Littleton. The clause has no hurt in it: it is possible the queen may be surprized, and orders may be given unknown to one another, and both cannot stand good: if such a thing should happen, there is no hurt in the clause.

Mr. Finch. The only reason I hear for accepting this clause is, 'Because there is no great harm in it:' to let the clause remain is no great harm; but I never heard it was a reason to receive it, because there was no great harm in it.

The Proviso was rejected; and the Bill, with the Amendments, &c. passed.

May 8. The question being put, that the Bill for reversing the Judgment in a Quo Warranto, against the city of London, and for restoring the city of London to its ancient Rights and Privileges, do pass, the house divided, and it was carried in the affirmative: yeas 166, noes 76.

*Proceedings on the Bill of 500*l.* Forfeitures.*

May 9. The house having resolved itself into a committee to consider of the Bill for vesting the 500*l.* Forfeitures in their majesties; and Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair, a motion was made to adjourn the house, but passed in the negative, yeas 76, noes 80.—After which the chairman of the said committee having not been directed to make any Report, the house again resolved into a committee, and the report was referred till the next day.

May 10. The question being put for making the said report, it passed in the affirmative, yeas 176, noes 93. The chairman then made the report accordingly, and a Clause was admitted, to be part of the Bill, 'for the Money to be paid into the Exchequer, and that a distinct account to be kept thereof.'—The question was then put, That the Bill, with the Amendments, be engrossed, which passed in the affirmative, yeas 152, noes 106.—On the 14th, a motion being made for reading the said Bill, it passed in the negative: yeas 92; noes 111. On the 15th the Bill was read the third time. An engrossed Proviso was then offered to be added, as a rider, That the Bill shall not charge any person, who accepted any office or commission, and executed the same without qualifying himself, if the said person do qualify himself as required, before the 1st of August next: It passed in the negative.—And the question being put, that the said Proviso be read a second time, it passed in the negative.

Another engrossed Clause was likewise offered, That no person shall incur the Penalty, who shall at the next quarter-sessions, take the Oaths on the Statute for 'Abrogating the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance, and appointing other Oaths:' and make the Declaration in the Statute 25 Car. 2. And the question being put, That the said Clause be read, it passed in the negative.

Another engrossed Clause was offered as a rider, 'That, whereas a Judgment was given in Easter or Trinity Term 1686, in a Suit between Goodwin and Hales, contrary to law, and it is enacted, That every Judge of the court who consented thereto, and also every judge and baron, who delivered any opinion for the giving the said judgment, or for dispensing with the statute, shall forfeit: . . . And, That every person, who passed any Patent, dispensing with the same, shall be for ever disabled from holding any employment or trust; and that every judge or baron, that were so in the said Easter or Trinity term, who shall not appear before the commissioners for that purpose appointed, and prove that he did deliver his opinion against the said Judgment; such judge or baron shall be adjudged to be convicted, and to incur the said forfeitures, and disabilities.'

Resolved, That the blank be filled up with 500*l.* And an Amendment was then proposed to be made in the said Clause, by leaving out the part relating to the disabilities, which upon the question, was agreed to by the house.

The question being then put, That the Clause be read a third time, it passed in the negative.—Another engrossed Clause was offered as a rider, That this Act shall not extend to charge any person, who after Oct. 8, and before Feb. 13, 1688, accepted any office, or commission, and executed the same without qualifying himself: if such person do qualify himself before Aug. 1, next; which proviso was twice read, and the question being put, that it be read the third time, it passed in the negative, yeas 160, noes 150.

Resolved, That the Proviso be made part of the bill. The question being then put, That the bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative; yeas 137, noes 91.*

* "In the end of the reign of James, many of the Dissenters had been allured to accept of religious liberty, illegally tendered by the stretch of prerogative; and some of them had accepted places for which they were disqualified by law. It appears to have been with a view to expose the transgressions of the Whigs, that the Tories now brought in a Bill, for vesting in his majesty all Forfeitures incurred by those, who had been in office in the late reign, without the legal qualifications; and, that none of the forfeitures might be alleviated or Debate on two Members attending the H. of Lords.] May 12. A Message from the lords, to desire, That sir Robert Clayton, and sir George Treby may attend their house concerning the Alteration of the Lieutenantcy in London.

Sir Henry Goodrick. For persons to go from your house, to be sworn for evidence to impeach your Judgment of the Lieutenantcy of London, I hope you will consider of it. For your members to attack your Judgment—I hope you will not compel your members to that.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I am sorry to hear such a Message from the lords; it is an unfortunate thing; it affects me very much. They are scarce good friends to this monarchy, that will make a difference betwixt the king and his people, to impeach the king's authority into the bargain. By an act of Charles 2, the king has power to place and displace in the militia, and the king has taken great care of the militia of London, which is the great chamber of the kingdom. The king has settled this by commission, and placed persons as he thought fit; and it has been so well received by this house, that they addressed with Thanks to the king; and it is reported, that the lords have sent for a List of the lieutenantcy, to know whether the king has done well, or no. The consequence, whatever it be, must tend to make a difference betwixt the houses. As for one of the gentlemen (Clayton) he is a party in the lieutenantcy, and as for the attorney-general (Treby) the lords have a claim to call him to their house to sit there. Is not this a sort of bringing of original causes before the lords? In appeals, and writs of error, they have judicature, but not on the commons: they are no censoris morum; and to send a si quis, whether the king should give men such authority! Examine this, whether the lords do it judicially, as an original cause, and send the lords Answer by messengers of your own.

Sir Edw. Seymour. Some present answer you must give, and it is moved 'to send it by messengers of your own.' The Message is of great moment, for your members to attend the lords. In all the enquiry I can make, I find no instance of such a message, till the last parliament, that Mr. Hampden, junior, was sent for, (see p. 425). Since it may be a contest, whatever it is, I would have the right on your side. As for one of them, the attorney-general, the lords had a right to him before he remitted, a Clause was added, ordaining them to be paid into the Exchequer, and accounted for to the public. This bill, if it had taken place, must have affected their own friends; but the Tories were willing to suffer in their pecuniary interests, provided that they could reduce the reputation of their antagonists to the same level with their own. After having passed the house of commons, it was thrice read in the house of lords, where some amendments were proposed; but the adjournment of parliament took place before these were agreed to by the other house." Somerville.

was your member; therefore I would not insist upon a person that sits here by their courtesy, and not your right. The lords never send for witnesses in matters of Impeachments, as Goodrick said; you prepare all that. By the same reason that the lords send for one of your members, they may send for ten; and, by the same rule of proportion, call for the very Chair for evidence. It is against the right being, and order of the house to send your members, and I am against it.

Sir Wm. Williams. I offer, that, as to the attorney-general, the king calls him thither, and the lords cannot distinguish him as to themselves. The attorney is not in possession of his place there; it must be the king that calls the lords to parliament, as he may do any of your members. I would send the lords an Answer by messengers of your own, till you can search Books; it is the best answer that can be given.

Sir Tho. Lee. It is said, 'The debate may be long, and the messengers will stay;' but the messengers must attend the fate of that. I hope, whatever Sawyer's opinion is, that the house did rashly in the Thanks to the king about the Lieutenantcy, that you will not take the sole advice of the king upon you; and, in the last Message, when you might have asked the lords concurrence, you said, 'You thanked for the cause, and not for the persons;' the lords now enquire into the persons. Your best Answer is, by messengers of your own. In the last parliament instead of giving leave to your members to go to the lords, to give evidence, you should have let the lords know that you are prosecutors, though they are the judges. I am sorry you have shown the lords the way to the king without you. The lords have a right to begin an Act of Attainder, as well as you. If the lords should proceed upon this as criminal, you let them know you are the accusers; and the best answer, for the present, is, by messengers of your own.

Col. Austen. It does not appear that the lords, in this, act as in order to Judgment; and therefore it is no original cause; but that the lords may second you in their Thanks, if they shall think fit, I cannot see that any of those cases mentioned stand in your way. To suppose they shall shock you, is more than you ought to do. I would send Answer by messengers of your own.

Resolved, "That the messengers be called in, and acquainted, That the house will return an Answer by messengers of their own." Then the question for adjourning passed in the affirmative, 159 to 156.

Debate on preserving the Peace of the Nation.] May 13. Sir Edward Seymour. I will not enter into the history, how the sun has gone back upon our dial; only I desire we may be preserved for the time to come. If you can sit down with all the ill administration of affairs you have had already, there is an end of my motion. I hope the king, upon passing the Bill of Regency, will leave us some time to consider; and it is worth your thoughts to consider to provide for the safety of the Nation in his absence, whether by the Militia, or otherwise. My motion is, 'To resolve the house into a committee of the whole house, to consider how to preserve the Peace of the Nation in the king's absence.'

Lord Castleton. I am seldom of that gentleman's opinion, but I am now, and I second his motion.

Col. Granville. I have heard the motion, and I think it so necessary, that I would not let it pass over. I am ready to embrace any remedy that may be offered. If we are in danger, now the king is here, and an army to defend us, we cannot be safe when he is out of England; therefore I second the motion.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The motion is of great importance; and that of the Militia, moved by Coningsby, is but one part of our safety; therefore I concur with Seymour's motion.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I confess I do not understand the motion. You have had the Militia under consideration, and disarming Papists. The persons most likely to endanger us are the Papists, who, in the North, are gone from their houses, and are in confederacies. I would not lose the fruits of that Bill, so much for your safety, but I would speedily proceed upon it.

Sir John Guise. This is too weighty a matter to speak to it off-hand. It is worth your time to consider, that a great part of the business of parliament is consulatory. Many words are not requisite now; and I move 'to go into a grand committee to-morrow.'

Sir Tho. Lee. The question is of great weight, and it is late in the day. I cannot say, (as lord Castleton) 'That I am seldom of Seymour's opinion;' but I must say, I have been more of late than formerly. I should be glad if he would propose something for you to go upon. I should be glad to have a little light what you have to do: but it falls oddly to have this motion come on the same day you have agreed the Bill of Regency with the lords; now to put it in the people's heads, that they are insecure. It may be of some danger to publish your Votes now, at a time when you have passed a bill to be secure in a Regency, and that now you declare yourselves insecure.

Sir Edm. Jennings. I suppose there is something latet in herbis in this motion. I think it is time to adjourn, and go to dinner.

Col. Austen. I wonder to hear gentlemen speak of 'the security of the Nation in the king's absence,' and the next motion, 'to go to dinner.' I will trouble you with nothing more than what has been said. I reckon there is to be a management by council, and it is no disparagement. I think, if the motion be not agreed to, it will look ill abroad.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Perhaps this motion may tend to taking the ministry out of some hands, and putting it into others. It is both the right of the crown, and a necessity of putting the government in the queen, a princess of great judgment, and the king may well put her in that trust. I wish Seymour would be more particular in his motion; if not, you may proceed upon general Heads of a bill for the Militia; but if he will make no farther explanation of himself, I would adjourn.

Sir Ch. Sedley. We are all contented, that the queen should have the administration of the government, in the king's absence; and we now consider how to make it easy to the queen. She is a wise woman, but she is a woman. The king will leave her some of his own council, and some of king James's council, a mixed council. What concerns all people ought to be handled by all; and I move as Seymour, &c.

Col. Birch. I am not fit to speak to this business: I cannot dance about it as others can. Nobody can doubt but the queen is but a woman still, and must have council. This is the great council. What will the people say? You have passed a Bill of Regency; but who shall advise and manage the queen in the king's absence? If Seymour meant not that, in his motion, I know not what he meant. If to have the kingdom managed for its safety be the meaning of it, I am for the question.

Sir John Lowther. I do not well comprehend the meaning of this Vote. I wish it may be explained, that we might. No motions should be made without the subject-matter before you, and the meaning of it. I would not willingly anticipate any thing. If, by the debate, we delay the king's journey, or create apprehensions in the people, we make the danger greater, and the enemies to the government will proceed more boldly, when they see you apprehend your own weakness. Unless the motion be explained, I second the motion to adjourn.

Sir John Thompson. I am for the motion, and I wish it had been sooner, and for a reason not touched: in the last parliament, when we were upon the consideration of the State of the Nation, and an Address preparing to the king, we were prorogued: we are doing what we were about then, and may be prorogued as we were then. After we have been hit twice in the same place, I am for the motion for a grand committee to-morrow.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I had not gone on, but that the house seemed to acquiesce in my motion, and that gentlemen should be surprized to consult their own safety! I should be glad to be so surprized. My motion is plain and intelligible. He is a bold man that dares present you with a remedy to that end, otherwise than as a general proposition. If the motion be not entertained, the world may think we are in safety, and we need not consider of it.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. I cannot imagine what explanation the motion needs; it is as reasonable as ever I heard. Though Seymour be able to propose, yet that no man will do but at a grand committee. We must consider this whilst the king is here, else, when he is gone, we shall want him to help us. Provision for our safety, whilst the king is here, is much better. I cannot apprehend what gentlemen fear from this consideration. The Bill of the Militia will not reach your end. Since all conclude it difficult to keep us in peace in the king's absence, pray put the question.

* This Bill had been returned by the lords just before.

Resolved, "That this house will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider of ways and means to preserve the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, in the absence of the king."

May 14. The house went into a grand committee, on ways and means to preserve the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, in the king's absence.

Mr. Holt. I hope this day will not prove as others have done. We find fault, and do nothing. Great complaints are made abroad, and, I fear, jealousies. The papists say, 'We dare do nothing.' The nation can never be safe, nor at ease, till Ireland be reduced. Now, consider what hands we shall leave the queen in, in the administration, &c. It is of great consequence to be in hands we confide in. I hear that one Shales is come over. I would have him come up to give you account of the state of Ireland: they say, he is at Chester, and I would farther proceed to settling the Militia, and what else is requisite.

Serjeant Maynard. We have had discoveries made of conspiracies, but never bring them home to any body. We have sent for this man, (Shales) and cannot get him. I would know who has obstructed it.

Sir Wm. L. Gower. You have been moved for Shales to be sent for. Will that be any security to the government? I hope you will think of something else.

Sir John Guise. The Order is, 'To consider how to secure the Nation, &c.' I know not how Shales comes directly into this case. If the errors of the last year must not be redeemed but by Shales's coming over now, I think that strange. Perhaps the queen may be very well satisfied without this; but it may satisfy her to have the Advice of this house; not that she wants advice, but is it not usual for us to give advice? The credit of the government may be in that advice. I have laid down some of my own thoughts for the present: I hope other gentlemen will do the same.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Certainly Shales is in custody by duke Schomberg's order. One thing weighs upon me extremely; there is a wicked party in this kingdom, that incline too much to their opinion. I wish the public good may be the common standard: when I hear of such assemblies of men, and that the Scotch party increases in arms, and some whom the king has extended his grace to; when I see several persons taken in Kent and Essex, &c. I have reason to believe a general conspiracy. In four or five weeks they go loose again; every man will make friends of the unrighteous mammon, and favour them. I hope you will leave some such power to prevent this. Let us not enter into any thing now to breed distinctions, nor sow such seeds of discord as cannot become prolific, but by a separation amongst ourselves. I would consider such as are in actual opposition against the government, that they may be secured.

VOL. V.

Sir Wm. Whitlock. What I heard from Goodrick calls me up. That persons should be secured, seems to me to be a retrenching the Habeas Corpus Act. If an angel came from heaven that was a privy-counsellor, I would not trust my liberty with him one moment. I would not now have a way to break in upon that law; for this very reason, I would not touch upon that law, for there never can be greater discontent than breaking in upon that law.

Mr. Coningsby. For some time I would repeal that law; it does not so much save you, as that your enemies, that would destroy the government, may not have the benefit of the government.

Sir Joseph Tredenham. Our circumstances are very ill, if inconsistent with that law.

Sir Henry Goodrick. I appeal, how irregularly those gentlemen speak to a thing never proposed. We are told of 'Saints and Angels,' by Whitlock, but I think there are none under his cassock; but I offered only, whether it was not fit, some way or other, to save the government; which it cannot be, unless the persons that conspire its ruin are prevented from walking about, &c.

Sir John Guise. I desire that nothing may be done with the Habeas Corpus Act, which is part of the Bill of Rights; but a little severity to these men will be ineffectual. There is a writ Ne exeat regnum, and I hope the lawyers will tell you, that that writ may be extended without violating the Habeas Corpus act.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I consider the motion that brought you into this committee to preserve the nation in the king's absence. I saw, in the Bill of Regency, the same dissatisfaction; if there be reason, there may be remedy. I expected to have heard another debate than about Shales. The Habeas Corpus act, the best security of the nation, I would not meddle with. I thought it had been the best part of the security of the nation, the council about the queen in the king's absence. I thought we could not be safe in the continuance of those hands who had so much shaken the government. Whether it was their design, their ignorance, or misfortune, I would have no such bottoms to trust the government upon. The king being here, the government is assisted with vigour; if we have those Miscarriages now, I have no reason to believe we shall be safe in his absence. I believe no man will justify the miscarriages. Now, reflect how our condition will stand, in such arbitrary and uncertain hands. If a man be sick, and can have no remedy, when he finds one, and will not apply it, he is in a worse condition. I am afraid, if we do not apply to the king, to alter the administration of the government, in his absence, from the hands it is in now, your government cannot last long.

Sir Ch. Sedley. That there are misfortunes from counsellors, I believe: I know not who they are, nor whether they are our friends. I have no accusation against any of them. I have been at cooking this dish many a time. To put the king upon this enquiry, now he is going away, would be unseasonable. Perhaps we are dissatisfied that some are in, and perhaps some would be dissatisfied if some of us were in. Pray let us go to some other business.

Mr. Foley. I have had experience how hard this has been. Heretofore none of the privy-council were ashamed of the Advice they gave; they set their hands to the Privy-Council book. I propose, that, for the future, all orders passed by the Privy-Council may be fairly entered, and that those present may enter their assent or dissent. Thus we may know, for the time to come, who gives Advice.

Sir John Guise. I do not doubt of Sedley's 'eating well, and cooking;' but I know no meat you have before you: I think this is not a jesting matter. I am of opinion, two ways must secure the peace of the nation; by those who have done amiss formerly, not to be employed, to distaste the people. I know not who they are. We all know the privy-council who are present, and who the rest; it is an easy matter to take them down, to see the characters of men. If the characters have been formerly before you, if in former reigns, or this, they have given distaste. Let names be after things. It all be well, and you have nothing to say to any body, pray let us go to dinner.

Sir John Thompson. When I hear the several discourses to-day of our condition, and the remedies, I would not leave them upon your hands. If you do not all the good, do some. I am only afraid of this, that they that have done you the mischief in time past will put you out of all power of remedy. They who sold you to France once, may do it twice. I desire to do something, and leave the rest to Providence. I would form it into a motion, viz. 'That all those who advised the king to dissolve the last parliament, may be removed from his council.'

Mr. Hutchinson. I would have the Journals searched. I think those under Impeachments, in former parliaments, not fit to be near the king.

Col. Granville. I hope we shall have some good effect of this day's debate. If we knew from whence our misfortunes come, they might be the easier remedied. I have heard persons described. I am for the head of the Privy-Council; a great man, a bold man, and an able man, capable of making attempts on English spirits. When we reflect upon the arbitrary actions and counsels by the marquis of Carmarthen, in king William's time, it reminds us of the same actions in king Charles 2's time. I have heard of his merit in the Revolution. A private life would have better become him, and been more for his interest. I cannot wonder if people be cautious in sending Money to those that have so often miscarried. At one leap, from being prisoner in the Tower to be President of the Council, sticks with me. He has been impeached by the commons of England, and now to grasp at power to satisfy his revenge upon those who have impeached him, for betraying the liberties of England! I would pass some censure upon him, and pull him down, though he were greater than he is: and I will be ready to do always so to those that betray the liberties of England.

Sir John Lowther. I did not think we should have had so profound a silence, if the danger had been from so great, so bold, and so able a man as lord Carmarthen. For an Impeachment against him, and he never tried, if that be a reason why he should be kept out of the Council, it may be a reason why he should come in. I think those were great crimes in the last reigns, of surrendering Charters, and those were not called to account. We were told then to lay all things asleep; but if you will look into Grievances, look into the last occasions of your ruin, not only into 1678, but 1684, and the rest.

Sir John Guise. Mention has been made of other people in other parliaments, &c. that have been well spoken of in this house; but I wonder that so knowing a person speaks of justification, when pardons have been pleaded. In this case you have one mentioned; you may demand Judgment against him, and he has nothing to plead but the pardon; a man at that time questioned for French money*; and 'tis an easy inducement for me to believe he will do so again. This nobleman has formerly been concerned in this house; we know how that went off. We had such reasons as I can never forget, why a Pardon cannot be pleaded to an Impeachment. He is President of the Council, and I could wish Lowther would tell us the good that council has done. For my own common safety, I confess, I cannot have confidence in him. I second the motion, and desire, 'That, during the king's absence, the lord marquis of Carmarthen may not be left one of the Council.'

Mr. Shadrach Vincent. Since I see it is now the fashion to name privy counsellors, I will name another, who I desire may be turned out:

"He is said to have pushed for the Treasurer's staff, a post he had formerly enjoyed, but was refused by the king, who was resolved the Treasury should be in the hands of Commissioners." Reresby.

* When earl of Danby. See vol. iv. p. 1060, 1067.

* "The earl of Danby had been made Lord President, and created marquis of Carmarthen. He had, by his accomplishing the king's marriage with the queen, and heartily concurring in the Revolution from the very beginning, atoned in some measure for his proceedings under Charles 2." Boyer.

he that delivered up the Charters in Cornwall. I mean the earl of Bath*.

Sir W. L. Gower. Till this matter be determined, I know not how you can enquire. If you will prosecute my lord of Bath, he has no pardon to plead, and, if he had, he will plead none. He will sooner turn himself out of the council, than stay in with him, if you move him out.

Sir Tho. Clarges. As to what relates to lord Bath, and lord Carmarthen, I will say nothing; but the matter of Gloucestershire (complained of by sir John Knight, about raising the Auxiliaries) is ten times of greater concern, and no laughing matter. I say, it is levying war, and no better. There is no law for Auxiliaries, but the Militia is our legal defence, and no lord lieutenant can raise auxiliaries; he is indemnified for what he has done, by the act, but if there have been any raised since the act, it is within the law of levying war. I move, That a committee may look into this matter. I cannot answer my duty to the king, nor my trust in this place, if you enquire not into it.

Sir Edw. Seymour. I am under no good circumstances of making speeches. I wonder that, what zeal soever men have for the thing, they should lead you out of order. I wonder this should be concealed all this while: I love not art of any kind. Let not the clock strike twelve at once; go on by degrees. It seems hard, that crimes acted so long ago should now be called in question; it were so, if we took any thing from him. If not fatal, it is at least unfortunate, if he has done it at one time, that he may not act it again. It is a question of common prudence for your safety. Let one thing take its determination, before you begin another. I would address the king to remove lord Carmarthen: I am sure he will neither support the church, nor the state.

Sir Charles Sedley. You are upon two motions; advice to the king not to leave his privy council to act all in his absence, but some council besides the privy council. I have received no dis-obligation from this noble lord, nor any favour from him; but pray keep us to some order, and put a question.

* "In the new Charters that had been granted, the election of the members was taken out of the hands of the inhabitants, and restrained to the corporation men, all those being left out who were not acceptable at court. In some boroughs, they could not find a number of men to be depended on, so the neighbouring gentlemen were made corporation men, and in some of these, persons of other counties, not so much as known in the borough, were named. This was practised in the most avowed manner in Cornwall, by the earl of Bath, who, to secure himself the groom of the stole's place, which he held all king Charles's time, put the officers of the guards names in almost all the Charters of that county, which sending up 44 members, they were for the most part so chosen, that the king was sure of their votes on all occasions." Burnet.

Sir Henry Goodrick. Orderly and properly you are to proceed upon my Lord President; all the rest of the debate is a deviation from the question. I am sorry to hear another noble lord named. I was one at first for not impeaching this noble lord. He was advised by his counsel to plead his Pardon. General accusations are general snares. Let any man, upon his honour, aver any of this accusation: 'Not fit to serve the church nor state!' I think it the greatest injury mortal man can have. 'Twas said by another, 'That the marquis of Carmarthen acted the same part now, that the earl of Danby did formerly.' Let them, on their honour, make it good against my lord president. I require it, in honour and justice, whether, upon a general accusation, we should desire the king to remove him? Let gentlemen stand up in their places, and aver the accusation, and I have done.

Col. Granville. Before I make out what lord Carmarthen has done, I hope Goodrick will make it good what lord Danby has done.

Sir Henry Goodrick. It is strange to call upon a man of honour to accuse his friend.

Sir Edm. Jennings. What proofs were made against lord Danby, when he was impeached? All know, the Impeachment was brought on by a trick. As to his Pardon, it was by the advice of counsel, that he pleaded it. I believe he has given the king counsel to preserve our properties, to prosecute the war in Ireland and France, and to keep the crown on his head, and his head on his shoulders. In 1641, lord Strafford was accused, and condemned with a Ne trahatur in exemplum. The king's ministers were banished. (And so he proceeded with the story of that time.) The mismanagement is from others about the king, and if any be in this house, it is fit they should be removed.

Mr. Dolben. The present subject of the debate is lord Carmarthen. Notwithstanding all the reflections upon him, I think him as well affected to the government, as any at the council-board. It is said, 'An Impeachment was against him;' but no judgment was given on that impeachment. I will not say that every thing has been well done; he is a fallible man; but as ill things have been done before his time, and since, as he has been accused of. He was a great and main instrument in declaring king William and queen Mary, for which every good man has cause to thank God upon his knees. This great thing he has supported by all his actions since. Sure he has as great an argument to support them now, as he had then to bring about the match. There is a relation in principles, as well as alliance, betwixt the marquis of Carmarthen, and the earl of Bath. I am against the motion. If he be laid aside and removed, I fear a man less worthy may be put in his place.

Sir John Thompson. If we may believe printed letters, we must lay that match upon lord Arlington. I stand up to put you in mind of your order. Put the question, and the sense of the house will determine it.

Sir Robert Sawyer. This that you are moved for, an Address to be made to the king, is to remove a certain enemy to king James, and a certain friend to king William. From his Impeachment, there was a perpetual enmity betwixt king James and him carried on in this house, by king James's interest, for advising the king to send him beyond sea.

Sir John Lowther. The objection against this lord is his Impeachment. I have not seen great fruit of Impeachments; one was impeached (lord Clarendon) who died in France, and had no prosecution. To this lord as much is to be said, relating to the present government, as any man. If the king be sensible of his marriage with the queen, how can he resent this general Address to have him removed from him? If he has any secret designs of his own, notwithstanding the great service he has done, I think that argument of small weight, and should be sorry any such thing should go from this house. I have been told, he advised the prince of Orange to come hither, and his counsel swayed much; if so, it is a sign the king relied much upon him. Before I engaged with him at York, I never knew him, and his presence with us in the north was an encouragement to us to hope for success. Since the king came in, no man could apply himself with more industry, with that tender constitution of his, being eight hours together in the day in business. If dexterity of management could expiate, he has done as much as man can do, both for church and state.

Mr. Ettrick. I am sorry that, without doors, we are divided into parties—What can be a greater punishment to a man of honour, than to have an old Impeachment revived, and an Address to the king against him, as unfit to be near him, and to remove him? What can be more unfortunate, than for the king to tell you, he knows nothing of this lord, why he should remove him?

Mr. Harbord. The king's enemies will be glad to hear of the divisions among us on this occasion. This lord did two things remarkable in serving the nation; no innocent blood was spilt in his time, when the streets ran blood; and dissolving the Pensionary Parliament: and my lord of Bath sent assurance to the prince of Orange, 'That he would be for him whenever he landed.' It is unfortunate, that these two persons should be named. I dare not propose what to advise, but these animosities are not for the king's nor the kingdom's service.

Resolved, 'That a committee be appointed to enquire into the listing, assembling, and exercising of Papists, and other disaffected persons in arms, in several counties in the kingdom, without their majesties commission.'

The King's Speech at the Adjournment.] May 23. His majesty, in the house of lords, after passing the bill of Indemnity*, was pleased to speak to both houses to the following effect:

* In this Bill, of all the late instruments of

"My lords and gentlemen; I have had such assurance of your good affections to me, that I come now to thank you; and particularly for the Supplies you have given me. The season of the year is so far advanced, that I can no longer delay my going into Ireland; and therefore I think it necessary to have an adjournment of the parliament. And although it shall be but to a short day, yet, unless some great occasion require it, (of which you shall have due notice) I do not intend you shall sit to do business until the winter; and I hope, by the blessing of God, we then shall have a happy meeting. In the mean time, I recommend to you the discharge of your duties in your respective counties, that the peace of the nation may be secured by your vigilance and care in your several stations."

The lord chief baron Atkins afterwards signified his majesty's pleasure, That both houses should adjourn till the 7th of July.† On the 7th of July the house met, and was prorogued, by commission, to the 23th inst.; from thence to August 18; and from thence to September popery and arbitrary power, 35 only were expressly excepted, and of them, few or none were made examples to the justice of the nation. When the Bill was sent down to the commons, Mr. Baron Turton brought this message from the lords: "Mr. Speaker, his majesty has been pleased to send this Bill, which the lords have accepted, and passed, nem. con. and now send it down to this house." Though the commons immediately passed the Bill, they demanded a Conference, in which they intended to acquaint their lordships, "That it is unusual for either house to acquaint the other by what number any Bill before them do pass; and the introducing any alteration in the usual method of proceedings, may be of dangerous consequence." But a stop was put to this affair by the adjournment. See the Journal.

† The king set out for Ireland the 4th of June, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, &c. On the 14th he landed at Carrickfergus, and on July 1, gained the famous Victory of the Boyne, which obliged king James to return to France, and was a prelude to the reducing of Ireland. In the mean time, England was threatened with a French invasion, their Fleet having entered the channel; and, on June 30, with a superiority of 70 sail to 50, it came to an engagement with the English and Dutch, under the earl of Torrington, near Beachy in Sussex; but, though the advantage was on the enemy's side (the Dutch losing six ships, and the English one) no descent was made, the French being contented with insulting the coast; and nothing could exceed the prudence and activity of the queen's measures. The earl of Torrington, being charged with misconduct, was sent to the Tower; and though he was afterwards acquitted by a court-martial, he was dismissed from his employments by the king. His majesty returned to England, Sept. 6.

8.—On the 8th of Sept. the house again met, and immediately adjourned to the 11th instant; from thence to the 12th; and from thence it was prorogued, by commission, to Oct. 2.

SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]

Oct. 2. Both houses met, when his majesty, in the house of lords, spoke as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen, Since I last met you, I have used my best endeavours to reduce Ireland into such a condition this year, as that it might be no longer a charge to England; and it has pleased God to bless my endeavours with such success, that I doubt not but I should have been fully possessed of that kingdom by this time, had I been enabled to have gone into the field as soon as I should have done; and, as is more especially necessary in Ireland, where the rains are so great, and begin so early.—I think myself obliged to take notice, how well the Army there have behaved themselves on all occasions, and borne great hardships with little pay, and with so much patience and willingness, as could not proceed but from an affectionate duty to my service, and a zeal for the Protestant religion.—I have already made it evident, how much I have preferred the satisfaction of my subjects before the most solid advantages of the crown, by parting with so considerable a branch of its inheritance; and it is no less apparent, that I have asked no Revenue for myself, but what I have readily subjected to be charged to the uses of the war.—I did, at my departure, give order for all the public accounts to be made ready for me against my return; and I have commanded them to be laid before the house of commons: By which they will see, that the real want of what was necessary beyond the Funds given, and the not getting in due time, that for which Funds were assigned, have been the principal causes why the Army is in so much arrear of their pay, and the Stores, both for the Navy and the Ordnance, not supplied as they ought to be.—Now, as I neither spared my person, nor my pains, to do you all the good I could, so I doubt not, but if you will as cheerfully do your parts, it is in your power to make both me and yourselves happy, and the nation great: And, on the other hand, it is too plain, by what the French have let you see so lately, that, if the present war be not prosecuted with vigour, no nation in the world is exposed to greater danger.—I hope therefore, there will need no more upon that subject, than to lay before you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the State of what will be necessary for the support of the Fleet and Armies, (which cannot possibly admit of being lessened in the year ensuing) and to recommend to your care the clearing of my Revenue, so as to enable me to subsist, and to maintain the charge of the Civil-List; the revenue being so engaged, that it must be wholly applied, after the 1st of Nov. next, to pay off the debts already charged upon it; and therefore a present consideration must be had of the arrears of the army, which shall likewise be laid before you, and for all which I must desire a sufficient and timely supply.—It is farther necessary to inform you, that the whole support of the Confederacy abroad will absolutely depend upon the speed and vigour of your proceedings in this session.—And here I must take notice, with great satisfaction, of the readiness which my subjects, of all degrees, hath shown, both in this city, and in their several counties, by giving their assistance so cheerfully as they did in my absence, while the French Fleet was upon our coasts; and, besides this so convincing mark of the good inclinations of my people, I have found, through all the countries where I have passed, both at my going into Ireland, and in my return from thence, such demonstrations of their affections, that I have not the least doubt but I shall find the same from their representatives in parliament.—I cannot conclude, without taking notice also, how much the honour of the nation has been exposed by the ill conduct of my Fleet, in the last summer's engagement against the French: and I think myself so much concerned to see it vindicated, that I cannot rest satisfied till an example has been made of such as shall be found faulty upon their examination and trial; which was not practicable while the whole Fleet was abroad; but is now put into the proper way of being done as soon as may be.—My lords and gentlemen; I look upon the future well-being of this kingdom to depend upon the result of your counsels and determinations at this time; and the benefit will be double, by the speed of your resolutions; insomuch that I hope you will agree with me in this conclusion, That whosoever goes about to obstruct or divert your application to these matters, preferably to all others, can neither be my friend, nor the kingdom's."

The houses then adjourned to Oct. 6, when it was Resolved, nem. con. That an humble Address of Thanks be presented to his majesty, for his going into Ireland and hazarding his royal person for the reducing thereof; and congratulating his success, and happy return: And a committee was appointed to prepare it.

Resolved, nem. con. That it be an Instruction to the said committee, to assure his majesty, in the said Address, that this house will assist and support his majesty and his government to the utmost of their power.

Resolved, nem. con. That an humble Address be presented to her majesty, acknowledging her gracious government during the absence of his majesty, and returning the humble Thanks of this house for the same: And the same committee was ordered to prepare it.

Oct. 8. The privy counsellors of the house were ordered to move his majesty, That a State of the War for the year ensuing might be laid before the house.

Oct. 9. The earl of Ranelagh, pay-master of the Army, acquainted the house, That he had, by his majesty's order, prepared a List, or State of the Land Forces, for the next year ready; and that his majesty had declared, "That no more thereof should be used within his own dominions than were absolutely necessary;" and that, besides what the said State amounted unto, the Army was in arrear 800,000*l.* And he delivered in the said State, or List, amounting in the whole, horse, dragoons, and foot, to 69,636 men, and 1,910,560*l.* 7*s.* charge.

Then sir Thomas Lee, one of the commissioners of the Admiralty, presented the house an Estimate of the Navy for the year ensuing, including the Ordnance, amounting in the whole to 29,026 men, 1,791,695*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* charge; both which Estimates were referred to the committee of supply.—The Officers of the Ordnance demanded for the ensuing year, one eighth part of the whole charge of the Navy, and one fifth part of the charge of the Army.—A Supply was voted for the entire reduction of Ireland, and securing the peace of this kingdom, and carrying on a vigorous war against France.

Oct. 9, p. m. The house attended their majesties with their Addresses, to which the king replied, "All Addresses from the house of commons are agreeable to me, especially such as express such a respect and affection to my person as this does: I shall always pursue the good and interest of the nation."

The queen answered, "I thank you, gentlemen, for your Address, and I am very glad that I have done any thing to your satisfaction."

Oct. 10. The Estimate of the charge of the Navy was voted reasonable, and the sum was ordered to be raised accordingly.

Oct. 13. A Supply was voted to their majesties for maintaining of an Army of 69,636 men; and Oct. 14, the sum of 2,294,560*l.* was voted for that purpose.

Oct. 16. Towards raising the Supply, an Assessment of 137,641*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* per month, for twelve months, was ordered to be charged on Land, and a Bill was ordered in accordingly.

The Earl of Torrington*, having desired to be heard before the house, touching the matter for which he was in custody, he was brought thither by the marshal of the admiralty, and heard, Nov. 12, and his lordship's relation of the Engagement was delivered in by Mr. Henry Herbert, Nov. 17.

Nov. 21. A Bill for doubling the Excise on Beer, Ale, and other liquors passed.

The King's Speech to both Houses.] Nov. 25. His majesty came to the house of lords, and after passing several Bills, made the following Speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen; I take this occasion, with great willingness, to assure you that I am extremely sensible of the zeal and chearfulness of all your proceedings in this session of parliament, and of the readiness which you, gentlemen of the house of commons, have shown in granting such large supplies towards the pressing occasions of the Navy and Army. And I do farther assure you, that I shall not be wanting, on my part, to see them exactly applied to those uses for which you intend them. At the same time, I must observe to you, that the posture of affairs abroad does necessarily require my presence at the Hague before the end of this year; and, by consequence, I must desire you to lose no time in the dispatching and perfecting such farther Supplies as are still necessary for the Navy and Army, and not for them only, but it is high time also, to put you in mind of making some provision for the expence of the Civil Government; which has no Funds for its support, since the Excise, which was designed for that service, and also the other branches of the Revenue, have been applied to other public uses; and, therefore, I earnestly recommend it to your speedy consideration."

Report concerning Impeachments.] Oct. 30. A Report was made from the committee appointed to inspect Precedents, whether Impeachments continue in statu quo from parliament to parliament, of several Precedents brought from the Tower. After the consideration of which Precedents, and others mentioned in the debate, and reading the orders made the 19th of March, 1678-9, and the 22d of May 1685, concerning Impeachments: and after long debate thereupon and several things moved, the question was put, Whether James earl of Salisbury and Henry earl of Peterborough* shall be now discharged from their bail? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Dec. 20. The substance of his Speech the king repeated (after passing several bills) urging them "to use all possible dispatch, as the posture of affairs abroad would not admit of deferring his journey much beyond that time."

Dec. 23. A Bill was passed for attainting persons in rebellion in England and Ireland, and for applying their estates towards the charge of the war.

Dec. 24. A Sum not exceeding 570,000*l.* was voted to their majesties, for the building of 17 third rate Ships of 80 guns each, and 10 fourth rates of 60 guns each, as desired by his majesty in his last Speech.

The King's Speech at the close of the Session.] Jan. 5, 1690-1.—The king, impatient to be at the congress in Holland, came to the house of lords, and, after passing all the Bills that were ready, made the following Speech:

"My lords and gentlemen; Having lately told you, that it would be necessary for me to go into Holland much about this time, I am very glad to find that the success of your endeavours to bring this session to a happy conclusion, has been such that I am now at liberty to do it. And I return you my hearty thanks for the great dispatch you have made in finishing the Supplies you have designed for carrying on the War; which it shall be my care to see duly and punctually applied to that service for which you have given them. And I do likewise think it proper to assure you, that I shall not make any grant of the forfeited lands in England or Ireland, till there be another opportunity of settling that matter in parliament, in such manner as shall be thought most expedient.—As I have reason to be very well satisfied with the proofs you have given me of your good affection in this session of parliament, so I promise myself the continuance of the same at your return into your several countries. And as every day produces still fresh instances of the restlessness of our enemies, both at home and abroad, in designing against the prosperity of this nation, and the government established, so I do not doubt but that the union and good correspondence between me and my parliament, and my earnest and constant endeavours for your preservation on the one hand, joined with the continuance of your zeal and affection to support me on the other, will, by the blessing of God, be at all times too strong for the utmost malice and contrivance of our common enemies.”*

* The crime these lords were charged with was being reconciled to the Church of Rome.

* See page 648, Note.

The lord chief baron Atkins then declared

* “No session of parliament, in the course of this reign, discovered greater unanimity, loyalty, and liberality, than that which now comes under our observation. The decided superiority of the Tories over the Whigs, in all their conflicts during the preceding session, had damped the spirit of enterprise in the latter, and suggested to them the wiser policy of endeavouring to regain power by concession and complaisance, rather than by open and violent opposition to the measures of the court. A considerable proportion of offices were still left in their hands, and some incidents encouraged them to hope, that, by a gentle and natural progression, their influence in the cabinet might again prevail, and be established. Lord Godolphin, who now began to associate with the leaders of the Whigs, was placed at the head of the Treasury, in the room of sir James Lowther. Sir John Somers held the office of Solicitor General, and by his abilities and virtues, was every day gaining upon the confidence of the king. The Whigs had lately augmented their stock of merit, and strengthened their claims to royal favour, by the readiness and liberality with which they had subscribed to the public Supplies, while their antagonists, preferred to them in trust and office, discovered either want of confidence in the stability of the present government, or want of attachment to it, by being averse to trust their properties in the funds. They enjoyed also a splendid triumph, by still maintaining superior influence in the city of London, notwithstanding the popular and powerful engines which the Tories employed to wrest it out of their hands, by restoring the Charter of the city, and dispensing the favours of the court. The office of mayor, the most honourable, and that of chamberlain, the most lucrative in the city, were filled by Pilkington and Robison, both distinguished partisans of the Whigs.” Somerville.

his majesty's pleasure, That both houses should adjourn to March 31 next ensuing, which they did accordingly*.

March 31, 1691. The house met, and by her majesty's pleasure adjourned to April 28, from thence to May 26, when it was prorogued by commission to June 30; from thence it was prorogued to August 3, from thence to October 5, and from thence to October 22.

THIRD SESSION OF THE SECOND PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech on opening the Session.]
Oct. 22, 1691. The houses met, when his majesty, in the house of lords, made the following Speech to both houses:

“My lords and gentlemen; I have appointed this meeting of parliament as soon as ever the affairs abroad would admit of my return into England, that you might have the more time to consider of the best and most effectual ways and means for the carrying on of the war against France this next year.—I am willing to hope, that the good success with which it hath pleased God to bless my arms in Ireland this summer, will not only be a great encouragement to you to proceed the more cheerfully in this work, but will be looked upon by you as an earnest of future successes, which your timely assistance to me may, by God's blessing, procure us all. And, as I do not doubt but you will take care to pay the Arrears of that Army, which hath been so deserving, and so prosperous in the reducement of Ireland to a peaceable condition, so, I do assure you, that there shall be no care wanting, on my

* The king set out for Holland the next day, but the wind being contrary, he returned to Kensington on the 9th, and seven days after set out again, and after a very dangerous voyage, landed on the 18th. Soon after a most numerous Congress of sovereign princes was held at the Hague, at which king William presided, and where it was resolved to employ 222,000 men against France, of which England was to furnish 20,000. However, the French were so early in the field as to besiege Mons, March 5, and to oblige it to surrender April 1. The king being unable to raise the siege, returned to England April 13. In his absence a Plot had been discovered for restoring king James, laid by the earl of Clarendon, the bishop of Ely, (Dr. Turner), Lord Preston, and his brother, and Penn the Quaker, for which Ashton, a servant of king James's queen, was executed January 23. The king set out again for Holland to take the command of the allied army, April 30, but nothing material ensued in Flanders. Gen. Ginkle completed this summer the reduction of Ireland, by the taking of Athlone, June 30; the victory at Aghrim, July 12; and the taking of Limerick, October 3; for which services he had a pension, and the Thanks of the house of commons, and was created earl of Athlone and baron Aghrim. The events at sea were inconsiderable. The king returned to England October 19.

part, to keep that kingdom as far as it is possible from being burdensome to England for the future.—I do not doubt but you are all sensible, that it will be necessary we should have as strong a Fleet next year, and as early at sea, as we had this summer; and I must tell you, that the great power of France will as necessarily require that we should maintain a very considerable army, ready, upon all occasions, not only to defend ourselves from any insult, but also to annoy the common enemy where it may be most sensible to them; and I do not see how it is possible to do this with less than 65,000 men.—I shall only add, that by the vigour and dispatch of your counsels, and assistance to me in this session of parliament, you have now an opportunity in your hands (which, if neglected, you can never reasonably hope to see again) not only to establish the future quiet and prosperity of these kingdoms, but the peace and security of all Europe.”

Both houses congratulated his majesty upon his safe and happy return after so many hazards to which he had exposed his person, and upon the success of his arms in the Reduction of Ireland; and at the same time they assured him, they would assist him to the utmost of their power, in carrying on a vigorous War against France, in order to procure an honourable and lasting peace to his own dominions, and to secure his neighbours from the injuries and invasions of the Common Oppressor.—They also addressed the Queen, and acknowledged her prudent Administration of the Government, during his majesty's absence.

Oct. 28. A Bill was brought into the commons, ‘For Abrogating the former Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy in Ireland; and appointing the Oaths to king William and queen Mary:’ which, after two or three conferences between the lords and commons, passed both houses, and had the royal assent.

The Thanks of the Commons given to General Ginkle.] The commons ordered the lord Castleton, sir Henry Goodrick, and five more of their Members, to attend general Ginkle, with their Thanks to him and his Officers, for the great services they had done towards the Reduction of Ireland. To which the baron replied, “I acknowledge this distinguishing honour done me by the house of commons, and value it above a triumph. The success of their majesties arms in Ireland, was owing chiefly to the valour of the English; and I will take care to communicate the Vote of the House to the Officers that served in Ireland, and always endeavour the prosperity of their majesties and their government.”

Estimates for the Year 1692.] Nov. 9. The earl of Ranelagh, by his majesty's order, delivered in a List of what Forces the king thought necessary for the next year's service, amounting in the whole, horse, dragoons, and foot, to 64,924 men, and 2,255,671*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* annual pay; and acquainted the house, “That how these Forces should be distributed, his majesty had not yet resolved; but that, how-soever, the king had commanded him to tell this house, That he will keep no more of them in his own dominions than what he shall judge absolutely necessary for their security, and the rest he will transport beyond seas, in order to annoy the common enemy, where it may be most sensible to them.”—And sir Rd. Onslow presented to the house an Estimate of the Charge of the Navy, for the year 1692, amounting in the whole to 30,000 men, and 1,855,054*l.* charge, both which Estimates were referred to the committee of supply.

Debate on the Supply.] The house went into a grand committee on the Supply.

Mr. Foley. The government, for three years past, eleven millions! Never so much was paid to the Navy and Army; and I know not why a third part of eleven millions may not carry on the war for one year. A great deal has been anticipated of what we have given already.

Col. Austin. I believe all are unanimous, that a Fleet is necessary. It is a great charge, and necessary it should be so. You found the effects of the Fleet short last year. These 30,000 men laid at a medium, I should be willing to hear any thing to lessen the charge.

Sir Tho. Clarges. None in this house but think a good Fleet necessary. You had a good fleet last year, and if they had had courage, you might have had a better account from them, having more men, tonnage, and guns, than heretofore; and they had not gone before the enemy last year. We are trusted by the people, and are not to make profusion of their treasure. When we had war with France and Holland, we had not 30, nor 25,000 men: Must all the Fleet be seamen? You will not put your landmen, I hope, only to mount the guards. It is fit they should go upon the fleet. I move, That the committee may examine these particulars. We have been used to these things, and must not lump these things, but examine them. We have flag-ships more than the establishment. When we know more of these things, we may do all that is needful, but nothing that is unnecessary.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You have a great matter before you, and it deserves great consideration; and yet it is endeavoured to have little time for so great a work. You are desired to read over the Particulars, head by head, and grant it. Has the Estimate the several Rates* of Ships? Without that, we can make no computation of men. Every body is for having a Fleet, but is it sufficient that the admiralty do give you in 30,000 men, for you to give money upon it? I find intelligence better at the latter end of the year than the middle: I would know how the French ships came out of Dunkirk†? In the Estimate of 4*l.* 5*s.* a head per month that will require great time how to be made out. When that is given in, I suppose the ships will be in the condition they were in, except in powder and shot; and of that, I suppose, not much spent; and that must make that out still of the 4*l.* 5*s.* per head. It was told us, 'The Vote of 30 ships would give great credit;' but is the naval force to be kept all the year round? We were told they were to be laid up, and now we must pay them as if abroad—And it ought not to be said, 'That, if we do not give speedily, we obstruct the king's business.'

* Neither the Rates, nor Numbers, of the Ships, were mentioned in the Estimate.

† To this, admiral Russel answered, “That the Dutch refused to go to the blockade of Dunkirk, till their compliment came up.”

Sir John Lowther. I do not remember that I said those things I am charged with, of 'obstructing the king's business, &c.' I am far from imposing. I desire to have your justice in this.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Lowther said, 'If we delay, and if the Supply be not immediately considered, the barriers of Flanders may be lost.' But if consideration will produce such fatal effects, then you may vote it immediately.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I think it is for the king's service, and not delay, to examine things. All the equipage for Ireland, men, and what belongs to the army, may be done for 450,000 l. At first sight, it seems to me 3 l. a man will do. We were not out last year till the 20th of June, and if not sooner out next year, we are miserable. In April, we were told they were all ready. I hope we may advise, whether they are too many, or too few. I know not any thing of 'Barriers;' but pray let us be strong at sea; but not hand over head to do things.

Col. Austen. As for the French ships going out of Dunkirk, a man that has not heard of it, lives very privately. Upon enquiry, you will find they came out on the Dutch side, and not on ours.

Sir Ch. Sedley. If one member sits in the house in his buff-coat, and another in his shirt, one will be sweltered, whilst the other's teeth chatter in his head.

A Committee was appointed to inspect the Estimate of the Navy for the year 1692, and to report their opinion.

Enquiries into the Conduct of the Fleet.] Nov. 12. The commons were acquainted, that Mr. Bridges, a member of their house, could give an Account of an information given him by a captain in their majesties Fleet, that sir Ralph Delaval, one of the admirals, had lately taken a French boat going for Ireland, with Papers of dangerous consequence to the government. The house ordered Mr. Bridges to name the person, and he named the lord Danby, son to the marquis of Carmarthen. A conference was then desired with the lords upon matters relating to the safety of the kingdom, but the business did not turn out as was expected. There was no Copy of a Letter from the earl of Nottingham to sir Ralph Delaval, in the intercepted Packet, only a Letter from the earl to sir Ralph, desiring him to send up that packet; so that storm blew over. The commons regulated the Payment of the Forces by effective musters; and enquired into the Miscarriages of the Fleet, the admiralty papers being laid before them, by two of the commissioners, admiral Russel and the lord Falkland; but these Regulations and enquiries raised more than answered the expectations of the people, and were afterwards thought to be intended rather to delay matters than amend them.

Dr. Welwood reprimanded by the House.] About the same time, Dr. Welwood, a physician, noted afterwards for his Memoirs, published a Weekly Paper, entitled, 'Mercurius Reformatus,' but his zeal having carried him farther than was agreeable to the house, on whose proceedings he seemed to reflect, he was ordered into custody of the serjeant at arms, and reprimanded by the Speaker, when he was discharged.

Debate on the Bill for regulating Trials, in Cases of Treason.] Nov. 18. An ingrossed Bill for regulating of Trials in Cases of Treason, was read the third time.

Sir Charles Sedley. Good kings, good lawyers, and good judges, are perishable commodities. If the duke of Somerset, at his Tryal, had had counsel, he had not omitted demanding the benefit of clergy. An impotent, lame, or aged man, by law, had his champion. Good-enough was one that Cornish hated; and it was not probable he would commit a secret to him. Cornish had Evidence for him, but not to be believed, because not upon oath; but I find sheriffs and juries are not provided for in the Bill.

Mr. Finch. If any thing in this bill be for weakening the government, I am against it; but if not, I am for it. What is there in this, that makes it easier to commit Treason, or less tryable, than before? all that is desired, is a just and lawful defence, at a man's trial. But will you say, the government is weakened, because a man has an easier way of defence? What are the parts of the bill that are new? a copy of the indictment, and witnesses for the prisoner upon oath, and counsel, that's new, and no overt act to be given in evidence, but what is laid in the indictment. Now, in all this, where is the mischief to the government? Shall it be said, that a man may commit Treason safely, with a copy of his indictment, and witnesses sworn to tell truth? there must be proofs of the overt act, and one is sufficient, and he prepares accordingly. As, a consultation to destroy the king in such a place, and a man proves himself in another place, and must recollect himself where he was, and have witnesses to prove it: this has been so practised. This provides (that the prisoner may be enabled to make his just defence) that he shall know all the facts charged against him. Suppose but one overt act, that must be laid; and it does not discover the king's evidence; where is then the objection, that two overt acts be laid? this is far from giving protection for Treason; but gives opportunity to the prisoner to make a fair defence. If a man be witness to the Treason, he is so still, though witness to the confession. I would have no man start that objection, 'That less than two witnesses is sufficient.' But there was a time when one witness was allowed, by no less a man than judge Popham, in sir Walter Raleigh's case. You take not away his confession: The words of the Bill are, 'Unless he confesses in open court, &c.' All you do provide, is, that there shall be two witnesses; but if he confess in open court, and the court record the same, that alters the question. Standing mute is a confession of the fact, though the prisoner forfeits not his lands, nor attaints his blood. But to throw this bill out, gentlemen must say, there is not one good thing in it. There is nothing made new in the bill, that makes an impunity for treason. That the copy of the indictment is to be delivered to the prisoner, in ten days, if he requires it; it is good in Middlesex, if he requires it, but not in country assizes, which cannot stay so long. If a man be to be tried for Treason, and the safety of the government be concerned, there may be a special commission of Oyer and Terminer; but it is said, 'That is to bring a farther charge upon the government;' but is there any comparison, that a man must lose his life for a few days stay? But a commission of Oyer and Terminer solves all objections of the safety of the government. The limitation of the time, for three years, cannot enervate the government; 'tis hardly possible to imagine, but that, in three years, the crime may be detected and prosecuted, or the person repent and be pardoned. Where then is the safety of the government concerned? 'Tis impossible he should not be detected in that time, or the thing repented of, and no ill effect of it. This may take away the venom that some persons may fall under after twenty years, and rake up a charge against a person.

Mr. Attorney Treby. Whatsoever is useful to the subject, and does not bring insecurity to the government, I am for. The lives of men are precious, but the lives of the king and queen are as precious, in which all our lives are bound up; and it deserves the highest consideration. This Bill was ushered in by reason of the hardship in the late times, in Trials for Treason; but I see little in the bill to obviate those miscarriages. The fault was not in the law, but in the men. When judges determine the law, in one case, one way, and in another case, another way, the judges convict themselves. In Fitzharris's Case, they were of opinion, 'That he ought to be tried by freeholders.' In col. Sidney's Case, all the judges of England resolved, 'That the law was not so.' If so, the greatest preservation of the people is to preserve us out of the hands of such judges, which I hope the Bill of Rights does sufficiently provide for. The best way is to preserve their present majesties, who, I hope, will never permit such men to come into places of judicature. In the preamble of the Bill, it is, 'That the prosecution of treason may be justly tried;' it seems to me improper. In treason, the blood of the heir is not corrupted; but he cannot derive from that ancestor.

This bill extends to clipping and coining, and all the lesser parts of treason. The copy of the indictment can be of no other use than to inform the prisoner of the matter. 'Tis to enable him himself, but not to help the person by the slip of a word, or a letter, to evade trial. As for being allowed counsel, in every treason, it would make trials long; and all mens cases are alike, when dressed up by art of counsel. To the objection of evidence, two witnesses, or confession of the party, &c. perhaps he may have confessed the treason before a hundred people. If this be the evidence, you take from the crown; he may brag of the treason before a thousand people, and go unpunished. Here in London, when the term comes at Essoign day, the sessions cease, and the prisoner cannot be tried, unless by a new commission; and counsel must attend the trial of the meanest clipper or coiner. All criminal justice is best done flagrante crimine. If a man clip or coin, what will his repentance signify, in three years, when all the money is spoiled? This bill does so much weaken the hands of the government, that it ought not to pass. If you resolve that the bill shall be rejected, no part of it can be brought in again this session. I would preserve any part of the bill that is useful, but not pass it as it is.—The Bill was then passed.

This day, 1,575,890*l.* was granted for the Charge of the Navy, including the Ordnance, for the year 1692.

Nov. 19. The earl of Ranelagh, by his majesty's order, laid before the house a distribution of the Land-Forces, mentioned in the Estimate, viz. 10,916 men in England, 12,960 in Ireland, 2,038 in Scotland, and 960 in the West Indies. Total 26,874. Remain to be transported beyond seas 38,050.

Debate on the Supply.] The house went into a grand committee on the Supply.

Mr. Foley. Consider what our state is, besides Land-Tax, and Excise, &c. If you find yourself at a loss for Money, and must anticipate, you must double your land-tax, and at last pay half your revenue. I see not why we should raise so many men, and maintain them. You are told, 'That it is to make an end of the war at once.' But suppose the French beat us; and what hopes have we, if the Fleet be in no better hands?—I am of opinion, that a lesser number of men may serve for a diversion. I fear things are not rightly represented to the king. Suppose we land, and take a French port, and then you engage for ever after to keep footing in France. In the Rolls we find, that, when Money was asked by Edw. 3, to maintain what he had conquered in France, the parliament answered, 'They were concerned only to keep England, and not what was conquered in France.'

Sir John Guise. Foley said, 'He could not consent to the number of men proposed;' but he tells you not why. I suppose we are to defend ourselves by sea. You have two thirds of the Fleet, and the Dutch one third. If the mouths of their rivers be taken away, their strength is taken away; and how can they supply you? If you did so distress the French last year, much more now, as you can draw your men out of Ireland. Have you brought France to this pitch, and will you leave it? When I voted a War against France, I was in earnest, and I have not abated since this war. I see not that any body wears less, spends less, or does less, than before. It is not only honourable, but safe, for you to continue your number of men.

Sir John Thompson. I know not for others, what they have done; but I have found decay in my little income; and we have every where complaints. If we consider what merchants have lost, and money carried abroad, and that foreign merchants carry out your freight, I think it is a sign we are poor. I would have this so carried on, as to have something to give when we come again. I may make a conclusion, though not able to make premises, in the war. If we cannot force France to a battle, you will do as little next year, as you have done in this. In the several Heads given you in, there are 12,000 men for Ireland, and yet you have been told, 'That it would support itself;' and 10,000 men for England, and we had not near so many when the French invaded us. Really I am afraid of a Standing Army. We have the skeleton, though not the body, of the forces. I look upon this war with France to be merely a colour. Pray put the thing Head by Head.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You have several Heads before you, and proper, as has been moved. It is an irregular motion, 'To put it Head by Head.' If you vote, 'That 65,000 men are to be the number,' then you bring Scotland and Ireland on your head. Pray therefore put the first general question 'for England.'

Sir Tho. Clarges. You have been told of the confederacy, 'That you might lay hold of this opportunity to keep them.' I was, and am, of opinion, that our coming into the Alliance is a greater strength to the confederates, than any force by land, and far more able to distress France, and that the most natural way is to continue the war, where he grows so great, by sea; if we would make ourselves masters of America, and recover what we have lost there. As we are an island, we are to consider, that, if the French have all the seventeen provinces, and we are superior at sea, we may still be safe, and for what belongs to us. But in the aid required of us, though Ireland is reduced, yet there is but an abatement of 4000 men. To prosecute the War totis viribus must be understood. When in parliament, former taxes were the sparable part of our estates, if we are unsuccessful in this war, what will become of us? I desire that we may manage this war with as much frugality as we can. I am sure that 16,000 men did recover Ireland formerly.

Sir Robert Howard. First we are told, 'We are not able.' If so, then there is an end; but as to that, I hope we are able. Next we are told of 'an Army to enslave us;' but no danger of that under a king that has courage. In the former reign, there were great preparations against France, and nothing done. I hope to see an English army act by itself, and the king at the head of it. If your Navy be strong, and in conjunction with the Dutch, you will provoke the French to come out with their fleet, and you may land where you please. The king is clear in all points with you; there is no mistrust in him; and therefore I would leave it to the king's judgment, for the number for beyond sea; and you may, I hope, from hence send all the provisions.

Sir Tho. Clarges. That the king is a valiant and wise prince, all agree; but he acts by advice; and so it is sent to us; but if we do not come up to the desires of such men, then we are told, 'We are against the king, and hinder his business.' I hope we shall hear no more of that; we are all here to advise what is to be done; but this great sum demanded for those men is half the current cash of the nation, and if we maintain an army of 40,000 men abroad, I fear we shall have none left for common defence another year.

Mr. Hampden. I have heard reflections formerly, but if a gentleman speaks in commendation of his prince, it is no reproach upon a man, who, in his speech, says nothing of it; but I do think a Standing Army is dangerous. But when it is said, 'The matter of the war with France is but a colour.' Do you think France will use you well that you may put yourselves into his hands? I know, that in my country the middle sort are willing to carry on the war; but if I hear or see nothing against this number of men, if you have hopes that the lion is not so fierce as he is painted, I hope you will agree to the number.

Sir John Thompson. As for the descent upon France, I have heard of orders for 16,000 horse and foot to march through the heart of England. 'A colour,' is the appearance of an argument, with really no force in it; a figure: No man is to be offended at the commendation of the king, but when an argument has not force in itself to force its way, that calls me up.

Mr. Attorney Treby. This discourse is of so great a nature that all gentlemen engage in it. It propounds to dissect the articles, and take them Head by Head. I am against it. When you had the List of the Fleet, you did it by the lump, and I think there is the same reason now. I take all to be one Army, 38,000 beyond sea, and so the less need here. No part of your freedom ought to be taken away. Freedom of debate here is as tender as the apple of the eye, and as general all over England. You come here with 'local wisdom,' as lord Bacon calls it. I speak a positive truth, when I say, the king is a great captain. But to clear some objections to the king's Speech. If the Confederacy break, the Germans disband, and the Dutch make peace, and truckle under France, then you cannot possibly be defended without a Standing Army, and standing Fleet too. The naval force, all the world over, is in the French hands, and yours, and how far may the Dutch, in conjunction with the French, (and we alone,) undermine us? The war was your advice for trade, and you resolve to go through with the war, to secure your trade, that it may be no longer in his power to disturb England; and that is the end you would be at. The question is then, Whether you can do this without such a force as this? I would answer one objection, viz. 'Not to give such a Supply as to conquer France.' I know not how we shall conquer Paris, but I would not have France conquer us. If we cannot carry this on, we have nothing left but prayers and tears; but I hope we shall not come to that. Can we think that France will use us better than his protestant subjects? Consider what we have promised the king: I hope we shall make it good. We have not, for a long time, had such a warlike prince as this. All this points to us what the king has said, 'If this opportunity be lost, we shall never have the same again.' I would not go through it by halves, but have such a force as the king may confide in. By doing it at one stroke, I hope we shall be secured from all this. It was said by a gentleman, 'That the French king knows what we do.' I believe it; I wish he did not know what we say. I do not doubt of what force the king has proposed.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. The proper question is, Whether to proceed Head by Head? Then consider, when you have voted 65,000 men, you engage to make that number good. If so, we must have the charge of all Ireland, and all Scotland. If so, to what purpose will you vote them, if you are not interested to maintain them? You are told, 'That if you vote them not, the allies will go off;' but last year they went in with their quota. It was never advised to keep our quota, and to go into France with a separate army. Possibly we may agree one Head, and not come up to the other. A general question takes away all liberty of debate. The Fleet to make a descent into France, is quite a different Head from the Army.

Sir Thomas Clarges. By the motion of a general question, our liberty to advise is taken away. You are told (by Capel) 'That queen Elizabeth was not limited;' there was not a number of men named, but the parliament gave two subsidies, and four fifteenths, and left it to her judgment, and when no extraordinary use was made of it, it returned to the subject again. They that give a negative, are not against an army, but what numbers they shall be limited to; proposing men differs little from money. It will look like a parliament of Paris; the king to propose, and they to verify it. Nothing of Scotland and Ireland is proposed. Let us not have sums and money, but Heads, proposed to us.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, That an Army of 64,924 men is necessary for the service of the year 1692, in order to the securing the peace of the kingdom, and the carrying on a vigorous War against France." Which was agreed to by the house.

Nov. 25. The house went again into a grand committee on the Supply.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I find all Establishments, since the Change, are a third part more than formerly. This Estimate of 65,000 men is sufficient for 200,000 men. This war, I am afraid, will not be done in a year; therefore I would do it so as our estates may bear.

Mr. Hampden. This is most proper, when you come to particular parts of the Army. You may address the king to apply as much as may be of the Civil List to maintain the Army.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I know not the consequence of such an Address to the king in matter of money. I propose that the question may be 'That officers and soldiers may be included in this List.'

Sir John Lowther. The general-officers advised a greater number than the king has proposed, which are so many men, besides officers.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If 16,000 men in Ireland be commanded by Protestants, they will make 35,000. They are now warlike, and at the battle of Aghrim they were not above 18,000 men. A gentleman that knows well, a commissioner of the revenue in Ireland, said, 'That 6,000 men were sufficient to be sent into Ireland.' I would not have 36,000 men named, and not above 20,000 paid. I hope we shall have effective men, and no collusion nor deceit. Till the Militia were armed, there was no considerable service done in Ireland.

Sir John Lowther. I hope the number of men will not always be necessary, only for the present, since the expence, I hope, will be but for one year. I hope this exception, by a side-wind, will not cut off your intention.

Sir John Thompson. I wonder what Lowther means by 'A side-wind;' if there be any, it is the supernumerary forces. We voted but 65,000 men; if the Officers came to more, it was not in the Vote; and I appeal to the house, if they did not mean Officers? It could never be thought that you meant by your Vote an Army of men without officers.

Sir John Lowther. If that Vote did include officers, you are in the right. For ought I know, this cuts off several thousands of men;—and officers not being included, your Vote stands.

Sir Tho. Clarges. You have resolved upon 64,500 men. We went not Head by Head on the Estimate, but lumped it, and I thought not fit to ravel into that. Whatever was intended by any private person, who brought the Paper of the Numbers, &c. it was the Resolution of the house such an Army; and I am a little scandalized at this: I know not by what figure in rhetoric, 'Men' is without 'Officers.' You may raise the mob for an army, at that rate. The reason why I put in Officers now, is, because the house was deceived, for we find in the Accounts only for private men. By your Vote you may determine this matter.

Sir Henry Goodrick. When Charles 2 declared war against France, in 1677, there were 1,000 men in each regiment, not including Officers. You have precedents for this demand; if there be any precedents of Officers included, I am the most mistaken in the world.

Sir Tho. Clarges. He says, 'That in the year 1677, Charles 2's officers were not included in the number;' but then we had plain dealing, and the house went Head by Head; there were a hundred in a company, besides officers; but now you come to lump. Then we had our debate free: Now you come to vote what your Army consisted of, and what meant by the word 'Army.' You had 38 or 39,000 men paid in Ireland, and had not 20,000 at Aghrim battle. My question is a plain question, 'That the numbers shall not be inclusive to Officers.' If we shall have more men than officers for them, I hope they will be reduced too.

Earl of Ranelagh. I stand up to inform you, that in every company of foot there will be eleven Officers, not included in the number of men set down. They will come to 11,000, in all, not included.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This lord tells you of what Numbers are given in; perhaps you will say, the same officers that now command 50, may command 100. When you include Officers, then you will provide Numbers and Men, and till you determine Numbers of Money, you cannot determine Numbers of Officers. Must it be taken for granted, that the house has no judgment in this matter? You did formerly resolve numbers in regiments, and till then you cannot tell numbers of officers. When you are come off from this of Ireland, the rest will follow.

Sir John Lowther. If you cut off 11,000 from your Vote, for ought I know, the king may come with such an unequal force, that he may be either beaten, or come off with a dishonourable peace.

Col. Titus. I was much startled when I heard of an abatement of 11,000 men. I never knew but three officers in a company. Drummers and pipers may be officers as well as others. If officers be no part of an Army, then some gentlemen are in the right.

Sir John Lowther. If 11,000 men will be deducted, I am not for that question. If officers, drummers, and serjeants, be deducted, I agree that three officers may be deducted.

Sir Robert Rich. I shall always stick to the true interest of the nation. To have a division for 2,000, I think not for the interest of the king nor the nation.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I believe it not the intention of any man to lessen your Vote of 64,000 men; and I hope no intention to increase it. But to talk of an Army and not Officers, I believe the notion never entered into any man's head as tied to that Vote of 64,000 men; for it is not to lessen them.

Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the 12,960 men for Ireland do consist of Officers and Soldiers, making up that number." Which was agreed to by the house.

Debate on the Accounts and Observations delivered by the Commissioners of Accounts; and on Secret Service Money paid to Parliament-Men.] Dec. 3. Sir Tho. Clarges. The lords have ordered the Commissioners of Accounts to send them their Accounts under their hands and seals. I would know, whether they should go in person to the lords, or are the commissioners to send their secretary with them?

Mr. Tho. Howard. I heard my name read in this Book of Accounts, for 50 and 100*l.* to Mr. Kingsmill and myself: both have had pensions from king Charles paid all this while, and in king James's time; and application has been made to this king, who made some objections to persons names; but it is in my name, and I do receive it. I am sorry it has gone so far. I owe all to the protection of the government, but nothing to the bounty of it.

Sir John Thompson. I stand amazed that, in the best times and governments, things should be in such darkness. I hope not to live to that day to see the house of commons one of the Grievances of the nation. When we see Grievances, I hope, if this house cannot take them away, it will not establish them. I believe we are under the best of kings, but never was so much goodness so abused. The Accounts are amazing things. We were told last session, 'Country gentlemen understood not Accounts,' and now, it seems, the Commissioners of the Treasury do not. If they understand not Secret Service, then they are not fit for their places. It is our misfortune, the person (Mr. Jephson) is dead that should give you Account. I would know, whether the secretary, or the lords, understand your Accounts? When they have directions from the king. So much given to Members. I am sorry money goes so little for merit as in former ages. Captains of ships put in for money: old methods will bring in new judgments. I am afraid some men have taken up old vices, which others have left. I would have this house begin with themselves. I do declare, I never had one penny from the king, nor ever will have.

Sir John Lowther. As to that part of the discourse of the gentleman that spoke last, I agree that I am not fit for my place in the Treasury. I shall be much easier out of it, and I hope I shall leave it. I remember an accident of that gentleman, at an accusation last session for drinking king James's health [was ready to faint away]. It is strange now to make reflections of being gagged by Offices. As for the Accounts, I dare be bold to say, some things are mistaken, and some of importance omitted, and nothing in them, but was transmitted last session. You have an Account of 18 millions, to raise a dust to blind you. All the Aids amount not to 11 millions, not much above ten. If you reckon the lawyers, and the money come out of the country, that is a double reckoning; but to say 18 millions, when in reality, not 11, is not fair. Not having yet had the copy of the Accounts, I cannot say much. As for king James's debt, upon the Revolution of the government, the Receivers did very wisely to pay themselves. The next thing objected to is, in the Accounts of Tallies struck, before money came in. It was for no more than 200,000*l.* borrowed of the City at a time, and that at the beginning of the year, when Sea and Land are at the greatest charges. People will not go on, if neither money nor credit. Some services press more than others, as Navy-Stores, wear and tear. If you strike not tallies of credit before hand, it will cost at the latter end of the year 2 or 300,000*l.* It had been worth the consideration of the Commissioners, to have consulted the several Offices of the Ordnance. I did hope this as well worthy of observation as the rest. For Secret Service, in the beginning of the reign, there was a great deal. Though remote from the Heads, you will find for the future much less, which now are put upon the proper distribution. As for Money to Members, you see all before you, and is there any thing like corrupting of votes? I believe, if all that sum were tendered to some persons, they would not do so base a thing; and if I would reflect upon the government, I should say it is a great fault in allowing so little Money for Secret Service. Cromwell gave more at a time for Secret Service, in the court of France, than all this comes to. For the plate of ambassadors to be returned, &c. there is now a Tryal depending with lord Castlemaine, and all diligence possible used in it. As to lord Griffin, in all ages, and at all times, Accounts have passed by privy-seal: and for the good of the subject it should be so. Shall Accounts be lost, and not have a discharge by privy seal? But if it be to the prejudice of the crown, or the subject, then it is a failure. For Ireland, the musters were taken in winter, when the Army was at the weakest, and the irregular time of the musters was to the disadvantage of the army, not of the nation. Thus things have occurred to me, as I heard the observations read; but there are some things that I wonder have escaped their observation, when Accounts have been sent three or four times back, and not perfected; and this is one of the crying shames of the government. The next thing is, how your Money is spent in the economy of the Navy? The king took his own dividend in the East India Company, 7,000*l.* to pay them, nay the very crown jewels, if I may say so. I should be glad any man abler than myself may be employed in the Treasury.

Sir John Thompson. I confess I am not so fit for employment as that gentleman; but should have been faithful, as I believe of him. I am not so angry as he, but, I observe, touch a place that is sore, and there will be some extraordinary motion. I cannot turn my words like a courtier. I wonder that gentleman should go so far back as the last session, when the house was satisfied with me. I was forced by king James to give 200*l.* for my quietus for my patent of barrister; so that I had no such intimacy with the government then. I never did accept of Bribes for my Vote here, nor ever was offered any. I did then clear myself, and I could wish that gentlemen would do so too.

Sir Tho. Clarges. Lowther has frankly arraigned the Commissioners, and I did expect you would have called him to the bar to have answered his Accusation. He tells you, 'The Commissioners have omitted several material things;' but the commissioners could not proceed farther, not having the particular Accounts of the Navy, Army, Ireland, or the Ordnance, before them. The commissioners did think fit to allow all the extraordinary charges upon Revolutions. My memory is not so good as to take all the Heads, as he has done; but what he says is an accusation. We cannot be wiser than God has made us, nor, I believe, that gentleman neither. Pray read the observations.

Sir Robert Rich. I thought, by Lowther's first speech, he had been a good accomptant, and he seems to be none at all, when he confesses he never read the Accounts. If the manner of the Account displeases him, we should have been infinitely obliged to him for his company, if his weighty affairs would have permitted him. But one expression is strange; to arraign the commissioners of casting a mist before the eyes of the house;—it was next to something else. He said it in that soft language before; he durst not say otherwise here. [Mr. Hampden took him down to Order, but proceeded not.]—I will not repeat the expression again, but nothing can be harder expressed. To the Observations, he said, 'There might have been more Observations.' I could have wished there had been occasion for none.

Sir John Lowther. I know not that it is a reflection for an omission to be taken notice of. I have had my share as hardly on that as any man. If a man's honour must not be vindicated here, I must take occasion to do it in another place.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. I would know why these Accounts were not brought to the commissioners in due time? The last session, provisions for Londonderry, and ships, lay here, ready laden, after it was relieved.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We sent out above 300 precepts the last time; the last time given was a day in June, but we had none of those Accounts, though sent article by article. We did desire, that the accomptants in Ireland should make oath there, and answer the Objections: We could not have those Accounts brought us in any time.

Sir Stephen Fox. I only desire to appeal to the commissioners, whether I did not appear according to their summons? They gave me liberty to state my Accounts in two months; but since, they could not take any more accounts till they made their report here.

Sir Tho. Clarges. If they did not obey our orders, we had no manner of coercion, as the commissioners of Brook-House, who had power of committing to prison upon contempt. I tell you in general, once for all, we have punctually observed your order in the Accounts of Incomes and Issues.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. If accomptants make not up their accounts in 3 years, what can the commissioners do, when the accounts of 1688 are not made up till 1689? I think it reasonable that, in a year and a half, they be brought to your auditor, when now all is in the dark.

Sir Tho. Clarges. When we called for the Account of the King's Houshold, we found some accounts not made up in ten years; as the king's Chamber, &c. Of the Taxes, since Charles 2, no account has been made these 30 years. I know not if greater business, or more profitable, has diverted them. The Exchequer is very exact in their method; but, if neglected, I know not where the fault lies.

Sir Benjamin Newland. We have set down, without altering one letter, as Mr. Jephson has delivered it to us. But for us to make alterations, it was not fit; but we have delivered it as we received it.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. You say, but 7 per cent. shall be given for interest, and they give 9 per cent. Your funds will miscarry, when you so increase your interest. As for the Land tax, it was a certain fund, and needed not to increase interest; at this rate, your interest will eat out all your funds.

Mr. Waller. It is plainly made out, that this is a breach of your act of parliament. I remember, an oath was proposed to be given to the lords of the treasury; they objected against that, because by it they should be obliged to pay the Bankers Debt. I hope we shall not pass this over without censure.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I take it, that this Fund of Credit was to take up money before it came in. The occasions of the government pressed them so far, that they could not take up half they wanted.

Sir Stephen Fox. We have ever struck tallies of anticipation; it is impossible, as this government stands, to have done otherwise; the necessity is unavoidable, and we had not done our duties to the nation if we had done otherwise.

Sir Christ. Musgrave. Your present consideration is, Whether tallies have not been struck before money was actually lent. If I heard right, I think it was owned they had struck for Seamen's Wages, before the money was actually received. Our present question is, Whether tallies have not been struck before the money was actually borrowed? Lowther says, 'You paid the Dutch for the money they lent you;' but must you pay the interest, before the money comes in? Why paid we interest to advance money to them, when we might have had it at the interest allowed?

Mr. Hampden. The king did borrow money, and paid interest for it. The Dutch had not, nor desired interest, till the time the money came into the exchequer.

Sir Wm. Strickland. I question not, but that the commissioners of accounts will tell you who paid not for their patents for their Offices, and I hope you will make them refund. I have an account of those who have had Patents, and have not paid for them.

Sir Edw. Seymour. The commissioners of accounts, whom you have trusted in this service, have reason to be exempted from paying for their patents; but, as for other officers, it is hard the king should pay for the patent, and, as I hear, likewise to pay for their charges in executing that patent.

Sir Robert Rich. By all the inspections I have made, I find no such covenant made.

Sir Robert Howard. The king not only pays for the patent, but for the taxes of the profit of their patent.

Sir Tho. Clarges. I do not say, the Treasurer of the Navy is under the qualification of this Head. He has 3,000*l.* a year salary; but I think no fees can be taken by any officer whatever, but by act of parliament, or from time to time immemorial. I remember, Mr. Vaughan, (when a member here) did plainly and positively assert, 'That no officer could take Fees, but what have been used from time immemorial, or hung up in a Table, or settled by act of parliament.' We find great sums to Offices charged for Fees. We had power for the best of our service, and we sent to the greatest officers to know what Fees. They said, 'They could not, upon oath, say 'Legal Fees,' but what had been taken formerly by other officers.' A poor captain, of 6*s.* 8*d.* a day, pays 6 or 7*l.* for his commission. When you have the persons, and subject matter, before you, then you are ready for Resolution.

Mr. Foley. The Receiver General of the Customs, in king Charles's and king James's times, had 1,000*l.* per ann. salary; the Comptroller of the Customs had 6 or 700*l.* per ann. By the new impositions, this brought his place even to Receivers of the Customs. For Mr. Kent's Fees, he alleges Lidcott for his precedent. Now he has 1,300*l.* per ann. so much as to maintain a coach and six horses.

Sir W. Strickland. When we grow poor, I would not have others grow rich. I would not increase Salaries, that had sufficient before. I hope they shall be made to refund, and be reduced to be as before. I would have the Commissioners of Accounts lay before you this Head, before you vote.

Mr. Foley. As for the Officers Fee-farm of the Customs, all other profits being taken away from them, it was thought fit they should have Pensions for life, and now 'tis continued to their sons.

Debate on Money for Secret Service to Parliament-men.] Sir Jn. Lowther. I think the words of the act of parliament are pursued. I dare say, this is not a matter at all that comes into the cognizance of the Commission of Accounts. The Lords of the Treasury think it a part of their duty, not to enquire into matters of state; as foreign Ministers, and Members of this house.

Mr. Foley. 'Tis said, by Lowther, 'That he thought not this fit for our enquiry.' Mr. Jephson would tell us what Pensions were paid to Parliament men, but not what sums. After

Mr. Jephson's death, we had his clerk, Mr. Squib, before us, who said, 'It was the king's pleasure, not to have Account of sums of money, and it was a great deal for the king's service not to have sums named.' We have it, we received it, and lay it before you.

Sir Charles Sedley. This is new to our ears, and foreign to story. We give great sums, but must not receive. For service for the state, 'tis allowable; but for Secret Service, no parliament man ought to be ashamed. I am an old parliament man, but a young speaker. One in my company, when I was young, would needs give the fiddlers two or three pieces, though he loved music as little as I; but he went shares with the fiddlers. If the service can be distinguished betwixt the capacity of a parliament man, and Secret Service, let us know it. As it appears to me, it seems a reflection upon every member: therefore I would enquire into it.

Sir W. Strickland. For Secret Service of state, was formerly, in that parliament called 'The Pensioner Parliament.' If this was given for public service, let it be owned. This may be the reason we go on so slowly. Let every gentleman lay his hand upon his heart, and declare and vote, 'That whoever has received Money is an enemy to the king and kingdom, and the liberties of the people.'

Mr. Goodwin Wharton. If this comes to any great or considerable sum, as I hope it will not, it may endanger the government; as in king Charles 2nd's time, when the Books were brought before the house.* I hope you will do some such thing now.

Lord Castleton. The herd will not suffer wounded deer to herd with them. These sort of men endangered king Charles, and threw out king James; and God bless king William and queen Mary!

Mr. Comptroller Wharton. I stand not up to oppose any motion; for indeed you have not any regular motion before you. But, since I hear a gentleman's name (Mr. Jephson) who is not alive to answer for himself, I had a friendship for him, and I think he did deserve it, and would not have had a hand in any such thing. Something he told me, after he had been with the Commissioners of Accounts, and positively he affirmed, 'That no sum of money was paid, but what was very justifiable.' And the nature of the thing he told me too. Sums were given to two members, for discoveries; the members never touched it themselves, but handed it to two persons who made the discovery.

Sir Tho. Clarges. We did send to Mr. Jephson, who did open himself very reasonably in the matter. He thought the precept was not full, and desired it to be explained; and he had it in the words he desired: he then did tell us, as Mr. Wharton has said, 'That it was for a service of such a nature, that he thought it of no service to the Commissioners to have it known; but if they insisted upon it, they should have it,' but a week after he died.

Sir Robert Rich. When Mr. Jephson was pressed, at our Board, he was asked, 'What he hesitated at?' he said, 'Some in both houses were concerned; in the one and other house four.' He said positively, 'It was not for their own use, but upon discoveries to others; but positively not to themselves.'

Ordered, "That the Commissioners appointed for taking the public Accompts do lay before this house, 1. A List of all such persons who have Salaries, and have made the king pay the Charge of passing their Patents, and passing their Accompts, as also the Taxes upon their offices. 2. A List of those that have great Salaries, and have upon slight pretences, got them increased; and who have had extraordinary Bills of incident Charges easily allowed. 3. A List of the Salaries which were granted upon special reasons; and which are still continued, though the reasons are ceased.—4. A List of the excessive Fees that are exacted and taken by the Officers that have great Salaries allowed them for execution of their places, and for which no legal precedent appears to justify the same."

Debate on Fuller's Information.] Dec. 9. Mr. Fuller,† upon his request, was brought to the bar of the house of commons to make his discovery, &c.; who gave an Account of his intrigue with the Lords in the Tower, prisoners; and, 'That they sent Letters and Messages by him to the late queen, and the French king.' He then proceeded as follows:—"One of the letters from the earl of Aylesbury I opened, which assured the queen of his fidelity, and desire 'That the French would send 30,000 men, and he engaged to rise by June next, and they should be ready to receive them.' This was in February last. Two Letters were sent to the late queen, in a bone of mutton, one from the earl of Feversham. Several of both houses did promise such matters as to cause the people to rebel. The earl of Litchfield intreated, 'That the landing might be in June or July, and he would be ready, when the French land-

* It was whispered, 'That part of this money (20,000*l.*) was for the purchase of Nottingham house, at Kensington.' Grey.

† "The amusement given to both houses by this William Fuller was one cause of delay to the Supplies. The Conspiracy of the Papists in Lancashire to raise a Rebellion in the kingdom, in order to introduce king James, was attested by several witnesses, which the Jacobites were so dexterous as to take off, either by fair, or violent means. But, nevertheless, their sinister designs being confirmed by the Papers taken with lord Preston, and several other circumstances, which amounted to an actual demonstration, some persons of note were secured, and search made after others; which brought the business to be examined before the commons. At this juncture, Fuller, who was a prisoner in the King's Bench, set up for an evidence, and, at his own desire, was brought to the bar of the commons." Tindal.

* See vol. iv. p. 1142.

ed, to join several thousands.' I did open the letter from lord Preston, declaring his fidelity to king James and the queen; and, 'That he would raise men in the north of England, if the French would land there.' (He named the earls of Peterborough, Salisbury, and others.) Salisbury declared, by father Emanuel, 'That he would advance 4000*l*.' King James's Declaration was dispersed by Dr. Gray, and sir Adam Blair. Salisbury's money should be advanced by Father Emanuel, (who was still in England) and he valued not a warrant to take him, he had such friends in the secretary's office, and in the king's house.—The late queen gave me a letter to the earls of Castlemaine and Feversham. King James had friends in the king's council, of whose service he was well assured. There was a commission to six lords to manage affairs in England, as if king James was in person in England. Bills of Exchange were sent by me. The marquis of Halifax was the first in the said commission. There were 23,000 listed, to join with the French. I must humbly crave the protection of the house, till I bring a gentleman to confirm what I have said. The archbishop of Canterbury (Sancroft) encouraged the matter as much as possible; but the earl of Portland would not meet the gentlemen that should discover. The archbishop was not able to give the gentlemen a protection. He wrote to lord Portland, and his secretary wrote to him, 'That it was not in his lord's sphere, nor could he have money.' I was by warrant committed to prison, and that prevented the gentleman coming in to discover. I will forfeit my life, if the house will give me leave to send for this gentleman into Flanders, who will confirm what I have said." [He withdrew.]

Mr. Chadwick. Fuller has named lord Portland, and my lord of Canterbury; I presume to inform you, what I know of this gentleman. He has made some believe that he knows something, but not so much as he pretends to. The king has been acquainted with all he has laid before you. I went often to him, to bring him to several points, but whenever he came to fixing time and place, he always shuffled, and pretended want of Papers. He fixed for lord Portland at Kensington, but he never kept his time. I thought fit to tell you this, and I am afraid you will find him a very shuffling fellow.

Sir John Guise. I have heard a scandalous report of this fellow. Mr. Crone was condemned upon this man's evidence.

Fuller came in again, and said.—"I saw an Address from the lords to the French king, for assurance to restore king James, from the late archbishop of Canterbury, the dukes of Norfolk, Newcastle, and Beaufort; the earls of Mulgrave, Clarendon, Aylesbury, Castlemaine, and Scarsdale; the bishops of Durham and Ely; the lords Grey, Widdrington, Forbes, and Teynham; William Penn, and Berkshire Howard: there were near forty more, but I could not take all their names, because colonel Parker called for the Address, to carry it to the queen. The queen said, 'There were several persons in both houses.' And Father Emanuel said, 'He had friends in the king's council, and the secretary's office;' and the queen told me, 'If any did trouble me, to apply to lord Godolphin; and that lord Feversham, and several others, would assist him,' as lord Preston and lord Aylesbury."

VOL. V.

Sir Charles Sedley. This young man has accused so many, that was he an angel from Heaven, I should not believe him, he has accused so many considerable persons.

Colonel Cornwall. One of the king's messengers was concerned in taking Fuller into custody; pray let him be called in.

Mr. Howe. One thing will convince me of the credit or falsity of this person. He says, 'The archbishop of Canterbury would meet him, and lord Portland put it off; and Mr. Chadwick said, 'He failed lord Portland.'

Mr. Chadwick. I went to Fuller, and he appointed Friday night positively to meet him; but no Fuller, nor any from him. I went again, and appointed another time at Kensington, and then the fire was there; but he failed twice before.

